Bill To Award California Electors To Popular Vote Winner Vetoed. The New York Times (10/3, Times, 1.21M) reports, "Saying it ran 'counter to the tradition of our great nation,' Gov. Arnold Schwarzenegger vetoed a bill on Saturday that would have automatically allocated all the state's 55 electoral votes to whichever presidential candidate received the national popular vote." The bill, "which passed the state's Legislature this summer, was devised by John R. Koza, a computer scientist who envisioned a system in which a series of states holding the number of electoral votes needed to elect a president -- 270 -- would commit their electors to casting ballots for the winner of the popular vote, regardless of how their individual electorates voted."

Ailes' Record In More Prominent News Corp Role Seen As Lackluster. The Wall Street Journal (10/3, Angwin, 2.03M) reports in a front page story that over the "past 10 years, Roger Ailes transformed the cable-news business using glitzy graphics, brash marketing and a take-no-prisoners approach. His playbook vaulted News Corp.'s Fox News Channel into the industry's No. 1 spot." Using a "similar approach, he has since taken on a more prominent role at News Corp. -- including running the company's local television stations -- but the results aren't as impressive. Accustomed to operating his own fiefdom, Mr. Ailes has ruffled feathers among other executives." Ailes has "started a new TV network, called MyNetworkTV, but it hasn't shown much sign of life amid a broader slump in the local-TV business. Meanwhile, ratings at Fox News are declining faster than those of its competitors and its advertising-sales growth is slowing."

DOJ_NMG_0073251

Illinois Town Prospers By Accepting Dubious Enterprises. The Wall Street Journal (10/3, Spain, 2.03M) reports in a front page story that when "construction and waste-management firm Fred Weber Inc. sought to build a trash-transfer station in the St. Louis area, it was shooed away by activists and residents opposed to having thousands of tons of other people's garbage being trundled through their communities." But "across the border in Illinois, the village of Sauget rolled out the welcome mat." That "'Yes, in my backyard' ethic has made Sauget, population 250, a peculiar island of prosperity in the sea of urban economic blight across the Mississippi River from St. Louis. While the little towns around it are marked by crime, shuttered factories, burned-out buildings and trash-strewn streets, Sauget boasts clean parks, neat homes and beautifully maintained roads." Sauget has "embraced some of the less-popular remnants of the industrial Midwest as well as the seamier side of the U.S. service economy. Along with companies that smelt zinc, treat sewage and incinerate toxic waste are a brace of strip clubs, two nightclubs and a 24-hour liquor store that doubles as an off-track betting parlor and the largest lottery outlet in Illinois."

Conservative Worry Over Left-Wing Professors Said To Be Overwrought. In a Wall Street Journal op-ed (10/3), Arthur C. Brooks of Syracuse University says, "Parents have just sent their kids off to college, full of hope that the knowledge and enlightenment they acquire will prepare them for the rigors of the modern economy. But a worrying possibility is keeping some of these parents -- especially the conservative ones -- up at night: the prospect that their children will be hopelessly corrupted by the faculty." Most studies "of the subject have indicated that, indeed, upward of 90% of college professors at many universities hold liberal political views. In some schools and departments, faculties are virtually 100% left-wing. It is one thing to lament this ideological lopsidedness in the academy. But it is quite another to assume that professors actually bend the little minds in their care toward a liberal point of view, or even a radical one." When "it comes to politics, people from conservative families follow their parents, not their professors."

NYTimes Says Wal-Mart Needs To Treat Employees Better. The New York Times (10/3, 1.21M) says in an editorial, "There are distressing signs that Wal-Mart may be acting on many of the ideas outlined in an internal document — leaked last year — to rid its payroll of full-time and less-healthy employees who are more expensive for the company to retain." But "Costco has shown that better wages for workers don't preclude low prices for customers. If Wal-Mart wants to avoid increasingly onerous legislation, regulation and scrutiny, company executives are going to have to learn that human beings are not machines that can be turned on and off, that parents can't always reshuffle their lives on short notice."

WPost Criticizes Virginia Republicans Over NoVA Transportation. The Washington Post (10/3, A16, 748K) says in an editorial, "Last week's stunning failure by Virginia lawmakers to address the state's urgent transportation needs will have lasting consequences. Led by a band of Republican obstructionists in Richmond -- ideologues and anti-tax fundamentalists -- the General Assembly has decided to let Northern Virginia commuters stew in their own juices for a couple of years. Make no mistake about the result: There will be no serious, sustainable funding for new roads, intersections and other improvements for at least the next two years -- after which today's stop-and-go trips may seem like a happy memory. Northern Virginia, the state's economic engine, is to be starved of any progress on basic infrastructure."

Bush Backs Turkey Joining EU. The Washington Post (10/3, A6, Fletcher, 748K) reports President Bush "voiced support for Turkey's entry to the European Union yesterday after meeting with Turkish Prime Minister Recep Tayyip Erdogan in a long session that also focused on ways to counter extremism, instability in the Middle East and the continued violence in Iraq." The session "lasted nearly two hours -- almost an hour longer than scheduled -- and White House aides called this a reflection of Turkey's critical relationship with the United States." Erdogan "thanked Bush for the endorsement, adding that 'the United States is a strategic partner, a very important strategic partner for Turkey.'" The Post says accession talks "have gotten off to a rocky start," and notes "many European countries are experiencing a surge of anti-immigration sentiment." The Post continues, "When it came to terrorism, Bush and Erdogan did not explicitly mention the simmering tension caused by a paramilitary group that has been battling to establish an autonomous Kurdish region near the intersection of Turkey, Iraq and Iran for more than two decades." Erdogan "said he is committed to battling terrorism," and then "scolded those who link the Muslim religion to the terrorism of al-Qaeda and other extremists who perpetrate violence in the name of Islam." The AP (10/3, Klug) runs a similar report.

DOJ_NMG_0073252

Erdogan Says Kurdish Attacks Creating Anti-US Sentiment In Turkey. The Washington Times (10/3, Sands, 88K) reports, "Turkish Prime Minister Recep Tayyip Erdogan, emerging from a lengthy Oval Office meeting with…Bush, warned yesterday that a surge of attacks by separatist Kurdish guerrillas based in neighboring Iraq have fueled anti-American sentiment in his country." Erdogan, "briefing reporters after the meeting, said he was reassured by Mr. Bush's pledge to work with Turkish and Iraqi leaders to curb attacks by the Kurdistan Workers Party, known by the Turkish acronym PKK, the militant Kurdish separatist group that the United States has designated a terrorist organization."

Bush Backs UN Force For Darfur. USA Today (10/3, 2.27M) reports, "President Bush said Monday that the United Nations should send a peacekeeping force to the Darfur region of Sudan without further delay." The Sudanese government "has resisted international pressure to accept a UN peacekeeping force, but Bush said the UN should deploy such a force anyway." The AP (10/3) quotes Bush saying, "The United Nations can play an important role in helping us achieve our objective, which is to end human suffering and deprivation. … In my view, the United Nations should not wait any longer."

Presidential Waiver Clears Military Training For 21 Countries. The AP (10/2, Gedda) reports, "Twenty-one countries that had been denied participation in U.S. military training programs are now eligible to take part again under a presidential waiver announced Monday by the White House. All 21 had run afoul of the Bush administration and U.S. law by refusing to sign an agreement with the United States that would exempt Americans from prosecution by the International Criminal Court." The AP adds, "Scores of countries have gone along with U.S. requests to exempt Americans from ICC prosecutions. Others, however, refused to bend to U.S. pressure, and the result in many countries has been a sharp decline in their military ties with the United States. Pentagon officials have told Congress that China has been filling the vacuum created by the suspension of training programs in 12 Latin American and Caribbean countries."

Burns Says Moscow, Beijing Will Back Push For UN Sanctions On Iran. The Washington Times (10/3, Kralev, 88K) notes remarks by Undersecretary Burns that Washington "is confident that Russia and China will join it in pushing for U.N. sanctions against Iran if it does not agree to suspend enriching uranium this week." Burns "also said the [UNSC] will insist on a clear answer to its demand that Iran suspend its enrichment activity. A 'maybe' will be considered a 'no,' he said." In describing Secretary Rice's September 18 dinner in New York, Burns says she "and her five counterparts agreed that the first week of October would be the absolute deadline for Iran 'to say yes or no.'" Burns "rejected a suggestion by Kazakh President Nursultan Nazarbayev…that Iran be offered a deal similar to the one Kazakhstan made when it gave up its nuclear arsenal in the 1990s," instead saying the Administration "has refused to offer security guarantees to Iran because of other concerns." He also noted that "the Iranian issue would be [Rice's] primary concern when she meets today in Cairo with the foreign ministers of Egypt, Jordan and the six members of the Gulf Cooperation Council." AFP (10/3) cites an anonymous "senior State Department official" saying "US diplomats have made 'good progress' in gaining allies' approval for a list of sanctions to be imposed on" Tehran.

The AP (10/3, Ames) reports EU foreign policy chief Javier Solana "said he was resuming talks with" Iranian nuclear negotiator Ali Larijani "and warned Monday that the time for continuing negotiations on Tehran's atomic program was limited. But [he] denied he was running out of patience." Solana "said he would talk by telephone with [Larijani] later Monday."

In Mideast, Rice Urged To Pursue Comprehensive Peace Deal. The Washington Post (10/3, A6, Wright, 748K) notes Secretary Rice "held midnight talks with Saudi Arabia's King Abdullah on Monday on the first leg of a five-day swing through the Middle East to rally Arab allies against the growing momentum of militant movements in the region." The Administration "is trying to line up support among an informal new bloc -- including the six Persian Gulf states, Egypt and Jordan -- to help stabilize the region after the" Israel-Hezbollah war. Rice "described that conflict as a clarifying moment in defining the political forces in the world's most volatile region," and now she "is hoping to explore ways of reviving the moribund [Israeli-Palestinian] peace process" and "bolster support for the fragile governments in Iraq and Lebanon." The Post says Administration "officials privately concede that their expectations for any major movement are low," and Rice's trip "comes at an all-time low in the region for the Bush presidency, with Iraq's insurgency intensifying, the Palestinians enmeshed in a political and economic quagmire, Hezbollah still armed in Lebanon, Iran's new president increasingly defiant, and three Israeli soldiers captured by Palestinian and Lebanese fighters over the summer yet to be released."

DOJ_NMG_0073253

The Financial Times (10/3, Khalaf, Dinmore, Wallis) reports Rice "faces urgent calls for a comprehensive peace [deal] when she meets eight Arab foreign ministers in Cairo today." The trip "is partly intended to shore up moderate Arab allies while dealing with the shared perception of the extremist threat from Iran, Lebanon's Hizbollah and Iraq's sectarian chaos. But because of severe ideological differences within the Bush administration, Ms Rice is not expected to unveil big initiatives." Rice "has apparently scored some success by persuading hardliners in the Bush administration that the US has to engage on the Palestinian-Israeli front. But Arab diplomats say the administration has indicated a peace initiative would only be unveiled after the US midterm elections in November."

The Washington Times/AP (10/3, Nasrawi) adds, "Eight U.S.-allied Arab countries are banding together to meet with [Rice] on her [Cairo stop], in hopes of reviving the deadlocked Arab-Israeli peace process and making headway on other regional issues." The "goal of Rice's tour is to promote democracy and discuss threats to stability,...but the Arab ministers' priority is relaunching peace talks." The AP notes, "By sending Rice to the region after the war in Lebanon, Washington may be signaling its willingness to listen to the concerns of moderate Arab leaders — though its unlikely the two sides share the same priorities."

Tel Aviv Reaches Out To Arab Nations In Order To Contain Iran. In a 1,500-word piece on its front page, the Wall Street Journal (10/3, A1, Leggett, Brauchli, 2.03M) says Tel Aviv is working with Arab capitals to thwart Iranian regional goals. The war with Hezbollah "has redoubled [Tel Aviv's] concerns about the threat from Iran, leading Israeli officials to reach out to Arab governments that share their concern about Tehran's growing influence in the region." Of intense discussion internally "is how far Israel should go to broaden such ties -- particularly because its territorial dispute with the Palestinians is likely to come into diplomatic play." Secretary Rice "is visiting the region, and she will focus on both Iran…and the Palestinian question." The Journal adds, "The ascent of violent Islamism is another area where Israel's interests are converging with those of its Arab neighbors. An array of Sunni Muslim networks such as al Qaeda, though ideologically at odds with Shiite Muslim Iran, consider Israel a mortal enemy while deriding many Arab governments as corrupt and illegitimate -- and have targeted both."

Israeli Analysts Now Hold Favorable View Of Lebanon War's Effects. The Washington Times (10/3, Mitnick, 88K) reports, "After weeks of handwringing over the inconclusive result of Israel's border war with Hezbollah, some Israelis are coming around to the idea that Hezbollah has indeed been weakened and that Israel's deterrent power is still intact." When Israel "agreed to a cease-fire with Hezbollah in August without having scored a knockout blow in the monthlong war, it was widely predicted that a new round of fighting with the Iranian-backed Shi'ite militia was inevitable." But "many analysts have since concluded that Hezbollah -- despite its bombastic rhetoric -- has suffered serious damage and will not be anxious for a return engagement." The war "destroyed the group's positions in southern Lebanon, wiped out a good deal of its rocket arsenal, left hundreds of Lebanese civilians dead and wrecked the country's infrastructure, angering the general public."

Clash Between Hamas, Fatah Factions Continues. The New York Times (10/3, Myre, 1.21M) reports, "Hamas and Fatah, the two main Palestinian factions, on Monday traded gunfire and recriminations for a second day in the West Bank and the Gaza Strip, leaving 2 people dead and about 20 wounded." The Palestinian Authority president, Mahmoud Abbas, of Fatah, and Prime Minister Ismail Haniya, of Hamas, "appealed for calm, and the clashes were not as intense or as widespread as on Sunday. Still, several shootouts erupted as Palestinian officials struggled to end the internal fighting."

Russia Suspends Transport, Postal Link With Georgia. The Financial Times (10/3, Buckley) reports, "Russia sharply escalated its dispute with Georgia on Monday, saying it would suspend transport and postal links with its southern neighbour – even as Georgia returned four soldiers arrested last week on spying charges." Moscow's transport ministry "ordered air, road, rail and sea links to be closed from midnight Monday night. The communications ministry said mail services would be suspended." The Wall Street Journal (10/3, Champion, 2.03M) reports, "Georgia released four Russian military officers it had arrested on charges of spying, in an effort to defuse an escalating crisis between the two countries." But "Moscow retaliated for the arrests" with the minister's announcement.

DOJ_NMG_0073254

The New York Times (10/3, Myers, 1.21M) says "relations between Russia and Georgia… have been turbulent since the Soviet collapse in 1991. The latest tensions, though, have been among the worst since Russian fighters joined two separatist conflicts in Abkhazia and South Ossetia, both in Georgian territory, during the early 1990's." The Washington Times/AP (10/3, Dzhindzhikhashvili) runs a similar report.

More Commentary. Under the headline "Enough Bullying," the Washington Post (10/3, A16, 748K) editorializes, "Vladimir Putin has never fully accepted the breakup of the Soviet Union, which he once called 'the greatest catastrophe of the 20th century.' Having consolidated power in Moscow by dismantling his country's nascent democracy, he has devoted himself in recent years to reestablishing the Kremlin's political and economic dominion over former Soviet republics that became independent in 1991. … A Russian attempt to strangle Georgia has been slowly escalating." In a telephone conversation, Putin "told President Bush that 'it was unacceptable for other countries to take steps that Georgia could interpret as support,' according to the Russian news agency RIA Novosti." Bush "ought to reject that imperious warning."

Ban Ki-Moon "All But Certain" To Become UN Secretary General. The Washington Post (10/3, A13, Lynch, 748K) reports the UNSC's "five permanent members on Monday unanimously backed South Korean Foreign Minister Ban Ki Moon's bid to become the United Nations' next secretary general, making it likely he will be endorsed next week by the 15-nation council as the world's top diplomat." Experts "said it is all but certain that Ban will become" UNSYG in January. "But the council decided to wait until Oct. 9 to formally recommend Ban's candidacy to the 192-member General Assembly so that his competitors can withdraw from the race. The General Assembly has never rejected the council's nominee." The Post says Ban will "take charge of an organization with a budget of more than $5 billion a year and operations in virtually every corner of the world." His elevation "would place a seasoned, cautious diplomat in the job of restoring public confidence in an organization that has been buffeted" by division and scandal in recent years.

The New York Times (10/3, Hoge, 1.21M) says Ban "virtually assured his selection as [UNSYG], winning overwhelming support in a final informal poll of the Security Council." He "will inherit the leadership of a global organization with 9,000 workers, a $5 billion annual budget and tasks ranging from education, health care and emergency assistance to areas hit by natural disaster, to peacekeeping in nations emerging from conflicts. He will also take over at a moment when the United Nations has been shaken by management lapses and scandals, and faces continuing demands to overhaul its procedures." The Wall Street Journal (10/3, Ramstad, King, 2.03M) notes yesterday's straw poll "effectively seals Mr. Ban's bid," and says he "will face an array of challenges." The Financial Times (10/3, Turner), AP (10/3, Wadhams), Washington Times (10/3, Pisik, 88K), Los Angeles Times (10/3, Farley, 918K) and Christian Science Monitor (10/3, Kirk, 58K) run similar stories.

Bret Stephens writes in his Wall Street Journal column (10/3), "Few people are better qualified to run the United Nations than Ashraf Ghani. So it goes without saying that the former Afghan finance minister and current chancellor of Kabul University stands almost no chance of getting the job." Instead, Kofi Annan's successor "is likely to be South Korea's colorless foreign minister Ban Ki-Moon." The Times of London "reports that this year Mr. Ban has pledged $18 million in aid to Tanzania -- currently a member of the Security Council -- and led a business delegation to Greece -- another current member -- and donated a grand piano to an Inca cultural center in Peru -- a third member -- and opened a Korean cultural center in Buenos Aires. Argentina, in case you hadn't guessed, is also on the Council. The Korean government denies that it is trying to buy votes, which is possible. Then again, maybe Mr. Ban understands only too well what it takes to get ahead at the UN. In that sense, and that sense alone, he demonstrates why he, and not Mr. Ghani, is Kofi Annan's fitting heir."

US General Says Chávez Worries Region. The New York Times (10/3, Pear, 1.21M) reports, "The commander of United States military activities in Latin America [Gen. Brantz J. Craddock] said Monday that Venezuela under President Hugo Chávez had become a destabilizing force, and that other countries in the Western hemisphere shared that concern." Craddock reported concern by other countries over Venezuela's "purchase of weapons, especially small arms." The Times reports, "Venezuela has bought AK-47 assault rifles and military helicopters from Russia and patrol boats from Spain." US officials "said Venezuela had used its oil wealth to undermine democratic forces in other Latin American countries." The Times reports that Craddock and Secretary Rumsfeld attended the same conference.

DOJ_NMG_0073255

Bosnian Voters Endorse Existing Ethnic Divisions. The New York Times (10/3, Wood, 1.21M) reports, "Bosnia's ethnic divisions seem most likely to become even more firmly entrenched, as partial results of national elections on Monday showed two parties with diametrically opposing views in the lead. The results could delay a move by the international authorities to end their oversight of the country." The Party for Bosnia and Herzegovina's Haris Silajdzic won the Muslim presidency, while the Alliance of Independent Social Democrats' Nebojsa Radmanovic won the Bosnian Serb presidency seat. Radmanovic's party is headed by Milorad Dodik, and the Times notes Silajdzic and Dodik "were criticized for increasing ethnic tensions as they outlined conflicting views of Bosnia's future. Each man advocates a tough version of the policies generally supported by his ethnic group." Muslim and Croat politicians generally seek closer integration and EU candidacy, while Serb politically generally favor independence for their sub-state, and outside experts "worry that the strongly differing stances will set back progress on political changes to ease a transfer of power from foreign officials to local politicians."

Brazilian Corruption Cases Said To Drag Down Lula's Support. The Wall Street Journal (10/3, Moffett, Samor, 2.03M) reports, "The last straw for Brazilian voters may have been the photos in Saturday's newspapers showing stacks of cash. The police seizure of the money from operatives of the governing party capped a series of scandals in President Luiz Inácio Lula da Silva's administration that frustrated the president's chance to win re-election outright in Sunday's first round of balloting and set up a runoff for later this month against centrist Geraldo Alckmin." Silva "in the end found himself dragged down by their cumulative weight even though he isn't facing charges," and now he "won't have the luxury of playing it safe in the runoff." The "anticorruption trend was less clear-cut in local congressional elections, where patronage politics is often the order of the day." The Journal adds that Brazilian financial markets "surged" following the first round of voting, because Alckim "is seen by investors as having a clearer agenda to shrink the state and stimulate growth."

LATimes Says Lula Deserved First Round Shakeup. In an editorial today, the Los Angeles Times (10/3, 918K) says Silva's "own mediocrity cost him" an outright win in the first round of voting. His "sudden and surprising fall from grace isn't necessarily good news," and even if he wins the runoff election, as is widely expected, he "may find it very difficult to get much done in his second term. Some might call that a bonus." The Times says Silva's "embrace of orthodox economic policies has come as a relief to many investors in Brazil and beyond, but there's little evidence that he ever had any appetite for the reforms Brazil needs if it is to boost its relatively anemic 3% annual growth rate." The Times also pans Silva's willingness "to defer leadership of the Latin American left" to the "buffoonish" Hugo Chavez, and says "that deference may have diminished [his] standing at home as well as abroad."

Zambian President Reelected In Clean Vote. The New York Times (10/3, Wines, 1.21M) notes Zambian President Levy Mwanawasa "took an unexpectedly large lead Monday as vote-counting neared an end in the nation's presidential election and some supporters of his populist rival, Michael Sata, rioted for a second day." Sata, who refused to concede but "said he would not contest the election results in court," also called for an end to the violence. Mwanawasa appears to have "captured 43 percent of the 2.52 million ballots counted, compared with 27 percent for Mr. Sata and 26 percent for Hakainde Hichilema, a businessman, the third major candidate." International observers declared the vote "relatively free of corruption." Mwanawasa "accused his rivals in a national address on Sunday of resorting to violence in the face of defeat and promised a crackdown on lawbreakers."

Abe Seeks Meetings This Week With Hu, Roh. The Washington Post (10/3, A12, Faiola, 748K) reports, "Seeking to mend Japan's deteriorating relations with its neighbors, Japanese officials on Monday said they were moving quickly to arrange summit meetings between freshly inaugurated Prime Minister Shinzo Abe and his counterparts in China and South Korea." The meetings, which could occur Sunday and Monday respectively, "would mark a symbolic breakthrough for Abe… China and South Korea have boycotted top-level meetings with Japan since last year" because of former Prime Minister Junichiro Koizumi's visits to the Yasukuni Shrine. The Post adds, "Analysts were quick to lower expectations for a long-term easing of tensions in the region -- largely because Abe's positions on the issues dividing Japan from its neighbors are at least as hard-line as Koizumi's." In any meeting with Chinese President Hu Jintao or South Korean President Roh Moo-hyun, Abe would "have much to talk about," including textbook content and the future of the Japanese Constitution.

DOJ_NMG_0073256

India Post Said To Struggle Against More Efficient Private Firms. A 1,994-word piece in the Wall Street Journal (10/3, Bellman, 2.03M) examines the evolving role of the postal system in India. "India's vast postal service, the world's largest, highlights a little-understood feature of this nation's economic transformation. While India often draws criticism for its failure to sell its vast network of state-owned companies, the government has quietly been opening many of its agencies to blistering competition from private-sector rivals," in this case including FedEx and UPS. "But as India lets its public sector get squeezed, it faces a big dilemma: What to do with these often huge and politically connected organizations during the painful transition period where they have to become competitive and profitable or extinct?" Noting that "more-efficient private couriers have eaten deeply into India Post's business," the Journal says similar problems have emerged at the "state-owned phone company Mahanagar Telephone Nigam Ltd" and at Air India and Indian Airlines. "Such competition from private business is helping to change the face of the Indian economy. The country is becoming a growing force in the global economy as reforms have unleashed the power of its one billion consumers. India's economy grew at a faster-than-expected 8.9% in the second quarter, nearly matching China's torrid pace."

Kristof Says Good Governance, Not More Aid, Will Remake Africa. In his latest column on his travels in Africa, New York Times (10/3, 1.21M) columnist Nicholas Kristof says "the need for better for better governance" is "one of the biggest challenges facing Africa today." While foreign aid can help, "what matters most is the local decision makers. The single biggest reason Africa is so poor is that it has had unusually bad leadership — a reflection, in turn, of colonial misrule." Kristof lauds UK Prime Minister Tony Blair's anticorruption initiative and President Bush's Millennium Challenge Accounts, and says, "We should help developing countries broadly, not just by writing checks but also by holding their feet to the fire on corruption and economic reform." He notes that "all across Africa, countries are increasing efforts to fight corruption and improve the investment climate," and concludes, "So, yes, Africa is still afflicted by AIDS, misery and the tyranny of" corrupt leaders. "But leadership is improving, opportunities are appearing, and there's something new in the air: reform, and hope."

THE BIG PICTURE:

Headlines From Today's Front Pages.

Los Angeles Times:

"A Plan To Save King/Drew Gets Tough."
"His Corps Value Was Bravery."
"11 Amish Girls Shot In School."
"2 Share Nobel For Method To Silence Specific Genes."
"Foley Saga No Shock To Some."
"Barrels Of Money Fuel Oil Tax Fight."
"Michelin Anoints Bay Area Cuisine With Pinch Of Stars."
"State Ends Inquiry, Names Monitor For Getty Trust."

New York Times

"Pressure Grows For Republicans Over Foley Scandal."
"Across Nation, Housing Costs Rise As Burden."
"Man Shoots 11, Killing 4 Girls, In Amish School."
"After Afghan Battle, A Harder Fight for Peace."
"Colliding With Death At 37,000 Feet, And Living."
"Bridging A Racial Rift That Isn't Black And White."

USA Today:

"Courts Are Asked To Crack Down On Bloggers, Websites."
"'A Horrendous Crime Scene.'"

Washington Post:

"At Least 3 Killed at PA. Amish School."
"After Foley, New Fears For The GOP."
"Most Blacks, Hispanics In Area Own Homes."
"In Antipsychotics, Newer Isn't Better."
"Outside Groups Shoveling Cash Into Tight Races."
"New Conductors Speed Global Flows Of Money."

DOJ_NMG_0073257

Washington Times:
"U.S. Cities United Front On Iran."
"Hastert Denies GOP Saw Foley's 'Vile' Message."
"Gunman Says 3 Amish Schoolgirls."
"Dow On verge Of Closing At An All-Time High."
"Genghis Misunderstood."

Detroit Free Press:
"Back In The Game!"
"Fans Prove This Is Tiger Town."

Atlanta Journal-Constitution:
"Farmers Accused Of 'Scheme' Wind Up Keeping Millions."
"Horror At Amish School."
"Scandal Puts Republicans On Defensive."
"Ga. Companies Await Third Straight Cut In Unemployment Tax."

Houston Chronicle:
"Why Your Electric Bill Is Still High."
"Terror In Amish Country."
"Judge Won't Dismiss Suit In Deputy Shooting."
"Mexico Implores Bush To Veto Border Fence Bill."
"Series Tackles Football Mania."

Story Lineup From Last Night's Network News:
ABC: Amish School House Shooting; School Safety; Foley Investigation; Foley Aftermath; Congressional Page Program; Working Mothers; Supreme Court; Gas Prices; Neil Armstrong's Words On The Moon; Golf In Darfur.
CBS: Amish School Shooting; School Safety; School Safety Analysis; Foley Investigation; Congressional Page Program; Brian Rohrbough Opinion; Amish Country.
NBC: Amish School Shooting; Amish Country; Foley Investigation; Woodward's Book; Washington's Reaction; Iraq-Sectarian Violence; Iraq-Sectarian Violence; Nobel Prize Winners; Stock Market; Neil Armstrong's Words; Troops Return Home.

Story Lineup From This Morning's Radio News Broadcasts:
ABC: PA-Amish school Shootings; Foley Scandal; Afghanistan-US KIA.
CBS: PA-Amish School Shootings; Foley Scandal; Chicago-Power Outage; Gas Prices.
NPR: PA-Amish School Shootings; WI-Student Accused Of Killing Principal; Foley Scandal; Wall Street; UN Secretary General Race; Brazil Election.

WASHINGTON'S SCHEDULE:

Today's Events In Washington.

White House:

PRESIDENT BUSH — Attends a Richard Pombo for Congress reception, Stockton Memorial Civic Auditorium, Stockton, Calif.; attends a John Doolittle for Congress reception, El Dorado Hills, Calif.; attends a Republican National Committee reception, Private residence, Los Angeles.

VICE PRESIDENT CHENEY — Speaks at a luncheon for Rep. Henry Bonilla, private residence, San Antonio; speaks at a reception for congressional candidate Van Taylor, private residence, Dallas.

US Senate: No Scheduled Events.

US House: No Scheduled Events.

Other: HISPANIC CAUCUS _ The Congressional Hispanic Caucus Institutes' holds its Public Policy Conference Summit. Highlights: 10 a.m. Session on preparing the Hispanic community for leadership in the STEM fields. Location: Renaissance Mayflower Hotel, 1127 Connecticut Ave. NW.

TERRORISM INSURANCE _ 7:15 a.m. - 9:45 a.m. The US Chamber of Commerce, others, sponsor a seminar on terrorism insurance, with Vince Randzzo of Wacovia Corp.; Stef Zielezienski of the American Insurance Association; Joel Wood of the council of Insurance Agents and Brokers, others. Location: 1615 H St. NW.

SCHOOL DROPOUTS _ 9:30 a.m. The National Education Association holds a news conference to release a plan to address the school dropout crisis. Location: National Press Club.

YOUTH-CIVICS/POLITICS _ 9:30 a.m. The Center for Information and Research on Civic Learning & Engagement holds a briefing to release``The Futures of American Democracy: New Study on Youth Civic and Political Health." Location: National Press Club, Zenger Room.

DOHA _ 10 a.m. The American Enterprise Institute holds a forum ``The World Trading System After the Collapse of Doha: The WTO, Developing Countries, and Regionalism" with former Commerce Undersecretary Grant Aldonas, others. Location: 12th floor, AEI, 1150 17th St. NW.

UAE LEADERS _ 10 a.m. Business for Diplomatic Action organization and Zogby International release a survey of young leaders in the United Arab Emirates. Location: Foreign Press Center, National Press Building.

DOJ_NMG_0073258

LATINO-SUMMIT _ 10:30 a.m. Ambassadors Roger Noriega and Nancy Soderberg speak at the Latino Coalition's 2006 Small Business Economic Summit to discuss Venezuela and Argentina's relationship. Location: Ritz-Carlton Hotel, 1150 22nd St. NW.

HEALTH CARE TRANSPARENCY _ 11 a.m. - 12:30 p.m. The Heritage Foundation sponsors a panel discussion, ``Transparency in Health Care." Participants: Walton Francis, economist and author of CHECKBOOKs ``Guide to Health Plans for Federal Employees;" David B. Kendall, Senior Fellow for Health Policy, Progressive Policy Institute; and Thomas P. Miller, resident fellow, American Enterprise Institute. Keynote remarks by Alex M. Azar II, Deputy Secretary of Health and Human Services. Location: Heritage Foundation, Lehrman Auditorium, 214 Massachusetts Ave. NE.

MILLENNIUM DEVELOPMENT GOALS _ 12 p.m. - 2 p.m. The United Nations Development Programme hosts a UNDP Washington Roundtable, ``The Millennium Development Goals: A Time of Reckoning." Panelists include Dirk Dijkerman, CEO, Office of the Director of Foreign Assistance, State Department; and Debayani Kar, communications and advocacy coordinator, Jubilee Network. Location: Carnegie Endowment for International Peace, Root Room, 1779 Massachusetts Ave. NW.

CHINA-INDIA _ 12:30 p.m. A team of American and Japanese former government, business and academic leaders release a report on recommendations for the U.S. and Japan to respond to the emerging economicv and political rise of China and India. Participants include former Deputy Secrertary of State Ken Dam, Noboru Hatakeyama of the Japan Economic Forum, Marshall Bouton of the Chicago Council on Global Affairs; others. Location: Douglas Room, Willard Inter-Continental Hotel, 1401 Pennsylvania Ave. NW.

SOROS _ 3 p.m. Investor George Soros speaks at the 16th conference on the Organization of American States Lecture Series of the Americas. Location: OAS, 17th St. and Constitution Ave. NW.

US RUSSIA NUCLEAR _ 3 p.m. - 4:30 p.m. Amb. Nikolay Spassky, deputy head of the Russian Atomic Energy Agency, speaks on ``Nuclear Powers Become Nuclear Partners," focusing on US-Russian nuclear cooperation. Location: Carnegie Endowment for International Peace, 1779 Massachusetts Ave. NW.

LARSON-MIDDLE EAST _ 4:30 p.m. Terje Rex Larson, Norwegian diplomat and United Nations special envoy, will speak at the Johns Hopkins University Paul H. Nitze School of Advanced International Studies (SAIS) about ``Challenges and Opportunities in the Middle East. Location: First floor auditorium of the schools Rome Building, 1619 Massachusetts Ave. NW.

SINGLETON _ 6:30 p.m. The National Hispanic Foundation for the Arts holds its Tenth Annual Noche de Gala dinner, with film director John Singleton, actor Michael Pena and singer Fanny Lu. Keynote address - Commerce Secretary Gutierrez at 6:30 p.m. Location: Renaissance Mayflower Hotel, 1127 Connecticut Ave. NW.

CUBA AFTER CASTRO _ 7:30 p.m. American University's School of International Affairs hosts a panel discussion. ``Cuba after Fidel." Partcipants: William LeoGrande, dean, American University School of Public Affairs; Robert Pastor, vice president, American University International Affairs Office; Philip Pters, vice president, Lexington Institute; and Silvia Wilhelm, executive director, Cuban American Commission for Family Rights. Location: Abramson Family Recital Hall, Katzen Arts Center, American University, 4400 Massachusetts Ave. NW.

SCHIEFFER ROAST _ 8:30 p.m. CBS news veteran Bob Schiffer will be ``roasted" by former Senate Democratic Leader Tom Daschle, former roastee Don Imus and his wife Deirdre, and White House press secretary Tony Snow at the 18th annual Roast for Spina Bifida. Location: JW Marriott, 1331 Pennsylvania Ave. NW.

Copyright 2006 by the Bulletin News Network, Inc. Reproduction without permission prohibited. Editorial content is drawn from thousands of newspapers, national magazines, national and local television programs, and radio broadcasts. The Attorney General's News Briefing is published five days a week for the Office of Public Affairs by BulletinNews, which creates custom news briefings for government and corporate leaders and also publishes the White House Bulletin, Frontrunner and Washington Morning Update. We can be found on the Web at BulletinNews.com, or called at (703) 749-0040.

DOJ_NMG_0073259

THE ATTORNEY GENERAL'S NEWS BRIEFING

PREPARED FOR THE OFFICE OF PUBLIC AFFAIRS, U.S. DEPARTMENT OF JUSTICE

TO: THE ATTORNEY GENERAL AND SENIOR STAFF

DATE: TUESDAY, OCTOBER 3, 2006 7:45 AM EDT

TODAY'S EDITION

Terrorism News:

Rice, Others Dispute Claim She Ignored CIA Warning Of Al Qaeda Attack ... 3
Homeless Iranian Woman Charged With Supporting Iraqi Terrorist Group ... 4
Defense Begins Closing Arguments At Albany Terror Trial ... 5
Hayat Relatives Return To US From Pakistan ... 5
Afghan Prisoners' Attorneys Challenge Bush Detainee Plan ... 5
Canadian Judge Releases Tamil Tigers Suspect On Bail ... 5
Alliance Of Algerian Terror Group, Al Qaeda Analyzed ... 5

Homeland Response:

Federal Report Makes No Recommendation On Terror Insurance Program ... 5
Chertoff, Peters To Meet With UK Transport Chief On Passenger Data Sharing ... 6
Judge Allows Greatly-Curtailed Jewell Libel Suit To Proceed To Trial ... 6
Nagin Signs Order Requiring Businesses To Use Local, Minority-Owned Firms ... 6

War News:

Maliki's Security Plan Would Empower Local Committees To Fight Violence ... 6
Iraqi Torture Site Could Be Linked To Security Forces ... 6
Iraq Veteran Pleads For More Troops In Iraq ... 7
Author Urges Reverence For Fallen Troops ... 7
Frist Says Taliban Should Be Part Of Afghan Government ... 7

DOJ:

Morford Named Interim US Attorney In Nashville ... 7

Corporate Scandals:

Enron Employees Angered By Fastow's Reduced Sentence ... 7
Memo Suggests Hurd Knew Of H-P Leak Probe In July 2005 ... 8
Sonsini's Novell Options Grants Raise Red Flags ... 8
Siegel Retires As Mills Chief Executive ... 8
Alexander Bail Hearing Arguments Begin ... 9
Professor Says Hedge Funds Do Not Need More Regulation ... 9

Criminal Law:

Foley Enters Rehab As His Attorney Denies "Inappropriate Sexual Contact." ... 9
Man Kills Four, Wounds Seven At Amish School In Pennsylvania ... 11
Bush Directs Gonzales, Spellings To Convene School Violence Conference ... 13
Online Gambling Exec Predicts Industry Consolidation ... 15
DOJ Grant Will Fund Mississippi Domestic Violence Unit ... 16
Philadelphia Police Dispatchers Charged With Extortion ... 16
Former FBI Informant Sentenced To 90 Years In Prison For NJ Heists ... 16
Lorusso To Testify In Jemal Trial Today ... 16
Mississippi Man Sentenced To Two Years In Prison For FEMA Fraud ... 16
FBI, USDOT Investigating Tampa Expressway Authority ... 17
FBI, Connecticut Authorities Investigating Interstate Construction Defects ... 17
Investigation Finds Inappropriate Expenditures At Getty ... 17
DNA Test May Win New Trials For Two Convicted Murderers ... 17
Judge Rejects Motion To Unseal Karr Child Porn Investigation Documents ... 17
Former Nevada Controller's First Husband To Be Exhumed In Murder Probe ... 18
Baltimore Man Arrested For Shooting Neighbor ... 18
Child Molester's Manuscript Used To Convict Him ... 18
Critical Care Nurse Charged With Killing His Wife ... 18

Civil Rights:

Kentucky Jail Officer Says He Is FBI Informant In Civil Rights Probe ... 18
EEOC Rules For Dismissed Chesapeake, VA, Deputies ... 19
Lawsuit Seeks Declaration That Student May Read Bible During Free Time At School ... 19
Euclid, OH, Approves Remap Plan Aimed At Settling DOJ Suit ... 19
Workplace Discrimination Against Arabs, Muslims Said To Be Rising Again ... 19

Antitrust:

DOJ Settles Dairy Antitrust Dispute With Kentucky ... 20
FCC Approves Attlel's Purchase Of Midwest Wireless ... 20
Microsoft's Vista Security Policies Under Attack ... 20
High Court Denies Northwest Airlines' Antitrust Appeal ... 20
SCOTUS Rejects UnitedHealth Ohio Doctor Rate Appeal ... 21
Supreme Court Will Not Hear California Competition Case Against AT&T ... 21

Broadcom-Qualcomm Global Patent Dispute Heads To ITC 21
Harrah's Considering $15 Billion Takeover Bid 21
Coach Accuses Target Of Selling Fake Bag 22
Gilead To Acquire Myogen For $2.5 Billion 22
Executive Says AMD Is Leading Consumer Choice And Value .. 22
Competition, Antitrust Laws Seen As Best Way To Regulate Internet 22

Environment:

SCOTUS To Consider Con Edison Cleanup Case 22
DOE To Delay Buying Oil To Fill Strategic Reserve 23

FBI/DEA/ATF/USMS:

Judge Upholds FBI, Secret Service Applicant Polygraph Exams 23
Former FBI Agent Sentenced To Six Years In Prison For Stock Scam 23
US Attorney Says Steroid Story Contained Inaccuracies 23
Report: Baseball's Pete Rose Used "Greenies." 24
Drug Ring Investigation Leads To New Jersey Man's Guilty Plea 24
Supreme Court Declines To Hear Pennsylvania Doctor's Appeal In Painkiller Case 24
Survey Indicates Parents Underestimate Children's Drug Use ... 24
New Evidence Surfaces In Texas Bombing Case 24
Man Wanted For Ohio Shooting Arrested In Washington 25

Immigration:

SCOTUS Rejects Appeal By Nazi Concentration Camp Guard .. 25
Border Fence Seen As Ineffective Strategy 25

Tax:

New York Man Sentenced To 27 Months In Prison For Tax Evasion 26
WSJournal Praises Rangel For Honesty On Plans To Raise Taxes 26
WSJournal Touts Indexing Capital Gains For Inflation 26

Congress-Administration:

GOP Leaders Allegedly Ignored Repeated Warnings Concerning Foley 26
Card Confirms He Proposed Rumsfeld Replacement 29
Non-Appeal Of DHS Ruling Said To Give Unions Negotiating Advantage 29
Supreme Court Opens New Term By Rejecting 1900 Appeals .. 30
Senate Confirms Bomar 30
10th Assistant Defense Secretary Position Created 30
Report Shows Abramoff Team's Effort To Influence Lawmakers 30
Congress Approves Military Pay Hike, Delays Civil Service Raise 31
Top Civil Servants Honored 31
California Man Accused Of Sending Letters Threatening Bush, Cheney, Others 31
President Will Attend Christening Of Father's Namesake Carrier 31

Other News:

Reports Offer Mixed Picture Of US Economy 31
Bloggers Increasingly Targeted By Libel Suits 32
Seeking Unpaid Fees, Lobbying Firm Sues Former Client 32
Insurers Roll Out New Medicare Drug Plans 33
Florida GOP Chooses Negron As Foley's Replacement 33
Bush To Raise Funds For Republicans In Three States 33
Cheney Campaigns In His Old Wyoming District 34
Rasmussen Poll Shows Allen Ahead By Six 34
Mason Dixon Poll Shows Whitehouse Leading Chafee 42-41 34
Talent, McCaskill Tied 43-43 In Mason Dixon Poll 34
Mason Dixon Poll Shows Cardin Leading Steele By Six Points .. 35
Outside Groups Spending Heavily In Key Races 35
New Suburbs Seen As Key To Control Of Congress 35
Lieberman Says Party Leaders Told Him He'll Keep His Seniority If Reelected 35
DNC Unlikely To Change New Hampshire Role In 2008 Campaign 35
Bill To Award California Electors To Popular Vote Winner Vetoed 36
Ailes' Record In More Prominent News Corp Role Seen As Lackluster 36
Illinois Town Prospers By Accepting Dubious Enterprises 36
Conservative Worry Over Left-Wing Professors Said To Be Overwrought 36
NYTimes Says Wal-Mart Needs To Treat Employees Better 36
WPost Criticizes Virginia Republicans Over NoVA Transportation 36
Bush Backs Turkey Joining EU 37
Bush Backs UN Force For Darfur 37
Presidential Waiver Clears Military Training For 21 Countries 37
Burns Says Moscow, Beijing Will Back Push For UN Sanctions On Iran 37
In Mideast, Rice Urged To Pursue Comprehensive Peace Deal 37
Russia Suspends Transport, Postal Link With Georgia 38
Ban Ki-Moon "All But Certain" To Become UN Secretary General 39
US General Says Chávez Worries Region 39
Bosnian Voters Endorse Existing Ethnic Divisions 39
Brazilian Corruption Cases Said To Drag Down Lula's Support . 40
Zambian President Reelected In Clean Vote 40
Abe Seeks Meetings This Week With Hu, Roh 40
India Post Said To Struggle Against More Efficient Private Firms 40
Kristof Says Good Governance, Not More Aid, Will Remake Africa 41

The Big Picture:

Headlines From Today's Front Pages 41

Washington's Schedule:

Today's Events In Washington 42

DOJ_NMG_0073261

TERRORISM NEWS:

Rice, Others Dispute Claim She Ignored CIA Warning Of Al Qaeda Attack. As the White House continued its effort to rebut claims made by Bob Woodward in his new book, "State of Denial," the author sought to bolster his case by sharing "once secret" documents with NBC News – the only network to cover the story last night. The network, and much of the TV coverage, continued to portray a White House put on the defensive by the book. However, stories in this morning's Washington Post and New York Times cast doubt on Woodward's characterization of a meeting between Condoleezza Rice and then-CIA director George Tenet. NBC Nightly News (10/2, story 4, 2:35, Mitchell, 9.87M) said, "All of the President's men in a state of denial over 'State of Denial.'" White House spokesman Tony Snow: "Flat wrong. Absolutely wrong." The White House, added NBC, "issued a press release titled, 'Five Key Myths In Bob Woodward's Book.' For instance, denying Condoleezza Rice was told of a possible terror threat on July 10, 2001, two months before 9/11. Today, Rice, en route to Saudi Arabia, said it was incomprehensible that she would ignore such a warning. But Woodward has documents proving that a CIA briefer told Rice of an impending attack." Bob Woodward, author, 'State of Denial': "He said specifically after the meeting, 'We did everything but pull the trigger of the gun we were holding to her head.' Mitchell: "Is there clear evidence that they did anything?" Woodward: "The presidential order to get bin Laden or kill him was sitting on the President's desk September 10, 2001. The day before 9/11." Mitchell: "Officials tell NBC News the former CIA Director George Tenet did testify in secret to the 9/11 Commission about that meeting."

The Washington Post (10/3, A3, Eggen, Wright, 748K) reports Tenet's "statements to the [9/11] commission in January 2004 confirm the outlines of an event in a new book by Washington Post Assistant Managing Editor Bob Woodward that has been disputed by some Bush administration officials. But the testimony also is at odds with Woodward's depiction of Tenet and former CIA counterterrorism chief J. Cofer Black as being frustrated that 'they were not getting through to Rice' after the July 10, 2001, meeting." The New York Times (10/3, Shenon, Mazzetti, 1.21M) says "both current and former officials, including allies of Mr. Tenet, took issue with Mr. Woodward's account that he and his aides had left the meeting feeling that Ms. Rice had ignored them." Democratic 9/11 Commissioner Richard Ben-Veniste said, "Tenet never told us that he was brushed off. We certainly would have followed that up."

The Los Angeles Times (10/3, Richter, 918K) reports Rice's "reaction to the description of the meeting underscores administration attempts to counter claims, in Woodward's book and elsewhere, that question whether officials heeded internal warnings and reports on terrorism and the Iraq war." Rice did not "deny that any meeting took place, noting she met frequently with Tenet and other intelligence officials and counterterrorism experts during 2001, when she said the administration was developing a comprehensive strategy. But she said the idea of an emergency meeting designed to 'shock' her did not make sense."

USA Today (10/3, Slavin, 2.27M) reports Rice "said she recalled 'a steady stream of quite alarmist reports of potential attacks' during that period, but they involved targets abroad in Saudi Arabia, Yemen, Israel and possibly Jordan. 'There was nothing that related to an attack in the United States,' she said." The AP (10/3, Gearan) reports Rice "said she cannot recall then-CIA chief George Tenet warning her of an impending al-Qaida attack in the United States" as claimed by Woodward. Rice said, "What I am quite certain of is that I would remember if I was told, as this account apparently says, that there was about to be an attack in the United States, and the idea that I would somehow have ignored that I find incomprehensible." The AP adds, "Speaking to reporters en route to Saudi Arabia and other stops in the Middle East, Rice said she met with Tenet daily at that point, and has no memory of the wake-up call from Tenet described in the book."

White House Described As At "War Over Woodward." NBC Nightly News (10/2, story 5, 1:10, Williams, 9.87M) reported, "All of this news out of Washington tonight leaves us with much to discuss with our Washington bureau chief and moderate of Meet the Press Tim Russert. … Tim, this so-called war over Woodward, same question. [A damage assessment so far?]" NBC (Russert) added, "The White House is ferocious in their response, and why? One of the best known reporters in America is in effect laying out a case questioning the competence and credibility of the White House on Iraq. It is the last thing they want to debate five weeks before an election."

Snow Calls Allegation Bush Is In Denial About Iraq "Outrageous." CNN's The Situation Room (10/2, King) reported, "An angry new response today from the White House to journalist Bob Woodward's new book State of Denial. Among other things, Woodward contains the declarations that terrorists in Iraq are in retreat don't match the secret intelligence assessment the President is being given. Press Secretary Tony Snow says the notion the president is in denial about Iraq war losses or that he is trying to cover up things is, quote, 'an outrage.'"

DOJ_NMG_0073262

NBC Nightly News (10/2, story 4, 2:35, Williams, 9.87M) reported, "Woodward's documents include these talking points the President used at a national security meeting just before the war. They recommended he keep the Iraqi army intact to prevent an insurgency. Instead, the army was disbanded. And the book offers several examples of the President making optimistic statements about Iraq, contrary to far more pessimistic secret assessments. Is this a case where they are not telling him the truth or he is putting a gloss on things?" Woodward: "He knows how bad it is." Mitchell: "A sign of how damaging Woodward's claims are is how hard the White House is fighting back."

Bob Woodward said on CNN's Larry King Live (10/2) that "there's a secret report from the intelligence division of the Joint Chief of Staff saying things are going to get worse. And, the terrorists in Iraq maintain this capability and in the year 2007, that's next year, it's going to get worse. [President Bush is] saying, as you heard, that they're in retreat." Asked what he makes of Bush's claims, Woodward said, "He's an optimist. He's a leader in a time of a really difficult war, a war of choice, a war he decided on, and it's Bush's war, no question about it and it's gone south and it's become more and more violent and more and more difficult."

Woodward Denies He Reached Conclusions Before Writing Book. Bob Woodward responded on CNN's Larry King Live (10/2) to White House counselor Dan Bartlett's claim that he reached some conclusions, saying, "I'd reached no conclusions. I had lots of secret memos and notes of what they had done and how they had done it and that his response to the man he put in charge of post war Iraq was when the man said, and your producer comes to you and says 'I can't do the things you've assigned me to do,' you don't go say 'kick ass.'"

White House Reportedly "Miffed" At Colin Powell. The White House Bulletin/US News (10/2) reports White House insiders "are more than a bit miffed at former Secretary of State Colin Powell. They consider him one of the prime sources" for Woodward's "State of Denial." Powell "lost many internal debates over the war and now he is getting even, White House officials say. But they don't want to take Powell on directly because he remains a highly-respected figure for most Americans and because, White House insiders say, they fear he might try to do more damage to Bush's image if he feels under sustained attack by his former colleagues."

More Commentary. In his Washington Post column (10/3, A17), George Will says, "'State of Denial' will take a toll on government collegiality and the candor of its deliberations. It is based on astonishing indiscretions -- current and past officials making private memos and conversations public for motives that cannot be pure. The book is hardly a revelation about supposed hidden chaos in Washington that produced the obvious chaos in Iraq. It does demonstrate that President Bush and others were shockingly slow to recognize Iraq's complexities and downward spiral. But we already knew that." The book "does not demonstrate that the president is in a state of denial."

In his Washington Post column (10/3, A17), Richard Cohen says it is "time for yet another" constitutional amendment: "This one would ensure that no child of a president could become president. This would avert another George W. Bush. The reasons for this amendment can be amply found in Bob Woodward's new book, 'State of Denial.' If ever a title was apt, this is the one. As if to prove that Woodward had it right, Bush reacted to the book's revelations about Don Rumsfeld -- intransigent, incompetent and intellectually intolerant -- by reaffirming his confidence in him. To Bush, and indeed to the rest of us as well, Rumsfeld has come to personify the conduct of the Iraq war. His leaving, especially his firing, would be an admission of the obvious: failure."

Homeless Iranian Woman Charged With Supporting Iraqi Terrorist Group. The New York Times (10/3, Rashbaum, 1.21M) reports, "A frail 51-year-old Iranian woman was indicted last week in Brooklyn on a charge of supporting a terrorist group based in Iraq that seeks the violent overthrow of the Iranian government, federal authorities said yesterday." Zeinab Taleb-Jedi "is free on a $500,000 bond and living in an East Side women's shelter. A law enforcement official said she did not pose a direct threat to the United States." The Times notes, "The People's Mujahedeen was first designated as a foreign terrorist organization in 1997, according to an affidavit filed in the case by F.B.I. Special Agent Mark Broihier, who said he had been investigating the group for five years. … When American forces invaded Iraq…they disarmed the military arm of the group and ordered its members to assemble at a base about 40 miles north of Baghdad," and "F.B.I. agents went to the base and interviewed about 200 people associated with the group, including Ms. Taleb-Jedi, the affidavit said. They found firing ranges and bomb shelters and shrines to the group's 'martyrs,' along with bunkers that had been used to store a range of ordnance, including 420,000 pounds of plastic explosives."

In a widely-distributed story, the AP (10/3, Hays) adds that according to court documents, "two confidential informants in Iraq" said Taleb-Jedi was "a leader of the Mujahedeen Khalq. … One of the informants told the FBI that Taleb-Jedi was on a council 'responsible for making leadership decisions for the organization, including approving specific acts of terrorism' against Iran, the papers said." When the FBI questioned her in Iraq, "Taleb-Jedi told agents her husband joined the Mujahedeen and went to Iraq in 1986. In 1999, after learning her husband was killed in a bombing, she 'left her job, sold all her belongings and traveled' the group's Ashraf Base in Iraq."

DOJ_NMG_0073263

Defense Begins Closing Arguments At Albany Terror Trial. Capital News 9 Albany (10/2, Ference) reported, "It's been more than three weeks and soon both defendants Mohammed Hossain and Yassin Aref will find out if the jury believes them to be innocent or guilty of supporting terrorism through money laundering when they got caught up in a 2004 FBI-sting operation. Defense attorneys for Yassin Aref continued to try to dispel the prosecution's accusation that Aref knew what an FBI informant was talking about when he mentioned the word 'missile.' … But prosecutors again showed the jury a page written by Aref where he translated English words to better understand them. He wrote 'rocket equals missile.'" Aref lawyers "also argued the codeword used by the FBI informant for missile -- Chaudhry -- wasn't clear. At one point, the informant referred to it by saying, 'one of my family members is married in Dr. Chaudhry's, uh family, my niece is married to one of the family members.'"

Hayat Relatives Return To US From Pakistan. As reported in yesterday's New York Times, the AP (10/3) reports in a widely-distributed story, "Two American citizens related to a California man who was convicted of supporting terrorists flew home from Pakistan, five months after they were barred from returning to the United States for refusing an FBI interrogation, their attorney said." Muhammad and Jaber Ismail "arrived at Kennedy Airport on Sunday afternoon, according to Julia Harumi Mass, an attorney with the American Civil Liberties Union of Northern California. … 'I never imagined that the country I was born in would stop me from coming home for five months and separate me from my family, especially when I was not even charged with a crime,' Jaber Ismail said."

Afghan Prisoners' Attorneys Challenge Bush Detainee Plan. The Washington Post/AP (10/3, A6, Apuzzo) reports attorneys "for 25 men being held in Afghanistan launched a pre-emptive strike Monday against President Bush's plan to prosecute and interrogate terror suspects." Court documents "demand that the men be released or charged and allowed to meet with attorneys. Such a filing, known as a habeas corpus petition, is prohibited under the legislation approved by Congress last week." That bill "says the military may detain enemy combatants indefinitely and, if officials choose to bring charges, the cases would be heard before a military commission, not a civilian judge. Bush has not signed the bill but expects to soon." Monday's filing "initiates what is likely to be a drawn-out legal fight similar to the one over detainees at a military prison in Guantanamo Bay. Detainees there have dozens of petitions pending."

Canadian Judge Releases Tamil Tigers Suspect On Bail. The Toronto Star (10/3, Grewal) reports, "A 29-year-old Mississauga man facing extradition to the United States on charges that he provided support to a Tamil terrorist group was released on $680,000 bail yesterday in a Brampton courtroom. Ramanan Mylvaganam will be reunited with his mother and five siblings after spending more than a month in custody, but under the terms of his release will not be allowed to live with them. Mylvaganam was arrested Aug. 22 after a joint RCMP-FBI investigation." The Star notes that Mylvaganam "must live with one of the named sureties, must be in the presence of one of them or his mother at all times, and may not communicate with the co-accused. In addition, he will be required to surrender his passport and report in every Monday. He is banned from using the Internet, a cellphone or any other electronic communication device."

Alliance Of Algerian Terror Group, Al Qaeda Analyzed. The Christian Science Monitor (10/3, Lund, 58K) reports many Algerians "are anxious; the Islamist radicals of the Salafist Group for Preaching and Combat, better known by the French acronym GSPC, have threatened attacks in the capital" of Algiers "during Ramadan." Already, "officials blame the group for violence outside of Algiers. Overnight Friday, in separate incidents, two security officers were killed near a mosque and a bomb derailed a train, according to the Associated Press." Authorities have "amassed some 3,000 police around the city. While the radical Salafist group has been active for years, officials have new cause to take greater precaution to its threats." In a videotape "released by Al Qaeda Sept. 11, 2006, Osama bin Laden's second-in-command Ayman al-Zawahiri announced that 'the Salafist Group for Preaching and Combat has joined the Al Qaeda organization ... may this be a bone in the throat of American and French crusaders, and their allies, and sow fear in the hearts of French traitors and sons of apostates.'" The Monitor adds the GSPC "has long expressed a willingness to join Mr. bin Laden. But not until now has Al Qaeda officially acknowledged a merger. Indeed, this alliance underlines the regional, rather than Algerian, focus of GSPC."

HOMELAND RESPONSE:

Federal Report Makes No Recommendation On Terror Insurance Program. The Wall Street Journal (10/3, A4, 2.03M) reports a report released this week by an interagency group headed by Treasury Security Henry Paulson "makes no recommendation on whether Congress should make a temporary post-9/11 insurance program permanent. The findings were consistent with a study by the Government Accountability Office, a congressional watchdog agency, that private insurance and reinsurance markets are reluctant to provide coverage for chemical, nuclear, biological and radiological weapon strikes." The Journal notes, "Congress has until the end of next year to study the issue before having to decide whether to extend the current backstop insurance program."

DOJ_NMG_0073264

Chertoff, Peters To Meet With UK Transport Chief On Passenger Data Sharing. The Financial Times (10/3, Cameron) reports UK Transport Secretary Douglas Alexander is scheduled to meet with DHS Secretary Michael Chertoff and Transportation Secretary Mary Peters in Washington Wednesday "in a move that could help break impasses over the sharing of airline passenger information and efforts to liberalise the transatlantic aviation market." The "visit comes amid continuing efforts by the US and the European Union to forge a new deal on the provision and sharing of sensitive passenger information." The Times adds that the meeting "reflects widespread industry concern about the need to reach a new deal on the sharing of passenger information."

Judge Allows Greatly-Curtailed Jewell Libel Suit To Proceed To Trial. The Atlanta Journal-Constitution (10/3, White, 399K) reports, "Olympic park security guard Richard Jewell's libel suit against The Atlanta Journal-Constitution can go to trial on one of 22 claims, a Fulton County judge ruled Monday." Judge John R. Mather " said the newspaper reported truthfully that Jewell was the focus of a federal investigation, that he fit the profile of a lone bomber and most other points surrounding the investigation. But Mather said a jury would need to decide whether the newspaper was wrong to report that investigators believed Jewell placed a 9-1-1 call warning law enforcement that a bomb would go off in the park." The AP (10/3) notes, "Jewell was praised as a hero for finding the backpack that contained the bomb and helping to clear park visitors from the scene. But he soon fell under a cloud of suspicion after it was reported that the FBI was investigating him for possible involvement. Jewell was later cleared, and some news organizations settled legal claims that he had been defamed."

Nagin Signs Order Requiring Businesses To Use Local, Minority-Owned Firms. USA Today/AP (10/3, 17A) reports, "New Orleans Mayor Ray Nagin signed an order Monday requiring that large businesses use as many local and minority-owned firms as possible when they seek millions of dollars in tax incentives and grants for Hurricane Katrina recovery. Nagin's executive order requires applicants for the incentives to involve at least 50% local businesses and 35% women- or minority-controlled businesses whenever possible." The rule expands on a requirement already in place for government contracts by involving "businesses applying for assistance promised by federally funded recovery programs that are administered by the city and the state."

WAR NEWS:

Maliki's Security Plan Would Empower Local Committees To Fight Violence. The Washington Post (10/3, A12, Keath, 748K) reports Iraqi Prime Minister Nouri al-Maliki "announced a new plan Monday aimed at ending the deepening crisis between Shiite and Sunni parties in his government and uniting them behind the drive to stop sectarian killings that have bloodied the country for months. The four-point plan, which emerged after talks between both sides, aims to resolve disputes by giving every party a voice in how security forces operate against violence on a neighborhood-by-neighborhood basis." Maliki would form multiethnic "local committees" to offer input on security activities. The Post says he "is under increasing pressure to stop the violence, which has killed thousands since February." His "administration has been plagued by growing mistrust between its Shiite and Sunni members, who each accuse the other of fueling the bloodshed."

The New York Times (10/3, Oppel, Mizher, 1.21M) adds, "Faced with unrelenting sectarian killings and growing anger from Sunni Arab leaders, [Maliki] announced a new security plan on Monday that calls for committees of neighborhood leaders to try to defuse sectarian crises in their own areas and also for new supervision of the news media." The "details of the plan were vague, and it was not clear how effective it would be in the face of recent unsuccessful attempts" to stop the violence. The AP (10/3, Keath) and the Los Angeles Times (10/3, Moore, 918K) runs similar stories.

Foreign Fighters Said To Form "Relatively Small Slice" Of Insurgency. The Christian Science Monitor (10/3, Grier, 58K) reports, "It may be true that Iraq is shaping a new generation of terrorist leaders, and that the US presence there is a 'cause célèbre' for jihadists, as a recently declassified US intelligence assessment holds." But "that doesn't mean the Iraqi insurgency is a wholly owned Al Qaeda subsidiary. Foreign fighters make up a relatively small slice of the forces targeting the US military in Iraq. Most insurgents are native Iraqi Sunni Islamists or former members of the old Baath party regime." Thus, "to Osama bin Laden, Iraq might be more important as a symbol than a physical battlefield or training ground."

Iraqi Torture Site Could Be Linked To Security Forces. USA Today (10/3, Jervis, 2.27M) reports, "U.S. and Iraqi troops conducting a raid in Baghdad found a blood-soaked torture chamber that may have been operated by a Shiite Muslim militia with ties to the government. Soldiers found Interior Ministry badges in the compound, and U.S. forces saw an Iraqi policeman on the roof of the compound before Sunday's raid." Troops also found "posters of radical Shiite cleric Muqtada al-Sadr and his white-bearded father, the late Grand Ayatollah Mohammed Sadiq al-Sadr." USA Today adds, "There have been signs that some of the militias may have ties to the Shiite-dominated government security forces, particularly paramilitary forces in the Interior Ministry. ... U.S. and Iraqi officers have expressed concerns, however, that the Shiite-dominated government may prevent the military from aggressively going after Shiite militias."

DOJ_NMG_0073265

Iraq Veteran Pleads For More Troops In Iraq. In an op-ed for the Wall Street Journal (10/3, 2.03M), Iraq veteran and 101st Airborne platoon leader Pete Hegseth argues, "America is fighting with a hand tied behind its back. Soldiers have all the equipment we need -- armored humvees, body armor for every body part, superior technology, etc. -- but we simply do not have enough troops in Iraq, and we need them now."

Author Urges Reverence For Fallen Troops. In USA Today (10/3, 2.27M), writer Kathy Roth-Douquet discusses the phrase "died in vain," which she traces to Abraham Lincoln. She states that deaths in Iraq are not "for naught," even if the war "is a mistake, or we pull out too early," because "despite any partisan's passion for the rightness of a position, none of us will know how right or wrong we really are until long after the last shot is fired. So we make decisions the way one does in a self-governing society of 300 million cantankerous souls: imperfectly, inelegantly, with unnecessary suffering."

Frist Says Taliban Should Be Part Of Afghan Government. The AP (10/3, Krane) reports, "US Senate Majority Leader Bill Frist said Monday that the Afghan war against Taliban guerrillas can never be won militarily and urged support for efforts to bring 'people who call themselves Taliban' and their allies into the government." The senator "said he learned from briefings that Taliban fighters were too numerous and had too much popular support to be defeated on the battlefield." Frist, "during a brief visit to a U.S. and Romanian military base in the southern Taliban stronghold of Qalat," said, "You need to bring them into a more transparent type of government. … And if that's accomplished, we'll be successful."

NATO Troops Fight To Win Afghan People's Support. The New York Times (10/3, Gall, 1.21M) reports from Pashmul, "NATO forces scored one of their biggest victories here in ferocious fighting in September, flushing out an area of southern Afghanistan that had been swarming with Taliban insurgents. But almost immediately a new and more difficult battle began — for support of the local people." The Times quotes Col. R. Stephen Williams's account of the battle and reports that in the aftermath "military commanders and the governor of Kandahar Province have started handing out half a million dollars in humanitarian aid and have promised families more help with repairing the war's damage."

The Christian Science Monitor (10/3, Peterson, 58K) also reports on such efforts to court support, writing, "Mr. Hamidullah's village is one of more than a dozen in the poor Kamdesh district of Nuristan along Afghanistan's porous border with Pakistan. US Army units of the 3rd Squadron, 71st Cavalry moved in over the summer to pay attention, with projects and money, to a region that ranks near the bottom of Afghanistan's development index." Troops and villagers both face obstacles: "pressure grows from the Taliban and other insurgents. In the past month, one prominent elder was tortured and killed, and a senior border policeman assassinated." Officers with short tours of duty rarely have the necessary "local know-how," a "requirement to successfully balance the needs of the villages while navigating among the local contractors and spreading wealth."

DOJ:

Morford Named Interim US Attorney In Nashville. The Nashville Tennessean (10/3, De La Cruz) reports, "A federal prosecutor from Ohio will serve as interim U.S. Attorney in Nashville, the U.S. Justice Department said in a statement today." The Tennessean continues, "Craig S. Morford will serve as interim as Jim Vines leaves the job as the top federal prosecutor for the Middle District of Tennessee. Vines' last day was Oct. 1, the statement said. He is returning to private practice with the King and Spalding firm." The Tennessean adds, "Morford has served as the first assistant in the U.S. Attorney's office in the Northern District of Ohio since November, 2003. He has a law degree from Valparaiso University School of Law and a bachelor's degree from Hope College, the statement said."

CORPORATE SCANDALS:

Enron Employees Angered By Fastow's Reduced Sentence. The Washington Post (10/3, D1, Johnson) reports, "When a federal judge took four years off the prison sentence of former Enron Corp. finance chief Andrew S. Fastow last week, he surprised legal analysts, angered onetime employees and sparked anew a debate about just punishment for white-collar criminals." The Post continues, "In a much-heralded 2004 plea deal, Fastow admitted to a pair of conspiracy charges that carried a maximum penalty of 10 years. He also agreed not to seek a reduction in his prison term. But one week ago, U.S. District Judge Kenneth M. Hoyt granted some mercy to the architect of the era's biggest accounting fraud and sent him to prison for just six years. … That means Fastow, who improperly took more than $45 million from the coffers of the Houston energy-trading company, could spend closer to 3 1/2 years in prison if he gets credit for completing a drug-treatment program and for good behavior. … The reduction, former Enron worker Rod Jordan said yesterday, 'was a slap in the face to employees.'" The Post adds, "No former employees appeared at last week's sentencing, with most preferring to wait until former chief executive Jeffrey K. Skilling is sentenced on fraud charges Oct. 23. 'A lot of them decided to skip Fastow because they thought it was a done deal,' Jordan said, referring to the 10-year term. … Fastow served as one of the government's most important witnesses in the trial of Skilling and Enron founder Kenneth L. Lay, who were convicted in May. Prosecutors in that case told the jury that Fastow had 'locked in' a 10-year prison sentence as part of a plea bargain with the Justice Department's Enron Task Force. … But Fastow's lawyer, John W. Keker, implored the judge last week to send Fastow away for five years because of his repentance, his cooperation with prosecutors and shareholders, and the toll on his family. Keker pointed out that Fastow's wife, Lea, spent nearly a year in prison after pleading guilty to underreporting the couple's income. … At the hearing, prosecutors did not object to the proposed reduced sentence. But they had previously filed a document agreeing with a probation department report that would have exposed Fastow to a sentence longer than 10 years."

DOJ_NMG_0073266

Memo Suggests Hurd Knew Of H-P Leak Probe In July 2005. The Wall Street Journal (10/3, Waldman, Clark) reports that Hewlett-Packard Co. "still hasn't answered a key question about its leak-investigation scandal: When did Mark Hurd, H-P's chief executive officer, learn that private phone records were being examined as part of the probe? A memo from H-P's outside law firm suggests that Mr. Hurd may have learned about the use of phone records as early as July 2005 -- a few months after the leak probe began -- though it doesn't indicate he knew that they were obtained through means that may have been illegal."

Cingular Wireless Sues Over Hewlett-Packard Pretexting. The Legal Times (10/3, Crea) reports, "Cingular Wireless filed a lawsuit Friday against Charles Kelly, one of five private investigators who allegedly impersonated Hewlett-Packard Co. board members in an effort to obtain customer calling information." The Times continues, "The case, filed in the U.S. District Court for the Northern District of Georgia, is seeking to get Kelly and his firm, Georgia-based CAS Agency Inc., along with any of its agents, to return confidential caller information and any profits made from the obtained data. The suit asks for an injunction from the court to prevent Kelly and his firm from obtaining any further customer information. It also claims punitive damages." The Times adds, "Kelly, along with other private investigators, was subcontracted through Security Outsourcing Solutions Inc., the company HP hired to determine who on the computer giant's board was leaking sensitive information to the press. Last Thursday, Kelly was subpoenaed to appear before a subcommittee of the U.S. House Energy and Commerce Committee investigating the HP scandal. Kelly and the others took the Fifth Amendment against self-incrimination and were immediately dismissed."

Sonsini's Novell Options Grants Raise Red Flags. The California Recorder (10/3, Scheck) reports, "As a director and lawyer for several companies suspected of illegally backdating stock options, Larry Sonsini has been under scrutiny the last six months for any role he may have played in option deals for employees. … But a Recorder review of SEC documents suggests Sonsini's involvement with suspiciously dated options wasn't limited to those he approved for other people." The Recorder continues, "Indeed, records filed by software maker Novell Inc. -- which recently announced it has hired outside counsel to review past option grant practices -- show that in 1999, Sonsini and the rest of the company's board deviated from their normal compensation plan by awarding themselves 50,000 options apiece. … That grant came on Oct. 26, when the stock was priced at a 17-month low. Over the next two months the share price would more than double, making the award worth more than $1 million on paper." The Recorder adds, "The timing of the Novell grant raises the question of whether the options were actually doled out the day the company said they were, according to corporate governance experts. … But that's not the only issue raised by these options. Less than a month after the grant, Novell announced exceedingly rosy financial figures from the previous fiscal year. From a nadir of $16.69 on the grant date, the stock eventually hit $39.94 by the end of December." The Recorder notes, "Ultimately, the options would become worthless before vesting due to the tech market crash. … Nevertheless, the series of events makes experts wonder whether the grants were also 'spring-loaded' -- that is, intentionally issued just before positive disclosures that the board knew would impact share prices. The SEC does not seem to view spring-loading with nearly the same severity as it does backdating, but the practice still troubles many experts, especially in this case."

Siegel Retires As Mills Chief Executive. The Washington Post (10/3, D1, O'Hara) reports that Laurence C. Siegel "retired as Mills Corp. chief executive Friday and is being asked to repay more than $360,000 in personal travel on a company-chartered jet." Mills will pay Siegel "$2.5 million in severance pay and $10.5 million if the company is sold by the end of next year, a likely event because Mills is actively trying to find a buyer for a 42-mall portfolio that includes Potomac Mills in Virginia and Arundel Mills in Maryland." The company described Siegel's departure "as a retirement and said its timing was not related to the personal travel expenses he is being asked to repay or to a soon-to-be completed investigation by the company's independent directors into Mills management and accounting failures."

DOJ_NMG_0073267

Alexander Bail Hearing Arguments Begin. The New York Times (10/3, Grobler, 1.21M) reports former Comverse CEO Jacob "Kobi" Alexander "transferred about $16 million to Namibia from Israel, bought a house and put his children into a local school, a Windhoek court was told on Monday." At the bail hearing, Alexander "showed every sign that he would fight efforts to extradite him to the United States to face charges of conspiracy, securities fraud and money laundering involving a suspected scheme to backdate stock options at Comverse." Defense lawyer Herman Oosthuizen said Alexander "would be willing to hand over his Israeli passport and post bail of about $1.36 million." The Times adds, "An F.B.I. agent, Marilyn Williams, who works out of the United States Embassy in Pretoria, South Africa, urged the court to reject the bail application. She said Mr. Alexander failed to return to New York on July 20 from a vacation in Israel to face questions from federal prosecutors. Mr. Alexander, she said, had also offered as much as $5 million — and then 'a name-your-price offer' — to a colleague at Comverse to take the blame in the stock options case."

In a widely-distributed story, the AP (10/3, Jacobson) notes that the bail hearing "will continue Tuesday. The Namibian government said it opposed bail pending a formal extradition request from the United States, said Justice Ministry official Dennis Khama. Marlene Williams, an FBI agent based in South Africa, also opposed bail."

Professor Says Hedge Funds Do Not Need More Regulation. Dale Oesterle, a law professor at Ohio State University, writes in USA Today (10/3), "Two high profile hedge fund calamities in the past week will no doubt result in renewed calls for more 'hedge fund regulation,' whatever that is. Amaranth Advisors lost a whopping $6 billion in trades of natural gas futures, and Pirate Capital is being investigated of failing to publicly disclose its stock sales. Pirate Capital has been one of the nation's most visible (and colorful) 'activist' hedge funds, funds that purchase stock in a company to force through major changes." Oesterle adds that "the current system of penalties has plenty of bite for funds that misbehave. The plight of Amaranth and Pirate hardly supports a claim for more regulation."

CRIMINAL LAW:

Foley Enters Rehab As His Attorney Denies "Inappropriate Sexual Contact." The Los Angeles Times (10/3, Levey, Neubauer, 918K) reports that "disgraced" former Rep. Mark Foley "has begun seeking treatment at a rehabilitation facility for alcoholism, his lawyer said today. 'I strongly believe that I am an alcoholic and have accepted the need for immediate treatment for alcoholism and other behavioral problems,' Foley said in a statement released through his attorney, David Roth. The lawyer did not reveal where Foley was receiving treatment." The New York Times (10/3, Hulse, Zeleny, 1.21M) reports Roth "denied that Mr. Foley had ever had inappropriate physical contact with minors. 'Mark Foley has never, ever had inappropriate sexual contact with a minor in his life,' Mr. Roth said. 'He is absolutely, positively not a pedophile.'" USA Today (10/3, 8A, Page, 2.27M) reports recounts details of Foley's political career, noting, "Rumors about Foley's sexual orientation didn't cause much of a stir in Washington and didn't imperil his re-election to the House."

USA Today (10/3, Heath, 2.27M) reports Ben Cavataro, "a 17-year-old high school senior…said" Foley "nominated him to be a page last summer. … The allegations against Foley surprised Cavataro, who only briefly met Foley during his three-week stint as a page last summer. 'There was no indication of anything improper with Foley or anybody else,' Cavataro said." USA Today (10/3, Bazar, 2.27M) notes Foley's "statement that he's an alcoholic, coming after reports that he sent sexually explicit e-mails to congressional pages, makes him the latest public figure to enter rehab in the face of scandal." The Washington Times (10/3, Pfeiffer, 88K), meanwhile, notes other sex scandals involving members of Congress.

The Palm Beach (FL) Post (10/3, Crowley) reports, "Mark Foley is not a pedophile and 'never ever' had sexual contact with minors, his attorney said Monday. … Instead, David Roth, a prominent criminal defense attorney with offices in West Palm Beach, portrayed Foley as a troubled alcoholic who has suffered from mental illness much of his adult life. … 'Mark is an alcoholic. He drank in secret. He did not drink in public,' Roth said. 'He had two lives with regard to his alcohol consumption. In public, and in public service, he was sober. When he was alone, he was not sober. He is an acknowledged alcoholic.'" The Post adds, "Foley is now in treatment for alcoholism and mental illness at an undisclosed center, where he is expected to remain for at least 30 days, Roth said. … Roth said he was contacted by Foley on Friday, minutes after the Fort Pierce Republican resigned from Congress after being confronted with sexually explicit Internet messages he exchanged with a teenage boy. … Asked if Foley, 52, had physical contact with any of the boys with whom he was communicating, Roth said, 'Based on all the information that I have, Mark Foley has never ever had an inappropriate sexual contact with a minor in his life.' … Asked if Foley is a pedophile, Roth said, 'He is absolutely, positively not a pedophile.' … He described Foley as 'contrite, remorseful and devastated by the harm that his actions have caused.... He blames no one but himself.'"

DOJ_NMG_0073268

Foley's Predilection For Young Males Was Reportedly Widely Known. The Los Angeles Times (10/3, Levey, Reynolds, Schmitt, 918K), in an article titled, "Foley Saga No Shock to Some: The Florida Republican was known to have an interest in younger men," reports, "some on Capitol Hill say" Foley "was known to have a special interest in younger men. In interviews with the Los Angeles Times, several current and former congressional employees and others said they recalled Foley approaching young male pages, aides and interns at parties and other venues. 'Almost the first day I got there I was warned,' said Mark Beck-Heyman…who served as a page. … 'It was no secret that Foley had a special interest in male pages,' said Beck-Heyman, adding that Foley…on several occasions asked him out for ice cream. Another former congressional staff member said he too had been the object of Foley's advances." The Times goes on to report, "The current and former congressional staffers interviewed by The Times, who are from both parties, said it was well known within the Capitol's gay community that Foley was interested in young men. 'Among the gay political community, there was a pretty wide understanding that he had an eye for the interns and the younger staff,' said one former congressional staffer."

Roll Call's "Heard on the Hill" (10/3, Akers) reports, "the Foley 'victims' crawling out of the woodwork! One of them, a boyish looking former reporter turned big-shot lawyer living in California, had until Friday tried to suppress the memory of repeatedly being 'asked out' by Foley in the mid- to late '90s when the former scribe was in his 20s but looked about 18. … After Foley resigned over the Pagegate scandal Friday, our source, whom we hesitate to call Deep Throat on the Left Coast, recalled something that happened about 10 years ago — he thinks it was early 1997 — one night at Café Deluxe. He was out to dinner with a gal pal when he suddenly heard someone yelling his name from across the restaurant. DT on the LC was mortified when he saw Foley, who he said 'was drunk,' approaching their table and quickly asked his friend to say she was his girlfriend. Foley…came over, exchanged pleasantries with the reporter and his friend and asked if the two were dating. 'Yes,' our source recalled his pal saying. Foley, according to our source replied, 'Well, I've been asking [name redacted] out for years, and he always says no. What's your secret?'"

CBS Evening News (10/2, story 5, 3:15, Couric, 7.66M) reported, "The FBI may not have seen it but some 16-year-olds sensed Foley was crossing a line other Congressmen didn't." Unidentified female: "I had a friend Matt and a friend Tim and he would see them first and he would be like 'Hi, Mattie, hi Timmy.' And we used to be like 'that's funny of them to say that. That's kind of weird.'"

Potential Prosecution Of Foley Examined. The AP (10/3, Jordan) reports, "The FBI…'is conducting an assessment to see if there's been a violation of federal law," according to FBI spokesman Richard Kolko." The AP continues, "The Florida Department of Law Enforcement said Monday it was also investigating whether the e-mail communications violated state law. Spokesman Tom Berlinger called the state probe 'a precursor to a possible criminal investigation.'" The AP adds, "FBI cyber sleuths are looking into the text of some of the Foley messages, checking to see how many e-mails and instant electronic messages were sent and how many computers were used, according to a law enforcement official, who spoke on condition of anonymity because of the ongoing investigation. … The FBI also was trying to determine if any of the teenagers who received messages are willing to cooperate with the investigation, the official said." The AP notes, "Ironically, Foley, who is 52 and single, could be found to have violated a law that he helped to write as co-chairman of the Congressional Missing and Exploited Children's Caucus."

McClatchy (10/3, Talev, Taylor) reports, "Yet in an ironic twist, federal laws championed by Foley himself make it a crime in some circumstances to use the Internet to persuade, induce or entice someone under 18 to engage in sexual activity." McClatchy adds, "Citizens for Responsibility and Ethics in Washington (CREW), a liberal watchdog group, said it asked the FBI to investigate non-explicit e-mails between Foley and a former page back in July, after a 'third party' made the e-mails available to the group. CREW asked Monday for the Justice Department's inspector general to investigate why the FBI didn't act. An FBI spokesman wouldn't comment, except to confirm that an investigation had been launched." McClatchy adds, "John Pierce, a former federal prosecutor of 14 years now in private practice, said if a crime was committed, the Justice Department could investigate members of Congress for knowing about a 'commission of a felony' and failing to report it. However, Pierce expressed doubts that Hastert would have called for such a probe if he believed there was a cover-up within his party's ranks."

Bloomberg (10/3, Roberts) reports, "Hastert yesterday sent a letter to Attorney General Alberto Gonzales asking for a criminal investigation of Foley. … In his letter to the attorney general, Hastert defended his handling of the matter, noting that after learning of Foley's 2005 e-mails to a male former page, Shimkus and the House clerk confronted Foley, demanded he stop contacting the page and believed the issue had been resolved privately as the parents had requested." Bloomberg notes, "Democrats said any Justice Department investigation of Foley should include how House Republican leaders responded after the first indications that Foley had sent inappropriate e-mails to teenage pages in 2005. House Democrats demanded that the chamber's ethics committee produce a preliminary report on the matter within 10 days. … 'Central to the investigation is immediately questioning, under oath, the House Republican leadership,' Pelosi wrote in a letter to lawmakers on the committee yesterday."

DOJ_NMG_0073269

Liberal Watchdog Group Forwarded Messages To FBI In July. CBS Evening News (10/2, story 5, 3:15, Couric, 7.66M) reported, "Melanie Sloan, who heads the Center for Responsibility in Politics, said there were warning signs" about Foley's "conduct. Last July, her group said some of the overly friendly e-mails were sent to the FBI but no action followed." Melanie Sloan: "I would have grabbed Foley's computer right away and starting examining." The Washington Post (10/3, A11, Babington, Weisman, 748K) reports the FBI "acknowledged yesterday that it did not begin an investigation in late July after receiving copies of e-mails sent in 2005" by Foley.

The AP (10/3, Taylor) notes Melanie Sloan, CREW's executive director and a former prosecutor "specializing in sex crimes," said, "they (the e-mails) should have raised a red flag over at the FBI," and "asked the Justice Department's inspector general to investigate why Foley's e-mails were not pursued." Roll Call (10/3, Bresnahan) characterizes CREW as a "liberal watchdog group" and reports that Sloan is a former House Democratic staffer. The Washington Post (10/3, A11, Babington, Weisman, 748K) describes CREW as a "liberal-leaning group."

The New York Times (10/3, Hulse, Zeleny, 1.21M) reports, "The group would not say where it had obtained the messages; it made them public after the ABC report."

Two Florida Papers Were Previously In Possession Of Foley Emails. The New York Times (10/3, Kornblut, Seelye, 1.21M) reports, "At least two news organizations were tipped off to e-mail messages sent by…Foley long before the story…broke last week and forced him to resign. The St. Petersburg Times and The Miami Herald received copies of an e-mail exchange between Mr. Foley, Republican of Florida, and a teenager, but neither paper gathered enough solid material to publish a story, according to statements by the papers' editors." The Times notes "the papers' decisions not to report the accusations are being cited by Republican leaders as justification for why they themselves did not step forward earlier to try to stop Mr. Foley." Speaker Hastert is quoted as saying, "He deceived his in-state newspaper when they each questioned him. … He deceived me, too."

Value Of Page Program Questioned. ABC World News (10/2, story 5, 0:20, Gibson, 8.78M) reported, "The Congressional page program has…seen scandal before, most notably the House censored two Representatives in 1983." The New York Times' John Tierney (10/3) writes, "Congress sees nothing strange about dragging teenagers from their families and schools to become pages, one step below a squire in the feudal food chain. … The justification for the page program is that it gives teenagers an insider's glimpse of how Congress works. But why disillusion them at such a tender age?" The Hill (10/3, Kucinich) reports Hastert "announced several changes to the page program yesterday at a joint press conference with Shimkus including the establishment of a hotline for 'parents, grandparents, pages, former pages."

Man Kills Four, Wounds Seven At Amish School In Pennsylvania. A dairy truck driver walked into a one room Amish schoolhouse in Nickel Mines, Pennsylvania yesterday and tried to execute the girls there. The New York Times (10/3, Kocieniewski, Gately) reports that police say Charles Roberts succeeded in killing four of the girls and wounding seven others before killing himself. The Times adds, "The heavily armed gunman first ordered the 15 boys in the room to leave, along with several adults, and demanded that the 11 girls line up facing the blackboard. As the gunman lashed the students' legs together with wire and plastic ties, the teacher dashed from the room and called the police around 10:35 a.m." Roberts "killed himself as the police stormed" the school.

A front page story in the Washington Post (10/3, A1, McCaffrey, Duggan) reports, "Of the seven other girls who were shot, as many as six were critically wounded. Their conditions were 'very, very dire,' said Col. Jeffery B. Miller, commissioner of the state police. Miller called it 'a horrendous crime scene' and said the victims, at least one as young as 6, were shot at close range in the back of the head. The condition of one girl, a 13-year- old, was upgraded last night to serious, a hospital official said."

NBC Nightly News (10/2, lead story, 2:50, Ellis) reported, "Hours after the shooting police walked the nearby field in a line searching for children that might have escaped the violence to hide in the familiar fields. According to police no children were found in the police. As for a motive police say this is a grudge that Roberts held for some 20 years but not against the Amish. Police are calling this a crime of convenience saying it was close to his home and at a school that had no security. Police are saying there is a lot of evidence that Roberts were planning this for a long time and that he was planning along siege."

The Washington Times/AP (10/3, Scolforo) reports, "The gunman, Charles Carl Roberts IV, a 32-year-old truck driver from the nearby town of Bart, was bent on killing young girls as a way of 'acting out in revenge for something that happened 20 years ago,' Col. Miller said, though he gave no details on what the grudge was." The AP adds, " Roberts was not Amish and apparently had nothing against the religious community, Col. Miller said. Instead, Col. Miller said, he apparently picked the school because it was close by, there were girls there and it had little or no security."

DOJ_NMG_0073270

ABC World News (10/2, lead story, 3:10, Muir) reported, "We're getting late word about the gunman who backed his pickup truck to the schoolhouse about a half mile down the road here, investigators tell us late tonight he had three guns, two stun guns, two knives and 600 rounds of ammunition. He was prepared for a long siege here and why this schoolhouse? Because he knew it wouldn't be secure, surrounded by only white fencing and acres and acres of farmland."

CBS Evening News (10/2, lead story, 3:20, Pitts) reported, "Authorities found what they described as a suicide note at Roberts' home in the neighboring town. He had apparently worked his shift last night at the local milk plant. This morning he took his own children to the bus stop. Minutes before the fatal shooting, he called his wife from inside the school on his cell phone." Miller: "He did make a statement to his wife on the phone that he was acting out in a way to achieve revenge for something that happened 20 years ago."

USA Today (10/3, Frank, Levin) reports that "the rural seclusion the Amish have here in central Pennsylvania's rolling hills was shattered Monday by the execution-style shooting of three Amish girls in a one-room schoolhouse. … The killings — the girls were bound together and had to be cut apart by rescue workers according to the Pennsylvania State Police — devastated the ordinarily composed Amish. Many were 'crying and weeping and hugging, and the Amish people don't usually show too much emotion,' said Annie Beiler, 66, whose farm abuts the school property."

The Pittsburgh Post-Gazette (10/3, Barnes, Mauriello) reports, "Mr. Roberts, apparently seeking revenge for a mysterious incident 20 years ago when he was a boy, had planned the slaughter for days, based on the weapons, tools and other equipment police recovered inside the school. … 'It's clear to us he did a great deal of planning in this,' said state police Commissioner Jeffrey Miller. 'It was clear he intended to be prepared for a lengthy siege. It was not a spur of the moment thing. He intended to harm these kids and himself.'" The Post-Gazette adds, "The incident did not appear to be related to the Amish. Mr. Roberts is not Amish. … Col. Miller would say little else about a motive except that something might have happened 20 years ago, when Mr. Roberts was 12. Col Miller refused to elaborate. … He also said the death of Mr. Roberts' infant daughter in 1997 may have played a part in yesterday's tragedy."

Bloomberg (10/3, Zeranski, Dolmetsch) reports, "Roberts was armed with a semi-automatic handgun, a shotgun, a stun gun and several knives, in addition to tools such as a hammer, hacksaw and wooden boards he used to barricade the classroom after letting some of the people go, said Miller, who added that Roberts had no previous criminal record." Bloomberg adds, "The killings were the third attack at an American school in six days. A gunman took six students hostage at Platte Canyon High School in Bailey, Colorado, before killing one girl and himself on Sept. 27. A principal in Wisconsin was shot to death by a former student on Sept. 29."

The Los Angeles Times (10/3, Barry, Simon) reports, "Employed by Land O'Lakes and assigned to deliver milk for a subsidiary called Northwest Food Products, Roberts was known around the community as outgoing and personable. Co-workers told authorities that Roberts had seemed tense of late, not his usual, quick-to-joke self, but had been more relaxed in the past few days." The Times adds, "But Roberts' brutality evoked very little anger among the community Monday. Men in broad-brimmed hats and suspenders and women in bonnets and long dark dresses expressed grief and shock, but in hushed, muted tones. … Rather than dwell on the victims -- though this is a close-knit community, where few are strangers -- Amish residents spoke of their concern for Roberts' family; their sorrow that a man could become so unhinged, so alienated from the Lord."

Local Television. More that 1,200 local television newscasts reported that a gunman attacked a one-room Amish school in rural Pennsylvania, shooting dead three girls before killing himself. In general, the incident was seen as part of series of ongoing violence that has recently hit US schools.

WPTY-TV Memphis, (9/2, 10:36 p.m.) reported, "What happened today in the West Nickel Mines Amish School in rural county Pennsylvania has horrified the country. Three girls, one teacher's aid murdered in cold blood and now word that a fourth may have died. All shot in the head by a gunman wreaking a terrible vengeance for a still unknown wrong he suffered long ago."

KKCO-TV Grand Junction, (9/2, 9:59 p.m.) reported, "A 32-year-old truck driver took more than a dozen girls hostage in a one room Amish school in Pennsylvania, killing at least three children and injuring 8 others. Then the gunman killed himself during a running gun battle with police. It was the nation's third deadly school shooting in the past week."

KOLN-TV Lincoln, (9/2, 4:59 p.m.) reported, "Authorities say the shooter wrote in a note he wanted revenge for something that happened 20 years ago."

WHYY-TV Philadelphia, (9/2, 5:32 p.m.) reported, "Today's school violence comes in the wake of last week's shooting of a principal in Wisconsin and shooting of a teenaged girl in Colorado."

KABC-TV Los Angeles, (9/2, 5:02 p.m.) reported, "Today's Amish school massacre is one of…school shootings and disturbances stretching from Colorado to Wisconsin, to Nevada, to nickel mines, Pennsylvania. In two of the incidents, gunmen targeted girls as victims."

DOJ_NMG_0073271

WRC-TV Washington, DC, (9/2, 1:02 p.m.) reported, "Just today, a massacre in a one-room Amish school in Pennsylvania. The victims, again, all girls. With the American Association of School Administrators, saying security is a great concern. It's very difficult to prevent against all of these things because if you are dealing with people who are off the scale in terms of normalcy and they are willing to do almost anything to themselves, it's very difficult to protect a school or any other place. A therapist says the feeling of being afraid in school is something many children in her community live with every day."

WVIT-TV Hartford, (9/2, 5:30 p.m.) reported, "Psychologists say there are definitely things parents should keep in mind when deciding whether to talk to kids about school violence. Their age is a good indication of just how much, if anything, you should say."

KTVX-TV Salt Lake City, (9/2, 10:03 p.m.) reported, "The rash of school violence across the country has many parents wondering what's being done to keep our children safe 'close to home."

WISN-TV Milwaukee, (9/2, 6:36 p.m.) reported, "Federal funding is on the decline for programs aimed at stopping school violence. Records show funding was nearly $440 million in 2001. It has fallen to $346 million this year and even less is being set aside for next year."

WJLA-TV Washington, DC, (9/2, 6:00 p.m.) reported, "This is the nation's third school shooting in less than one week."

KDVR-TV Denver, (9/2, 9:28 p.m.) reported, "Some are wondering if this is a case of copycat shooters. There are some similarities between today's shooting and what happened in Bailey."

Expelled Student Shows Up At Las Vegas School With Gun, Flees. The AP (10/3, Ritter) reports, "Four public school campuses were locked down Monday while police searched for a teenager who was spotted at a high school with a gun, authorities said." The AP continues, "No shots were fired, and police said they had no indication the teen -- a former student who had been banned from Mojave High School -- had threatened anyone." The AP adds, "Police gave up their search of a residential area in suburban North Las Vegas after more than three hours. … 'We know who he is,' North Las Vegas police spokesman Tim Bedwell said. 'He will be found eventually.'" The AP notes, "Bedwell would not disclose the teen's name or age, but said he believed the youth had been expelled or transferred from the high school for academic or disciplinary reasons."

The New York Times (10/3, Scott) reports, "The youth was expelled from the school, Mojave High, in the last academic year, though it is not clear why. The authorities were waiting for him there Monday morning, having received a tip from a student, said Sgt. Phil Gervasi of the Clark County school district police." The Times adds, "When the youth recognized the officers, Sergeant Gervasi said, he dropped the loaded .25-caliber pistol and fled. After three hours, the search in the neighborhood was called off, he said. … 'They're still looking for an AK-47 he stole from his parents' house,' Sergeant Gervasi said."

Judge Sets $750,000 Bail In Wisconsin School Shooting Case. The Milwaukee Journal Sentinel/AP (10/3, Staff, Press) reports, "A Sauk County prosecutor told a judge Monday that 15-year-old Eric Hainstock may have had other targets in mind when he entered his high school and killed his principal Friday." The Sentinel continues, "District Attorney Patricia Barrett disclosed the potential of other targets in successfully arguing for a bail amount of $750,000 for the teen, who remains in the Sauk County Law Enforcement Center." The Sentinel adds, "Hainstock appeared in court with his attorneys through a video feed from jail. When Circuit Judge Patrick Taggart asked him if he understood he could face life in prison, Hainstock replied calmly and firmly, 'I do.' … In following Barrett's bail recommendation, the judge said, 'It goes without saying the public does need protection in this matter.'" The Sentinel notes, "Barrett told the judge there were other 'persons of interest' for Hainstock when he went to Weston Schools Friday morning and shot Principal John Klang."

The AP (10/3, Richmond) reports, "Hainstock's attorneys asked for $10,000 bail, saying the teen has lived in the Sauk County area his whole life and has no convictions. … But Circuit Judge Patrick Taggart agreed with Barrett. … If Hainstock were to post the $750,000 cash bond, he would have to submit to electronic monitoring, the judge said. He also would be barred from leaving Sauk County or having contact with anyone at the schools or the Klang family." The AP notes, "He has been charged with first-degree intentional homicide. Wisconsin does not have the death penalty. … Taggart set a pretrial conference for Hainstock for Oct. 13."

Bush Directs Gonzales, Spellings To Convene School Violence Conference. The AP (10/3, Pickler) reports, "The Bush administration will host a conference next week to discuss the recent string of school violence across the country, the White House said Monday." The AP continues, "Presidential spokeswoman Dana Perino said the conference will bring together education and law enforcement officials to talk about the nature of the problem and federal action that can help communities prevent violence and deal with its aftermath." The AP adds, "Three schools have been hit by deadly attacks in the past week. A gunman killed himself and three others Monday at a one-room Amish schoolhouse in Pennsylvania; on Friday a 15-year-old

DOJ_NMG_0073272

Wisconsin student shot and killed his principal; and last Wednesday a man took six girls hostage in Colorado, sexually assaulting them before fatally shooting one girl and killing himself. … 'The president is deeply saddened and troubled by the recent school violence and shootings that have taken place in different communities across America,' Perino said. 'It breaks America's collective heart when innocent children who are at school to learn are violently taken hostage and cut down in their own schools.'" The AP notes, "Perino said the conference was still in the planning stages, so a specific date, location and other details were not ready to be announced. It was not clear whether President Bush would attend."

Bloomberg (10/3, Zeranski, Dolmetsch) reports, "President George W. Bush instructed Attorney General Alberto Gonzales and Education Secretary Margaret Spellings to convene a meeting in Washington next week among educators and law enforcement officials to come up with ways to deal with school violence."

AFP (10/3) reports, "Gonzales and Spellings met Monday with Bush's domestic policy adviser, Zinsmeister, to discuss the issue, Perino said."

USA Today (10/3, Levin, Parker) reports, " "It was the third fatal school shooting in the USA in six days. … In Washington, meanwhile, the White House said President Bush will convene a conference on school violence next week."

ABC's Nightline (9/2, 11:59 p.m.) reported, "The white House is stepping in. President Bush, next week, brings together law enforcement and educational officials to figure out what the government can do to stem this innocence of killings."

The Bush administration announcement that it will hold a conference on school violence received moderate and straightforward coverage by local television newscasts. All newscasts agreed that the latest incidents that hit U.S. schools may be behind the decision. Some examples: WATE-TV Knoxville, (9/2, 10:59 p.m.) reported, "President Bush is planning a conference next week to address the string of school violence. The plan is to bring together education and law enforcement to figure out which federal resources can be brought in to prevent school violence and respond to it. President Bush says he is troubled by the shootings."

WSVN-TV Miami, (9/2, 10:01 p.m.) reported, "Today's violence makes it the third U.S. school shooting in less than a week. Tonight, The White House is announcing President Bush plan to hold a special conference on school violence next week in Washington."

WPXI-TV Pittsburgh, (9/2, 11:05 p.m.) reported, "President Bush says he is saddened by the recent school violence and will address the issue at a news conference next week."

WTNH-TV Hartford, (9/2, 11:04 p.m.) reported, "President Bush will host a conference next week on school violence. Educators and law enforcement will be brought together. They will try to figure out how to keep innocent children from being targeted in a place where they are supposed to feel safe."

WLOS-TV Greenville, (9/2, 10:59 p.m.) reported, "President Bush says he is 'deeply saddened' by the recent series of school violence. He is planning a conference next week to address the problem."

KTBC-TV Austin, (9/2, 9:01 p.m.) reported, "The Bush administration will host a conference next week to discuss the recent string of school violence across the country. The conference will bring together education and law enforcement officials to talk about the nature of the problem and federal action that can help communities prevent violence and deal with its aftermath."

WINK-TV Ft. Myers, (9/2, 11:02 p.m.) reported, "A spokeswoman says it will bring together education and law enforcement officials to discuss which federal resources can be used to prevent and respond to these kinds of attacks."

Schools Urged To Watch For Signs Of Emotional Distress In Children. USA Today (10/3, Davis) reports, "School safety experts say that the first order of business in classrooms across the nation today should be to take the psychological pulse of children. The slayings at a Pennsylvania schoolhouse Monday most likely sent shivers of fear through students, teachers and parents everywhere, they say." Experts "say children can be upset even if they're not directly involved with a tragedy. They say disturbing events can stir up the memory of trauma from a child's past. Signs of emotional distress include lethargy or withdrawal and changes in personality, appetite or sleep."

NYTimes, WPost See Gun Laws As Tool To Curb Rash Of School Shootings. The New York Times (10/3, 1.21M) editorializes, "No one will rise up to defend a man who walks into an Amish school, lines young girls up against a blackboard, ties up their feet, and then kills them before killing himself. But a surprising number of people will inevitably rise up to defend his guns, to call the man guilty but his weapons innocent. … This is the third school shooting in a week. What will stick in almost everyone's minds is the gross disparity between Mr. Roberts's murderous intentions and the bucolic peacefulness of an Amish school in early October. But this killing is no different from the ones that took place in Wisconsin and Colorado recently. The weapons were the same, and so was the conflict between the hideous assault of a damaged mind and the atmosphere of openness and trust that makes education possible. … Most gun owners are respectable, law-abiding citizens. But that is no reason to acquit the guns."

The Washington Post (10/3, A16, 748K), in an editorial, notes that "there are those who will argue that nothing -- least of all laws controlling guns -- can stop a madman. That doesn't mean, though, that we shouldn't try. Sadly, rather than making it harder for the wrong people to get guns, some in Congress are seeking to make it easier. … We hope that the singular calamity that befell this community will wake up the nation to do something about the madness it can control."

DOJ_NMG_0073273

Online Gambling Exec Predicts Industry Consolidation. The Financial Times (10/3, Blitz, Correspondent) reports, "Internet gambling companies face a wave of consolidation in the wake of the US clampdown on online gaming, which could see American casinos and gambling businesses swooping for bargains in the sector, the heads of two of the biggest online gambling sites said on Monday. Mitch Garber, chief executive of PartyGaming, and Gigi Levy, who takes over as chief of 888 Holdings this year, made their predictions as the sector felt the impact of the bill passed in the Senate on Friday making it illegal for banks and credit card companies to process online gaming payments from the US." Garber "told the Financial Times that he expected the pace of consolidation to quicken, with MGM and Harrah's, which built their gaming empires around the fully regulated Las Vegas casino industry, likely to step in."

UK Online Gambling Companies May Stop Doing Business In US. The Wall Street Journal/AP (10/3) reports, "Several British online gambling companies may cease doing business in the US as a result of Congress passing legislation prohibiting the use of credit cards, checks and electronic fund transfers for online gaming. PartyGaming PLC, the world's biggest online gambling company, said it would pull out of the US if President Bush signs the legislation into law. Meanwhile, 888 Holdings PLC said it's suspending online betting operations in the US and Sportingbet PLC said it called off takeover talks with World Gaming PLC." The legislation passed the house and Senate as part of a port securities bill over the weekend.

The Washington Post/AP (10/3, D5, Barr) reports, "Shares in British online gambling companies dived Monday after Congress passed legislation prohibiting the use of credit cards, checks and electronic fund transfers for online gaming. … Shares in PartyGaming plunged 58 percent yesterday to end at 84 cents, shares in 888 sank 26.1 percent to finish at $2.03, while Sportingbet shares dropped 64.5 percent to close at $1.24."

The Atlanta Journal-Constitution (10/3, Emling) reports, "Top online gambling companies said Monday they were preparing to suspend their U.S. operations after Congress approved a bill aimed at cutting off cash flowing to their Internet sites." The AJC continues, "The Unlawful Internet Gambling Enforcement Act, abruptly passed Saturday as part of a port securities bill, bans banks and credit card companies from accepting checks and electronic payments from customers using Internet gaming sites. President Bush is expected to sign the measure." The AJC adds, "The congressional action sent gaming companies' stocks into a tailspin. … Shares of PartyGaming PLC, which operates the world's most popular poker site, PartyPoker, fell 58 percent on Monday, and those of Sportingbet, which owns ParadisePoker.com, fell 64 percent. Overall, the plunge wiped up to $7.5 billion in market capitalization off the books. .. . Another major operator, 888 Holdings, said it had suspended its online betting U.S. operations, and PartyGaming said it would do so once the act is signed."

The Los Angeles Times (10/3, Hiltzik) reports, "Online gambling companies were grappling with a new crisis Monday after the Senate quietly passed a bill forbidding American banks and credit card companies from processing payments to them." The Times continues, "Shares of publicly traded Internet gaming operators plummeted on the London Stock Exchange after the measure was attached as a rider to a bill designed to enhance U.S. port security and passed late Friday. .. .The House passed a similar bill this year, and the legislation is expected to be signed by President Bush. It prohibits banks and credit card companies from making payments to online gaming websites that appear on a list to be drafted within nine months by the Justice Department and the Federal Reserve." The Times adds, "Online websites also would be prohibited from accepting U.S. payments, but because most are based overseas, the ability of U.S. authorities to prosecute them is uncertain. … Also unclear is what sort of gambling falls under the prohibition. Although Internet sports betting is plainly outlawed by the federal Wire Act, there is some doubt whether online poker or other games fall under the same prohibition."

USA Today (10/3, McCarthy, Swartz) reports, "Senate Republican leader Bill Frist of Tennessee tacked the bill on to the popular Safe Port Act bill on Saturday, before Congress went into recess for November's elections. … The surprise passage of the law threw the online gambling industry into a tailspin Monday." USA adds, "The federal government has been cracking down on Internet betting on sports, poker and other casino games that it considers illegal under the 1961 Wire Act. Considering that American bettors generate 50%-60% of industrywide revenue, many operators will be forced to either cash in their chips and go out of business or sell or merge with another provider, experts say. … Roughly half the estimated 500 companies operating 2,300 gambling websites across the Caribbean, Central America and Europe could be wiped out, predicts Sue Schneider, publisher of Interactive Gaming News. The survivors will have to make do on sharply reduced revenue, while seeking ways around the U.S. ban and building up their business in Asia. … After the bill is signed, U.S. Attorney General Alberto Gonzales will have 270 days to determine how the law will be enforced."

DOJ_NMG_0073274

DOJ Grant Will Fund Mississippi Domestic Violence Unit. The AP (10/3) reports, "A new domestic violence unit is being established by the Mississippi attorney general's office and funded by a $1.5 million grant." The AP continues, "The unit will act as a resource for law enforcement, prosecutors, judges and all other individuals or entities having legal duties related to domestic violence victims or providing services to victims. … 'What this division does is bring a cohesiveness to the state's efforts to fight domestic violence,' said Attorney General Jim Hood. 'Our state ranks second highest in the nation for domestic violence. That dubious distinction alone is enough to say we have to improve our efforts and that's what we are dedicated to doing.'" The AP adds, "Hood's office said the unit will partner with the Administrative Office of Courts, the Judicial College, the Mississippi Department of Public Safety Planning and the Mississippi Coalition Against Domestic Violence. … The two-year grant was awarded by the U.S. Justice Department's Office on Violence Against Women."

Philadelphia Police Dispatchers Charged With Extortion. The AP (10/3) reports two Philadelphia police civilian "radio dispatchers are facing federal extortion charges after investigators said they provided names and addresses connected to auto license tags to someone they thought was going to rob the homes." Patricia Bradley and Tamara Mitchell "have been charged with extortion and aiding and abetting, U.S. Attorney Patrick Meehan said Monday. The women ran license tags on the police department's computer system and gave the names and addresses connected to those tags to a man they believed was going to rob the residences, according to investigators with the FBI and the city police department's internal affairs division. Investigators said Bradley and Mitchell believed that the vehicles, two registered in Pennsylvania and two in New Jersey, belonged to drug dealers."

The Philadelphia Daily News (10/3, Hinkelman, 109K) reports that "the man to whom they peddled the names and addresses turned out to be a government informant," and US Attorney Patrick Meehan said, "These defendants deliberately undermined the work of the very officers they were supposed to be supporting." The Daily News adds, "The feds said the informant had given money to the defendants in exchange for names and addresses related to the tags. The amount of money handed over by the informant typically ranged from $50 to $100 per name and address, said a person familiar with the investigation." The Philadelphia Inquirer (10/3, Arnold, 399K) also reports on the charges, but does not mention the FBI role in the investigation.

Former FBI Informant Sentenced To 90 Years In Prison For NJ Heists. The New York Times (10/3, 1.21M) reports, "A man who once served as an F.B.I. informant was sentenced in Federal District Court yesterday to 90 years in prison for a series of bank robberies" in New Jersey. US Attorney Christopher J. Christie said that Michael Giubilo "was arrested by federal agents as he was about to enter the Bank of New York in Millburn, Mr. Christie said. At trial, he said, Mr. Giubilo claimed that he had been set up by the F.B.I. In 1997, a federal judge ordered that Mr. Giubilo stop working as an informant because of his continued criminal activity, including weapons possession and eluding the police, Mr. Christie said."

Lorusso To Testify In Jemal Trial Today. The Washington Post (10/3, B6, Leonnig) reports, "No witness is more crucial or more awaited in the bribery trial of downtown developer Douglas Jemal than the D.C. government refugee expected to testify today: Jemal's former drinking buddy and disgraced former city official Michael A. Lorusso. … Lorusso, 40, pleaded guilty in 2004 to taking cash bribes and gifts from Jemal and his development company's officers in exchange for crafting sweetheart deals that would give Jemal's company millions of city taxpayer dollars it didn't earn. But in newly filed court papers, Jemal's defense attorneys say jurors should not believe Lorusso and that the former deputy director of the D.C. Office of Property Management got a sweet deal himself by tantalizing prosecutors with tales of bribes from a big local fish. Jemal has maintained that anything he gave Lorusso was a gift to a friend, without any strings attached -- just as when the developer picks up the Friday night tab for his pals at the Capitol Grille."

Mississippi Man Sentenced To Two Years In Prison For FEMA Fraud. The AP (10/3) reports Bryan Michael Beets of Vicksburg "has been sentenced to two years in prison. … U.S. District Judge David C. Bramlette ordered Beets to pay $3,854 in restitution, which is payable to FEMA and the American Red Cross. Beets was accused of falsely claiming to live in a Long Beach dwelling that was damaged by Katrina, when he actually was living and working in Vicksburg. Beets was convicted in federal court in June." In a statement yesterday announcing the sentence, US Attorney Dunn Lampton said, "The prosecution and sentence today show the continuing commitment of the Katrina Fraud Task Force to uphold the U.S. Attorney General's mandate of zero tolerance of Katrina fraud."

Louisiana Woman Sentenced To 18 Months In Prison For Katrina Fraud. The AP (10/3) reports Tarsha Johnson of Baton Rouge "was sentenced to 18 months in prison on Monday for making a false claim to get disaster aid after Hurricane Katrina, a U.S. attorney said." She "pleaded guilty May 8 to making a false claim." U.S. District Judge Frank J. Polozola "also ordered her to perform 50 hours of community service and to pay $2,000 in restitution."

DOJ_NMG_0073275

FBI, USDOT Investigating Tampa Expressway Authority. The St. Petersburg Times (10/3, Van Sickler) reports, "The FBI and the U.S. Department of Transportation are conducting a criminal investigation into the Tampa-Hillsborough Expressway Authority, an agency board member confirmed Monday." Hillsborough County Commissioner Tom Scott "said he spoke with investigators from the two federal agencies last week for more than 90 minutes. 'I was invited to meet with them and they are looking at the (Expressway Authority),' Scott said. 'But I can't disclose the content of their questions in order not to hinder their investigation.'" The Times notes, "The criminal inquiry is the third investigation into the agency since late August, when details emerged about possible conflicts of interest, violations of ethics and public record laws, and questionable billings by lobbyists."

FBI, Connecticut Authorities Investigating Interstate Construction Defects. The AP (10/3) reports, "Gov. M. Jodi Rell ordered an independent audit Monday into contracts, work performance and the Department of Transportation in connection with construction defects plaguing a $52 million improvement project of Interstate 84. Also Monday, state Attorney General Richard Blumenthal said his office is investigating the project, which involves a 31/2-mile stretch of the highway between Waterbury and Cheshire." The AP adds, "Authorities with the FBI and other federal agencies are investigating the problems, which could also add months to a project that was supposed to be completed a year ago. Many of the drains lead nowhere, some are clogged with debris and others were apparently connected with substandard, cracked and leaking pipes, the newspaper reported."

Investigation Finds Inappropriate Expenditures At Getty. After a yearlong investigation, the California attorney general's office has concluded that the J. Paul Getty Trusts's former chief executive Barry Munitz and the Trust's board made a number of inappropriate expenditures, but will not be the subject of legal action because the money was returned. The Los Angeles Times (10/3, Felch, Frammolino) reports, "The misuse of the Getty's tax-exempt money included excessive travel expenses by Munitz and his wife, Munitz's extensive use of his staff for personal errands, his payment of consulting fees to a former Getty intern, and gifts of artwork to retiring trustees, according to the report released today by the attorney general's office." Attorney General Bill Lockyer "will take no legal action against the trust, Munitz or board members, the report said." Lockyer "has appointed an independent monitor, former state Atty. Gen. John K. Van de Kamp, to ensure the Getty carries through with its promised reforms over the next two years."

The New York Times (10/3, Wyatt, Kennedy) reports, "The report stated that the misuse of funds did not result from fraud and that the value of a settlement between the former president, Barry Munitz, and the trust exceeded the value of the losses from any improper payments. The Getty, which has adopted several reforms since Mr. Munitz resigned under pressure in February, expressed satisfaction with the results of the inquiry."

DNA Test May Win New Trials For Two Convicted Murderers. The Washington Post (10/3, B4, Londoano) reports, "Two of Colleen Williar's neighbors were convicted of murder after the 24-year-old woman was raped, strangled with a sock and repeatedly stabbed in her Baltimore home nearly two decades ago. Now, a vaginal swab from the autopsy that was recently compared with DNA samples from the men might win new trials for James L. Owens, 41, and James Thompson, 47. The men were convicted in 1988 during separate trials in which relatively weak physical evidence was supported by a last-minute confession by Thompson. He later recanted, and both men now say they were innocent bystanders who came under suspicion after telling a series of lies that began as an attempt to cash in on police reward money. Defense lawyers said the case could mark the first time in Maryland history that a post-conviction DNA test clears co-defendants convicted of murder."

Judge Rejects Motion To Unseal Karr Child Porn Investigation Documents. In a widely-distributed story, the AP (10/3, Wohlsen) reports, "A judge refused to unseal police documents in the child pornography case against former JonBenet Ramsey slaying suspect John Mark Karr, whose attorneys are fighting to have the misdemeanor charges tossed out. The Press Democrat of Santa Rosa had sought to view the documents…but Sonoma County Judge Cerena Wong agreed with prosecutors who argued it could harm the investigation and prejudice potential jurors." The AP adds that the trial "was postponed for further hearings Tuesday on defense motions to dismiss the case or throw out newly revealed computer data. … Sonoma County Deputy County Counsel Anne Keck told the judge the FBI was comparing images of teenagers found on Karr's computer equipment with a national database of child porn victims," but "FBI spokesman Joe Schadler later said the bureau's role in the Karr investigation had ended, and was limited to providing expert testimony and forensic analysis of five pictures discovered on Karr's computer in 2001. 'We're not doing any further forensic work,' he said."

DOJ_NMG_0073276

Former Nevada Controller's First Husband To Be Exhumed In Murder Probe. The New York Times (10/3, Friess, 1.21M) reports that the investigation into the death of former Nevada Controller Kathy Augustine "has prompted the authorities to look into another death three years ago, that of her first husband, Charles Augustine, 63, who died in a Las Vegas hospital where he was being cared for by" Chaz Higgs – Kathy Augustine's second husband and the lead suspect in her murder. "David Roger, the district attorney for Clark County, announced Monday that investigators would exhume Mr. Augustine's body to check for traces of the same drug that officials say killed Ms. Augustine." The Times notes, "With no visible explanation for the death, Ms. Augustine's blood samples were sent to the F.B.I. laboratory in Quantico, Va. Last week, the lab reported the presence of succinylcholine, and Ms. Augustine's death was ruled a homicide."

Higgs Waives Extradition Hearing. The Washington Times (10/3, Seper, 88K) reports Higgs yesterday "waived extradition to face first-degree murder charges in Nevada. Arrested Friday by FBI agents in Hampton, where he had been staying with relatives, Mr. Higgs is suspected of killing Mrs. Augustine with an injection of a powerful muscle relaxant. Handcuffed and wearing an orange jail jumpsuit, Mr. Higgs said nothing during the brief hearing."

Baltimore Man Arrested For Shooting Neighbor. The Baltimore Sun (10/3, Linskey) reports, "A 40-year-old man was arrested by police Monday afternoon, ending a seven-hour standoff in a Northeast Baltimore neighborhood that police said began when he allegedly used a shotgun to kill a neighbor who was cleaning his truck. Police declined to speculate on a motive for the slaying that occurred about 6 a.m. in the Belair-Edison neighborhood, but they said the suspect spoke briefly with the victim before the shooting." A police spokesman "identified the suspect as Marvin Ferguson of the 3800 block of Lyndale Ave. Police said Monday night that he was being questioned by homicide detectives but had not yet been charged. Immediately after the shooting, Ferguson stood outside until he heard police sirens, and then retreated into his home and refused to speak with negotiators, said Agent Donny Moses, a police spokesman."

Child Molester's Manuscript Used To Convict Him. Dean Schwartzmiller of San Jose, California has been convicted of child molestation based on testimony from eight of his victims and a manuscript he was writing about his 35 years as a pedophile. The Washington Times (10/3, Wetzstein) reports that Schwartzmiller "faces up to 153 years in prison when he is sentenced Oct. 16 on 12 charges of child molestation, taking obscene pictures of a minor and possession of child pornography. Law-enforcement officials said the case is unique because of the memoir manuscript and seven spiral notebooks, written in code, that contained more than 36,000 entries about Schwartzmiller's sexual activities with children."

Critical Care Nurse Charged With Killing His Wife. The New York Times (10/3, Friess) reports, "One day before his apparently healthy wife stopped breathing and collapsed, Chaz Higgs, a critical care nurse, is said to have engaged in what seemed at the time to be idle chatter with a co-worker about the best way to kill a spouse, according to an indictment returned last week charging Mr. Higgs with his wife's murder. The way to do it and get away with it, Mr. Higgs is said to have told another nurse, is with an injection of the paralytic drug succinylcholine because it frequently goes undetected in autopsies." The Times adds, "Now, the investigation into the death of Ms. Augustine has prompted the authorities to look into another death three years ago, that of her first husband, Charles Augustine, 63, who died in a Las Vegas hospital where he was being cared for by Mr. Higgs. David Roger, the district attorney for Clark County, announced Monday that investigators would exhume Mr. Augustine's body to check for traces of the same drug that officials say killed Ms. Augustine."

The Washington Times (10/3, Seper) reports that Higgs "told authorities he found his wife unconscious in bed at their home in Reno and called police, saying she had suffered a heart attack. He told police she was suffering from extreme stress from an ongoing campaign for state treasurer, where she faced fundraising problems and opposition from her own party. But Reno Police Deputy Chief Jim Johns later confirmed that a preliminary autopsy found no evidence of heart disease that would trigger an attack and a complete autopsy was ordered. … According to a police report, medical examiners found a needle mark on Mrs. Augustine's buttocks that could not be explained."

CIVIL RIGHTS:

Kentucky Jail Officer Says He Is FBI Informant In Civil Rights Probe. The Lexington Herald-Leader (10/3, Musgrave, Ku, Blackford, 118K) reports, "An officer at the Fayette County jail who is running for jailer in Jessamine County says he alerted the FBI to allegations of excessive force at Lexington's jail. John Vest, a corporal who has worked at the Fayette jail since 2003, said at a press conference yesterday that he has been working with the FBI in its investigation of alleged unnecessary force and civil rights violations against prisoners for 'an undisclosed period of time.' … David Beyer, an FBI spokesman, said he could neither confirm or deny that Vest has been working with federal officials on the case." The Leader adds, "After Vest's announcement, jail officials questioned Vest's credibility, saying he has been involved in three use-of-force incidents during the three years he's been at the jail." Fayette County Detention Center director Ron Bishop said, "It makes a lot more sense now, when you look at the timing and his running for office."

DOJ_NMG_0073277

The AP (10/3) notes, "Vest declined to comment on the disciplinary actions against him, saying it was part of the FBI investigation. 'I really wish that I could, but it violates the integrity of the case,' Vest said. … Vest's spokesman, David Adams, said neither he nor Vest could comment on whether Vest's work with the FBI came before or after he decided to run for office." WTVQ-TV Lexington (10/2, Stotelmyer) reported, "Bishop says the FBI search bothers him. He claims the jail has handled the use of force and allegations of excessive force properly. He says Vest never approached him about problems," and he "questions Vest's motives because Vest is the Republican candidate for jailer in next month's election." However, "Vest says before the FBI used him they 'checked me out, my credibility, my integrity.' Vest says he's done a good job as an inside informant. 'I did a lot and what I did, I did good,' said Vest."

EEOC Rules For Dismissed Chesapeake, VA, Deputies. The Hampton Roads Virginian-Pilot (10/3, Clayton) reports, "The Equal Employment Opportunity Commission has ruled in favor of two sheriff's deputies who said they were fired in retaliation for a discrimination lawsuit that alleged a hostile, racist work environment." The V-P continues, "The agency sent a letter to Tony Ellis notifying him of the ruling and suggesting an agreement that would require Sheriff John R. Newhart's office to reinstate Ellis, who was fired Dec. 30. The suggested agreement also requires Newhart to give Ellis back pay and benefits, punitive and compensatory damages, and attorneys' fees and to conduct on-site EEOC training for all supervisors and expunge all references to Ellis' dismissal in his personnel file." The V-P adds, "David Cahoon, who was set to testify in Ellis' case last year, also was fired and received the same ruling last week from the EEOC. … Ellis said EEOC officials told him that if the Sheriff's Department doesn't respond within 10 days, the case will be sent to the U.S. Justice Department. … Ellis was demoted from the rank of lieutenant in May 2004 because he didn't file a report about the use of force on a jail inmate on time. He filed a discrimination complaint with the EEOC and was given a right-to-sue letter, he said. .. .Ellis filed suit in U.S. District Court against the sheriff and the department in November 2004 alleging he was demoted because he is black and that racial disparities in the department led to inmate mistreatment, violence among employees and other incidents. .. .A federal judge dismissed the suit in November 2005. A month later, on Dec. 30, Cahoon and Ellis were fired. Ellis had worked for the department for 20 years; Cahoon for 21 years."

Lawsuit Seeks Declaration That Student May Read Bible During Free Time At School. The Washington Post (10/3, B4, Rich) reports Maryann Mangum filed a lawsuit in U.S. District Court in Greenbelt alleging that Dwight D. Eisenhower Middle School Vice Principal Jeanetta Rainey "ordered" her daughter Amber, "then 12, to stop reading the Bible or face punishment." The girl was a "frequent reader during lunch breaks" and "in the spare minutes before afternoon classes. The habit was never viewed as a problem…until the book she was reading was the Bible." The lawsuit alleges that Rainey said "reading the Bible violated school policy and that she would face discipline if she continued to do so." Mangum is being advised by the Rutherford Institute. Institute President John W. Whitehead said that the suit "does not specifically seek monetary damages but rather that a judge declare that students cannot be barred from reading the Bible during free time at school."

Euclid, OH, Approves Remap Plan Aimed At Settling DOJ Suit. The Cleveland Plain Dealer (10/3, Atassi) reports that the Euclid, OH, City Council "unanimously approved a redistricting plan to help settle a federal lawsuit that contends the city's election system prevents black candidates from winning council seats." The Plain Dealer continues, "Under the new system, which will take effect in time for the 2007 election, Ward 4's black population would decrease from 54 percent to about 51 percent, and the percentage of black residents in Ward 3 would increase from about 39 percent to 45 percent. … About 13 percent of residents would be assigned a new ward, and the city's five at-large seats would remain." The Plain Dealer adds, "City officials hope the plan will satisfy the Justice Department, which filed suit in July after a three-year investigation concluded that broadly drawn districts and a system for electing at-large council members have diluted minority voting strength. … Leading into council's vote Monday night, city officials did their best to ease the worries of residents who stepped to the lectern and said that although they believe the Justice Department's accusations are out of line, adopting the proposal seems to be an admission of guilt. … In June, the Justice Department proposed that the city shore up minority voting power by breaking four wards into eight -- two of which would be predominantly black -- and eliminating all at-large seats but the council president's."

Workplace Discrimination Against Arabs, Muslims Said To Be Rising Again. The Los Angeles Times (10/3, Semuels, 918K) reports, "Reports of workplace discrimination against people perceived to be Muslim or Arab soared after the Sept. 11 attacks and then declined, government statistics indicate. But some advocates say they've seen a resurgence in the last year that corresponds to global political events. … 'We only see the tip of the iceberg,' said Joan Ehrlich, district director of the EEOC office in San Francisco. 'It's probably not even reflective of the amount of discrimination going on because people are afraid to come to the government for help.'" The Times notes, "In a case filed recently by EEOC attorney [Anna] Park, seven Yemeni sailors working for Norwegian Cruise Line were fired in rapid succession 'because they looked Muslim,' Park said. The firings occurred after the FBI began investigating a report that a crew member had asked about the location of a cruise ship's engine room, arousing suspicions. The men were fired before the investigation was completed, the suit alleged."

DOJ_NMG_0073278

ANTITRUST:

DOJ Settles Dairy Antitrust Dispute With Kentucky. The AP (10/3) reports, "A Kentucky dairy company will be sold to a competitor under a settlement between the U.S. Department of Justice, the state of Kentucky and the Dairy Farmers of America." The AP continues, "Prairie Farms Dairy Inc., of Carlinville, Ill., will buy Southern Belle Dairy Co., of Somerset, from the Dairy Farmers of America to settle an antitrust suit filed by the federal government." The AP adds, "The Allen Family Limited Partnership will also have to sell its interest in Southern Belle as part of the deal. The settlement was filed Monday in U.S. District Court in London. .. .Thomas O. Barnett, assistant U.S. Attorney General over the department's Antitrust Division, said the deal will mean better prices and quality of service in Kentucky and Tennessee. .. .The Justice Department and Kentucky filed suit in 2003 challenging the Dairy Farmers' Association's purchase of the Southern Belle dairy."

The Kansas City Star (10/3) reports, "The Department of Justice said Monday that its settlement with the Kansas City-based cooperative would restore competition in the bidding for school-milk contracts in eastern Kentucky and Tennessee." The Star adds, "The dispute began in 2003 when the federal government sued Dairy Farmers of America over its 2002 acquisition of a 50 percent interest in Southern Belle in Somerset, Ky. That purchase followed Dairy Farmers of America's earlier acquisition of a 50 percent interest in National Dairy Holdings, which owns Flav-O-Rich Dairy of London, Ky. … The government alleged that Dairy Farmers of America's acquisitions gave the cooperative ownership interest in the two dairies that competed against each other to supply milk to 45 school districts in eastern Kentucky. The purchases also reduced the number of bidders from three to two for 55 other school districts in eastern Kentucky and Tennessee, according to the federal government's suit."

FCC Approves Attlel's Purchase Of Midwest Wireless. The AP (10/3) reports, "The Federal Communications Commission on Monday approved Alltel Corp.'s $1.1 billion purchase of Midwest Wireless Holdings LLC on the condition that it sell some of its assets." The AP continues, "The companies must sell cell-phone businesses in Minnesota regions covering Chippewa, Lac qui Parle, Pipestone, and Le Sueur, the FCC said. The approval came more than three weeks after the Justice Department approved the transaction, with similar conditions. .. .The FCC voted 5-0 to approve the acquisition."

Microsoft's Vista Security Policies Under Attack. The San Jose Mercury News (10/3, Tribble) reports, "Computer security provider McAfee joined a chorus of complaints Monday and accused software programming giant Microsoft of abusing its monopoly by controlling what security products can run on its new operating system." The News continues, "The Santa Clara company ran a full-page advertisement in the Financial Times saying that Microsoft, which started selling its own security products this summer, was trying to 'hamstring' competitors. … 'Microsoft seems to envision a world in which one giant company not only controls the systems that drive most computers around the world but also the security that protects those computers from viruses and other online threats,' the advertisement states. '... when it fails, it fails for 97 percent of the world's desktops.'" The News adds, "Microsoft's Vista, which is expected to be released to business customers next month, was designed in cooperation with the security firms and with the goal of providing customers as many security options as possible, said Stephen Toulouse, senior product manager in the security technology unit of Microsoft. .. . In a joint phone interview Monday afternoon, McAfee chairman and chief executive George Samenuk along with the company's chief security architect John Viega said that if Microsoft's intention was truly to protect customers, than it 'would allow legitimate security.' … McAfee's sentiment echoes San Jose-based Symantec, which announced its opposition to Vista limitations two weeks ago."

High Court Denies Northwest Airlines' Antitrust Appeal. The AP (10/3) reports, "The Supreme Court Monday refused to consider a significant antitrust case involving Northwest Airlines and a low-cost competitor that could have set some rules for competition between large airlines and smaller, no-frills rivals." The AP continues, "The case, Northwest Airlines Corp. v. Spirit Airlines Inc., stems from a six-year-old Spirit Airlines suit in which Spirit charged that Northwest engaged in predatory pricing to force Spirit to drop two flights from Detroit, one to Boston, the other to Philadelphia. The case raises key antitrust issues, such as the type of evidence needed to prove that a company engaged in below-cost pricing to drive a competitor out of business." The AP adds, "A district court sided with Northwest, but the 6th U.S. Circuit Court of Appeals overturned the ruling and found for Spirit Airlines. But the Supreme Court Monday refused to hear the case due to procedural issues related to the timing of an appeal filed by Northwest. The airline filed a petition July 17 but the petition was removed from the court's docket because it was filed five days late. … Northwest asked the court to consider the case despite the late filing, but the court refused, issuing an order denying the 'out-of-time' petition."

DOJ_NMG_0073279

SCOTUS Rejects UnitedHealth Ohio Doctor Rate Appeal. Market Watch (10/3) reports, "The U.S. Supreme Court Monday rejected an appeal from UnitedHealth Group Inc.'s Ohio unit on whether doctors can go to court with antitrust challenges on reimbursement rates despite existing arbitration pacts." Market Watch continues, "UnitedHealth contends the Cincinnati area doctors are bound by arbitration clauses in the insurance agreements. Ohio state courts, however, have ruled the doctors can pursue their claims in court." Market Watch adds, "The doctors and two medical societies allege UnitedHealth and other insurance companies violated antitrust laws by conspiring to set unreasonably low insurance reimbursements to health-care providers. At issue in the case is whether the antitrust claims fall outside the contract requiring that disputes be handled through arbitration."

Supreme Court Will Not Hear California Competition Case Against AT&T. Market Watch (10/3, Anderson) reports, "The U.S. Supreme Court on Monday said it won't decide whether a California company can use state laws to sue AT&T Inc. for alleged anticompetitive conduct in other states." Market Watch continues, "RLH Industries Inc., a surge-protection technology company in Orange, Calif., sued the telecommunications giant in a California court over restrictions in several states that prevented it from selling high voltage protection equipment to local phone companies in markets served by subsidiaries of AT&T." Market Watch adds, "The lawsuit remains pending in a California state trial court after a state appeals court allowed the case to continue. AT&T has argued constitutional limits on state interference with interstate commerce bar the lawsuit from proceeding. … 'A state is and should be flatly forbidden from attempting to govern commerce occurring wholly outside that state,' AT&T said in a court petition. 'Under the decision below, California's antitrust and unfair competition laws would control markets throughout the country.' … RLH Industries maintains that California state courts have jurisdiction to review anticompetitive practices by companies that impact it, even if those practices are taking place in other states. According to the RLH brief, lower courts are still considering some of the issues raised in the AT&T petition to the Supreme Court, making high court review premature."

Broadcom-Qualcomm Global Patent Dispute Heads To ITC. Bloomberg (10/3, Brennan, Decker) reports, "The global patent battle between Qualcomm Inc. and Broadcom Corp. for supremacy in a fast-growing segment of the wireless-telephone industry may be decided in an obscure corner of the Washington bureaucracy." Bloomberg continues, "Broadcom, of Irvine, California, is asking an International Trade Commission official to decide next week to bar imports of handsets that use technology from San Diego-based Qualcomm. Broadcom says the Qualcomm technology, which provides high-speed Internet access and lets users view high-quality videos, violates patents on its chips." Bloomberg adds, "The outcome of the fight may determine control of the U.S. market for so-called 3G, or third-generation, wireless phones, a market that topped $1 billion last year. The stakes are so high for both companies that some experts say they would be foolish not to reach a settlement, rather than risk an adverse decision. … Charles Bullock, an administrative law judge at the commission, is due to decide on Oct. 10 whether the government should bar the Qualcomm-powered phones. Bullock's decision will be reviewed by the six-member commission, which is made up of three Republicans and three Democrats. After that, it may be challenged in a federal appeals court in Washington."

Harrah's Considering $15 Billion Takeover Bid. USA Today (10/3, Yu, Krantz) reports, "Harrah's Entertainment, the world's largest casino operator, was considering Monday an unsolicited $15 billion joint takeover bid from private equity firms Apollo Management and Texas Pacific Group. … If completed, it would be the third-largest private buyout this year of a U.S. company, says deal tracker Dealogic. … In a statement, Las Vegas-based Harrah's said it has formed a committee of board members to review the proposal to buy the company for $81 a share in cash, a 22% premium over Harrah's Friday close."

The Wall Street Journal (10/3, Sanders) reports, "While Harrah's Entertainment Inc. considers a roughly $15.1 billion offer from private-equity firms Apollo Management and Texas Pacific Group, the biggest hurdle to a deal may be the long and arduous process of obtaining casino licenses in the many jurisdictions where Harrah's operates." The "biggest wrinkle could involve licensing for any new owners and the time it could take. Neither Apollo nor Texas Pacific executives hold gambling licenses. Individual states issue licenses to casino owners and operators, subjecting applicants to detailed investigations. Officials from Nevada, New Jersey and Missouri -- all states where Harrah's operates casinos -- estimate the licensing process could take as long as two years. Such licensing investigations usually delve deeply into financial and criminal backgrounds of the applicants. But Apollo and Texas Pacific have already begun exploring the options with various state regulators."

DOJ_NMG_0073280

Coach Accuses Target Of Selling Fake Bag. The Wall Street Journal (10/3, O'Connell, Hudson) reports that handbag maker Coach Inc. is accusing Target Corp. of marketing a fake Coach bag. In a lawsuit filed in federal court in Manhattan Friday, "Coach alleged that Target was a counterfeiter by selling a Coach-style purse, complete with a hang tag that says 'Coach,' according to Coach Chief Financial Officer Mike Devine. The allegedly fake bag has Coach's signature C-pattern and a touch of snakeskin-like fabric in the center of the bag, according to a photo of it included in the lawsuit. The bag, purchased from a Target store in Largo, Fla., is an 'exact replica of a genuine Coach handbag' bearing at least one Coach trademark, the suit says. … Target, which isn't a licensed distributor of Coach products, said the bag in question is an authentic version and therefore the suit is without merit."

Gilead To Acquire Myogen For $2.5 Billion. The Wall Street Journal (10/3, Moore, Sechler) reports, "Biopharmaceuticals company Gilead Sciences Inc. agreed to acquire Myogen Inc. for about $2.5 billion, a move aimed at gaining ownership of the biotechnology company's lead product candidate, a potential treatment for pulmonary arterial hypertension. … With the transaction, the Foster City, Calif., company would acquire Myogen's main drug candidate, Ambrisentan, a treatment for pulmonary arterial hypertension that is in late-stage clinical trials."

USA Today/AP (10/3) reports, "Gilead agreed to pay Myogen shareholders $52.50 per share, a premium of 50% over the stock's closing price Friday of $35.08 a share. Myogen's stock hit a 52-week high, while Gilead's shares closed down 6.5% Monday." The AP adds, "The news caught many off guard, not only for the acquisition price but because it represented a shift for Gilead out of its area of expertise in infectious diseases."

Executive Says AMD Is Leading Consumer Choice And Value. Thomas M. McCoy, Executive Vice President, Legal Affairs, and Chief Administrative Officer for AMD, writes in a letter to the Wall Street Journal (10/3), "In his Sept. 23 Rule of Law column 'Tigers by the Tail,' Ron Cass asserts that Advanced Micro Devices is attempting to 'restrain a dominant competitor through the courts than beat it in the market.' This brief for Intel is wrong. AMD is an innovation leader working as hard as it can to win in the market; the only thing missing is a competitive market free from monopoly abuse. AMD is the company leading consumer choice and value, not vice versa." McCoy adds, "The Japan Fair Trade Commission has already found that Intel violated its antitrust laws by imposing illegal, exclusive contracts on computer manufacturers. … Despite its technology leadership, AMD has reached only 18% revenue share of the microprocessor market and, not surprisingly, most of its recent gain came after the ruling in Japan, AMD's lawsuit in the U.S. and the European Commission's dawn raids."

Competition, Antitrust Laws Seen As Best Way To Regulate Internet. Robert Hahn and Robert Litan, directors of the AEI-Brookings Joint Center for Regulatory Studies, write in The Hill (10/3), "If you doubt the effectiveness of simple slogans, the current debate over net neutrality should change your mind. As the heat of the rhetoric rises, the quality of the information has declined. … On examination…one truth is clear -- while both sides are prone to hyperbole and exaggeration, net neutrality enthusiasts are also just plain wrong. And the error is dangerous. If the net neutrality proponents prevail, it is less likely that phone and cable companies that operate most of the Internet pipes will have sufficient economic incentives to build needed new capacity." Hahn and Litan add, "Rather than heavy-handed government mandates that presume to know the best way for the Internet to evolve, we should continue to keep the 'hands-off' policy that has enabled the Internet to become the powerful engine of innovation we enjoy today. The genius of competition, backed by long-standing and proven laws that block the abuse of corporate power, has worked in the past. It should be allowed to work in the future."

ENVIRONMENT:

SCOTUS To Consider Con Edison Cleanup Case. The AP (10/3) reports, "The Supreme Court indicated Monday that it is likely to consider a case involving New York City-based utility Consolidated Edison Inc. and its efforts to require UGI Utilities, a subsidiary of UGI Corp., to help pay for the environmental cleanup of several gas power plants." The AP continues, "The court requested an opinion on the matter from the Justice Department's Solicitor General, which usually indicates that the court will consider the matter during its current term." The AP adds, "The case addresses the issue of whether Con Ed can sue UGI Utilities in order to recover a share of the cleanup costs related to several gas power plants currently owned by Con Ed. The company argued that UGI formerly owned and operated the plants. UGI has countered that under the federal 'Superfund' law, Con Ed cannot seek to recover costs from UGI, because Con Ed has not resolved its liability for the cleanup with the state."

DOJ_NMG_0073281

DOE To Delay Buying Oil To Fill Strategic Reserve. The Wall Street Journal (10/3, A5, 2.03M) reports, "The Department of Energy will delay purchasing oil to fill the nation's Strategic Petroleum Reserve until after the winter-heating season, a spokesman said yesterday. President Bush had ordered the department to halt filling the emergency crude stockpile ahead of the summer-driving season, when gasoline prices edged up to nominal highs." The Journal says, "Spokesman Craig Stevens said the department had agreed to hold off collecting 1.7 million barrels owed to it from oil companies until the second quarter of 2007. Given that the department is 'satisfied with the [reserve's] current level,' and that it was wary of affecting the market ahead of the high-demand winter-heating season, 'we have no plans currently to use the $600 million [from last year's oil sale] to fill the reserve.'" Stevens "said if the department decides to start buying crude, it would be done during a period of months to minimize the impact on the market."

FBI/DEA/ATF/USMS:

Judge Upholds FBI, Secret Service Applicant Polygraph Exams. In a widely-distributed story, the AP (10/3, Apuzzo) reports, "The FBI and Secret Service may keep using lie-detector tests to screen potential employees, a federal judge ruled Monday. U.S. District Judge Emmet G. Sullivan's ruling ends a six-year lawsuit brought by six applicants who failed polygraph tests and were denied jobs. They said the policy violated their rights to privacy and due process." Although the "questions are personal, Sullivan said, they're not an unconstitutional invasion of privacy. Because the applicants sought positions of public trust, the agencies have the right to inquire about the backgrounds of their agents, he said."

Former FBI Agent Sentenced To Six Years In Prison For Stock Scam. The Wall Street Journal (10/3, C3, 2.03M) reports, "Former Federal Bureau of Investigation special agent Jeffrey Royer was sentenced to a six-year imprisonment for his role in a stock-manipulation case involving a handful of penny-stock companies. Mr. Royer also was sentenced to three years of supervised release. He was found guilty of racketeering conspiracy and securities fraud in 2005 along with short-seller Anthony Elgindy. The government accused the two men of using confidential FBI information to depress the shares of companies that Mr. Elgindy and members of his online investment group sold short -- or bet against using borrowed shares." The New York Times/Bloomberg (10/3) adds, "In June, Mr. Elgindy was sentenced to 11 years and 3 months in prison and ordered to forfeit $1.5 million for using inside information to make short sales and extort money from companies he criticized in an online newsletter. … Prosecutors say Mr. Royer also supplied Mr. Elgindy with information about investigations of companies by the F.B.I. and the Securities and Exchange Commission."

Newsday (10/3, DeStefano) reports Judge Raymond Dearie called "it a tragic case of a public official gone wrong." The judge "noted that, without Royer's involvement, the stock schemes and extortion wouldn't have happened, although he said Royer shouldn't be held responsible for Elgindy's shakedown attempts." The New York Daily News (10/3, Marzulli, 729K) reports the sentencing in "City briefs," under the headline "G-Man Gets 6 For Scam."

US Attorney Says Steroid Story Contained Inaccuracies. ESPN.com (10/3) reports, "The federal prosecutor overseeing an investigation of steroids in baseball said Monday that a newspaper report indicating that five players, including Roger Clemens, had used illegal performance-enhancing drugs contained 'significant inaccuracies.'" ESPN continues, "The inaccuracies have to do with the names as they appear in the report, a spokesman for San Francisco U.S. Attorney Kevin Ryan said. The spokesman did not elaborate. … Citing sealed court filings, the Los Angeles Times reported that former pitcher Jason Grimsley had named Clemens, his Houston Astros teammate Andy Pettitte, and Baltimore Orioles Miguel Tejada, Brian Roberts and Jay Gibbons. The story first appeared on the Times' Web site on Saturday and was quickly seized on by print and broadcast media outlets. … Ryan issued a statement Monday, saying: 'In view of the recent news reports purporting to identify certain athletes whose names had been redacted from the government's search warrant filings in the Grimsley matter, and in the interests of justice, please be advised that these reports contain significant inaccuracies.'"

The New York Times (10/3, Curry) reports, "Grimsley's agent, Joe Bick, said Grimsley, who was released by the Arizona Diamondbacks after he acknowledged using steroids and other drugs and who subsequently retired, is not responsible for the naming of any players in the affidavit. … 'In terms of how those names got in the document, Jason disputes the fact that he put them there,' Bick said. 'Jason's attorney made that statement a while ago, and he still feels that way.'" The Times notes, "Edward F. Novak, Grimsley's lawyer, did not return a telephone message yesterday. But Novak told The Arizona Republic in June that Grimsley did not volunteer any names of current or former players and merely answered questions when the investigators quizzed him about specific players."

DOJ_NMG_0073282

The AP (10/3, Kravets) reports a spokesman for the Los Angeles Times "had no immediate comment. The newspaper reported that an unidentified source with access to the document allowed the newspaper to view it, and a second source provided additional details about the document"

Report: Baseball's Pete Rose Used "Greenies." The AP (10/3) reports Pete Rose "says he took 'greenies' in his playing days, if only to lose a few pounds. … In an appearance on the 'Late Show' taped Monday, Rose was asked by host David Letterman whether he ever used any performance-enhancing drugs as a player. Rose said he never did, but when prodded about 'greenies,' explained that he used them -- though they were nothing more than 'diet pills.'" According to the AP, neither Letterman nor Rose "used the word 'amphetamines,' which were commonly nicknamed 'greenies' at the height of their supposed popularity in baseball. The sport added amphetamines to its list of banned substances last year."

Drug Ring Investigation Leads To New Jersey Man's Guilty Plea. The Easton (PA) Express-Times (10/3, Quigley) reports a Phillipsburg man "has pleaded guilty in connection with Operation Stateline, a sweeping undercover drug sting that shut down a network operating in the Phillipsburg-Easton area. Ray Edward Carter…faces a federal prison sentence of between 10 years to life under the terms of the agreement reached Thursday with the U.S. Attorney Christopher Christie's office. … The six-month investigation conducted by the federal Drug Enforcement Agency and local authorities ended last month. The sting resulted in state narcotics charges against 23 area residents."

Supreme Court Declines To Hear Pennsylvania Doctor's Appeal In Painkiller Case. The Pittsburgh Tribune-Review (10/2) reports the U.S. Supreme Court yesterday "declined to hear an appeal filed by a doctor convicted of trading prescription painkillers for sex at his Oakmont office. Dr. Bernard Rottschaefer, 63, of Plum, was convicted in 2003 of 153 counts of illegally prescribing powerful painkillers, such as OxyContin, to drug-addicted female patients. He denies trading drugs for sex and has remained out of prison pending the outcome of his appeal." U.S. District Judge Gary Lancaster "dismissed the second appeal, because the first was still pending."

The Pittsburgh Post-Gazette (10/3, Ward) reports Rottschaefer's lawyers "have filed a third motion for a new trial in U.S. District Court -- the last was rejected back in January 2005 -- claiming that they again have newly discovered evidence that could have changed the outcome of his trial. This time, the evidence is testimony in a civil malpractice case against Dr. Rottschaefer in which the women he allegedly victimized all said they had various ailments that the OxyContin helped to treat. That contradicts the prosecution's theory in the criminal case, in which it claimed that Dr. Rottschaefer prescribed the powerful pain medication to those women with 'no legitimate medical purpose,' said defense attorney Eli Stutsman."

Survey Indicates Parents Underestimate Children's Drug Use. In its Health section, The New York Times (10/3, Bakalar) reports a new study has found parents "consistently and substantially underestimate their children's use of alcohol and other drugs. Researchers interviewed 591 adolescents ages 12 to 17 about their drug and alcohol use and then questioned at least one parent of each about what he or she thought the children were using. The analysis appears in the October issue of Alcoholism: Clinical and Experimental Research." Parents "consistently said they believed that their children were using substances less frequently than the children reported." For example, the Times reports that almost 23 percent of the adolescents admitted using marijuana, but only 13.2 percent of their parents knew it.

New Evidence Surfaces In Texas Bombing Case. The Fort Worth Star-Telegram (10/3, Baker) reports, "Six years ago, Texas Death Row inmate Michael Toney made headlines when he tried to sell seats to his execution over the Internet. … But now Toney, convicted of blowing up three people in Lake Worth on Thanksgiving Day in 1985, may create another stir as he tries to avoid the death chamber for one of North Texas' most notorious crimes." The Star-Telegram continues, "The Texas Court of Criminal Appeals recently ruled that new evidence — including reports from the federal bureau of Alcohol, Tobacco, Firearms and Explosives discrediting the prosecution's key witnesses — is sufficient to support Toney's innocence claim and warrants another review by state District Judge Everett Young. .. .The Tarrant County district attorney's office says that some of the claims have been made in previous appeals. But a defense attorney representing Toney says he is convinced that Toney is innocent. … 'It's one of the most egregious cases I've seen,' said Jared Tyler, an attorney with the Texas Innocence Network. 'For me, there is not a shred of evidence that he did it.'" The Star-Telegram adds, "Toney, 40, was sentenced to death in 1999 for the briefcase bombing that killed Angela Blount, 15; her father, Joe Blount, 44; and her cousin Michael Columbus, 18. … The case had gone unsolved for a decade until Toney, who was in jail for another offense, told another inmate that he was hired to put the briefcase bomb at the mobile home. Investigators later presented evidence showing that Toney — who they said was to be paid $5,000 for the bombing — put it at the wrong trailer. … Toney always proclaimed his innocence and his efforts in 2000 to sell seats to his future execution to the highest bidder was part of a publicity stunt to attract attention to his case. The state forbade him to sell the seats."

DOJ_NMG_0073283

Man Wanted For Ohio Shooting Arrested In Washington. The AP (10/3) reports, "Authorities on Monday arrested a man accused of killing a man during a youth football game in Youngstown, Ohio, standing over the wounded victim on the field and shooting him several more times." The AP continues, "Anthony M. Caulton, 25, also known as Anthony Pfeifer, was arrested at a home in Bremerton, across Puget Sound from Seattle, after investigators developed leads that he might be hiding in Washington state, the U.S. Marshals Service said." The AP adds, "Caulton was wanted for investigation of a shooting at a Volney Rogers Youth Football League game on Aug. 19 at the former South High School stadium. … As many as 800 people were at the game when Caulton shot Larry D. Jones, 31, in the grandstand, police said. Jones then fled onto the field, and when he collapsed the shooter shot him several more times."

IMMIGRATION:

SCOTUS Rejects Appeal By Nazi Concentration Camp Guard. The AP (10/3, Yost) reports, "A former Nazi concentration camp guard lost a Supreme Court appeal on Monday over the government's decision to revoke his U.S. citizenship." The AP continues, "Justices declined to review the case of John Hansl, a member of the SS Death's Head battalion that guarded concentration camps at Sachsenhausen near Berlin in 1943 and Natzweiler in France in 1944." The AP adds, "Hansl, who lives in Des Moines, Iowa, sought to distinguish his case from other former Nazi camp guards by arguing he did not hide his wartime past when he asked for a visa to enter the United States in the mid-1950s or personally assist in persecution. … An appeals court, however, agreed with a lower court ruling that Hansl's work as an armed guard with orders to shoot escaping prisoners was sufficient evidence that he 'personally assisted in persecution.' … In one instance, Hansl helped search for an escaped prisoner who was later shot to death, although Hansl did not pull the trigger, court records show." The AP notes, "The Justice Department has said that more than 70 people who assisted in Nazi persecution have been stripped of U.S. citizenship since the Office of Special Investigations began operations in 1979. The office pursues war criminals."

Border Fence Seen As Ineffective Strategy. The Washington Post (10/3, A3, 748K) reports, "Building a fence in an attempt to secure the US border with Mexico is impractical and would simply lead illegal immigrants to cross elsewhere, according to former US Customs and Border Protection agents and other experts." Also, "the Mexican government agreed in a diplomatic note sent yesterday to the US government, warning that the fence would damage relations between the two countries." The Post adds, "Former US customs agents who have hunted drug traffickers in the mountains and deserts near the Arizona border said the new barrier would be defeated by the rugged terrain. 'You can't build a wall across the mountains of southern Arizona, as much of the terrain is inaccessible even on foot,' veteran agent Lee Morgan said as he stood along the proposed route of the fence, east of Douglas."

Crackdown On Illegal Immigrants Creates Mixed Reaction. The Christian Science Monitor (10/3, Jonsson, 58K) reports that as "federal, state, and local officials crack down on illegal immigrants across the country, attitudes continue to harden among those who want them to stay and those who want them to go. In places like Stillmore, Ga., Arkadelphia, Ark., and Charlotte, N.C., raids and crackdowns have uncorked a phenomenon for those left behind: a sense of moral confusion about mass roundups and midnight raids." Allan Burns, an anthropologist at the University of Florida in Gainesville, said, "There's a tension between working alongside these people, understanding their impact on the economy, and then some of the issues of a community being able or not able to sustain this kind of immigration." Proponents "of immigration law enforcement say the government has a right to get tough on illegal immigrants and those who employ them. Led by Gov. Sonny Perdue, Georgia lawmakers say they will go after people who have broken immigration laws. Georgia has the fastest growing population of illegal immigrants, estimated at 470,000."

County Ordinance Would Bar Agencies From Denying Services To Illegals. The Chicago Tribune (10/3, Noel, 623K) reports, "Despite a dissenting vote from Tony Peraica, the Republican candidate for Cook County Board president, a resolution passed a subcommittee Monday that could make the county a sanctuary for undocumented immigrants." Modeled on legislation "adopted by several large cities, including Chicago, the resolution will go before the full board after passing 3-2. It would forbid county agencies from asking about immigration status when providing services." The "co-sponsor of the resolution, Commissioner Roberto Maldonado (D-Chicago), said the measure offers symbolic support for undocumented immigrants as well as protection from real abuses."

DOJ_NMG_0073284

Southern Pastors Try To Overcome Division Between Blacks, Hispanics. The New York Times (10/3, Swarns, 1.21M) reports that in Willacoochee, Georgia, an "immigrant boomtown in Atkinson County, about 45 miles north of the Florida border," the Rev. Harvey Williams, who is black, and the Rev. Atanacio Gaona, a Mexican immigrant, "have forged a rare friendship that transcends the deep divide between blacks and Hispanics here." For centuries, "the South has been defined by the color line and the struggle for accommodation between blacks and whites. But the arrival of hundreds of thousands of Hispanic immigrants over the past decade is quietly changing the dynamics of race relations in many Southern towns." The two pastors "find that the fault lines that separate their communities sometimes test their friendship and challenge their efforts to bring blacks and Hispanics closer together." Blacks "here, who had settled into a familiar, if sometimes uneasy, relationship with whites, are now outnumbered by Hispanics. The two groups, who often live and work side by side, compete fiercely for working-class jobs and government resources. By several measures, blacks are already losing ground." The "two Pentecostal ministers who pray together are men of faith who say they believe that blacks and Hispanics should be allies in the struggle to overcome discrimination and economic adversity, even though they acknowledge that interethnic unity is often hard to come by."

TAX:

New York Man Sentenced To 27 Months In Prison For Tax Evasion. Business First of Buffalo (10/2) reported, "Amherst resident John Fortune has been sentenced to 27 months incarceration, following a guilty plea for structuring financial transactions to avoid IRS reporting requirements, according to the U.S. Attorney's office." Assistant U.S. Attorney Gretchen Wylegala said on Monday that over a "6 month period, Fortune took nearly $150,000 in cash in 40 separate transactions." Business First noted, "The conviction in June was the culmination of an investigation on the part of the FBI."

WSJournal Praises Rangel For Honesty On Plans To Raise Taxes. The Wall Street Journal (10/3, 2.03M) says in an editorial that Rep. Charlie Rangel, "the 36-year House veteran from New York City who will chair the Ways and Means Committee if Democrats win a majority" has been "happy to explain his own agenda on taxes and the war in Iraq." Rangel "was asked by Congress Daily whether he'd consider tax increases across the income spectrum. 'No question about it,' he said. 'Everything has to be on the table.'" Republicans have "jumped all over Mr. Rangel's tax comments in particular, but at least in one sense the New Yorker should be congratulated: Unlike his fellow Democrats, he isn't hiding what he believes. He's merely being candid about what he'd like to do at Ways and Means, and as a long-time Member he may feel he'll have a better chance of achieving his tax-hike goals if he talks about them more openly during the campaign. Voters won't be able to say they weren't warned."

WSJournal Touts Indexing Capital Gains For Inflation. The Wall Street Journal (10/3, 2.03M) says in an editorial, "Republicans haven't had any luck making the Bush tax cuts of 2003 permanent, and next year's prospects don't look promising. So now is a good time to consider some alternative tax-cutting strategies that might be more achievable." One "useful idea comes courtesy of House Republicans Mike Pence and Eric Cantor, who recently introduced a bill to index capital gains for inflation. Income tax brackets have been adjusted for the cost of living ever since the Reagan tax cuts of 1981 -- a historic pro-growth victory. But capital gains continue to suffer from an inflation tax, which yields a windfall profit for the government but reduces the value of holding long-term capital assets."

CONGRESS-ADMINISTRATION:

GOP Leaders Allegedly Ignored Repeated Warnings Concerning Foley. Media reports last night and this morning indicate House Speaker Dennis Hastert, and the GOP in general, are under intense political pressure over the scandal surrounding former Rep. Mark Foley. NBC Nightly News (10/2, story 5, 1:10, Russert, 9.87M) summed up the tenor of the coverage, saying, "Republicans are panicked, in a simple word. … They are afraid of the consequences. And they are afraid conservative Christians will stay home at the elections and not support Republican candidates."

The Financial Times (10/3, Daniel, Dinmore) quotes Charlie Cook, publisher of the Cook Political Report, as saying, "Initially I just thought that this would cost them a seat and the public would just chalk it up to yet another sleazebag politician," but "as articles turned toward cover-up/inaction, it's just one more nail in the coffin for this majority." The Wall Street Journal (10/3, A4, Calmes, 2.03M) reports the GOP "has new reason to worry about two key constituencies: Christian conservatives and suburban soccer moms. … The Foley fallout has united both Republican voter groups in anger." Newsweek's Howard Fineman, on MSNBC's Hardball (10/2), said, "I think this is a missile aimed straight at the heart of the Republican base, which is why Republicans in the White House and on the Hill are scrambling so quickly to try to get ahead of this fast moving story. The Republican party has been built in the last 15 or 20 years on the notion that they are the party of family values."

DOJ_NMG_0073285

Roll Call (10/3, Davis) says House Republican leaders "held a tense Members-only conference call Monday evening to attempt to assuage lawmakers' anger about a controversy that some Republicans fear has put the majority increasingly in peril. Sources familiar with the call described Members as 'angry' and 'furious,' and said many lawmakers raised safety concerns about the teenagers currently enrolled in the page program." The Washington Post (10/3, A11, Sheridan, 748K) reports Hastert "has asked the Justice Department to cast a wide net in its investigation of lewd e-mails sent by a Republican legislator to young pages, even looking into whether other lawmakers learned of them and failed to notify authorities. But legal experts said yesterday that it was unlikely any such third parties would face prosecution."

All three networks aired extensive reports on the scandal. The report on ABC World News (10/2, story 3, 2:55, Ross, 8.78M) was particularly negative toward the GOP. ABC said, "Despite repeat warning signs going back at least five years, almost nothing was done in Congress to stop Foley's suspect behavior with pages. Today, the Republican leaders said they had no idea how bad it was until ABC News revealed some of Foley's X-rated messages to the underage boys. … But there were lots of warning signs. In 2001, pages were warned to be careful with Foley. In 2005, one page complained to his Congressman about' 'sick' e- mails from Foley -- a complaint passed to the Speaker's staff. Then, this past spring, the complaint was again raised with three Republican leaders, including Hastert himself." ABC added, "A former senior Republican official in Congress says Foley was one of a handful of members and staff whose behavior with pages was being closely watched but so far, Foley is the only member whose overt sexual approaches have been documented."

CBS Evening News (10/2, story 4, 2:55, Couric, 7.66M) reported, "Hastert is feeling the heat from the scandal involving" Foley. Hastert "and other top Republicans knew for a year that Foley had sent questionable e-mails to a former Congressional page. The Speaker says he only found out last Friday, though, about other sexually explicit messages sent by Foley. But…it could be too late for damage control." CBS added, "There is no getting around it, the unraveling of the page scandal could be the undoing of some house Republican leaders, if not their hold on Congress. … Some religious conservatives may not want to wait for the FBI's report and they have House Speaker Dennis Hastert in their sights."

NBC Nightly News (10/2, story 3, 2:45 , Williams, 9.87M) reported Hastert "was front and center but a lot of critics on both sides of the political aisle said they were not satisfied. … Democrats [are] accusing Republicans of a cover up." NBC noted that at a news conference, "Hastert refused to take questions." The Hill (10/3, O'Connor) reports Hastert, "who seldom grants interviews to news outlets, held several yesterday with print and television reporters to answer questions about why Republican leaders failed to fully investigate improper e-mail sent by Foley. … Hastert publicly maintained yesterday that his staff did everything it could have." USA Today (10/3, Kiely, 2.27M), meanwhile, says, "Speaking to reporters for the first time since the scandal broke, Hastert said House officials had no reason to press further when Foley explained a chatty e-mail to a 16-year-old boy in which the representative requested the former House page's photograph. That e-mail caused the boy's parents to complain, but it contained nothing sexually explicit. 'Would have, could have, should have,' Hastert said. 'We did what we thought … was prudent at the time.'"

Most media analysis portray the scandal as having a detrimental effect on GOP chances this November. The New York Times (10/32, Hulse, Zeleny, 1.21M), in an article titled, "Pressure Grows for GOP Over Foley Scandal," reports Hastert "faced intensifying questions on Monday about why Republicans had not reacted more assertively…as members of his party, fearing a political debacle, demanded a strong response. Straining to hold the party together five weeks from Election Day…Hastert and his leadership team held a conference call with House Republicans on Monday night and heard blunt advice and criticism from participants who pressed for further action to reassure voters." The AP (10/3, Taylor) says Hastert's "media offensive came as the burgeoning scandal entered its fourth day, souring the outlook for Republicans in the November elections and raising questions about the judgment of senior House officials who handled the controversy."

WTimes, Some Social Conservatives Want Hastert To Resign As Speaker. The Washington Times (10/3, 88K), in an editorial titled "Resign, Mr. Speaker" that is currently featured atop the Drudge Report, alleges that Hastert "dissembled, to put it charitably, before conceding that he, too, learned about the e-mail messages sometime earlier this year. Late yesterday afternoon, Mr. Hastert insisted that he learned of the most flagrant instant-message exchange from 2003 only last Friday, when it was reported by ABC News. This is irrelevant. The original e-mail messages were warning enough that a predator -- and, incredibly, the co-chairman of the House Caucus on Missing and Exploited Children -- could be prowling the halls of Congress. The matter wasn't pursued aggressively. It was barely pursued at all. Moreover, all available evidence suggests that the Republican leadership did not share anything related to this matter with any Democrat." The Times adds, "Hastert must do the only right thing, and resign his speakership at once."

The Washington Post (10/3, Balz, VandeHei, 748K), in a front-page story titled, "After Foley, New Fears For The GOP: Some Say Party Could Lose House and Senate,"

DOJ_NMG_0073286

reports, "There was intense anger among social conservative activists in Washington yesterday, and some called for…Hastert to resign. … Leaders from about six dozen socially conservative groups held a conference call late yesterday afternoon, and participants were described as livid with House GOP leaders. 'They are outraged by how Hastert handled this,' said Paul M. Weyrich, a conservative activist who participated in the call."

The Washington Times (10/3, Hurt, 88K) reports, "several well-known conservatives called for Republican resignations because, they said, Mr. Hastert and other leaders did not act aggressively enough when they first learned last year of a separate set of 'overly friendly' e-mails that Mr. Foley had sent to another teenage former page. 'Speaker Hastert had knowledge of Congressman Foley's inappropriate behavior and chose to protect a potential pedophile and powerful colleague over a congressional page,' David Bossie, president of the conservative group Citizens United, said yesterday." The Times adds, "Such rebukes by conservative supporters yesterday erased any hopes by Republican leaders that they might curtail the political fallout from the scandal."

Jones "Disgusted" With Leaders' Response. The Washington Post (10/3, A11, Babington, Weisman, 748K) reports, "Some House Republicans said yesterday that the FBI and House leaders erred in not considering the e-mails -- and the concern they raised among the recipient's parents -- as justification for an inquiry. 'This thing should have been looked into months ago,' said Rep. Walter B. Jones Jr. (R-N.C.), who said he is 'disgusted' by his leaders' response."

Pelosi Wants Hastert, GOP Leaders Questioned Under Oath. CNN's The Situation Room (10/2, King) reported that House Minority Leader Nancy Pelosi "issued this response: 'Speaker Hastert again failed to answer the question that every mother and father in America is asking: how could Republican leaders choose partisan politics over protecting children? Republican leaders admitted to knowing about Mr. Foley's abhorrent behavior for six months to a year and failed to protect the children in their trust. Republican leaders must be investigated by the ethics committee and immediately questioned under oath.'"

Roll Call (10/3, Bresnahan) reports Pelosi "has asked for…Hastert and other top Republicans to be questioned under oath by the ethics committee regarding their handling of the Foley scandal, including what they knew, and when…and how they responded to the incident." Roll Call notes Pelosi "has not called for a special or independent counsel to oversee the investigation, although some Democrats privately are suggesting their leadership should back that proposal."

DNC Calling Attention To Foley's Ties To Reynolds, NRCC. The Los Angeles Times (10/3, Levey, Neubauer, 918K) reports Republicans' efforts "to distance the party from Foley may be complicated by his close ties with the party's campaign operation." Kirk Fordham, Foley's chief of staff from 1995 to 2004 is now chief of staff for NRCC Chairman Rep. Tom Reynolds and Foley's PAC donated $100,000 to the NRCC this summer. The Times notes the DNC is "seizing on the campaign donation, which put Foley among the GOP committee's bigger donors" and "stepped up its accusations that Reynolds and other Republican leaders were more interested in protecting Foley than investigating potential misconduct." The AP (10/3, Sidoti) reports Reynolds' "race against Jack Davis, a millionaire maverick Democrat, has been close for months, and Reynolds' disclosure that he had been told months ago of Foley's inappropriate e-mails plays into one of Davis' central arguments — that Reynolds, as a GOP leadership member, cares more about political dealmaking than his district." The Hill (10/3, Allen, Blake) reports Democrats "are drawing a bead on" Reynolds. A Survey USA poll from last week "found that Reynolds is only leading his opponent by two points."

Democrats Blast Snow Over "Naughty E-Mails" Comment. The New York Times (10/3, Hulse, Zeleny, 1.21M) reports White House Press Secretary Tony Snow "initially characterized the scandal as 'naughty e-mails,' drawing a blistering response from Democrats who said his words suggested that Republicans did not understand the gravity of the situation."

CNN's The Situation Room (10/2, King) reported, "House leaders aren't the only senior Republicans whose statements on the Foley matter are raising eyebrows." Snow "now says the Administration is horrified by the allegations against Foley, but he says it's up to the House and criminal investigators to decide just how to respond. In his afternoon White House briefing, Snow took a much tougher line than he did in an interview this morning with CNN." Snow: "It's not always pretty up there on Capitol Hill and there have been other scandals, as you know, that have been more than simply naughty e-mails. … I want to find out what happened, but before we prosecute, let's figure out what all the facts are. That's probably the most important thing to do, is to be fair to all parties."

The Des Moines Register (10/3, 163K) reports Sen. John Kerry "denounced" Foley, saying, "I'm really angry those in a position of responsibility care more about power and politics than protection of children." Kerry said the scandal "adds to the 'Republican culture of corruption.'"

The Washington Post (10/3, C1, Farhi, 748K) reports, "In recent years, for the most part, Democrats have been able to survive their sordid escapades while Republicans have paid with their political lives."

More Commentary. The Wall Street Journal (10/3, 2.03M), in an editorial, contends that "in today's politically correct culture, it's easy to understand how senior Republicans might well have decided they had no grounds to doubt Mr. Foley merely because he was gay and a little too friendly in emails. Some of those liberals now shouting the loudest for Mr. Hastert's head are the same voices who tell us that the larger society must be tolerant of private lifestyle choices, and certainly must never leap to conclusions about gay men and young boys. Are these Democratic critics of Mr. Hastert saying that they now have more sympathy for the Boy Scouts' decision to ban gay scoutmasters?"

DOJ_NMG_0073287

The New York Times (10/3, 1.21M) editorializes, "That House leaders knew Representative Mark Foley had been sending inappropriate e-mail to Capitol pages and did little about it is terrible. It is also the latest in a long, depressing pattern: When there is a choice between the right thing to do and the easiest route to perpetuation of power, top Republicans always pick wrong."

Roll Call (10/3), in an editorial, writes, "The last time a Speaker of the House was under investigation, a deadlocked ethics panel named an outside counsel in 1995 to probe the use of charities and fundraising groups by then-Speaker Newt Gingrich (R-Ga.). That is the controlling precedent as the ethics panel tries to move forward on the Foley case, and we encourage the committee to name an outside investigator as soon as possible."

The Los Angeles Times (10/3, 918K) editorializes, "What should not be missed amid the partisan sniping is the failure of those involved to see the red flags. The episode should serve as a cautionary tale for all employers, particularly ones who bring youths into the workplace."

In her column for Roll Call (10/3) Democratic strategist Donna Brazile writes, "I don't know about the rest of America, but I have had enough of lies, deceit and distortions of the truth by a majority party seeking to retain political advantage and hold on to power."

The Washington Post's Eugene Robinson (10/3, A17) writes, "About all the party leadership can do is hope the whole affair is so unsavory that some voters will be too grossed out to pay much attention."

Card Confirms He Proposed Rumsfeld Replacement. NBC Nightly News (10/2, story 4, 2:35, Williams, 9.87M) reported, "The White House is…denying former Chief of Staff Andrew Card tried to get the President to replace Defense Secretary Rumsfeld. But today, Card confirmed he proposed replacing Rumsfeld with former Secretary of State James Baker. And you hearing that Republican on the Hill had concerns about Don Rumsfeld?" Andrew Card: "I would not be bashful about repeating that." Mitchell: "And Card didn't deny he talked to Laura Bush about firing Rumsfeld." Andrew Card: "I would always solicit her council and would ask her to be candid, and she would frequently repeat to me some of the concerns she heard from other people."

MSNBC's Hardball (10/2, Mitchell) reported, "Andy Card sat down with me today and confirmed what he did and didn't do. He said it wasn't a conspiracy so get rid of Rumsfeld, but he certainly did recommended the President that Republicans on the Hill were calling for it." Card: "I did speak to him frequently about Defense, as these opportunities for change were presented. I also reflected to the President what I had heard when I would go meet with members of Congress, Democrats, Republicans, and Senators, the House members. And it was always a candid conversation." MSNBC: "And you were hearing that Republicans on the Hill had concerns about Don Rumsfeld?" Card: "I was. I was. And I would not be bashful about repeating that. And I would counsel the President appropriately as the chief of staff. But I would never lobby the President, and I would never go out and solicit others to lobby the President. So to claim there's a campaign that I orchestrated or was trying to mount would be inaccurate."

Fox News' Special Report (10/2, Angle) reported, "Card and others don't deny there was some discussion of replacing Rumsfeld but insist it was in the context of getting fresh blood in several key posts. … Card even recommended the President replace him as chief of staff which he did. In fact, several officials talked with the President about bringing in a whole new team but Mr. President Bush wanted some continuity in the middle of a difficult war."

Non-Appeal Of DHS Ruling Said To Give Unions Negotiating Advantage. The Federal Times (10/3, Kauffman) reports, "The Bush administration's decision not to appeal a June court decision striking down key parts of the Homeland Security Department's new personnel system gives unions a clear advantage in negotiating new changes, observers say." The Times continues, "Collective bargaining had been severely curtailed under proposed reforms, which were struck down by federal judges. Managers, for instance, no longer would need to bargain with unions before changing an employee's work assignment, detailing an employee to another location or introducing new technologies." The Times adds, "Now those matters are back on the table, along with changes to the pay and performance appraisal system for union employees that have been on hold pending the court case. Unions now appear likely to have significant say in what reforms are made and how they're carried out. … 'It certainly appears that the unions have a whole lot more leverage in the final outcome of this than you would have thought three years ago,' said Washington attorney William Bransford, who represents senior executives and other employees and previously handled labor disputes for the IRS. … Meanwhile, the department has proceeded with changes to the pay and performance management systems for nonbargaining unit employees. About 4,000 supervisors and nonbargaining unit employees currently are covered under the new personnel system, and another 6,700 managers and supervisors were scheduled to convert on Oct. 1, department spokesman Larry Orluskie said."

DOJ_NMG_0073288

Supreme Court Opens New Term By Rejecting 1900 Appeals. ABC World News (10/2, story 7, 0:25, Gibson, 8.78M) reported, "The Supreme Court's new term opened today. The justices right away refused an appeal by Northwest Airlines in an antitrust case brought by low cost competitor Spirit Airlines. And they rejected an appeal by newspaper companies. They sided with Detroit union workers who won reinstatement after an 18-month strike. During the year ahead the court will take up issues including global warning, racial diversity and late term abortion."

The Washington Post (10/3, A2, 748K) reports the court "rejected about 1,900 appeals that piled up during the summer recess. Among the cases the justices declined to hear were a challenge to a Texas law that bans the sale of sex toys, objections by parents in California to a mandatory class on Islam, and an appeal of lower-court rulings that the managers of Detroit newspapers acted improperly when they fired striking workers." During its new term, the Supreme Court "has agreed to rule on potential landmark cases on abortion rights, the environment and racial diversity in schools -- some of the country's most contentious social issues."

The Wall Street Journal (10/3, A2, Anderson, 2.03M) reports the Supreme Court "declined to take up a U.S.-China trade issue, rejecting an appeal on whether courts can review presidential decisions on import-restriction recommendations by the U.S. International Trade Commission." The "legal challenge to President Bush was brought by Motion Systems Corp., an Eatontown, N.J., maker of pedestal parts for motorized wheelchairs. The company filed a complaint with the ITC in 2002 arguing Chinese imports of similar products threatened its business."

Kennedy Emerges As Key Swing Vote. The Wall Street Journal (10/3, Bravin, 2.03M) reports that since Justice Sandra Day O'Connor "retired in January, the High Court has been dubbed the Kennedy Court. Between a bloc of four conservatives facing off against four liberal-leaning members, Justice Anthony Kennedy, with his own occasionally idiosyncratic jurisprudence, may tip the balance on hot-button cases." Seeing Justice Kennedy 'as the new swing vote, attorneys readying for the Supreme Court's annual term that begins this week have been plumbing nearly two decades of Kennedy opinions, searching for arguments that could persuade the justice that they have the law right. The trick for advocates is finding how to do that."

High Court Urged To Take Narrow View Of "Illicit Trafficking." The New York Times (10/3, 1.21M) says in an editorial, "The Supreme Court starts off its term today with arguments in a pair of immigration cases that turn on a technical issue but could have a considerable impact on the real world. If the court gives the words 'illicit trafficking' the wrong interpretation, as some lower courts have, a significant number of legal immigrants could be unjustly uprooted and deported, or given unduly harsh criminal sentences." Federal immigration law, "quite reasonably, imposes special conditions on legal immigrants who are convicted of 'aggravated felonies.' The law says that 'illicit trafficking' in drugs is an aggravated felony, and today's cases pose the question of what that means. The plain meaning of 'trafficking' in drugs is engaging in commercial activity. But some courts have ignored this plain meaning and held that simple possession of drugs can count, and therefore can be an aggravated felony."

Senate Confirms Bomar. The New York Times/AP (10/3, Press) reports, "A British native and career Interior Department employee has been confirmed by the Senate as director of the National Park Service. The new director, Mary A. Bomar, left, was one of four Interior Department officials confirmed by the Senate at 2 a.m. on Saturday as lawmakers rushed to finish work before recessing. Ms. Bomar succeeds Fran P. Mainella, who announced her resignation in July."

10th Assistant Defense Secretary Position Created. The Hill (10/3, Tiron) reports, "After weeks of intense discussions, congressional defense authorizers approved the Pentagon's request for a 10th assistant secretary of defense — a pivotal position in a big reorganization planned to take place over the next year. But the nod for an assistant secretary for global security affairs comes with strings attached." Congressional leaders like Speaker Dennis Hastert and Sen. Richard Lugar have raised concerns: "Hastert has cast doubt on the reorganization because he fears it will hurt congressional oversight and the military's counter-drug mission." Meanwhile, Lugar has "called the merger of counter-narcotics and counter-proliferation missions 'a mistake,' adding, 'these jobs are too big and too important for any one person.'" By reorganizing, the DOD hopes "to bring a key Pentagon office into line with the U.S. military's need to respond to a widening array of transnational threats, to manage international military coalitions, and to equip partner nations to fight terrorists."

Report Shows Abramoff Team's Effort To Influence Lawmakers. The Hill (10/3, Schor) reports the House Government Reform Committee report "released late last week on the 400-plus communications between Bush administration officials and disgraced lobbyist Jack Abramoff and his colleagues also provides new evidence of the extensive reach 'Team Abramoff' maintained among lawmakers and aides from both parties." Abramoff and lobbyists "formerly working under him at Greenberg Traurig claimed meeting with 24 senators, 19 House members and more than 100 aides — at least 20 of them Democratic — on behalf of the Saginaw Chippewa tribe of Michigan, according to a summary released as part of supplementary evidence to the Government Reform report. Lawmakers' names were all redacted by committee staff, but aides' names were released and represent Democratic as well as Republican members." The bulk of the report "focuses on attempts by Abramoff and his lobbying team to leverage their White House contacts, including Deputy Chief of Staff Karl Rove and now-GOP national chairman Ken Mehlman, for a variety of favors. But in the Saginaw Chippewa work summary, provided to the committee by the lobbying firm, Abramoff and his colleagues touted their skills at securing federal appropriations for roads, a school and a crime-prevention center for the Chippewas, who took in a significant income from their Soaring Eagle casino." Among the "victories Abramoff's team claimed was securing an objection by now-Senate Minority Leader Harry Reid (D-Nev.) to a bill by Sen. Debbie Stabenow (D-Mich.) that would have allowed another Michigan tribe to open a casino potentially harmful to the Chippewas' gambling operation."

DOJ_NMG_0073289

Congress Approves Military Pay Hike, Delays Civil Service Raise. The Washington Post (10/3, D4, Barr, 748K) reports in its "Federal Diary" column, "Hours before wrapping up for its campaign break, Congress nailed down a 2.2 percent pay raise for the armed forces but left resolution of the federal employee raise to a lame-duck session next month. The pay raise was approved late last week by the House and Senate as part of the fiscal 2007 defense authorization bill, which sets out policy and personnel goals for the Defense Department. The across-the-board raise will take effect in January, and additional raises for senior enlisted personnel and warrant officers will begin in April. The House version of the bill had called for a 2.7 percent across-the-board military raise, but House and Senate negotiators chose to go with the Senate's proposed 2.2 percent increase, which matched the adjustment approved by Congress in an appropriations bill." The House "approved a 2.7 percent raise for federal employees, and a Senate bill, which did not reach the floor, also has proposed a 2.7 percent civil service raise." The Washington Times (10/3, Causey, 88K) also reports the story.

Top Civil Servants Honored. The Washington Post (10/3, A15, 748K) reports that the fifth annual Sammies, or Service to America Medals, were presented at a gala last Wednesday. The awards "were created by the Partnership for Public Service and the Atlantic Media Company. A committee selected nine winners from more than 500 nominees and 30 finalists. Nancy Cox, a scientist at the Centers for Disease Control and Prevention, won the top award, Federal Employee of the Year, for 'leading the world's efforts to prepare for a catastrophic flu pandemic.'"

California Man Accused Of Sending Letters Threatening Bush, Cheney, Others. The AP (10/2) reports an engineer at a nuclear power plant near Sacramento "has been charged with sending threatening letters containing a powdery substance to the same Sierra foothills country club where President Bush will appear Tuesday for a Republican campaign event. Michael Lee Braun, 51, appeared Monday in U.S. District Court in Sacramento on two federal charges of sending threats through the mail. The FBI said he also is a suspect in mailing dozens of similar threats since shortly after the 2001 terrorist attacks." According to the AP, an affidavit indicates Braun "was a suspect since the first letters were mailed from Sacramento to the U.S. Drug Enforcement Agency and a Sacramento dental office." The AP reports the letters are said to have contained threats directed at President Bush, first lady Laura Bush, Vice President Dick Cheney, and others.

President Will Attend Christening Of Father's Namesake Carrier. The Norfolk Virginian Pilot (10/3) reports, "President Bush will join his parents at Saturday's christening of the nation's newest aircraft carrier, named for his father, at shipbuilder Northrop Grumman Newport News. The carrier, CVN-77, is called the George H.W. Bush, after the country's 41st president." The Bush "is the last of 10 Nimitz-class carriers" and cost "approximately $6 billion."

OTHER NEWS:

Reports Offer Mixed Picture Of US Economy. USA Today (10/3, Read, 2.27M) reports, "A pair of economic reports offered a mixed picture of the economy Monday as growth slowed among US manufacturers while commercial construction showed surprising resilience." The manufacturing sector "grew in September at the slowest pace in more than a year, a trade group said. A big gain in commercial construction spending, however, was enough to offset a decline in home building in August, the Commerce Department said." Construction spending "edged up 0.3% to a seasonally adjusted annual rate of $1.2 trillion, the best showing in five months." The Institute for Supply Management "said its manufacturing index registered 52.9 in September, below August's reading of 54.5 and the lowest reading since May 2005, when the index hit 51.4. Analysts had predicted a reading of 53.5. A reading of 50 or more indicates expansion, while below 50 shows contraction."

DOJ_NMG_0073290

The Wall Street Journal (10/3, Conkey, 2.03M) also says "the nation's factories appear to be losing some steam as economic growth moderates." Other data "offered signs that the residential real-estate market may be stabilizing after a slowdown in sales over the past year. The National Association of Realtors said its index of pending home sales rose 4.3% in August from July but remains 14% below the year-earlier pace."

Gas Prices Drop Again. ABC World News (10/2, story 8, 0:15, Gibson, 8.78M) reported, "The government said that price of gasoline dropped again for the eighth straight week. Average price is 2.31 down 7 cents from last week and 73 cents overall since early August."

Stocks Mixed. NBC Nightly News (10/2, story 8, 0:10, Williams, 9.87M) reported, "Turning to Wall Street today The Dow was down almost 9 points [to close at 11, 670.35]. The NASDAQ was off just over 20 points [to close at 2,237.60]." The Wall Street Journal (10/3, Browning, 2.03M) says, "Pushing several times past the January 2000 record close of 11722.98, the Dow industrials got as high as 11726.94 yesterday before sagging at midday. … It was the third consecutive session in which the Dow industrials briefly surpassed the record but couldn't hold on." The Washington Times (10/3, Hill, 88K) runs a similar report under the headline "Dow On Verge Of Closing At An All-time High."

USA Today (10/3, Krantz, 2.27M) reports, "Hurt by losses of stocks in the Internet retail, home entertainment software and oil and gas industries, the Standard & Poor's 500 index fell 4.53 points to 1331.32. That's leaves the S&P up 6.7% for the year."

Majority Of Black, Hispanic Families Own Homes In DC Region. The Washington Post (10/3, A1, Layton, Keating, 748K) reports, "A majority of black and Hispanic households in metropolitan Washington now own their houses instead of renting, according to new data released today by the U.S. Census Bureau. The new numbers, reflecting changes from 2000 to 2005, underscore the Washington region's affluence and strong economy. During the half-decade of soaring housing prices, whites, blacks, Asians and Hispanics were all more likely to own their homes in the region than nationally." The Post adds, "Some of the most dramatic shifts are taking place in the District, where African Americans are no longer a majority among homeowners. In 2000, 54 percent of D.C. homeowners were black, and 41 percent were white. But a decline of 6,000 black homeowners since then, and a surge of 7,000 additional white homeowners, brought the two groups to virtual parity in the 2005 survey. The decline in black homeowners in the District was offset by growth in the suburbs."

Housing Costs Sharply Up Between 2000, 2005. The New York Times (10/3, Scott, Archibold, 1.21M) reports, "The burden of housing costs in nearly every part of the country grew sharply from 2000 to 2005, according to new Census Bureau data being made public today. The numbers vividly illustrate the impact, often distributed unevenly, of the crushing combination of escalating real estate prices and largely stagnant incomes." While "many of the highest home values were on the coasts, in places like Southern California and Manhattan, many of the biggest jumps in the percentage of people paying a burdensome amount of their income for housing occurred in the Midwest and in suburbs nationwide, making it clear that the housing squeeze has reached deep into the middle class. …. Among suburban homeowners, there were big increases in the percentage of people with mortgages spending at least 30 percent in places like Loudon County, Va.; Morgan County, Ind.; Nassau County, on Long Island; and Bastrop County, Tex."

Dionne Says Voters Crediting Governors For "Relatively Good Economy." E.J. Dionne writes in the Washington Post (10/3, A17, 748K), "Republicans have been scratching their heads in frustration. Why has a relatively good economy not been helping either President Bush's approval ratings or their party's electoral cause? One answer is that economic growth is helping people at the top far more than anyone else. Another explanation can be discovered here and in other well-functioning states around the country: To the extent that voters are expressing gratitude this year, they are saying thanks to their governors." That "does not stop them from yelling irately at Washington, D.C."

Bloggers Increasingly Targeted By Libel Suits.

USA Today (10/3, Parker) reports that "blogs -- short for Web logs, the burgeoning, freewheeling Internet forums that give people the power to instantly disseminate messages worldwide -- increasingly are being targeted by those who feel harmed by blog attacks. In the past two years, more than 50 lawsuits stemming from postings on blogs and website message boards have been filed across the nation. The suits have spawned a debate over how the 'blogosphere' and its revolutionary impact on speech and publishing might change libel law. Legal analysts say the lawsuits are challenging a mind-set that has long surrounded blogging: that most bloggers essentially are 'judgment-proof' because they -- unlike traditional media such as newspapers, magazines and television outlets -- often are ordinary citizens who don't have a lot of money."

Seeking Unpaid Fees, Lobbying Firm Sues Former Client.

Roll Call (10/3, Ackley) reports, "The lobbying firm PodestaMattoon has taken the unusual step of suing a former client for breach of contract and unpaid fees, including bonuses, totaling more than $300,000." In the case, which was "filed in D.C. Superior Court," "PodestaMattoon and its attorneys from Dickstein Shapiro allege Falex Corp. of Sugar Grove, Ill., and its nonprofit entity, the Center for Tribology and Coatings, owe the firm $307,460.83, plus interest, for unpaid fees and out-of-pocket expenses. PodestaMattoon, which is owned by Republican Daniel Mattoon and Democrat Tony Podesta, publicly reported income of $520,000 from Falex between January 2004 and March 10, 2006, when the client was terminated. In the court filings, PodestaMattoon claims that in January 2004, Falex agreed to pay 'a $150,000 performance fee if PodestaMattoon reached certain strategic and legislative goals.' While the lawsuit does not specify those legislative goals, lobbying disclosure reports filed with the Secretary of the Senate show that the firm was working for Falex on Defense appropriations matters. … PodestaMattoon's court filing states that 'during the remainder of 2004 PodestaMattoon performed its obligation under the 2004 Agreement' and, as a result, 'Falex became obligated to pay' the $150,000 performance fee. According to the filing, Falex paid only $50,000 of that sum and did not pay expenses worth more than $27,000."

DOJ_NMG_0073291

Insurers Roll Out New Medicare Drug Plans. The Wall Street Journal (10/3, D1, Fuhrmans, Zhang, 2.03M) reports, "After spending months sorting through a multitude of Medicare drug-benefit options for 2006, seniors have the chance to undergo the dizzying experience all over again. That is because this week insurers begin marketing their 2007 drug plans before the six-week enrollment season kicks off Nov. 15." The "good news is that most seniors who are satisfied with the plan they are enrolled in don't have to do anything." Still, "the drug-benefit landscape is changing enough that even enrollees who are content may want to review how their plan stacks up against new offerings."

Florida GOP Chooses Negron As Foley's Replacement. The Hill (10/3, O'Connor) reports the Florida Republican Party named former state Rep. Joe Negron as Mark Foley's replacement. Negron's "name will not appear on the ballot. He will receive all the votes cast for Foley. Democrats are now favored to capture that seat." CQ Politics (10/3, Kapochunas) reports, "Any votes cast for Foley will be credited to Negron as the replacement candidate. But it will be Foley's name, not Negron's, that residents of the south-central Florida district will see when they cast their votes. And it is possible, if not likely, that many will be uncomfortable punching Foley's name, given the circumstances surrounding his hasty departure from the race and his House seat. … Local Democrats continue to portray the race as a matchup not between Negron and Mahoney, but between Foley and Mahoney."

The AP (10/3, Farrington) quotes Negron as saying, "My job beginning immediately is to get word out to all these absentee voters and to everyone else in this race that you are not voting for Mark Foley, you are voting for the Republican nominee, and I'm not Mark Foley. … I think it's something that can be done." However, according to the AP, "one prominent Florida Republican expressed pessimism about holding onto the seat. 'It's a death sentence ... mission impossible,' said former state Republican Party Chairman Tom Slade. 'The only way you win is they (voters) have got to vote for Mark Foley. That doesn't appear to me to be very attractive.'"

The Los Angeles Times (10/3, Jarvie, Bustillo, 918K) reports, "Foley's sexually charged Internet exchanges with minors prompted widespread reactions of disbelief and disgust in his home district, suggesting that the party may face an uphill challenge in convincing voters that the seat, once considered a Republican lock, should remain in the party's hands. … 'I don't know that it's going to be possible, but our job is to get voters to look beyond the name,' said Bill Lents, chairman of the St. Lucie County Republican Party. 'One idea being kicked around is "wrong name, right party." That's a message we have to get across, and it's not going to be easy, but that's our job.'"

Boehner Pessimistic Over GOP's Chances In Foley's District. The Washington Post (10/3, A1, Balz, VandeHei, 748K) reports House Majority Leader John Boehner "said in a radio interview with conservative commentator Sean Hannity that the party's replacement candidate is all but doomed. Because of ballot procedures in Florida, 'to vote for this candidate, you have to vote for Mark Foley,' Boehner said. 'How many people are going to hold their nose to do that?'"

Bush To Raise Funds For Republicans In Three States. The Washington Post (10/3, Baker, 748K) reports, "President Bush on Monday kicked off a three-day Western campaign fundraising trip that will take him to Nevada, California, Arizona and Colorado as he steps up his efforts to preserve Republican control of Congress five weeks before too-close-to-call midterm elections." Bush "plans to use the campaign swing to launch an aggressive attack on Democrats for voting last week against bills that limited the courtroom rights of terrorism suspects and authorized the president's warrantless wiretapping program." At his first stop, a fundraiser here for House candidate Dean Heller, Bush said, "It sounds like they think the best way to protect the American people is to wait until we're attacked again. … That's not the way it's going to be under my administration."

The Sacramento Bee (10/3, Bizjak, 298K) reports that President Bush will make a fast visit to El Dorado County, California today to attend a $2,000 per person fundraiser for Rep. John Doolittle. Bush "is expected to arrive via helicopter, 'helo-ing in' as the White House calls it, for lunch on a hilltop overlooking Folsom Lake, then 'helo-ing' out two-plus hours later."

DOJ_NMG_0073292

The New York Times (10/3, Rutenberg, Nagourney, 1.21M) reports, "Bush's job approval ratings are sagging, nervous members of his own party are running advertisements highlighting their differences with him, and the White House is besieged with new questions about the war in Iraq." But Bush "is hardly going to be sitting out the final stage of this year's campaign. Even if many Republicans in tough races across the country do not want to be seen with him, Mr. Bush and his aides have developed a comprehensive plan to get him on the road for much of the next 40 days and put the power of the presidency into a midterm election that could shape his final two years in the White House." The Times adds, "To date, at a series of mostly private events, Mr. Bush has raised $180 million for his party and individual candidates, according to the Republican National Committee, outpacing the record Mr. Bush set in 2002, when it was easier to raise money because of less restrictive campaign finance laws. Together with Laura Bush, the first lady, and Vice President Dick Cheney, the White House has raised nearly $250 million for the election cycle."

The White House Bulletin/US News (10/2) reported that as the November 7 election approaches, Bush "is said to be eager to engage the Democrats, and increasingly he wants to do it himself." "He's his own best spokesman," White House Press Secretary Tony Snow told US News and the Bulletin. Snow "expects to do fewer of his own on-the-record briefings during the next month -- maybe only two a week -- because the President wants to carry his case, personally, to the voters. Tops on Bush's message list: Defend the war on terrorism and the war in Iraq, talk up the economy, and call attention to his other initiatives such as his ideas for overhauling education and the health-care system. Republican advisers expect Bush to get tougher on the Democrats, whom he says are eager to re-take power in Congress and push through a left-wing agenda, including increasing taxes and limiting his power to conduct the war in Iraq and the overall war on terrorism."

Cheney Campaigns In His Old Wyoming District. USA Today (10/3, 2.27M) reports, "Vice President Cheney returned Monday to the Wyoming congressional district he once served, campaigning for the re-election of GOP Rep. Barbara Cubin." Cheney "said Republicans must keep their majority in Congress to maintain the fight against terrorism." Said Cheney, "What the Democrats are pushing now is the very kind of retreat that has been tried and failed in the past." He also "said he didn't have to remind the crowd what sort of legislation would come forward in Congress if Democrats gained the majority, invoking the idea of Sen. Edward Kennedy and Rep. Barney Frank, both Massachusetts Democrats, becoming committee chairs. Cubin faces what the Casper Star-Tribune called a "strong challenge" from businessman Gary Trauner."

Cheney Has Raised More Than $38 Million For Republicans This Cycle. Fox News' Your World with Neil Cavuto (10/2, Baier) reported, "Vice President Cheney headlined 102 events this cycle, raising more than $38 million for Republicans."

Rasmussen Poll Shows Allen Ahead By Six. The Washington Times (10/3, Bellantoni, 88K) reports, "Virginia Sen. George Allen holds a six-point lead over his Democratic challenger, James H. Webb Jr., a new statewide poll released yesterday shows. If the election were held today, Mr. Allen, a Republican, would capture 49 percent of the vote, while Mr. Webb would receive 43 percent, according to a telephone survey of 750 likely voters conducted by Rasmussen Reports from Thursday through Sunday." The data also show "5 percent are undecided and 3 percent would choose some other candidate in the contest."

Allen Campaign Airs Two-Minute Ad In Primetime. The AP (10/3) reports, "Desperate to rescue his re-election campaign from a six-week tailspin, Sen. George Allen aired a two-minute ad across Virginia just before prime time Monday -- a valedictory aimed at saving his political career." The "embattled Republican bought air time in every television market hoping to shift attention from a string of damaging developments beginning Aug. 11, when he called a man of Indian descent 'macaca,' a type of monkey, through claims last week that he used a common racial slur against black people." The AP adds, "Strategists for the former governor decided to take the dramatic step Saturday, a day after a statewide poll showed Allen and Democrat Jim Webb deadlocked at 43 percent each. As late as July, Webb trailed Allen by 16 percentage points." Allen "will pay about $43,000 to simulcast the ad once, from 7:58 p.m. to 8 p.m., on one television station each in the Norfolk, Richmond, Roanoke and Washington, D.C., markets. About $30,000 of that is for the time on WRC in Washington, which broadcasts to the populous northern Virginia suburbs both candidates are targeting."

Mason Dixon Poll Shows Whitehouse Leading Chafee 42-41. CNN's The Situation Room (10/2, King) reported, "In Rhode Island, moderate Republican Senator Lincoln Chafee is facing a stiff challenge from Democrat Sheldon Whitehouse. A new Mason-Dixon poll shows Whitehouse with 42 percent support among likely voters, to Chafee's 41 percent."

Talent, McCaskill Tied 43-43 In Mason Dixon Poll. CNN's The Situation Room (10/2, King) reported that in Missouri. "Republican Senator Jim Talent is tied with Democratic challenger Claire McCaskill in another new

DOJ_NMG_0073293

Mason-Dixon poll. Each gets 43 percent support among likely voters."

Mason Dixon Poll Shows Cardin Leading Steele By Six Points. CNN's The Situation Room (10/2, King) reported that in Maryland, "Democratic Congressman Ben Cardin now holds a six-point lead over Republican Lieutenant Governor Michael Steele. The Mason-Dixon poll of likely voters show Cardin with 47 percent and Steele with 41 percent."

Outside Groups Spending Heavily In Key Races. The Washington Post (10/3, A1, Birnbaum, Goldfarb, 748K) reports, "As the race for control of Congress turns toward its final sprint to Election Day, independent organizations with ideological or commercial stakes in the outcome are pouring record amounts of money into the closest contests -- in some cases eclipsing the spending of the candidates themselves." For example, in Ohio, "Rep. Deborah Pryce, the fourth-ranking Republican in the House, was attacked by nearly $1 million in negative commercials this summer. But her Democratic opponent, Franklin County Commissioner Mary Jo Kilroy, did not pay for any of them. They were bankrolled instead by trial lawyers, labor unions and the liberal group MoveOn.org. In fact, outside groups appear to have spent more in that period than Pryce and Kilroy combined, a pattern that is being duplicated in some of the most competitive campaigns across the country." Labor unions "are betting especially big. The AFL-CIO alone is helping Democratic candidates with a $40 million get-out-the-vote effort, its largest ever during an off-year election. Labor's nemesis, the U.S. Chamber of Commerce, is devoting an equal sum to elections this autumn and is concentrating on efforts to bring voters to the polls. … On the right, the U.S. Chamber of Commerce plans to allocate $20 million to help federal candidates and another $20 million for state and local races. The American Medical Association is also a serious player. It recently reported $307,125 spent in support of GOP Rep. Johnson in Connecticut."

New Suburbs Seen As Key To Control Of Congress. USA Today (10/3, Lawrence, 2.27M) reports, "New suburbs spreading across once-rural counties are among the hottest battlegrounds in fall elections that will determine whether Democrats or Republicans control Congress for the rest of the Bush administration. The new 'it' counties, as sociologist Robert Lang calls them, are in play in top races for governor, Senate and House in at least a dozen states: Florida, Kentucky, Illinois, Indiana, Maryland, Minnesota, Missouri, New Jersey, Ohio, Pennsylvania, Virginia and Washington." USA Today adds, "In recent elections, Democrats have dominated cities and close-in 'mature' suburbs, while Republicans sweep newer, outer suburbs and rural America. … Among the counties that could determine whether Republicans keep their House majority: Clark County, Indiana. Former representative Baron Hill, a Democrat, is in a rematch with Republican Rep. Mike Sodrel. Pasco County, Florida, north of Tampa. Republican state Rep. Gus Bilirakis and former Hillsborough County commissioner Phyllis Busansky, a Democrat, are vying to succeed his father, Rep. Michael Bilirakis, also a Republican. Sherburne and Wright counties, Minnesota, northwest of Minneapolis-St. Paul. Democrat Patty Wetterling is competing with state Sen. Michele Bachmann for the seat now held by Senate candidate Mark Kennedy, a Republican." Matthew Dowd, "who was President Bush's pollster, says some rapidly growing outer suburbs are heavily GOP. However, he says Republicans were wrong to assume after 2004 that they have a grip on them. "

Lieberman Says Party Leaders Told Him He'll Keep His Seniority If Reelected. The Hill (10/3, Bolton) reports, "Sen. Joe Lieberman, the longtime Democratic senator from Connecticut running for re-election as an independent, says the party leadership has assured him he would keep his seniority if he returns to Congress. Local Democrats are responding with irritation, political opponents voice disbelief, and Senate Minority Leader Harry Reid (D-Nev.) denies making a decision." Reid "does not want to wrestle with these questions in public before the Nov. 7 election. 'The caucus won't make any decisions until after the elections in November,' said Reid's spokesman, Jim Manley."

DNC Unlikely To Change New Hampshire Role In 2008 Campaign. In his Roll Call column (10/3), political analyst Stuart Rothenberg says, "Seeking to add states with large minority populations into the Democratic presidential primary mix, the Democratic National Committee has added Nevada and South Carolina to the party's early calendar. Does this mean the demise of the New Hampshire primary and the dilution of the state's influence in the nomination process — especially if the state defies the DNC and moves its primary to an earlier date? Don't bet on it." Democratic presidential candidates, 'as well as political operatives and journalists I've talked with, leave little doubt that New Hampshire once again will be a battleground for the party's nomination, whenever the primary is held." Rothenberg added, "I don't know if New Hampshire will challenge the DNC by moving its primary earlier than the DNC allows, but it might. A number of smart people I talked to firmly believe it will. Some even think the Granite State will have no choice but to move up to December or even November. And if that happens, the irony is that the DNC will have succeeded in forcing Democrats to choose a nominee earlier, rather than changing the states that have the most impact in selecting the party's standard-bearer."

DOJ_NMG_0073294

Bill To Award California Electors To Popular Vote Winner Vetoed. The New York Times (10/3, Times, 1.21M) reports, "Saying it ran 'counter to the tradition of our great nation,' Gov. Arnold Schwarzenegger vetoed a bill on Saturday that would have automatically allocated all the state's 55 electoral votes to whichever presidential candidate received the national popular vote." The bill, "which passed the state's Legislature this summer, was devised by John R. Koza, a computer scientist who envisioned a system in which a series of states holding the number of electoral votes needed to elect a president -- 270 -- would commit their electors to casting ballots for the winner of the popular vote, regardless of how their individual electorates voted."

Ailes' Record In More Prominent News Corp Role Seen As Lackluster. The Wall Street Journal (10/3, Angwin, 2.03M) reports in a front page story that over the "past 10 years, Roger Ailes transformed the cable-news business using glitzy graphics, brash marketing and a take-no-prisoners approach. His playbook vaulted News Corp.'s Fox News Channel into the industry's No. 1 spot." Using a "similar approach, he has since taken on a more prominent role at News Corp. -- including running the company's local television stations -- but the results aren't as impressive. Accustomed to operating his own fiefdom, Mr. Ailes has ruffled feathers among other executives." Ailes has "started a new TV network, called MyNetworkTV, but it hasn't shown much sign of life amid a broader slump in the local-TV business. Meanwhile, ratings at Fox News are declining faster than those of its competitors and its advertising-sales growth is slowing."

Illinois Town Prospers By Accepting Dubious Enterprises. The Wall Street Journal (10/3, Spain, 2.03M) reports in a front page story that when "construction and waste-management firm Fred Weber Inc. sought to build a trash-transfer station in the St. Louis area, it was shooed away by activists and residents opposed to having thousands of tons of other people's garbage being trundled through their communities." But "across the border in Illinois, the village of Sauget rolled out the welcome mat." That "'Yes, in my backyard' ethic has made Sauget, population 250, a peculiar island of prosperity in the sea of urban economic blight across the Mississippi River from St. Louis. While the little towns around it are marked by crime, shuttered factories, burned-out buildings and trash-strewn streets, Sauget boasts clean parks, neat homes and beautifully maintained roads." Sauget has "embraced some of the less-popular remnants of the industrial Midwest as well as the seamier side of the U.S. service economy. Along with companies that smelt zinc, treat sewage and incinerate toxic waste are a brace of strip clubs, two nightclubs and a 24-hour liquor store that doubles as an off-track betting parlor and the largest lottery outlet in Illinois."

Conservative Worry Over Left-Wing Professors Said To Be Overwrought. In a Wall Street Journal op-ed (10/3), Arthur C. Brooks of Syracuse University says, "Parents have just sent their kids off to college, full of hope that the knowledge and enlightenment they acquire will prepare them for the rigors of the modern economy. But a worrying possibility is keeping some of these parents -- especially the conservative ones -- up at night: the prospect that their children will be hopelessly corrupted by the faculty." Most studies "of the subject have indicated that, indeed, upward of 90% of college professors at many universities hold liberal political views. In some schools and departments, faculties are virtually 100% left-wing. It is one thing to lament this ideological lopsidedness in the academy. But it is quite another to assume that professors actually bend the little minds in their care toward a liberal point of view, or even a radical one." When "it comes to politics, people from conservative families follow their parents, not their professors."

NYTimes Says Wal-Mart Needs To Treat Employees Better. The New York Times (10/3, 1.21M) says in an editorial, "There are distressing signs that Wal-Mart may be acting on many of the ideas outlined in an internal document — leaked last year — to rid its payroll of full-time and less-healthy employees who are more expensive for the company to retain." But "Costco has shown that better wages for workers don't preclude low prices for customers. If Wal-Mart wants to avoid increasingly onerous legislation, regulation and scrutiny, company executives are going to have to learn that human beings are not machines that can be turned on and off, that parents can't always reshuffle their lives on short notice."

WPost Criticizes Virginia Republicans Over NoVA Transportation. The Washington Post (10/3, A16, 748K) says in an editorial, "Last week's stunning failure by Virginia lawmakers to address the state's urgent transportation needs will have lasting consequences. Led by a band of Republican obstructionists in Richmond -- ideologues and anti-tax fundamentalists -- the General Assembly has decided to let Northern Virginia commuters stew in their own juices for a couple of years. Make no mistake about the result: There will be no serious, sustainable funding for new roads, intersections and other improvements for at least the next two years -- after which today's stop-and-go trips may seem like a happy memory. Northern Virginia, the state's economic engine, is to be starved of any progress on basic infrastructure."

DOJ_NMG_0073295

Bush Backs Turkey Joining EU. The Washington Post (10/3, A6, Fletcher, 748K) reports President Bush "voiced support for Turkey's entry to the European Union yesterday after meeting with Turkish Prime Minister Recep Tayyip Erdogan in a long session that also focused on ways to counter extremism, instability in the Middle East and the continued violence in Iraq." The session "lasted nearly two hours -- almost an hour longer than scheduled -- and White House aides called this a reflection of Turkey's critical relationship with the United States." Erdogan "thanked Bush for the endorsement, adding that 'the United States is a strategic partner, a very important strategic partner for Turkey.'" The Post says accession talks "have gotten off to a rocky start," and notes "many European countries are experiencing a surge of anti-immigration sentiment." The Post continues, "When it came to terrorism, Bush and Erdogan did not explicitly mention the simmering tension caused by a paramilitary group that has been battling to establish an autonomous Kurdish region near the intersection of Turkey, Iraq and Iran for more than two decades." Erdogan "said he is committed to battling terrorism," and then "scolded those who link the Muslim religion to the terrorism of al-Qaeda and other extremists who perpetrate violence in the name of Islam." The AP (10/3, Klug) runs a similar report.

Erdogan Says Kurdish Attacks Creating Anti-US Sentiment In Turkey. The Washington Times (10/3, Sands, 88K) reports, "Turkish Prime Minister Recep Tayyip Erdogan, emerging from a lengthy Oval Office meeting with…Bush, warned yesterday that a surge of attacks by separatist Kurdish guerrillas based in neighboring Iraq have fueled anti-American sentiment in his country." Erdogan, "briefing reporters after the meeting, said he was reassured by Mr. Bush's pledge to work with Turkish and Iraqi leaders to curb attacks by the Kurdistan Workers Party, known by the Turkish acronym PKK, the militant Kurdish separatist group that the United States has designated a terrorist organization."

Bush Backs UN Force For Darfur. USA Today (10/3, 2.27M) reports, "President Bush said Monday that the United Nations should send a peacekeeping force to the Darfur region of Sudan without further delay." The Sudanese government "has resisted international pressure to accept a UN peacekeeping force, but Bush said the UN should deploy such a force anyway." The AP (10/3) quotes Bush saying, "The United Nations can play an important role in helping us achieve our objective, which is to end human suffering and deprivation. … In my view, the United Nations should not wait any longer."

Presidential Waiver Clears Military Training For 21 Countries. The AP (10/2, Gedda) reports, "Twenty-one countries that had been denied participation in U.S. military training programs are now eligible to take part again under a presidential waiver announced Monday by the White House. All 21 had run afoul of the Bush administration and U.S. law by refusing to sign an agreement with the United States that would exempt Americans from prosecution by the International Criminal Court." The AP adds, "Scores of countries have gone along with U.S. requests to exempt Americans from ICC prosecutions. Others, however, refused to bend to U.S. pressure, and the result in many countries has been a sharp decline in their military ties with the United States. Pentagon officials have told Congress that China has been filling the vacuum created by the suspension of training programs in 12 Latin American and Caribbean countries."

Burns Says Moscow, Beijing Will Back Push For UN Sanctions On Iran. The Washington Times (10/3, Kralev, 88K) notes remarks by Undersecretary Burns that Washington "is confident that Russia and China will join it in pushing for U.N. sanctions against Iran if it does not agree to suspend enriching uranium this week." Burns "also said the [UNSC] will insist on a clear answer to its demand that Iran suspend its enrichment activity. A 'maybe' will be considered a 'no,' he said." In describing Secretary Rice's September 18 dinner in New York, Burns says she "and her five counterparts agreed that the first week of October would be the absolute deadline for Iran 'to say yes or no.'" Burns "rejected a suggestion by Kazakh President Nursultan Nazarbayev…that Iran be offered a deal similar to the one Kazakhstan made when it gave up its nuclear arsenal in the 1990s," instead saying the Administration "has refused to offer security guarantees to Iran because of other concerns." He also noted that "the Iranian issue would be [Rice's] primary concern when she meets today in Cairo with the foreign ministers of Egypt, Jordan and the six members of the Gulf Cooperation Council." AFP (10/3) cites an anonymous "senior State Department official" saying "US diplomats have made 'good progress' in gaining allies' approval for a list of sanctions to be imposed on" Tehran.

The AP (10/3, Ames) reports EU foreign policy chief Javier Solana "said he was resuming talks with" Iranian nuclear negotiator Ali Larijani "and warned Monday that the time for continuing negotiations on Tehran's atomic program was limited. But [he] denied he was running out of patience." Solana "said he would talk by telephone with [Larijani] later Monday."

In Mideast, Rice Urged To Pursue Comprehensive Peace Deal. The Washington Post (10/3, A6, Wright, 748K) notes Secretary Rice "held midnight

DOJ_NMG_0073296

talks with Saudi Arabia's King Abdullah on Monday on the first leg of a five-day swing through the Middle East to rally Arab allies against the growing momentum of militant movements in the region." The Administration "is trying to line up support among an informal new bloc -- including the six Persian Gulf states, Egypt and Jordan -- to help stabilize the region after the" Israel-Hezbollah war. Rice "described that conflict as a clarifying moment in defining the political forces in the world's most volatile region," and now she "is hoping to explore ways of reviving the moribund [Israeli-Palestinian] peace process" and "bolster support for the fragile governments in Iraq and Lebanon." The Post says Administration "officials privately concede that their expectations for any major movement are low," and Rice's trip "comes at an all-time low in the region for the Bush presidency, with Iraq's insurgency intensifying, the Palestinians enmeshed in a political and economic quagmire, Hezbollah still armed in Lebanon, Iran's new president increasingly defiant, and three Israeli soldiers captured by Palestinian and Lebanese fighters over the summer yet to be released."

The Financial Times (10/3, Khalaf, Dinmore, Wallis) reports Rice "faces urgent calls for a comprehensive peace [deal] when she meets eight Arab foreign ministers in Cairo today." The trip "is partly intended to shore up moderate Arab allies while dealing with the shared perception of the extremist threat from Iran, Lebanon's Hizbollah and Iraq's sectarian chaos. But because of severe ideological differences within the Bush administration, Ms Rice is not expected to unveil big initiatives." Rice "has apparently scored some success by persuading hardliners in the Bush administration that the US has to engage on the Palestinian-Israeli front. But Arab diplomats say the administration has indicated a peace initiative would only be unveiled after the US midterm elections in November."

The Washington Times/AP (10/3, Nasrawi) adds, "Eight U.S.-allied Arab countries are banding together to meet with [Rice] on her [Cairo stop], in hopes of reviving the deadlocked Arab-Israeli peace process and making headway on other regional issues." The "goal of Rice's tour is to promote democracy and discuss threats to stability,…but the Arab ministers' priority is relaunching peace talks." The AP notes, "By sending Rice to the region after the war in Lebanon, Washington may be signaling its willingness to listen to the concerns of moderate Arab leaders — though its unlikely the two sides share the same priorities."

Tel Aviv Reaches Out To Arab Nations In Order To Contain Iran. In a 1,500-word piece on its front page, the Wall Street Journal (10/3, A1, Leggett, Brauchli, 2.03M) says Tel Aviv is working with Arab capitals to thwart Iranian regional goals. The war with Hezbollah "has redoubled [Tel Aviv's] concerns about the threat from Iran, leading Israeli officials to reach out to Arab governments that share their concern about Tehran's growing influence in the region." Of intense discussion internally "is how far Israel should go to broaden such ties -- particularly because its territorial dispute with the Palestinians is likely to come into diplomatic play." Secretary Rice "is visiting the region, and she will focus on both Iran…and the Palestinian question." The Journal adds, "The ascent of violent Islamism is another area where Israel's interests are converging with those of its Arab neighbors. An array of Sunni Muslim networks such as al Qaeda, though ideologically at odds with Shiite Muslim Iran, consider Israel a mortal enemy while deriding many Arab governments as corrupt and illegitimate -- and have targeted both."

Israeli Analysts Now Hold Favorable View Of Lebanon War's Effects. The Washington Times (10/3, Mitnick, 88K) reports, "After weeks of handwringing over the inconclusive result of Israel's border war with Hezbollah, some Israelis are coming around to the idea that Hezbollah has indeed been weakened and that Israel's deterrent power is still intact." When Israel "agreed to a cease-fire with Hezbollah in August without having scored a knockout blow in the monthlong war, it was widely predicted that a new round of fighting with the Iranian-backed Shi'ite militia was inevitable." But "many analysts have since concluded that Hezbollah -- despite its bombastic rhetoric -- has suffered serious damage and will not be anxious for a return engagement." The war "destroyed the group's positions in southern Lebanon, wiped out a good deal of its rocket arsenal, left hundreds of Lebanese civilians dead and wrecked the country's infrastructure, angering the general public."

Clash Between Hamas, Fatah Factions Continues. The New York Times (10/3, Myre, 1.21M) reports, "Hamas and Fatah, the two main Palestinian factions, on Monday traded gunfire and recriminations for a second day in the West Bank and the Gaza Strip, leaving 2 people dead and about 20 wounded." The Palestinian Authority president, Mahmoud Abbas, of Fatah, and Prime Minister Ismail Haniya, of Hamas, "appealed for calm, and the clashes were not as intense or as widespread as on Sunday. Still, several shootouts erupted as Palestinian officials struggled to end the internal fighting."

Russia Suspends Transport, Postal Link With Georgia. The Financial Times (10/3, Buckley) reports, "Russia sharply escalated its dispute with Georgia on Monday, saying it would suspend transport and postal links with its southern neighbour – even as Georgia returned four soldiers arrested last week on spying charges." Moscow's transport ministry "ordered air, road, rail and sea links to be closed from midnight Monday night. The communications ministry said mail services would be suspended." The Wall Street Journal (10/3, Champion, 2.03M) reports, "Georgia released four Russian military officers it had arrested on charges of spying, in an effort to defuse an escalating crisis between the two countries." But "Moscow retaliated for the arrests" with the minister's announcement.

DOJ_NMG_0073297

The New York Times (10/3, Myers, 1.21M) says "relations between Russia and Georgia… have been turbulent since the Soviet collapse in 1991. The latest tensions, though, have been among the worst since Russian fighters joined two separatist conflicts in Abkhazia and South Ossetia, both in Georgian territory, during the early 1990's." The Washington Times/AP (10/3, Dzhindzhikhashvili) runs a similar report.

More Commentary. Under the headline "Enough Bullying," the Washington Post (10/3, A16, 748K) editorializes, "Vladimir Putin has never fully accepted the breakup of the Soviet Union, which he once called 'the greatest catastrophe of the 20th century.' Having consolidated power in Moscow by dismantling his country's nascent democracy, he has devoted himself in recent years to reestablishing the Kremlin's political and economic dominion over former Soviet republics that became independent in 1991. … A Russian attempt to strangle Georgia has been slowly escalating." In a telephone conversation, Putin "told President Bush that 'it was unacceptable for other countries to take steps that Georgia could interpret as support,' according to the Russian news agency RIA Novosti." Bush "ought to reject that imperious warning."

Ban Ki-Moon "All But Certain" To Become UN Secretary General. The Washington Post (10/3, A13, Lynch, 748K) reports the UNSC's "five permanent members on Monday unanimously backed South Korean Foreign Minister Ban Ki Moon's bid to become the United Nations' next secretary general, making it likely he will be endorsed next week by the 15-nation council as the world's top diplomat." Experts "said it is all but certain that Ban will become" UNSYG in January. "But the council decided to wait until Oct. 9 to formally recommend Ban's candidacy to the 192-member General Assembly so that his competitors can withdraw from the race. The General Assembly has never rejected the council's nominee." The Post says Ban will "take charge of an organization with a budget of more than $5 billion a year and operations in virtually every corner of the world." His elevation "would place a seasoned, cautious diplomat in the job of restoring public confidence in an organization that has been buffeted" by division and scandal in recent years.

The New York Times (10/3, Hoge, 1.21M) says Ban "virtually assured his selection as [UNSYG], winning overwhelming support in a final informal poll of the Security Council." He "will inherit the leadership of a global organization with 9,000 workers, a $5 billion annual budget and tasks ranging from education, health care and emergency assistance to areas hit by natural disaster, to peacekeeping in nations emerging from conflicts. He will also take over at a moment when the United Nations has been shaken by management lapses and scandals, and faces continuing demands to overhaul its procedures." The Wall Street Journal (10/3, Ramstad, King, 2.03M) notes yesterday's straw poll "effectively seals Mr. Ban's bid," and says he "will face an array of challenges." The Financial Times (10/3, Turner), AP (10/3, Wadhams), Washington Times (10/3, Pisik, 88K), Los Angeles Times (10/3, Farley, 918K) and Christian Science Monitor (10/3, Kirk, 58K) run similar stories.

Bret Stephens writes in his Wall Street Journal column (10/3), "Few people are better qualified to run the United Nations than Ashraf Ghani. So it goes without saying that the former Afghan finance minister and current chancellor of Kabul University stands almost no chance of getting the job." Instead, Kofi Annan's successor "is likely to be South Korea's colorless foreign minister Ban Ki-Moon." The Times of London "reports that this year Mr. Ban has pledged $18 million in aid to Tanzania -- currently a member of the Security Council -- and led a business delegation to Greece -- another current member -- and donated a grand piano to an Inca cultural center in Peru -- a third member -- and opened a Korean cultural center in Buenos Aires. Argentina, in case you hadn't guessed, is also on the Council. The Korean government denies that it is trying to buy votes, which is possible. Then again, maybe Mr. Ban understands only too well what it takes to get ahead at the UN. In that sense, and that sense alone, he demonstrates why he, and not Mr. Ghani, is Kofi Annan's fitting heir."

US General Says Chávez Worries Region. The New York Times (10/3, Pear, 1.21M) reports, "The commander of United States military activities in Latin America [Gen. Brantz J. Craddock] said Monday that Venezuela under President Hugo Chávez had become a destabilizing force, and that other countries in the Western hemisphere shared that concern." Craddock reported concern by other countries over Venezuela's "purchase of weapons, especially small arms." The Times reports, "Venezuela has bought AK-47 assault rifles and military helicopters from Russia and patrol boats from Spain." US officials "said Venezuela had used its oil wealth to undermine democratic forces in other Latin American countries." The Times reports that Craddock and Secretary Rumsfeld attended the same conference.

Bosnian Voters Endorse Existing Ethnic Divisions. The New York Times (10/3, Wood, 1.21M) reports, "Bosnia's ethnic divisions seem most likely to become even more firmly entrenched, as partial results of national elections on Monday showed two parties with diametrically opposing views in the lead. The results could delay a move by the international authorities to end their oversight of the country." The Party for Bosnia and Herzegovina's Haris Silajdzic won the Muslim presidency, while the Alliance of Independent Social Democrats' Nebojsa Radmanovic won the Bosnian Serb presidency seat. Radmanovic's party is headed by Milorad Dodik, and the Times notes Silajdzic and Dodik "were criticized for increasing ethnic tensions as they outlined conflicting views of Bosnia's future. Each man advocates a tough version of the policies generally supported by his ethnic group." Muslim and Croat politicians generally seek closer integration and EU candidacy, while Serb politically generally favor independence for their sub-state, and outside experts "worry that the strongly differing stances will set back progress on political changes to ease a transfer of power from foreign officials to local politicians."

DOJ_NMG_0073298

Brazilian Corruption Cases Said To Drag Down Lula's Support. The Wall Street Journal (10/3, Moffett, Samor, 2.03M) reports, "The last straw for Brazilian voters may have been the photos in Saturday's newspapers showing stacks of cash. The police seizure of the money from operatives of the governing party capped a series of scandals in President Luiz Inácio Lula da Silva's administration that frustrated the president's chance to win re-election outright in Sunday's first round of balloting and set up a runoff for later this month against centrist Geraldo Alckmin." Silva "in the end found himself dragged down by their cumulative weight even though he isn't facing charges," and now he "won't have the luxury of playing it safe in the runoff." The "anticorruption trend was less clear-cut in local congressional elections, where patronage politics is often the order of the day." The Journal adds that Brazilian financial markets "surged" following the first round of voting, because Alckim "is seen by investors as having a clearer agenda to shrink the state and stimulate growth."

LATimes Says Lula Deserved First Round Shakeup. In an editorial today, the Los Angeles Times (10/3, 918K) says Silva's "own mediocrity cost him" an outright win in the first round of voting. His "sudden and surprising fall from grace isn't necessarily good news," and even if he wins the runoff election, as is widely expected, he "may find it very difficult to get much done in his second term. Some might call that a bonus." The Times says Silva's "embrace of orthodox economic policies has come as a relief to many investors in Brazil and beyond, but there's little evidence that he ever had any appetite for the reforms Brazil needs if it is to boost its relatively anemic 3% annual growth rate." The Times also pans Silva's willingness "to defer leadership of the Latin American left" to the "buffoonish" Hugo Chavez, and says "that deference may have diminished [his] standing at home as well as abroad."

Zambian President Reelected In Clean Vote. The New York Times (10/3, Wines, 1.21M) notes Zambian President Levy Mwanawasa "took an unexpectedly large lead Monday as vote-counting neared an end in the nation's presidential election and some supporters of his populist rival, Michael Sata, rioted for a second day." Sata, who refused to concede but "said he would not contest the election results in court," also called for an end to the violence. Mwanawasa appears to have "captured 43 percent of the 2.52 million ballots counted, compared with 27 percent for Mr. Sata and 26 percent for Hakainde Hichilema, a businessman, the third major candidate." International observers declared the vote "relatively free of corruption." Mwanawasa "accused his rivals in a national address on Sunday of resorting to violence in the face of defeat and promised a crackdown on lawbreakers."

Abe Seeks Meetings This Week With Hu, Roh. The Washington Post (10/3, A12, Faiola, 748K) reports, "Seeking to mend Japan's deteriorating relations with its neighbors, Japanese officials on Monday said they were moving quickly to arrange summit meetings between freshly inaugurated Prime Minister Shinzo Abe and his counterparts in China and South Korea." The meetings, which could occur Sunday and Monday respectively, "would mark a symbolic breakthrough for Abe… China and South Korea have boycotted top-level meetings with Japan since last year" because of former Prime Minister Junichiro Koizumi's visits to the Yasukuni Shrine. The Post adds, "Analysts were quick to lower expectations for a long-term easing of tensions in the region -- largely because Abe's positions on the issues dividing Japan from its neighbors are at least as hard-line as Koizumi's." In any meeting with Chinese President Hu Jintao or South Korean President Roh Moo-hyun, Abe would "have much to talk about," including textbook content and the future of the Japanese Constitution.

India Post Said To Struggle Against More Efficient Private Firms. A 1,994-word piece in the Wall Street Journal (10/3, Bellman, 2.03M) examines the evolving role of the postal system in India. "India's vast postal service, the world's largest, highlights a little-understood feature of this nation's economic transformation. While India often draws criticism for its failure to sell its vast network of state-owned companies, the government has quietly been opening many of its agencies to blistering competition from private-sector rivals," in this case including FedEx and UPS. "But as India lets its public sector get squeezed, it faces a big dilemma: What to do with these often huge and politically connected organizations during the painful transition period where they have to become competitive and profitable or extinct?"

DOJ_NMG_0073299

Noting that "more-efficient private couriers have eaten deeply into India Post's business," the Journal says similar problems have emerged at the "state-owned phone company Mahanagar Telephone Nigam Ltd" and at Air India and Indian Airlines. "Such competition from private business is helping to change the face of the Indian economy. The country is becoming a growing force in the global economy as reforms have unleashed the power of its one billion consumers. India's economy grew at a faster-than-expected 8.9% in the second quarter, nearly matching China's torrid pace."

Kristof Says Good Governance, Not More Aid, Will Remake Africa. In his latest column on his travels in Africa, New York Times (10/3, 1.21M) columnist Nicholas Kristof says "the need for better for better governance" is "one of the biggest challenges facing Africa today." While foreign aid can help, "what matters most is the local decision makers. The single biggest reason Africa is so poor is that it has had unusually bad leadership — a reflection, in turn, of colonial misrule." Kristof lauds UK Prime Minister Tony Blair's anticorruption initiative and President Bush's Millennium Challenge Accounts, and says, "We should help developing countries broadly, not just by writing checks but also by holding their feet to the fire on corruption and economic reform." He notes that "all across Africa, countries are increasing efforts to fight corruption and improve the investment climate," and concludes, "So, yes, Africa is still afflicted by AIDS, misery and the tyranny of" corrupt leaders. "But leadership is improving, opportunities are appearing, and there's something new in the air: reform, and hope."

THE BIG PICTURE:

Headlines From Today's Front Pages.

Los Angeles Times:
"A Plan To Save King/Drew Gets Tough."
"His Corps Value Was Bravery."
"11 Amish Girls Shot In School."
"2 Share Nobel For Method To Silence Specific Genes."
"Foley Saga No Shock To Some."
"Barrels Of Money Fuel Oil Tax Fight."
"Michelin Anoints Bay Area Cuisine With Pinch Of Stars."
"State Ends Inquiry, Names Monitor For Getty Trust."

New York Times
"Pressure Grows For Republicans Over Foley Scandal."
"Across Nation, Housing Costs Rise As Burden."
"Man Shoots 11, Killing 4 Girls, In Amish School."
"After Afghan Battle, A Harder Fight for Peace."
"Colliding With Death At 37,000 Feet, And Living."
"Bridging A Racial Rift That Isn't Black And White."

USA Today:
"Courts Are Asked To Crack Down On Bloggers, Websites."
"'A Horrendous Crime Scene.'"

Washington Post:
"At Least 3 Killed at PA. Amish School."
"After Foley, New Fears For The GOP."
"Most Blacks, Hispanics In Area Own Homes."
"In Antipsychotics, Newer Isn't Better."
"Outside Groups Shoveling Cash Into Tight Races."
"New Conductors Speed Global Flows Of Money."

Washington Times:
"U.S. Cities United Front On Iran."
"Hastert Denies GOP Saw Foley's 'Vile' Message."
"Gunman Says 3 Amish Schoolgirls."
"Dow On verge Of Closing At An All-Time High."
"Genghis Misunderstood."

Detroit Free Press:
"Back In The Game!"
"Fans Prove This Is Tiger Town."

Atlanta Journal-Constitution:
"Farmers Accused Of 'Scheme' Wind Up Keeping Millions."
"Horror At Amish School."
"Scandal Puts Republicans On Defensive."
"Ga. Companies Await Third Straight Cut In Unemployment Tax."

Houston Chronicle:
"Why Your Electric Bill Is Still High."
"Terror In Amish Country."
"Judge Won't Dismiss Suit In Deputy Shooting."
"Mexico Implores Bush To Veto Border Fence Bill."
"Series Tackles Football Mania."

Story Lineup From Last Night's Network News:
ABC: Amish School House Shooting; School Safety; Foley Investigation; Foley Aftermath; Congressional Page Program; Working Mothers; Supreme Court; Gas Prices; Neil Armstrong's Words On The Moon; Golf In Darfur.
CBS: Amish School Shooting; School Safety; School Safety Analysis; Foley Investigation; Congressional Page Program; Brian Rohrbough Opinion; Amish Country.
NBC: Amish School Shooting; Amish Country; Foley Investigation; Woodward's Book; Washington's Reaction; Iraq-Sectarian Violence; Iraq-Sectarian Violence; Nobel Prize Winners; Stock Market; Neil Armstrong's Words; Troops Return Home.

Story Lineup From This Morning's Radio News Broadcasts:
ABC: PA-Amish school Shootings; Foley Scandal; Afghanistan-US KIA.
CBS: PA-Amish School Shootings; Foley Scandal; Chicago-Power Outage; Gas Prices.

DOJ_NMG_0073300

NPR: PA-Amish School Shootings; WI-Student Accused Of Killing Principal; Foley Scandal; Wall Street; UN Secretary General Race; Brazil Election.

WASHINGTON'S SCHEDULE:

Today's Events In Washington.

White House:

PRESIDENT BUSH — Attends a Richard Pombo for Congress reception, Stockton Memorial Civic Auditorium, Stockton, Calif.; attends a John Doolittle for Congress reception, El Dorado Hills, Calif.; attends a Republican National Committee reception, Private residence, Los Angeles.

VICE PRESIDENT CHENEY — Speaks at a luncheon for Rep. Henry Bonilla, private residence, San Antonio; speaks at a reception for congressional candidate Van Taylor, private residence, Dallas.

US Senate: No Scheduled Events.

US House: No Scheduled Events.

Other: HISPANIC CAUCUS _ The Congressional Hispanic Caucus Institutes' holds its Public Policy Conference Summit. Highlights: 10 a.m. Session on preparing the Hispanic community for leadership in the STEM fields. Location: Renaissance Mayflower Hotel, 1127 Connecticut Ave. NW.

TERRORISM INSURANCE _ 7:15 a.m. - 9:45 a.m. The US Chamber of Commerce, others, sponsor a seminar on terrorism insurance, with Vince Randzzo of Wacovia Corp.; Stef Zielezienski of the American Insurance Association; Joel Wood of the council of Insurance Agents and Brokers, others. Location: 1615 H St. NW.

SCHOOL DROPOUTS _ 9:30 a.m. The National Education Association holds a news conference to release a plan to address the school dropout crisis. Location: National Press Club.

YOUTH-CIVICS/POLITICS _ 9:30 a.m. The Center for Information and Research on Civic Learning & Engagement holds a briefing to release``The Futures of American Democracy: New Study on Youth Civic and Political Health." Location: National Press Club, Zenger Room.

DOHA _ 10 a.m. The American Enterprise Institute holds a forum ``The World Trading System After the Collapse of Doha: The WTO, Developing Countries, and Regionalism" with former Commerce Undersecretary Grant Aldonas, others. Location: 12th floor, AEI, 1150 17th St. NW.

UAE LEADERS _ 10 a.m. Business for Diplomatic Action organization and Zogby International release a survey of young leaders in the United Arab Emirates. Location: Foreign Press Center, National Press Building.

LATINO-SUMMIT _ 10:30 a.m. Ambassadors Roger Noriega and Nancy Soderberg speak at the Latino Coalition's 2006 Small Business Economic Summit to discuss Venezuela and Argentina's relationship. Location: Ritz-Carlton Hotel, 1150 22nd St. NW.

HEALTH CARE TRANSPARENCY _ 11 a.m. - 12:30 p.m. The Heritage Foundation sponsors a panel discussion, ``Transparency in Health Care." Participants: Walton Francis, economist and author of CHECKBOOKs ``Guide to Health Plans for Federal Employees;" David B. Kendall, Senior Fellow for Health Policy, Progressive Policy Institute; and Thomas P. Miller, resident fellow, American Enterprise Institute. Keynote remarks by Alex M. Azar II, Deputy Secretary of Health and Human Services. Location: Heritage Foundation, Lehrman Auditorium, 214 Massachusetts Ave. NE.

MILLENNIUM DEVELOPMENT GOALS _ 12 p.m. - 2 p.m. The United Nations Development Programme hosts a UNDP Washington Roundtable, ``The Millennium Development Goals: A Time of Reckoning." Panelists include Dirk Dijkerman, CEO, Office of the Director of Foreign Assistance, State Department; and Debayani Kar, communications and advocacy coordinator, Jubilee Network. Location: Carnegie Endowment for International Peace, Root Room, 1779 Massachusetts Ave. NW.

CHINA-INDIA _ 12:30 p.m. A team of American and Japanese former government, business and academic leaders release a report on recommendations for the U.S. and Japan to respond to the emerging economicv and political rise of China and India. Participants include former Deputy Secrertary of State Ken Dam, Noboru Hatakeyama of the Japan Economic Forum, Marshall Bouton of the Chicago Council on Global Affairs; others. Location: Douglas Room, Willard Inter-Continental Hotel, 1401 Pennsylvania Ave. NW.

SOROS _ 3 p.m. Investor George Soros speaks at the 16th conference on the Organization of American States Lecture Series of the Americas. Location: OAS, 17th St. and Constitution Ave. NW.

US RUSSIA NUCLEAR _ 3 p.m. - 4:30 p.m. Amb. Nikolay Spassky, deputy head of the Russian Atomic Energy Agency, speaks on ``Nuclear Powers Become Nuclear Partners," focusing on US-Russian nuclear cooperation. Location: Carnegie Endowment for International Peace, 1779 Massachusetts Ave. NW.

LARSON-MIDDLE EAST _ 4:30 p.m. Terje Rex Larson, Norwegian diplomat and United Nations special envoy, will speak at the Johns Hopkins University Paul H. Nitze School of Advanced International Studies (SAIS) about ``Challenges and Opportunities in the Middle East. Location: First floor auditorium of the schools Rome Building, 1619 Massachusetts Ave. NW.

SINGLETON _ 6:30 p.m. The National Hispanic Foundation for the Arts holds its Tenth Annual Noche de Gala dinner, with film director John Singleton, actor Michael Pena and singer Fanny Lu. Keynote address - Commerce

DOJ_NMG_0073301

Secretary Gutierrez at 6:30 p.m. Location: Renaissance Mayflower Hotel, 1127 Connecticut Ave. NW.

CUBA AFTER CASTRO _ 7:30 p.m. American University's School of International Affairs hosts a panel discussion. ``Cuba after Fidel.'' Partcipants: William LeoGrande, dean, American University School of Public Affairs; Robert Pastor, vice president, American University International Affairs Office; Philip Pters, vice president, Lexington Institute; and Silvia Wilhelm, executive director, Cuban American Commission for Family Rights. Location: Abramson Family Recital Hall, Katzen Arts Center, American University, 4400 Massachusetts Ave. NW.

SCHIEFFER ROAST _ 8:30 p.m. CBS news veteran Bob Schiffer will be ``roasted'' by former Senate Democratic Leader Tom Daschle, former roastee Don Imus and his wife Deirdre, and White House press secretary Tony Snow at the 18th annual Roast for Spina Bifida. Location: JW Marriott, 1331 Pennsylvania Ave. NW.

Copyright 2006 by the Bulletin News Network, Inc. Reproduction without permission prohibited. Editorial content is drawn from thousands of newspapers, national magazines, national and local television programs, and radio broadcasts. The Attorney General's News Briefing is published five days a week for the Office of Public Affairs by BulletinNews, which creates custom news briefings for government and corporate leaders and also publishes the White House Bulletin, Frontrunner and Washington Morning Update. We can be found on the Web at BulletinNews.com, or called at (703) 749-0040.

USDOJ- Office of Public Affairs

From:	USDOJ- Office of Public Affairs
Sent:	Tuesday, October 03, 2006 8:30 AM
To:	USDOJ- Office of Public Affairs
Subject:	Department of Justice News Clips for Tuesday, October 03, 2006
Attachments:	dojclips061003.pdf; dojclips061003.doc

This morning's Department of Justice News Clips is attached.

Website: You can also read today's briefing, including searchable archive of past editions, at http://www.BulletinNews.com/justice.

Full-text Links: Clicking the hypertext links in our write-ups will take you to the newspapers' original full-text articles.

Interactive Table of Contents: Clicking a page number on the table of contents page will take you directly to that story.

Contractual Obligations and Copyright: This copyrighted material is for the internal use of US Department of Justice employees only and, by contract, may not be redistributed without BulletinNewsâ€™ express written consent.

Contact Information: Please contact us any time at 703-749-0040 or Justice-Editors@BulletinNews.com. Use of this email address will automatically result in your message being delivered to everyone involved with your service, including senior management. Thank you.

DEPARTMENT OF JUSTICE NEWS CLIPS

PREPARED FOR THE OFFICE OF PUBLIC AFFAIRS, US DEPARTMENT OF JUSTICE

TO: THE ATTORNEY GENERAL AND SENIOR STAFF

DATE: TUESDAY, OCTOBER 3, 2006 7:45 AM EDT

TODAY'S EDITION

Terrorism News:

Tenet Recalled Warning Rice (WP)....4
C.I.A. Chief Warned Rice On Al Qaeda (NYT)....6
Rice Denies Book's Assertion She Brushed Off CIA Terror Warning (LAT)....7
Rice Says She Did Not Ignore Urgent Pre-Sept. 11 Warning (USAT)....9
Rice: No Memory Of CIA Warning Of Attack (AP-Y)....9
The Leaders We Have (WP)....11
Can Bush Save Bush? (WP)....12
Iranian Woman Indicted In Brooklyn In Terrorism Case (NYT)....13
U.S. Says Woman In Shelter Terror Chief (AP)....14
Testimony Ends In Aref And Hossain Trial (CAPN9)....14
Wait Ends For Father And Son Exiled By F.B.I. Terror Inquiry (NYT)....15
Terror Supporter's Kin Return To U.S. (AP)....16
Lawyers For Detainees Challenge Bush Plan (WP/AP)....16
Accused Tamil Tiger Supporter On Bail (TORSTAR)....17
Merger With Al Qaeda Deepens Threat From Algerian Radicals (CSM)....18

Homeland Response:

Terrorism Insurance Still Holds Uncertainties (WSJ)....19
UK And US To Meet Over Passenger Data (FT)....19
Trial OK'd On One Jewell Claim Against AJC (AJC)....20
Judge: Jewell Libel Suit Against Newspaper Can Proceed (CLE)....20
Nagin Wants Minorities In On Katrina Recovery (USAT/AP)....21

War News:

Iraqi Premier Offers Plan To Stop Violence (WP/AP)....22
Iraqi Leader Unveils New Security Plan Amid Rising Violence (NYT)....22
Iraq PM Announces Plan To Unite Parties (AP-Y)....24
Iraqis Plan A Team Effort To End Violence (LAT)....25
Iraq War Draws Foreign Jihadists, But Not In Droves (CSM)....27
Torture Site May Be Linked To Security Forces (USAT)....28
More Troops, Please (WSJ)....29
Death Never 'in Vain' (USAT)....31
Frist: Taliban Should Be In Afghan Gov't (AP)....32
After Afghan Battle, A Harder Fight For Peace (NYT)....33
Afghan Politics - One Chicken Dinner At A Time (CSM)....35

DOJ:

Ohio Prosecutor Named Interim U.S. Attorney (TENN)....37

Corporate Scandals:

Feeling 'Slap In The Face' After Fastow's Sentence (WP)....37
Memo Suggests When Hurd Knew Of Phone Data (WSJ)....38
Cingular Wireless Files Suit Against Investigator Over Hewlett-Packard Pretexting (LAW)....40
Sonsini Received Questionable Novell Options (LAW)....40
Mills Chief Retires But Must Repay Costs For Jet Travel (WP)....43
In Namibia Court, Arguments Over Bail For Options Fugitive (NYT)....44
Ex-Comverse Chief Executive Says He Will Plead Not Guilty (AP)....44
Checks Already In Place (USAT)....45

Criminal Law:

Foley Enters Alcohol Rehab Center (LAT)....46
Pressure Grows For G.O.P. Over Foley Scandal (NYT)....47
On Political Track For Decades, Foley's Career Derails In Days (USAT)....49
Little-known Job Caught In Spotlight (USAT)....51
Addictions Are Often Disclosed Amid Scandals (USAT)....52
Foley Joins List Of Sex Scandals On Capitol Hill (WT)....52
Foley 'drank In Secret,' Seeking Help, Lawyer Says (PALMBEACHP)....53
Foley Saga No Shock To Some (LAT)....55
Follow The Money (RC)....57

Ex-Rep. Foley Checks Into Alcohol Rehab (AP) 58
Foley Checks Into Rehab As Republicans Seek Cover (MCT) 60
Hastert Says He Wasn't Aware Of Explicit E-Mails (Update1) (BLOOM) 61
FBI Knew In July About Foley E-Mails To Teen (WP)..... 63
Hastert Defends Handling Of Page Scandal (AP-Y)..... 64
Pelosi Wants GOP Leaders' Testimony (RC) 66
Papers Knew Of Foley E-Mail But Did Not Publish Stories (NYT) 68
Your Page, M'Lord (NYT) 69
Foley May Be 1st Member Prosecuted Under Strong Internet-crime Laws (HILL)..... 70
Man Shoots 11, Killing 4 Girls, In Amish School (NYT)..... 72
Four Girls Killed At Pa. Amish School (WP)..... 74
Gunman Slays 4 Amish Schoolgirls (WT/AP)..... 76
Seclusion Shattered By School Slayings (USAT)..... 77
Gunman At Amish School Kills 4 Girls, Wounds 7 (PPG)..... 79
Three Killed, 8 Hurt In Pennsylvania School Attack (Update8) (BLOOM) 81
Milk-Truck Driver Kills 3 Girls, Critically Wounds 8 (LAT)..... 82
Gun Reported At North Las Vegas School (AP) 84
Expelled Boy Shows Up At School Armed, Then Flees (NYT)84
Bail In School Attack Is $750,000; Safety Cited (MJS)..... 85
Judge Sets Bail At $750,000 In Weston Schools Shooting (AP)..... 85
National School Violence Conference Set (AP-Y)..... 86
Three Killed, 8 Hurt In Pennsylvania School Attack (Update8) (BLOOM) 87
Bush 'Troubled' By School Shooting (AFP-Y)..... 88
'A Horrendous Crime Scene' (USAT)..... 89
Experts: Events Might Weigh Heavily On Kids (USAT) 90
Three School Shootings (NYT)..... 90
Common Tragedy And Culprits (WP)..... 91
Online Gambling Set For Takeover Wave (FT)..... 91
U.K. Online Gambling Sites Mull Exiting U.S. Market (WSJ/AP) 92
Online Gaming Shares Plummet In Bill's Wake (WP/AP) 92
Bad Luck For Online Gaming (LAT)..... 93
New Legislation May Pull The Plug On Online Gambling (USAT)..... 94
Attorney General Creates Domestic Violence Unit (AP)..... 95
Philadelphia Police Dispatchers Charged With Selling Information (AP)..... 95
2 Police Dispatchers Charged In Scheme (PHI)..... 96
2 Police Radio Dispatchers Face Jail Time (PHI)..... 96
Newark: Bank Robber Sentenced (NYT)..... 97
Jemal Defense Team Questions Deal For Prosecution's Witness (WP) 97
Miss. Resident Sentenced For Making False Claims To FEMA (AP)..... 98
BR Woman Gets Prison In Disaster Fraud (AP) 99
FBI Joins Expressway Inquiries (SPT) 99
Rell, Blumenthal Announce Reviews Of Troubled Highway Project (AP)..... 100
'Inappropriate' Expenditures Found At Getty (LAT)..... 101
Monitor Named To Oversee Reforms At Getty Trust (NYT) .103
DNA Test Result Casts Doubt On Two Convictions In 1987 Murder (WP) 104
Judge Keeps Karr Pornography Case Sealed (HC/AP) 105
Police Investigate '03 Death After Charge Against Nurse (NYT)..... 106
Husband Faces Charges In Nevada Official's Death (WT) ..107
Manuscript Used To Convict Molester (WT)..... 108
Husband Faces Charges In Nevada Official's Death (WT) ..109

Civil Rights:

FAYETTE LOCKUP IS TARGET OF RIGHTS VIOLATIONS INQUIRY (LEXHL) 110
Fayette Jail Employee Says He Assisted FBI Investigation (AP)..... 111
Jail Informant Goes Public (WTVQ-TV)..... 112
EEOC Rules In Favor Of Chesapeake Deputies Who Were Fired (VAPILOT) 112
Bible-Reading Student Gets Lesson In Litigation (WP) 113
Euclid OKs Election Plan Hoping To End U.S. Lawsuit (CLPD)..... 114

Antitrust:

Justice Department, State Settle Suit With Dairy Industry (AP)115
Dairy Co-op In KC Settles With U.S. (KCS)..... 115
FCC OKs Alltel Buy Of Midwest Wireless (AP-YBIZ)..... 115
McAfee, Others Criticize Vista Security Policies (MERCN)...116
Supreme Court Denies Northwest Airlines Appeal In Key Antitrust Case (AP)..... 117
Supreme Court Rejects UnitedHealth Ohio Doctor Rate Appeal (MRKTWTCH) 118
Supreme Court Won't Hear Calif. Competition Case Against AT&T (MRKTWTCH)..... 118
Broadcom Seeks To Bar Qualcomm Chips In Patent Fight (Update4) (BLOOM) 118
Harrah's Gets $15B Private Equity Bid (USAT)..... 120

DOJ_NMG_0073305

Licenses Are The Biggest Hurdle To A Deal For Harrah's (WSJ) 121
Not Our Bag, Coach Says In A Lawsuit Alleging Target Sold Counterfeit Purse (WSJ)....122
Gilead Agrees To Buy Myogen For $2.5 Billion (WSJ) 123
Gilead Plans To Acquire Myogen In $2.5B Deal (USAT/AP) 124
You've Got It Backward: Intel Is Bullying AMD (WSJ)....125
Competition And Antitrust Law Can Protect The Internet (HILL)....126

Environment:

Supreme Court To Take On Con Ed Case (AP)....127
U.S. To Delay Buying Strategic-Reserve Oil (WSJ)....127

FBI/DEA/ATF/USMS:

Court Upholds Polygraph Tests For FBI, Secret Service Applicants (AP)....127
Ex-FBI Agent Gets 6 Years In Stock Case (WSJ)....128
6-Year Sentence In Trading Case (NYT)....128
Ex-agent Gets 6 Years In Fraud (NSDY)....129
City Briefs (NYDN)....129
Inaccuracies Have To Do With Names In Times Report (ESPN)....130
Doubt Cast On Report That Named Players (NYT)....131
Prosecutor: Steroids Story 'Inaccurate' (AP)....131
Pete Rose Admits Taking Amphetamines (AP)....132
Drug Ring Suspect Pleads Guilty (ETPA)....132
Supreme Court Denies Oakmont Doc's Appeal (PTR)....133
Doctor Again Challenges Drugs-for-sex Conviction (PPG)..134
Adolescence: When Young People Use, Parents Seldom Know (NYT)....134
New Evidence Surfaces In Bombing Case (FWST)....135
Man Wanted In Shooting At Ohio Football Game Arrested In Wash. (AP)....137

Immigration:

Supreme Court Rejects Appeal Of Nazi Concentration Camp Guard (FINDLAW/AP)....137
Border Fence Called Impractical (WP)....137
Crackdown On Immigrants Empties A Town And Hardens Views (CSM)....138
Immigration Resolution Passes Early Test (CHIT)....139
Bridging A Racial Rift That Isn't Black And White (NYT)....140

Tax:

Amherst Man Sentenced For Hiding Funds (BIZBUFF)....143
An Honest Democrat (WSJ)....144
Counting Capital Gains (WSJ)....144

Congress-Administration:

Book And E-mails Hit Republican Nerves (FT)....145
Party's Handling Of Foley Riles Up Voters Frustrated By Immigration, Spending (WSJ)....146
Leaders Face Foley Fallout (RC)....148
Statutory Implications Of E-Mails Are Murky (WP)....150
E-mails Send House GOP Scrambling (HILL)....150
Hastert Says He Didn't Know Of Explicit Contact (USAT)....152
Resign, Mr. Speaker (WT)....153
After Foley, New Fears For The GOP (WP)....154
Hastert Denies GOP Saw Foley's 'Vile' Messages (WT)....155
Analysis: Foley Shadows GOP Election (SFC/AP)....157
Ripple Effect May Shake Reynolds (HILL)....158
Kerry: Foley Scandal Part Of GOP 'culture Of Corruption' (DMR)....159
The Redder They Are, The Harder They Fall (WP)....160
Paging Mr. Hastert (WSJ)....161
The Foley Matter (NYT)....162
Adult Supervision (RC)....162
Foley's Red Lights (LAT)....163
GOP Leaders Deserve Nothing Less Than To Lose Their Jobs (RC)....164
No Spinning Past This Scandal (WP)....165
DHS Loses Court Battle Over Collective Bargaining (FEDTIMES)....166
As Term Begins, Justices Reject 1,900 Appeals (WP)....167
High Court Rejects Appeal Of Trade-Case Decision (WSJ) 168
When Ideologies Clash, Justice May Tip Supreme Court's Balance (WSJ)....169
Justice For Immigrants (NYT)....170
Senate Confirms Director Of National Parks (NYT/AP)....171
Pentagon Gets New Office (HILL)....171
Abramoff Report Reveals Ties To GOP, Democratic Members (HILL)....172
Congress Sets Military Pay Raise, Punts On Civil Service (WP)....174
Congress Leaves Big Question Mark On Pay Raises (WT)..175
Top Civil Servants Honored (WP)....175
Calif. Man Charged With Threatening Bush, Cheney (AP)...176
President To Be On Hand For Christening Of Carrier Named After His Father (VAPILOT)....177

Other News:

Manufacturing Decelerates While Commercial Construction Soars (USAT/AP)....177
Data On Factories Indicate Economy Is Losing Speed (WSJ)178
Another Session Leaves The Dow Chasing Record (WSJ)..179

DOJ_NMG_0073306

Dow On Verge Of Closing At An All-time High (WT).....180
Strike 4: Dow Fails To Set Record High (USAT).....181
Most Blacks, Hispanics In Area Own Homes (WP).....181
Across Nation, Housing Costs Rise As Burden (NYT).....183
A Backlash Against Bickering (WP).....185
Those Attacked Online Are Filing Libel Lawsuits (USAT).....186
PodestaMattoon Sues Client For Unpaid Fees (RC).....189
Mean Seniors Face Fresh Round Of Decisions As 2007 Sign-Up Nears (WSJ).....190
Many Obstacles Face Negron In Fla. 16, Especially Foley's Name (CQ).....192
Fla. GOP Picks Foley Replacement (AP-Y).....193
Foley Debacle Tests District Loyalties (LAT).....194
Bush Heads West To Stump For Republicans (WP).....195
Few Will See Bush's Quick Visit Today (SACBEE).....196
Bush, Fund-Raiser In Chief, Hits The Trail In Earnest (NYT)196
Cheney Slams Dems In Wyo. Stump Speech (USAT).....198
Poll Shows Allen Leading Webb By Six Points (WT).....199
Allen Banks On 2-minute Statewide Ad To Reverse Tailspin (AP).....200
Outside Groups Shoveling Cash Into Tight Races (WP).....200
New Suburbs Could Be New Political Battlegrounds (USAT)202
Lieberman Says He Has Been Promised Seniority (HILL).....203
Poor New Hampshire? Don't Bet Against The Granite State (RC).....205
Veto In California On Electoral College (NYT).....207
After Riding High With Fox News, Murdoch Aide Has Harder Slog (WSJ).....207
In His New Role, Roger Ailes Has Rankled Colleagues; Slow Start At MyNetworkTV (WSJ).....210
All In The Family (WSJ).....212
The Chair Out From Under Them (NYT).....213
Richmond's Obstructionists (WP).....213
Bush Backs Turkey's Entry To E.U. (WP).....214
Bush Backs Turkey's Bid To Join EU (AP-Y).....215
Kurdish Rebels Said To Fuel Anti-U.S. Views (WT).....215
Bush Says U.N. Force Should Go To Darfur (USAT).....216
Bush Says U.N. Should Not Wait On Darfur (AP-Y).....217
Bush Waiver Restores Military Training (AP-Y).....217
U.S. Wins A United Front On Iran (WT).....218
'Good Progress' In Drawing Up Iran Sanctions: US Official (AFP).....219
EU Official Pushes Iran On Nuclear Plans (AP).....220
Rice Meets With Saudi King On Trip To Rally Arab Allies (WP).....220
Rice Faces Calls For Progress In Mideast (FT).....221
Rice Revisiting Mideast Peace Issue (WT/AP).....222
Israelis Reach Out To Arab Nations That Share Fear Of Ascendant Iran (WSJ).....223
Analysts Warm To Lebanon Results (WT).....225
2 Killed As Palestinian Factions Clash For 2nd Day (NYT)..226
Russians Raise The Stakes In Georgia Row (FT).....227
Georgia Frees Russian Officers, But Moscow Moves To Retaliate (WSJ).....228
Russia Severs Transport Links With Georgia (NYT).....228
Russian 'Spies' Freed, But Moscow Vengeful Georgia Faces Sanctions For Arrests (WT/AP).....230
Enough Bullying (WP).....230
S. Korean Strongly Backed To Lead U.N. (WP).....231
Council Backs South Korean For U.N. Secretary General (NYT).....232
South Korea's Ban Wins Support From Major Powers To Head U.N. (WSJ).....233
South Korean Set To Succeed Annan At UN (FT).....234
Ban Ki-Moon Cements Hold On U.N. Post (AP).....235
Korean Wins A Final Poll For U.N. Chief (WT).....235
S. Korean Poised To Succeed Annan (LAT).....236
The Quiet Diplomat Who May Lead The UN (CSM).....237
'If The U.N. Cannot Be Trusted With Money . . .' (WSJ).....239
U.S. General Says Chávez Worries Region (NYT).....240
Early Results Of Bosnia Vote Reinforce Ethnic Split (NYT)..241
Party's Scandals Catch Up To Brazil's President (WSJ).....242
A Message For Lula (LAT).....243
Riots Spread As Incumbent Widens Lead In Zambia Vote (NYT).....244
Japan's Abe Seeks Talks With China, South Korea (WP).....244
Snail Mail As Economy Zooms, India's Postmen Struggle To Adapt (WSJ).....245
Optimism And Africa (NYT).....248

TERRORISM NEWS:

Tenet Recalled Warning Rice (WP)

DOJ_NMG_0073307

By Dan Eggen And Robin Wright

The Washington Post, October 3, 2006

Former CIA director George Tenet told the 9/11 Commission that he had warned of an imminent threat from al-Qaeda in a July 2001 meeting with Condoleezza Rice, adding that he believed Rice took the warning seriously, according to a transcript of the interview and the recollection of a commissioner who was there.

Tenet's statements to the commission in January 2004 confirm the outlines of an event in a new book by Washington Post Assistant Managing Editor Bob Woodward that has been disputed by some Bush administration officials. But the testimony also is at odds with Woodward's depiction of Tenet and former CIA counterterrorism chief J. Cofer Black as being frustrated that "they were not getting through to Rice" after the July 10, 2001, meeting.

Rice angrily rejected those assertions yesterday, saying that it was "incomprehensible" that she would have ignored such explicit intelligence from senior CIA officials and that she received no warning at the meeting of an attack within the United States.

Rice acknowledged that the White House was receiving a "steady stream of quite alarmist reports of potential attacks" during that period, but said the targets were assumed to be in the Middle East, including Saudi Arabia, Yemen, Israel and Jordan.

"What I am quite certain of, however, is that I would remember if I was told -- as this account apparently says -- that there was about to be an attack in the United States," Rice said. "The idea that I would somehow have ignored that I find incomprehensible."

The meeting has become the focus of a fierce and often confusing round of finger-pointing involving Rice, the White House and the 9/11 Commission, all of whom dispatched staffers to the National Archives and other locations yesterday in attempts to sort out what had occurred.

Members of the commission -- an independent, bipartisan panel created by Congress to investigate the Sept. 11, 2001, terror attacks -- have said for days that they were not told about the July 10 meeting and were angry at being left out. As recently as yesterday afternoon, both commission chairman Thomas H. Kean and vice chairman Lee Hamilton said they believed the panel had not been told about the July 10 meeting.

But it turns out that the panel was, in fact, told about the meeting, according to the interview transcript and Democratic commission member Richard Ben-Veniste, who sat in on the interview with Tenet. The meeting was not identified by the July 10 date in the commission's best-selling report.

Rice added to the confusion yesterday by strongly suggesting that the meeting may never have occurred at all -- even though administration officials had conceded for several days that it had. A State Department spokesman said later that while the meeting definitely happened, Rice and Tenet disputed Woodward's characterization of her response.

"The briefing was a summary of the threat reporting from the previous weeks," State Department spokesman Sean McCormack told reporters traveling with Rice in Jiddah, Saudi Arabia. "There was nothing new."

Despite this, McCormack said, Rice asked that Tenet provide the same briefing to Defense Secretary Donald H. Rumsfeld and then-U.S. Attorney General John D. Ashcroft. The two men received it by July 17, he said. McCormack was unable to explain why Rice felt the briefing should be repeated if it did not include new material.

Ashcroft said in an interview yesterday that he was never briefed by Tenet or Black about an imminent domestic threat.

"I didn't get called on by Black or Tenet if they were going around doing such briefings," Ashcroft said. "If in fact they were making visits to emphasize the severity of the domestic threat, I'm a little disappointed they didn't bring that information to my attention."

Neither Black nor Tenet has made any public comments about the assertions in Woodward's book. Woodward declined yesterday to comment in detail, saying only that he stood by his reporting.

Tenet gave testimony about the July 2001 meeting with Rice at his Langley headquarters office on Jan. 28, 2004, occasionally referring to charts and slides. Philip Zelikow, who at the time was the commission's executive director and now works for Rice, was present along with other commission staff members, according to Ben-Veniste and to a portion of the transcript, which was read to The Washington Post by an official with access to it.

At one point in the lengthy session, Tenet recalled a briefing he was given on July 10 by Black and his staff, according to the transcript. He said the information was so important that he quickly called for a car and telephoned Rice to arrange for a White House meeting to share what he had just learned, according to the transcript and Ben-Veniste.

According to the transcript, Tenet told Rice there were signs that there could be an al-Qaeda attack in weeks or perhaps months, that there would be multiple, simultaneous attacks causing major human casualties, and that the focus would be U.S. targets, facilities or interests. But the intelligence reporting focused almost entirely on the attacks occurring overseas, Tenet told the commission.

It was at this session that Tenet said "the system was blinking red," which became a chapter title in the commission report, according to the official who saw the transcript.

According to three people present at the session, including Ben-Veniste, Tenet believed that Rice responded seriously to what she had been told. "We particularly questioned him about whether he had the sense that Dr. Rice and the others on the White House side understood the gravity of what he was telling them," said Ben-Veniste, a former Watergate prosecutor. "He said that they believed that they did. . . . We asked him further whether Dr. Rice just shrugged this off, and he said he did not have such an impression."

Ben-Veniste's comments seem to contradict his own remarks over the weekend to the New York Times, in which he said that "the meeting was never mentioned to us." Ben-Veniste said yesterday that there was confusion between two different meetings and that the meeting described by Tenet is different in character from the one portrayed by Woodward.

Zelikow, who now works as one of Rice's closest aides as a State Department counselor, did not respond to a request for comment yesterday. He told the New York Times that none of the commission's witnesses had drawn attention to a July 10 meeting or had outlined the type of confrontation with Rice described by Woodward.

In comments to reporters, Rice also denied that she had endorsed ousting Rumsfeld at the end of Bush's first term, although she said she did tell President Bush that he might want to consider changing his entire foreign policy team.

"I did tell the president at one point that I thought maybe all of us should go, because we had fought two wars and had the largest terrorist attack in American history," Rice said. "When he asked me to be secretary of state, I said I think maybe you need new people. I don't know if that was somehow interpreted, but what I was actually talking about was me."

Wright reported from Shannon, Ireland, and Jiddah, Saudi Arabia. Staff writer Walter Pincus contributed to this report.

C.I.A. Chief Warned Rice On Al Qaeda (NYT)

By Philip Shenon And Mark Mazzetti

The New York Times, October 3, 2006

JIDDA, Saudi Arabia, Oct. 2 — A review of White House records has determined that George J. Tenet, then the director of central intelligence, did brief Condoleezza Rice and other top officials on July 10, 2001, about the looming threat from Al Qaeda, a State Department spokesman said Monday.

The account by the spokesman, Sean McCormack, came hours after Ms. Rice, the secretary of state, told reporters aboard her airplane that she did not recall the specific meeting on July 10, noting that she had met repeatedly with Mr. Tenet that summer about terrorist threats. Ms. Rice, the national security adviser at the time, said it was “incomprehensible” to suggest she had ignored dire terrorist threats two months before the Sept. 11 attacks.

Mr. McCormack also said records showed that the Sept. 11 commission had been informed about the meeting, a fact that former intelligence officials and members of the commission confirmed on Monday.

When details of the meeting emerged last week in a new book by Bob Woodward of The Washington Post, Bush administration officials questioned Mr. Woodward’s reporting.

Now, after several days, both current and former Bush administration officials have confirmed parts of Mr. Woodward’s account.

Officials now agree that on July 10, 2001, Mr. Tenet and his counterterrorism deputy, J. Cofer Black, were so alarmed about intelligence pointing to an impending attack by Al Qaeda that they demanded an emergency meeting at the White House with Ms. Rice and her National Security Council staff.

DOJ_NMG_0073309

According to two former intelligence officials, Mr. Tenet told those assembled at the White House about the growing body of intelligence the C.I.A. had collected suggesting an attack was in the works. But both current and former officials, including allies of Mr. Tenet, took issue with Mr. Woodward's account that he and his aides had left the meeting feeling that Ms. Rice had ignored them.

Earlier this week, some members of the Sept. 11 commission said they could not recall being told about a meeting like the one described by Mr. Woodward.

On Monday, officials said Mr. Tenet had told members of the commission about the July 10 meeting when they interviewed him in early 2004, but committee members said he never indicated he had left the White House with the impression that he had been ignored.

"Tenet never told us that he was brushed off," said Richard Ben-Veniste, a Democratic member of the commission. "We certainly would have followed that up."

Mr. McCormack said the records showed that far from ignoring Mr. Tenet's warnings, Ms. Rice acted on the intelligence and requested that Mr. Tenet make the same presentation to Defense Secretary Donald H. Rumsfeld and John Ashcroft, then the attorney general.

But Mr. Ashcroft said by telephone on Monday evening that he never received a briefing that summer from Mr. Tenet.

"Frankly, I'm disappointed that I didn't get that kind of briefing," he said. "I'm surprised he didn't think it was important enough to come by and tell me."

Government investigations have shown that Mr. Ashcroft was briefed by other C.I.A. officials in the weeks before the Sept. 11 attacks.

The dispute that has played out in recent days gives further evidence of an escalating battle between the White House and Mr. Tenet over who should take the blame for the failure to stop the Sept. 11 attacks and assertions by Bush administration officials that Saddam Hussein was stockpiling chemical and biological weapons and cultivating ties to Al Qaeda.

Mr. Tenet resigned as director of central intelligence in the summer of 2004 and was honored that December with a Presidential Medal of Freedom at a White House ceremony. Since leaving the C.I.A., Mr. Tenet has stayed out of the public eye, largely declining to defend his record even after several government investigations assailed the faulty intelligence that helped build the case for the Iraq war.

Mr. Tenet is now completing work on a memoir that is scheduled to be published early next year. It is unclear how much he will use the book to settle old scores, although recent books have portrayed him both as dubious about the need to invade Iraq and angry that the White House has made the C.I.A. the primary scapegoat for the war.

In his book "The One Percent Doctrine," the journalist and author Ron Suskind quotes Mr. Tenet's former deputy at the C.I.A., John McLaughlin, as saying Mr. Tenet "wishes he could give that damn medal back."

In his own book, Mr. Woodward wrote that over time Mr. Tenet developed a particular dislike for Ms. Rice, and that the former C.I.A. director was furious when she publicly blamed the agency for allowing President Bush to make the false claim in the 2003 State of the Union address that Mr. Hussein was pursuing nuclear materials in Niger.

"If the C.I.A., the director of central intelligence, had said, 'Take this out of the speech,' it would have been gone, without question," Ms. Rice told reporters in July 2003.

In fact, the C.I.A. had told the White House months before that the intelligence about Niger was dubious, and had managed to keep the claim out of an October 2002 speech that Mr. Bush gave in Cincinnati.

More recently, Mr. Tenet has told friends he was particularly angry when, appearing recently on Sunday talk shows, both Ms. Rice and Vice President Dick Cheney cited Mr. Tenet as the reason that Bush administration officials asserted that Mr. Hussein had stockpiles of banned weapons and ties to Al Qaeda.

Mr. Cheney recalled in an appearance on "Meet the Press" on Sept. 10: "George Tenet sat in the Oval Office and the president of the United States asked him directly, he said, 'George, how good is the case against Saddam on weapons of mass destruction?' The director of the C.I.A. said, 'It's a slam dunk, Mr. President, it's a slam dunk,' "

Rice Denies Book's Assertion She Brushed Off CIA Terror Warning (LAT)

By Paul Richter

The Los Angeles Times, October 3, 2006

State Department officials acknowledged late Monday that Secretary of State Condoleezza Rice was at a 2001 meeting where she was reportedly warned of the need to act on an impending terrorist threat to the United States.

They said she met with then-CIA Director George J. Tenet on or around July 10. A new book by Bob Woodward says she brushed off Tenet's warning at that session.

Earlier on Monday, Rice rejected the book's suggestion as "incomprehensible."

Speaking to reporters on her plane en route to the Middle East, Rice insisted she did not recall. Tenet and his counterterrorism chief seeking a special meeting with her to try to mobilize more vigorous anti-terror action, as Woodward writes in "State of Denial."

"The idea that I would have ignored that, I find incomprehensible," Rice told reporters late Sunday during the flight. "I am quite certain that it was not a meeting in which I was told that there was an impending attack, and refused to respond."

The State Department said Monday that a meeting around the time described by Woodward had in fact taken place, based on government records, but that no new information was given to Rice, who then was President Bush's national security advisor.

In his book, Woodward writes that Tenet and J. Cofer Black, then director of the CIA's counterterrorism center, decided on July 10, 2001, that they had to request a dramatic, "out-of-cycle" meeting with Rice to describe their anxiety over the chance of an attack against American interests, possibly within the United States.

Rice agreed to see them and acknowledged their warnings, but Tenet and Black felt she did not appreciate the gravity of the situation, which Woodward writes was the "starkest warning" yet given to the White House. "She was polite, but they felt the brush-off," Woodward writes.

Rice's reaction to the description of the meeting underscores administration attempts to counter claims, in Woodward's book and elsewhere, that question whether officials heeded internal warnings and reports on terrorism and the Iraq war.

Rice did not deny that any meeting took place, noting she met frequently with Tenet and other intelligence officials and counterterrorism experts during 2001, when she said the administration was developing a comprehensive strategy. But she said the idea of an emergency meeting designed to "shock" her did not make sense.

On Monday, two State Department officials delving into records at Rice's request found that a meeting took place "on or around July 10," as the book reports, said Curtis Cooper, a State Department spokesman. But the officials said that the meeting did not reveal any new threats, and that records about the meeting had been turned over to the national commission that investigated the Sept. 11 attacks, Cooper said. Woodward's book indicates that the Sept. 11 commission had access to the records of the meeting, but did not probe deeply into it.

Cooper said Tenet was asked by Sept. 11 commission members about the meeting. Cooper could not say whether the discussion took place in the commission's public sessions or in private. In public, no commissioner referred to a meeting on July 10. One commission member, Timothy J. Roemer, a former Democratic House member from Indiana, said over the weekend that commissioners had not been told about the meeting.

One of the officials probing meeting records at Rice's request was Philip D. Zelikow, the former Sept. 11 commission executive director whom Rice appointed State Department counselor last year.

Zelikow and State Department legal advisor John Bellinger reported that the information Tenet presented consisted of "threat reporting" from several weeks leading up to the meeting. "The information presented at this meeting was not new," Cooper said.

Rice told reporters that she was meeting regularly during the period with Tenet and Black, and they were getting a "steady stream" of intelligence reports warning of potential strikes. "I was talking to George about them all the time," she said.

Rice also denied that she had complained to Bush that Defense Secretary Donald H. Rumsfeld was not returning her calls, as Woodward writes.

"Secretary Rumsfeld has never refused to return my phone calls — this is ludicrous," she said.

She denied that she tried to convince Bush to dump Rumsfeld, as the book says, though she said at one point she told Bush "that maybe all of us should go" after the demands of two wars, the aftermath of Sept. 11 and other world developments.

DOJ_NMG_0073311

Rice said her five-day Mideast trip is aimed at trying to persuade moderate Arab states to do more to help democratic leaders in the region. She said she may meet Friday in London with ministers of the other world powers trying to convince Iran to suspend its uranium program.

Rice Says She Did Not Ignore Urgent Pre-Sept. 11 Warning (USAT)

By Barbara Slavin

USA Today, October 3, 2006

JEDDAH, Saudi Arabia — Secretary of State Condoleezza Rice said Monday that it was "incomprehensible" that she would have ignored an urgent warning from the CIA director two months before Sept. 11, 2001, that al-Qaeda was planning to attack the United States, as a new book reports.

"I don't remember a so-called emergency meeting," Rice said in addressing several claims in State of Denial by Bob Woodward of The Washington Post. Woodward based his account on interviews with unnamed officials.

Rice discussed the book with reporters who accompanied her on a trip to the Middle East.

Rice dined Monday with Saudi King Abdullah at the start of a week-long tour aimed at bolstering moderate forces in the region in the wake of a 34-day war between Israel and Hezbollah in Lebanon. The radical Shiite Muslim militia, which has been branded a terrorist group by the United States, gained stature in the Middle East for holding its ground against Israel.

Rice flies today to Cairo and then heads to Israel and the Palestinian territories.

In his book, Woodward writes that George Tenet, then director of the CIA, and a senior aide, Cofer Black, held an unscheduled meeting with Rice on July 10, 2001. According to Woodward, Tenet sought the meeting because he wanted to press the new Bush administration to take action immediately against al-Qaeda leader Osama bin Laden to disrupt a possible attack in the USA.

Rice said she recalled "a steady stream of quite alarmist reports of potential attacks" during that period, but they involved targets abroad in Saudi Arabia, Yemen, Israel and possibly Jordan. "There was nothing that related to an attack in the United States," she said.

In her testimony to the 9/11 Commission, which investigated events leading up to the attacks, Rice said it was not until the following month that she recalled hearing about possible terrorist plots in the U.S. homeland. An Aug. 6, 2001, presidential daily report by the CIA was entitled "Bin Ladin Determined To Strike in US." Rice did not tell the commission about any earlier warning.

Rice also challenged a claim in Woodward's book that she had difficulty getting her phone calls returned by Defense Secretary Donald Rumsfeld and that she advised President Bush to fire Rumsfeld at the end of Bush's first term because of Rumsfeld's policy mistakes in managing the war in Iraq.

"Secretary Rumsfeld has never refused to return my phone calls. This is ludicrous," Rice said.

As for Woodward's report that she wanted Rumsfeld to leave the administration, Rice said, "I did tell the president at one point that maybe all of us should go" so Bush could appoint a fresh national security team for his second term.

In the end, Bush asked only one top national security adviser to leave: Rice's predecessor as secretary of State, Colin Powell, according to a second new book. Soldier, a biography of Powell by Washington Post reporter Karen DeYoung, portrays the former Cabinet member as receiving shabby treatment from others in the Bush administration.

The book alleges Vice President Cheney's aides added unverified intelligence about Iraqi development of weapons of mass destruction to a presentation Powell made before the United Nations Security Council in the lead-up to the U.S. invasion of Iraq in 2003. It said Powell tried to verify the information but much of what he said before the Security Council has turned out to be inaccurate. Last year, Powell called his speech a "blot" on his record of public service.

The book also says Powell was forced out of the administration even though he was willing to stay in a second term.

Asked about the portrait of Powell, Rice said: "I know the president had an open door for Colin Powell. .... He was treated not only with respect but with admiration."

Rice: No Memory Of CIA Warning Of Attack (AP-Y)

By Anne Gearan, Ap Diplomatic Writer

AP, October 3, 2006

DOJ_NMG_0073312

Secretary of State Condoleezza Rice said she cannot recall then-CIA chief George Tenet warning her of an impending al-Qaida attack in the United States, as a new book claims he did two months before the attacks on Sept. 11, 2001.

"What I am quite certain of is that I would remember if I was told, as this account apparently says, that there was about to be an attack in the United States, and the idea that I would somehow have ignored that I find incomprehensible," Rice said.

Rice was President Bush's national security adviser in 2001, when Bob Woodward's book "State of Denial" outlines a July 10 meeting among Rice, Tenet and the CIA's top counterterror officer.

"I don't know that this meeting took place, but what I really don't know, what I'm quite certain of, is that it was not a meeting in which I was told there was an impending attack and I refused to respond," Rice said.

Speaking to reporters en route to Saudi Arabia and other stops in the Middle East, Rice said she met with Tenet daily at that point, and has no memory of the wake-up call from Tenet described in the book.

"It kind of doesn't ring true that you have to shock me into something I was very involved in," Rice said.

There was near constant discussion of possible attacks overseas, and high alarm, Rice said.

Meanwhile, former Attorney General John Ashcroft said Monday that he should have been notified of any such report dealing with a pending attack on the United States. "It just occurred to me how disappointing it was that they didn't come to me with this type of information," Ashcroft said in an interview with The Associated Press.

"The FBI is responsible for domestic terrorism," Ashcroft said. He said both Tenet and Cofer Black of the CIA should have been aware that he had pressed for a more aggressive policy in going after bin Laden and his followers in the United States and should have briefed him as well. Rice knew of this advocacy, he suggested.

"There was no covert action to kill him and we needed one," Ashcroft said.

The meeting between Tenet, Rice and Black was not mentioned in the reports from several investigations of the Sept. 11 attacks, but Woodward wrote that it stood out in the minds of Tenet and Black as the "starkest warning they had given the White House" on al-Qaida leader Osama bin Laden and his network.

Tenet asked for the meeting after receiving a disturbing briefing from Black, according to the book.

But though Tenet and Black warned Rice in the starkest terms of the prospects for attack, she brushed them off, Woodward reiterated Monday. He told NBC's "Today" show that Black told him the two men were so emphatic, it amounted to "holding a gun to her head" and doing everything except pulling the trigger.

Black reportedly laid out secret intercepts and other data "showing the increasing likelihood that al-Qaida would soon attack the United States." Tenet was so worried that he called Rice from his car and asked to see her right away, the book said.

"Tenet and Black felt they were not getting through to Rice," Woodward wrote of the session. "She was polite, but they felt the brush-off."

Rice referred to the session as "the supposed meeting" and noted that it is not part of the independent Sept. 11 Commission's report.

"I remember that George was very worried and he expressed that," Rice told reporters. "We were all very worried because the threat reporting was quite intense. The problem was that it was also quite nebulous."

Rice, who was promoted to secretary of state in Bush's second term, also said she never argued that Secretary of Defense Donald Rumsfeld should be fired. The book's suggestion that Rumsfeld would not take her calls is "ludicrous," Rice said.

Rumsfeld and Rice are not close, and he is often considered her rival in administration decision making. Woodward wrote that then-White House Chief of Staff Andrew Card twice tried to get Bush to sack Rumsfeld and replace him with Bush family counselor James A. Baker III, and that both then-Secretary of State Colin Powell and Rice backed the plan.

Woodward interviewed Rice for his new book.

Rice's latest Middle East trip is focused on strengthening support for Palestinian President Mahmoud Abbas and other moderate Arab leaders after a series of setbacks for democratic and moderate forces in the region.

Her trip includes visits to allies Saudi Arabia and Egypt and a meeting of other friendly nations that ring the Persian Gulf, before visits to Israel and the West Bank.

DOJ_NMG_0073313

Rice is looking for new ways to improve Abbas' standing in his standoff with Hamas radicals trounced Abbas' secular Fatah Party in Palestinian elections in January. Abbas was elected separately and retains his position, but he has been hamstrung by the divided government and a cutoff of Western aid.

The Bush administration and Israel are increasingly convinced Hamas will crumble, and look to Abbas to capitalize. Rice may ask other countries to do more to bolster Abbas' security forces, and she hopes to breathe life into stalled agreements and talks that would help Palestinians move more freely across their borders with Israel.

Iran's nuclear ambitions will also be part of Rice's discussions, as an unofficial deadline passes this week for Iran to heed a U.N. Security Council demand to shelve disputed nuclear activities.

Rice said Sunday she may close her trip Friday with a meeting of world powers in Europe to look at what to do next. The United States wants to press for U.N. Security Council sanctions, but it is not clear she has full support from other permanent members of the council.

___

On the Net:

State Department: http://www.state.gov

The Leaders We Have (WP)

By George F. Will

The Washington Post, October 3, 2006

While leading the hunt for weapons of mass destruction in Iraq in the summer of 2003, David Kay received a phone call from "Scooter" Libby, Dick Cheney's chief of staff, who wanted a particular place searched: "The vice president wants to know if you've looked at this area. We have indications -- and here are the geocoordinates -- that something's buried there." Kay and his experts located the area on the map. It was in the middle of Lebanon.

This story from Bob Woodward's "State of Denial" would be hilarious were it not about war. The vignette is dismaying because it seems symptomatic of a blinkering monomania that may have prevented obsessed persons from facing facts.

Some will regard "State of Denial" as Katrina between hard covers, a snapshot of dysfunctional government. But it is largely just a glimpse of government , disheartening as that fact may be to those who regard government as a glistening scalpel for administering social transformation.

Once, when President William Howard Taft was listening to an aide talk about "the machinery of government," Taft murmured, "The young man really thinks it's a machine." Actually, government is people, and not a random slice of the population. Those at government's pinnacle generally are strong-willed, ambitious, competitive, opinionated and have agendas about which they care deeply. That is why they are there. And why almost any administration, carefully scrutinized, looks much like a teaspoon of pond water viewed under a microscope -- a teeming, disorderly maelstrom of sometimes rival life forms. That is especially true of an administration staffed with such canny Washington survivors as Cheney, Donald Rumsfeld and Colin Powell. A government of rookies or shrinking violets would be more harmonious. So, how much of a virtue is harmony?

"State of Denial" will take a toll on government collegiality and the candor of its deliberations. It is based on astonishing indiscretions -- current and past officials making private memos and conversations public for motives that cannot be pure.

The book is hardly a revelation about supposed hidden chaos in Washington that produced the obvious chaos in Iraq. It does demonstrate that President Bush and others were shockingly slow to recognize Iraq's complexities and downward spiral. But we already knew that.

The book does not demonstrate that the president is in a state of denial. His almost exclusive and increasingly grating reliance on the rhetoric of unwavering resolve may be mistaken. It certainly has undermined his reputation as a realist. But he believes a president must be "the calcium in the backbone" of the nation, so the resolute face that he thinks he must show the nation does not preclude private anguish.

The book's central figure, however, is not Bush, whose lack of inquisitiveness is a defect, but Rumsfeld, whose abrasive inquisitiveness is supposedly a defect. The prologue begins with Rumsfeld's selection as defense secretary. The 45th and final chapter contains much about Bush but revolves around an interview with Rumsfeld.

DOJ_NMG_0073314

The book actually includes one heartening story that should enhance Rumsfeld's reputation. On Veterans Day 2005, the president traveled to a Pennsylvania Army depot to deliver a speech announcing the new military policy for Iraq, the policy of "clear, hold and build." Woodward says Rumsfeld, having read the speech, called Andy Card, the White House chief of staff, a half-hour before Bush was to deliver it, and said, "Take that out." Card replied that the three words were the centerpiece of the speech, not to mention the war strategy. Rumsfeld replied, "Clear, we're doing. It's up to the Iraqis to hold. And the State Department's got to work with somebody on the build."

At last, a division of labor that uses the U.S. military only for properly military purposes and assigns responsibilities in a way that will force Iraq's government to grow up. In the name of counterinsurgency, there has been too much of what today's military argot calls "full-spectrum operations" -- operations that go beyond killing insurgents to building schools, connecting sewers and other civil projects that keep the training wheels on the Iraqi government's bicycle and keep the United States chasing the chimera of "nation-building."

"Where's the leader?" Bush, according to Woodward, has exclaimed in dismay about the Iraqi government's dithering. "Where's George Washington? Where's Thomas Jefferson? Where's John Adams, for crying out loud?" For a president to ask that question about Iraq, that tribal stew, is enough to cause one to ask it about the United States.

Can Bush Save Bush? (WP)

By Richard Cohen

The Washington Post, October 3, 2006

Not too long after Franklin D. Roosevelt died, Republicans insisted on what was to become the 22nd Amendment to the Constitution. It was meant to ensure that never again would a president serve more than two terms. Now is the time for yet another amendment. This one would ensure that no child of a president could become president. This would avert another George W. Bush.

The reasons for this amendment can be amply found in Bob Woodward's new book, "State of Denial." If ever a title was apt, this is the one. As if to prove that Woodward had it right, Bush reacted to the book's revelations about Don Rumsfeld -- intransigent, incompetent and intellectually intolerant -- by reaffirming his confidence in him. To Bush, and indeed to the rest of us as well, Rumsfeld has come to personify the conduct of the Iraq war. His leaving, especially his firing, would be an admission of the obvious: failure.

My proposed amendment comes to mind because from time to time Woodward would quote someone on why Bush ran for president in the first place and what determines his executive style: his father. He wanted to best his father but also even the score for him. This score was a twofold thing. George W. Bush wanted, in effect, to win the second term that George H.W. Bush had lost (to Bill Clinton), and he also wanted to finish the job his father had started with Saddam Hussein. If there is a better explanation for why Bush -- not necessarily the neocons around him -- so fervently wanted war, I cannot come up with it.

This descent into the fog of Freudian politics is, I know, just the sort of thing Washington eschews. Such musings lack position papers or paper trails -- paper of any kind, actually -- and rely instead on elastic language sometimes known as psychobabble. Yet those of us who are both fathers and sons know the truth of these matters. There is no more complicated relationship on the face of the earth. It is fraught with competition, a kind of canine sniffing that is suffused with both an edgy rivalry and an immense love that does not quit even with the grave. If I say that George W. Bush was out to both vanquish and redeem his father, many a man will know what I mean.

But I don't have to say it. Brent Scowcroft, the elder Bush's close friend and his former national security adviser, says it for me. This is what Woodward writes about Scowcroft: "In his younger years, Scowcroft thought, George W. couldn't decide whether he was going to rebel against his father or try to beat him at his own game. Now, he had tried at the game, and it was a disaster."

It was not only Scowcroft, though, who thought -- or feared -- that Bush had approached the challenge of Saddam Hussein the wrong way. There are suggestions in the book that both of Bush's parents felt that way. Woodward quotes a conversation Barbara Bush had with former senator David Boren, an old family friend, in which she says that she and her husband are "worried" about Iraq -- with the former president "losing sleep over it." Boren asks why the father did not talk to the son.

"He doesn't think he should unless he's asked," Barbara Bush said.

DOJ_NMG_0073315

I go on about this matter because in Woodward's book, as with everything else I've read about the 43rd president, it's apparent that Bush had no reason to run for the office other than to satisfy some psychological compulsion -- and had no accomplishment to his name that did not stem from primogeniture. Especially in foreign policy, he was an ignoramus who smugly thought that his instincts trumped experience and knowledge. What's even more appalling is that over and over in Woodward's book, Bush sticks to his losing hand, refusing to challenge his own assumptions -- or, it seems, his steadfast belief that his is a divine mission.

The conventional script in Washington for ending the Iraq war is for Bush to approach key Democrats and seek bipartisan cover for a methodical American withdrawal. Maybe that will happen or maybe it will be Republicans such as James Baker, Bush senior's secretary of state, who will do the approaching. But given the nature of the problem, maybe it would be best if the father shed his reluctance and offered his son some sharp advice. After all, it is now clear that the finest service one president can provide another -- not to mention his country -- is to reassert a parental role. The kid's in way over his head.

Iranian Woman Indicted In Brooklyn In Terrorism Case (NYT)

By William K. Rashbaum

The New York Times, October 3, 2006

A frail 51-year-old Iranian woman was indicted last week in Brooklyn on a charge of supporting a terrorist group based in Iraq that seeks the violent overthrow of the Iranian government, federal authorities said yesterday.

The woman, Zeinab Taleb-Jedi, is free on a $500,000 bond and living in an East Side women's shelter. A law enforcement official said she did not pose a direct threat to the United States.

Prosecutors said Ms. Taleb-Jedi, who was arrested in late March when she flew to Kennedy Airport from Amman, Jordan, was a member of the leadership council of the Iranian resistance group People's Mujahedeen, which both the United States and the European Union describe as a terrorist organization.

She was indicted on Friday in Federal District Court in Brooklyn on a single count of providing material support to the group. The case against her was based on an investigation by the F.B.I. and federal prosecutors in California, but she will be tried in New York.

Ms. Taleb-Jedi, who became an American citizen in 1996, has been free on a personal recognizance bond signed by her son, a recent college graduate, since shortly after her arrest, according to court records. After that she lived for a short while with him on West 128th Street and then at the Lenox Hill Neighborhood House Park Avenue Women's Shelter, according to court papers.

Shelter officials said it housed older women with mental health disorders. The woman and her son could not be located for comment last night. At the time of her arraignment, on April 1, her court-appointed lawyer, Justine Harris, said Ms. Taleb-Jedi, who then weighed just 95 pounds, came to the United States to seek medical care for severe digestive problems.

The People's Mujahedeen was first designated as a foreign terrorist organization in 1997, according to an affidavit filed in the case by F.B.I. Special Agent Mark Broihier, who said he had been investigating the group for five years.

Two informers cited in the affidavit said Ms. Taleb-Jedi was a member of the group's leadership council. One said the council was "responsible for making leadership decisions for the organizations, including approving specific acts of terrorism" against Iran, the affidavit said.

When American forces invaded Iraq in April 2003, they disarmed the military arm of the group and ordered its members to assemble at a base about 40 miles north of Baghdad, where they turned over a range of heavy weapons, from tanks and artillery, along with lighter weapons, according to the affidavit.

F.B.I. agents went to the base and interviewed about 200 people associated with the group, including Ms. Taleb-Jedi, the affidavit said. They found firing ranges and bomb shelters and shrines to the group's "martyrs," along with bunkers that had been used to store a range of ordnance, including 420,000 pounds of plastic explosives.

In her interview at the Iraqi base, Ms. Taleb-Jedi said she had began her college education in Iran but came to the United States in 1978 to work on her master's degree in political science in Atlanta, according to the affidavit.

DOJ_NMG_0073316

She eventually moved to Queens, where she continued her activities for the group, and then to northern Virginia, according to the affidavit. In 1995 and 1996, she registered, under the Foreign Agents Registration Act, as a press officer for the People's Mujahedeen of Iran.

U.S. Says Woman In Shelter Terror Chief (AP)

By Tom Hays, ASSOCIATED PRESS WRITER

AP, October 3, 2006

NEW YORK -- An Iranian widow who became a naturalized U.S. citizen 10 years ago was a top official for a heavily armed, Iraq-based terrorist organization dedicated to the violent overthrow of Iran's government, the U.S. government alleges in court documents.

The documents, obtained from Brooklyn court files on Monday, say two confidential informants in Iraq identified Zeinab Taleb-Jedi, 51, as a leader of the Mujahedeen Khalq. The group was identified in court papers as Mujahedin-e Khalq.

One of the informants told the FBI that Taleb-Jedi was on a council "responsible for making leadership decisions for the organization, including approving specific acts of terrorism" against Iran, the papers said.

Taleb-Jedi was arrested in March after flying from Jordan to Kennedy International Airport. A judge agreed to release her on $500,000 (euro394,166) bond. The court papers said she has been living at a women's shelter in Manhattan.

Taleb-Jedi was among 200 Muhjahedeen Khalq members detained and questioned by the FBI in 2004 after U.S. military forces took over parts of Iraq once controlled by the group, the documents said. U.S. soldiers seized tanks, anti-aircraft weapons, rocket-propelled grenade launchers and more than 420,000 pounds of plastic explosives.

At the time, Taleb-Jedi allegedly told agents she "wholeheartedly supports the Mujahedin," the papers said.

Federal prosecutors in Los Angeles, who have been investigating the group, announced last week that a grand jury in Brooklyn had indicted Taleb-Jedi on charges of providing support to a terrorist organization. If convicted, she faces up to 15 years in prison.

The group, also known as the People's Mujahedeen Organization of Iran, and its affiliates were deemed foreign terrorist organizations by the U.S. State Department in 1997. The designations bar anyone in the United States from providing material support.

The defendant, who was born in Iran, came to the United States on a student visa in 1978 to pursue a master's degree in political science in Georgia, court papers said. She later moved to Queens before settling in Virginia, where she became a naturalized U.S. citizen.

In her FBI interview, Taleb-Jedi told agents her husband joined the Mujahedeen and went to Iraq in 1986. In 1999, after learning her husband was killed in a bombing, she "left her job, sold all her belongings and traveled" the group's Ashraf Base in Iraq, 40 miles (64 kilometers) north of Baghdad, documents said.

A call to her attorney on Monday was not immediately returned.

Arguing for her release at an arraignment, defense attorney Justine Harris said her client had returned to the United States to see her adult son and to seek medical treatment for a severe digestive ailment that had pushed her weight down to 95 pounds.

"This a middle-age woman with absolutely no record," the lawyer said.

The group was founded in Iran in the 1960s and moved to Iraq in the early 1980s to base its activities against Iran's government. It sided with Iraq in its 1980-88 war against Iran.

The State Department says the groups were funded by Saddam Hussein, supported the seizure of the U.S. Embassy in Tehran in 1979 and are responsible for the deaths of Americans in the 1970s.

Testimony Ends In Aref And Hossain Trial (CAPN9)

By By: Steve Ference

Capital News 9, October 3, 2006

It's been more than three weeks and soon both defendants Mohammed Hossain and Yassin Aref will find out if the jury believes them to be innocent or guilty of supporting terrorism through money laundering when they got caught up in a 2004 FBI-sting operation.

DOJ_NMG_0073317

Defense attorneys for Yassin Aref continued to try to dispel the prosecution's accusation that Aref knew what an FBI informant was talking about when he mentioned the word "missile." In order to show Aref, whose native language is Kurdish, knew what missile meant, they read an article from a pamphlet called "Rally for Jihad."

Prosecutors read an excerpt:

"How wonderful it is, oh Muslims, when you see the enemy shot down by your bullets and their body parts ripped by your missiles."

It's been years since news of an FBI sting surprised the Capital Region. And led to the arrest of two men for allegedly laundering money to support terrorism. Soon the case will be in the hands of the jury, now that both sides have rested. Our Steve Ference has more on the last day of testimony.

Defense attorneys argued just because the word missile was found in one of hundreds of books and papers owned by Aref means little.

But prosecutors again showed the jury a page written by Aref where he translated English words to better understand them. He wrote "rocket equals missile." Again defense attorneys argued it didn't mean much, because Aref had also written the word "wet" equaled the Arabic word for dry.

His attorneys also argued the codeword used by the FBI informant for missile - Chaudhry - wasn't clear. At one point, the informant referred to it by saying, "one of my family members is married in Dr. Chaudhry's, uh family, my niece is married to one of the family members."

So what did either defendant understand was going on then? A friend of Yassin Aref, May Saffar, said other witnesses brought in by the government mistranslated words, and she's afraid it might confuse the jury.

Saffar said "To bring in an Urdu translator to the jury and have her mistranslate an Arabic word - how does this help him?"

She says at first she denounced both defendants, but now isn't convinced they did anything wrong. But either way, she says at least Aref believes his future is up to God.

"It doesn't matter what the outcome is, fair or not" Saffar said. "I will just have to accept it."

We'll see closing arguments Tuesday, and then the jury will get instructions on how to handle the case that will then be in their hands.

Judges' juror instructions:

Another intriguing part of the case the judge instructed jurors not to concern themselves with why the FBI became interested in Aref as part of their sting operation. Defense attorneys have maintained that their client was unfairly targeted - and was simply a witness to a loan transaction. But the judge told jurors that the FBI had "certain valid suspicions." Prosecutors also presented evidence in court that Aref's name and address was found in a address books at three separate terror camps in Iraq in 2003.

Wait Ends For Father And Son Exiled By F.B.I. Terror Inquiry (NYT)

By Randal C. Archibold

The New York Times, October 2, 2006

LOS ANGELES, Oct. 1 — Two American citizens of Pakistani descent returned to the United States on Sunday, five months after they were denied permission to fly home to California unless they submitted to an interrogation by F.B.I. terrorism investigators.

The men, Muhammad Ismail, 45, and his son, Jaber, 19, of the Northern California farming town of Lodi, returned from Pakistan on a flight that landed at Kennedy Airport in New York around 3:30 p.m. Eastern time. They were scheduled to arrive in California on Sunday night or early Monday on a connecting flight, their lawyer said Sunday.

The Ismails are an uncle and cousin of Hamid Hayat, a Lodi man who was convicted in April in federal court of providing material support to terrorists. Mr. Hayat told investigators he had attended a terrorism training camp during a long stay in Pakistan and intended to carry out unspecified attacks in the United States. Mr. Hayat's father, Umer, was convicted on a lesser charge of lying to investigators about the amount of cash he carried to Pakistan on a 2003 trip, but a jury deadlocked on terrorism charges.

DOJ_NMG_0073318

The Ismails were not charged in the case. They attributed their predicament to being related to the Hayats, the only people to have been charged in what federal prosecutors have described as an investigation into possible terrorism links in Lodi.

Julia Harumi Mass of the American Civil Liberties Union of Northern California, who is representing the Ismails, said the pair had no terrorism connections. In a complaint in August to the Department of Homeland Security, she urged the authorities to explain any accusations against them and why they had been denied permission to fly home.

Legal experts said the matter raised questions about balancing terrorism investigations against American citizens' right to travel freely without having been charged with a crime or detained as a suspect.

On Sept. 6, nearly a month after Ms. Mass's complaint, the Homeland Security Department notified her in a letter and telephone call that unspecified records had been modified "to address any delay or denial boarding" the pair had encountered. Ms. Mass said she took that to mean they were cleared to fly, and the Ismails arranged financing and bought tickets home.

"I never imagined that the country I was born in would stop me from coming home for five months and separate me from my family, especially when I was not charged with a crime," Jaber Ismail said in a statement released through the A.C.L.U.

Hamid Hayat had told investigators he believed that Jaber, who was born in Lodi, attended a terrorism camp, but he lacked details. Mr. Hayat's lawyers attacked the investigators' questioning of Mr. Hayat as vague and coerced. Muhammad Ismail, a naturalized citizen who was born in Pakistan, said in the statement that they had traveled to Pakistan so Jaber Ismail could pursue religious study there.

On April 21, as juries were weighing the Hayats' cases, the Ismails were not permitted to board a connecting flight to San Francisco from Hong Kong and returned to Pakistan, where Jaber Ismail was questioned by F.B.I. agents at the American embassy in Islamabad. The agents, Ms. Mass said, requested further interviews with him and his father and a polygraph, which the Ismails refused.

The United States attorney's office in Sacramento, which prosecuted the Hayats, has declined to comment on the investigation other than to acknowledge that agents wished to speak with the Ismails. A Homeland Security spokesman said he had no information about the case.

Terror Supporter's Kin Return To U.S. (AP)

AP, October 3, 2006

SAN FRANCISCO - Two American citizens related to a California man who was convicted of supporting terrorists flew home from Pakistan, five months after they were barred from returning to the United States for refusing an FBI interrogation, their attorney said.

Muhammad Ismail, 45, and his son, Jaber, 19, arrived at Kennedy Airport on Sunday afternoon, according to Julia Harumi Mass, an attorney with the American Civil Liberties Union of Northern California. They were scheduled to take a connecting flight to San Francisco yesterday, she said.

The Ismails are an uncle and cousin of Hamid Hayat, 23, of Lodi, who was convicted in April of one count of providing material support to terrorists and three counts of lying about it to FBI agents.

His father, Umer Hayat, was convicted of lying to investigators about the amount of cash he carried to Pakistan on a 2003 trip, but a jury deadlocked on terrorism charges.

In April, the Ismails were barred from boarding a connecting flight to San Francisco from Hong Kong and returned to Pakistan.

There, Jaber Ismail was questioned by FBI agents, but the two refused further interviews and a polygraph.

After complaining to the federal government, Mass received a letter last month from the Department of Homeland Security suggesting that the two were cleared to fly.

"I never imagined that the country I was born in would stop me from coming home for five months and separate me from my family, especially when I was not even charged with a crime," Jaber Ismail said. "I went to Pakistan for religious studies, but I knew that I always wanted to return home to California."

Lawyers For Detainees Challenge Bush Plan (WP/AP)

By Matt Apuzzo, Associated Press

The Washington Post, October 3, 2006

Attorneys for 25 men being held in Afghanistan have launched the first legal challenge of President Bush's plan for prosecuting and interrogating terrorism suspects.

Documents filed yesterday in federal district court here demand that the men be released or be charged and allowed to meet with attorneys. Such a filing, known as a habeas corpus petition, is prohibited under the legislation approved by Congress last week.

That bill says the military may detain enemy combatants indefinitely and, if officials choose to bring charges, the cases will be heard before a military commission, not a civilian judge.

Bush has not signed the bill but expects to do so soon. Supporters say it is a necessary tool in the war on terrorism.

Yesterday's filing initiates what is likely to be a drawn-out legal fight similar to the one over detainees at a U.S. military prison in Guantanamo Bay, Cuba. Detainees there have dozens of petitions pending.

In civilian courts, the government is required to tell people why they are being held and allow them access to attorneys. People accused of crimes are then afforded speedy trials before juries of their peers.

"With the move that Congress made, the capitulation it made to the president, those rights are in danger of being curtailed," said Vincent Warren, executive director for the Center for Constitutional Rights, which filed the petition.

The new law protects detainees from blatant abuses such as torture but does not require that they be granted legal counsel. It also allows prosecutors to use evidence, such as hearsay, that wouldn't be allowed in civilian courts.

Though the petition was filed before the bill was signed, the law was written retroactively, so a judge would have to strike down at least some of the law in order for the detainees represented by the center to prevail.

The case was assigned to U.S. District Judge Richard J. Leon, who, in a Guantanamo Bay case last year, ruled that Congress had authorized the president to order the detention of "enemy combatants" for the duration of the war on terror. Leon did not set a hearing date for the new case.

The detainees named in the case are being held at Bagram air base north of Kabul, according to court papers.

Accused Tamil Tiger Supporter On Bail (TORSTAR)

By San Grewal, STAFF REPORTER

Toronto Star, October 3, 2006

A 29-year-old Mississauga man facing extradition to the United States on charges that he provided support to a Tamil terrorist group was released on $680,000 bail yesterday in a Brampton courtroom.

Ramanan Mylvaganam will be reunited with his mother and five siblings after spending more than a month in custody, but under the terms of his release will not be allowed to live with them.

Mylvaganam was arrested Aug. 22 after a joint RCMP-FBI investigation.

The fourth-year computer-engineering student at the University of Waterloo is one of 11 men accused of conspiring to help the Tamil Tigers, an organization listed as a terrorist group in both Canada and the U.S. All 11 were arrested since late August, some in Canada and others south of the border.

U.S. authorities are holding three Canadians in custody.

Judge John Belleghem read out the conditions of Mylvaganam's release, which stipulate that he must live with one of the named sureties, must be in the presence of one of them or his mother at all times, and may not communicate with the co-accused.

In addition, he will be required to surrender his passport and report in every Monday. He is banned from using the Internet, a cellphone or any other electronic communication device.

A publication ban on the court proceedings is in effect.

About a dozen relatives in the courtroom broke into smiles and congratulated one another when the decision came down.

Mylvaganam's lawyer, Jeffry House, said the decision, which came after the Crown recommended his client's release, was the right one.

DOJ_NMG_0073320

"There's certainly nothing linking my client to the Tamil Tigers," said House, who pointed out the family responsibility his client shoulders. "He brought his mother and five siblings from Sri Lanka, including his disabled sister. Essentially, he's the head of the family; he's the main breadwinner."

Mylvaganam had been working for Microsoft in Seattle in a co-op program before returning to Ontario in May.

Merger With Al Qaeda Deepens Threat From Algerian Radicals (CSM)

By Aron Lund, Contributor To The Christian Science Monitor

The Christian Science Monitor, October 3, 2006

Italian police said Monday they broke up a cell with ties to Algeria's Salafist Group for Preaching and Combat.

ALGIERS, ALGERIA

It was a quiet Ramadan evening, the sunset casting a red glow on the white colonial facades along the city's seafront. With the call of the muezzin, the Muslim prayer crier, Algerians had returned home to break the fast with friends and family, leaving the city nearly deserted.

During this holy month of Ramadan, the quiet has become reassuring. Many here are anxious; the Islamist radicals of the Salafist Group for Preaching and Combat, better known by the French acronym GSPC, have threatened attacks in the capital during Ramadan.

Already, officials blame the group for violence outside of Algiers. Overnight Friday, in separate incidents, two security officers were killed near a mosque and a bomb derailed a train, according to the Associated Press.

Authorities have amassed some 3,000 police around the city. While the radical Salafist group has been active for years, officials have new cause to take greater precaution to its threats.

In a videotape released by Al Qaeda Sept. 11, 2006, Osama bin Laden's second-in-command Ayman al-Zawahiri announced that "the Salafist Group for Preaching and Combat has joined the Al Qaeda organization ... may this be a bone in the throat of American and French crusaders, and their allies, and sow fear in the hearts of French traitors and sons of apostates."

Born out of Algeria's civil war, which began in 1992 when the army overturned an Islamist electoral victory, the GSPC has long expressed a willingness to join Mr. bin Laden. But not until now has Al Qaeda officially acknowledged a merger. Indeed, this alliance underlines the regional, rather than Algerian, focus of GSPC.

It also underscores concerns spelled out in the National Intelligence Estimate, parts of which were recently declassified, that said "several North African groups, unless countered, are likely to expand their reach and become more capable of multiple and/or mass-casualty attacks outside their traditional areas of operation."

For years, the GSPC has been moving units into the areas of the Sahara, away from the military pressure brought to bear in Algeria's north. A GSPC faction was involved in the desert kidnapping of 32 European tourists in 2003, and in 2005 the group overran a Mauritanian military base. GSPC activity has also been reported in Mali and Niger, and support cells have popped up in surrounding Muslim countries and Europe.

According to the French newspaper Le Figaro, the French Antiterrorist Coordination Unit (UCLAT) estimates that tens of indigenous Islamist cells have contacts with the GSPC, and, adding to their concern, Zawahiri exhorted the Algerians to strike at France in his Sept. 11 tape.

Monday, Italian police reported that they had broken up an Algerian cell that "financed and gave logistical support to Islamic terrorism responsible for massacres in Algeria," [a news agency] reported.

This internationalization, and the GSPC's attempts to rally militants in surrounding countries, has long worried the US. In 2002, the Pentagon announced the Pan-Sahel Initiative, assigning US military advisers to train and equip the militaries of Mauritania, Mali, Niger, and Chad. Also involved are Algeria and Morocco, though both governments deny reports of US forces stationed within their countries.

Some, however, take a less alarmist view of events. University of Virginia professor and Algeria analyst William Quandt, responding to questions via e-mail, describes it as "a pretty small, marginal group that is just struggling to survive," and says that "whatever links it may have to Al Qaeda must be quite tenuous." He estimates the group to have no more than a few hundred members.

DOJ_NMG_0073321

But even if real contacts are scarce, official Al Qaeda status could still bolster the GSPC's standing. By linking their struggle to the Iraqi jihad, the organization is able to tap into popular anger at American foreign policy, and the widespread support for Iraq's armed groups that this has generated.

HOMELAND RESPONSE:

Terrorism Insurance Still Holds Uncertainties (WSJ)

The Wall Street Journal, October 3, 2006

WASHINGTON -- Federal officials said the market for terrorism insurance has improved since the Sept. 11, 2001 attacks but further development is uncertain because of the unpredictability of potential damage from a terrorist strike and inadequate demand from policyholders.

An interagency working group headed by Treasury Secretary Henry Paulson, in a report released yesterday, found that the private market hasn't adapted to provide thorough property and casualty coverage for terrorism risks. But it makes no recommendation on whether Congress should make a temporary post-9/11 insurance program permanent.

The findings were consistent with a study by the Government Accountability Office, a congressional watchdog agency, that private insurance and reinsurance markets are reluctant to provide coverage for chemical, nuclear, biological and radiological weapon strikes. But for other forms of coverage, such as group life insurance, policies covering terrorism risks have generally remained available.

Congress has until the end of next year to study the issue before having to decide whether to extend the current backstop insurance program. The White House has opposed making the program permanent.

UK And US To Meet Over Passenger Data (FT)

By Doug Cameron

Financial Times, October 3, 2006

The UK transport secretary is due to meet with his US counterpart and the country's head of homeland security on Wednesday in a move that could help break impasses over the sharing of airline passenger information and efforts to liberalise the transatlantic aviation market.

Douglas Alexander will meet Michael Chertoff, the US homeland security chief, as well as Mary Peters, who was last week confirmed to succeed Norman Mineta as US transportation secretary.

Mr Alexander's visit comes amid continuing efforts by the US and the European Union to forge a new deal on the provision and sharing of sensitive passenger information.

The US authorities regard the extension of a 2004 pact, which expired on September 30, as a key weapon in its fight against terrorism. While officials on both sides point to "broad agreement" over a new deal, European negotiators have had to wrestle with potential legal challenges over privacy and civil liberties resulting from any expanded agreement.

Mr Alexander is also due to address the International Aviation Club in Washington during his brief US visit, providing the first public platform to express lingering unease among EU governments over progress in long-running efforts to reach a new transatlantic aviation agreement covering route access, as well as competition and security matters.

The UK remains a key player in the negotiations because of the pivotal role of access to London's congested Heathrow airport. Critics of the preliminary pact agreed last year maintain that access to the airport will not be improved by the proposed deal, which is being closely watched by others countries as a potential template for multilateral air transport negotiations.

Heathrow access for US airlines is still viewed as a key element in negotiations with the EU, which, together with the UK, is seeking, expanded investment opportunities in the US industry despite fierce opposition to such moves in the US Congress.

The UK role is heightened by the efforts of Sir Richard Branson, the British entrepreneur, to launch a domestic US carrier, Virgin America, which has held up by widespread domestic opposition.

Mr Alexander's planned meeting with Mr Chertoff reflects widespread industry concern about the need to reach a new deal on the sharing of passenger information.

DOJ_NMG_0073322

EU-based airlines have continued to operate flights normally and provide the data to the US authorities through a series of temporary deals and de facto amnesties from legal action by some member states while negotiations continue.

Mr Chertoff backed a proposed deal at the weekend, but EU negotiators returned from Washington to seek clearance for a new pact. Airline officials said the proposal mirrored the existing arrangements, but extended the length of time, which US authorities could keep the information beyond the eight years outlined in the expired deal.

Mr Chertoff has also made it clear in recent speeches that his department would look to share information with intelligence agencies in the US and elsewhere, despite concerns from civil liberties groups on both sides of the Atlantic.

Carriers have to provide the DHS with two sets of information, with passport data sent electronically to the department before take-off under the Advance Passenger Information programme. The current talks centre around the use of details contained in a Passenger Name Reference (PNR), which also include name, contact and payment details which the US authorities said was maintain are invaluable in tackling terrorism and organised crime.

Trial OK'd On One Jewell Claim Against AJC (AJC)

By Gayle White, The Atlanta Journal-constitution

The Atlanta Journal-Constitution, October 3, 2006

Olympic park security guard Richard Jewell's libel suit against The Atlanta Journal-Constitution can go to trial on one of 22 claims, a Fulton County judge ruled Monday.

State Court Judge John R. Mather dismissed most claims against the newspaper in a suit that has been pending since shortly after the 1996 Olympics.

The judge said the newspaper reported truthfully that Jewell was the focus of a federal investigation, that he fit the profile of a lone bomber and most other points surrounding the investigation.

But Mather said a jury would need to decide whether the newspaper was wrong to report that investigators believed Jewell placed a 9-1-1 call warning law enforcement that a bomb would go off in the park.

The judge acknowledged that Jewell may have initially been suspected of making the call. But, Mather wrote, it ultimately became clear that the call was made just three minutes after Jewell reported finding a suspicious knapsack in the park. The call came from a telephone booth several blocks away, possibly a five to eight minute walk.

Jewell's lawyer, Lin Wood, said Monday, "It is a significant victory for Richard Jewell to get his case before a jury."

Wood indicated he doesn't plan to appeal and is eager to proceed to a trial.

The newspaper's reports regarding the telephone call were "absolutely, undisputably false," Wood said.

The newspaper's lawyer, Tom Clyde, said the reporting accurately reflected the information that was available in the days following the bombing.

"At the time of our reporting, the timing sequence of when the bomb went off and when the phone call was made remained very much in question," he said.

As the timing became clearer, the newspaper "led the way" in reporting the evidence that exonerated Jewell, Clyde said.

John Mellott, publisher of The Atlanta Journal-Constitution, said he is pleased with the court's decision.

He said the newspaper will seek permission to appeal the ruling on the 9-11-call claim "and looks forward to the opportunity to show the accuracy of our reporting on that issue to the Court of Appeals."

Jewell was initially lauded as a hero after a bomb went off at the July 27, 1996, Olympic celebration. He called attention to the suspicious knapsack that held a bomb and helped evacuate the area. But he was later identified by the Journal-Constitution and other media as a suspect.

Jewell was later cleared. In April, 2005, Eric Rudolph pleaded guilty to setting the bomb and three others.

The Olympic Park bomb killed Alice Hawthorne of Albany and injured more than 100 other people.

In August, Gov. Sonny Perdue marked the 10th anniversary of the bombing by commending Jewell, who is now a deputy sheriff in Meriwether County, Ga.

Judge: Jewell Libel Suit Against Newspaper Can Proceed (CLE)

The Columbus Ledger-Enquirer, October 3, 2006

DOJ_NMG_0073323

ATLANTA - A judge ruled Monday that former Olympic security guard Richard Jewell's libel suit against The Atlanta Journal-Constitution can proceed, although he dismissed most of Jewell's claims that the newspaper had defamed him in its reports on the 1996 bombing at Centennial Olympic Park.

State Court Judge John R. Mather said a jury would decide whether the newspaper was wrong to report that investigators believed Jewell placed a 911 call warning that a bomb would go off in the park.

The July 27, 1996 bombing killed one person and wounded more than 100. Jewell was praised as a hero for finding the backpack that contained the bomb and helping to clear park visitors from the scene. But he soon fell under a cloud of suspicion after it was reported that the FBI was investigating him for possible involvement.

Jewell was later cleared, and some news organizations settled legal claims that he had been defamed. The Journal-Constitution defended its reporting of the investigation.

In April, 2005 Eric Rudolph pleaded guilty to setting the Olympic park bomb and three others, including a fatal explosion at a Birmingham, Ala., abortion clinic.

This year, Gov. Sonny Perdue marked the 10th anniversary of the bombing by commending Jewell, who is now a deputy sheriff in Meriwether County.

Mather ruled that the Journal-Constitution reported truthfully that Jewell was the focus of investigation, that investigators believed he fit the profile of a lone bomber and most other points surrounding the probe.

However, the judge acknowledged that although Jewell may have been suspected initially of making the 911 call, it became clear that the call was made three minutes after Jewell found the suspicious backpack - from a telephone booth several blocks away.

Jewell's lawyer, Lin Wood, said the newspaper's reports on the telephone call were "absolutely" false.

"It is a significant victory for Richard Jewell to get his case before a jury," Wood said.

Tom Clyde, the newspaper's lawyer, said that when the stories were published, "the timing sequence of when the bomb went off and when the phone call was made remained very much in question."

Clyde said the Journal-Constitution later "led the way" in reporting evidence that exonerated Jewell.

The newspaper's publisher, John Mellott, said it will seek permission to appeal the ruling on the 911-call claim "and looks forward to the opportunity to show the accuracy of our reporting on that issue to the Court of Appeals."

Nagin Wants Minorities In On Katrina Recovery (USAT/AP)

USA Today, October 3, 2006

NEW ORLEANS — New Orleans Mayor Ray Nagin signed an order Monday requiring that large businesses use as many local and minority-owned firms as possible when they seek millions of dollars in tax incentives and grants for Hurricane Katrina recovery.

Nagin's executive order requires applicants for the incentives to involve at least 50% local businesses and 35% women- or minority-controlled businesses whenever possible.

A similar requirement has been in place for government contracts, but the mayor's order expands it to businesses applying for assistance promised by federally funded recovery programs that are administered by the city and the state.

“We just want to make sure we don't go back to a city of haves and have-nots,” Nagin said. “This is imperative, not only for us but for our kids and grandkids.”

In the immediate aftermath of the August 2005 storm, many local firms complained that the main beneficiaries of large government contracts for emergency cleanup and recovery were out-of-state businesses and workers.

Nagin said his order should help ensure that local firms enjoy the benefits of the enormous federal rebuilding investment and help them secure small-business loans and other financing.

He said his order should not slow the rebuilding or send more businesses to adjacent parishes that don't have similar requirements. “This is such a big pie. We just want to make sure this pie expands,” Nagin said at a news conference.

DOJ_NMG_0073324

City workers will examine projects seeking incentives or tax breaks and determine reasonable goals for local and women- or minority-controlled companies, said Judith Williams, co-chair of the mayor's 100-day commission, established at the start of Nagin's second term.

"We're not looking to make it impossible for folks to do business here," she said.

In addition to the executive order on local and disadvantaged businesses, Nagin announced the signing of two other executive orders Monday.

One requires city agencies to develop a list of pending projects so small businesses are aware of potential contracts, and another requires businesses planning developments to account for historic and natural resource effects.

WAR NEWS:

Iraqi Premier Offers Plan To Stop Violence (WP/AP)

By Lee Keath

The Washington Post, October 3, 2006

BAGHDAD, Oct. 2 -- Iraq's prime minister announced a new plan Monday aimed at ending the deepening crisis between Shiite and Sunni parties in his government and uniting them behind the drive to stop sectarian killings that have bloodied the country for months.

The four-point plan, which emerged after talks between both sides, aims to resolve disputes by giving every party a voice in how security forces operate against violence on a neighborhood-by-neighborhood basis.

Local committees will be formed in each Baghdad district -- made up of representatives of every party, religious and tribal leaders and security officials -- to consult on security efforts. A Sunni representative, for example, could raise a complaint if he thinks police are not pursuing a Shiite militia after an attack. A central committee, also comprising all the parties, will coordinate with the armed forces.

"We have taken the decision to end sectarian hatred once and for all," Prime Minister Nouri al-Maliki said. "We have vowed before almighty God to stop the bloodshed."

In a possible boost to the effort to rein in the violence, a radical cleric who leads one of the most powerful Shiite militias, Moqtada al-Sadr, has ordered his followers to put aside their weapons temporarily, a Sadr spokesman said.

Maliki announced his plan hours after gunmen abducted 14 computer shop employees in a bold midday attack in downtown Baghdad, the second mass kidnapping in as many days.

The bodies of seven of the 24 captives seized Sunday at a frozen-meat factory were found dumped in southern Baghdad.

Sunni politicians blamed Shiite militias for both mass kidnappings and demanded the government take action.

Maliki is under increasing pressure to stop the violence, which has killed thousands since February. U.S. Ambassador Zalmay Khalilzad warned this week that Maliki must make progress within the next two months to avert a crisis.

But Maliki's administration has been plagued by growing mistrust between its Shiite and Sunni members, who each accuse the other of fueling the bloodshed.

When Maliki took office in May, he announced a 24-point reconciliation plan that laid out ways to tackle violence -- including an amnesty for militants who put down their weapons as well as security crackdowns. So far, the plan has done little to stem the daily killings.

Sunnis accuse the Shiite-led security forces of turning a blind eye to killing of Sunnis by Shiite militias -- some of which are linked to parties in the government. Sunnis have accused Maliki, a Shiite, of being hesitant to crack down on the militias.

Shiites, meanwhile, accused Sunni parties of links to terrorists after a bodyguard of a Sunni party leader, Adnan al-Dulaimi, was arrested by U.S. forces Friday and accused of plotting al-Qaeda bombings. Some Shiite politicians demanded a government reshuffle to push out Sunni parties.

The local committees aim to resolve these disputes.

Iraqi Leader Unveils New Security Plan Amid Rising Violence (NYT)

DOJ_NMG_0073325

By Richard A. Oppel Jr. And Qais Mizher

The New York Times, October 3, 2006

BAGHDAD, Oct. 2 — Faced with unrelenting sectarian killings and growing anger from Sunni Arab leaders, Prime Minister Nuri Kamal al-Maliki announced a new security plan on Monday that calls for committees of neighborhood leaders to try to defuse sectarian crises in their own areas and also for new supervision of the news media.

But the details of the plan were vague, and it was not clear how effective it would be in the face of recent unsuccessful attempts, through both political and military initiatives, to quell the sectarian violence and growing militia dominance that have pushed the country to the verge of civil war.

News of the plan came amid brazen sectarian abductions and killings in the past two days that have enraged Sunni legislators, some of whom accused Shiite lawmakers of focusing their efforts against Sunni militants while ignoring — and even empowering — Shiite militiamen.

In addition, the past few days have been one of the deadliest stretches for coalition forces in months, as the military reported the deaths of 10 more American and British servicemen since Saturday. At least 13 troops have been killed in the past three days.

The 10 newly reported deaths included five marines killed in Anbar Province, three of them in enemy attacks, one in a vehicle accident Sunday and one in an attack Saturday. Three soldiers were killed in Baghdad on Monday by small-arms fire, and another died Sunday after his vehicle was struck by a roadside bomb. A British soldier was also reportedly killed in Basra on Sunday.

In Baghdad, increasingly bold abductions have continued to underscore the degree to which many areas of the capital are not under the government's control.

Shortly after noon on Monday, men wearing police uniforms and riding in eight pickup trucks resembling those used by Interior Ministry forces blocked off a street near a technical college in eastern Baghdad and abducted 14 men working at an electronics store, according to the Iraqi police. The kidnappers' trucks did not have license plates, but otherwise the men appeared to possess all of the gear and dress of official security forces, the police said.

The abductions followed the kidnapping on Sunday of 26 food-processing workers in the western Baghdad neighborhood of Amel — and the discovery of the dead bodies of at least 10 of them shortly afterward, an Interior Ministry official said Monday.

The bodies were found in a southern Baghdad neighborhood, some with clear signs of torture, and most shot in the head, the official said. Four of the food workers escaped or were released, but the fate of the other 12 is unknown, he said.

The kidnappings prompted the country's most influential Sunni party, the Iraqi Islamic Party, to demand to know how victims from Amel could be transported so far without being discovered at Iraqi police and army checkpoints.

"We are sure that this work was done by terrorist militias working hard to kill Iraqis in the daylight, without anything to fear" from the Iraqi police or troops, the party said in a statement.

In Parliament, what normally would have been a perfunctory exercise to extend by a month the country's state of emergency led some Sunnis to denounce the government's inability to stop militias that have infiltrated Iraqi security forces. Continuing to give the security forces expanded powers makes it easier for militiamen to literally get away with murder, some charged.

"The state of emergency gives power to these bad guys in the security forces," said Salim Abdullah, a Sunni member of Parliament. "We give them power, but they are not accountable."

Some Shiite politicians, meanwhile, have accused Sunni lawmakers of having close ties to insurgents.

In the past week, Mr. Maliki's four-month-old government has faced growing criticism from some American military officials as well as Sunni lawmakers for its inability so far to rein in militiamen who operate with impunity, sometimes with the protection of Iraqi security forces.

In an effort to make some strides against militias, Mr. Maliki's security plan would create local committees of political leaders, tribal sheiks, clerics and members of the security forces that would monitor security in every Baghdad neighborhood.

"We are doing this to end sectarianism in Iraq forever," said Mr. Maliki, a Shiite, as he announced the plan on television flanked by Sunni lawmakers.

DOJ_NMG_0073326

The committees would have no control over the security forces and would instead function as arbitrators of local sectarian disputes, intelligence gatherers for security forces, and as a bridge between civilians and the police and army, according to lawmakers involved in drafting the plan.

"These commissions will never have any authority to lead or command security forces," said Jalaladin al-Sagheir, a Shiite member of Parliament. "It will just let the people know that they are a part of their district's protection."

The local committees will report to a "central commission for peace and security," which will work with Iraqi armed forces. There will also be a new commission for monitoring the news media, but no other details were available. The plan will be reviewed by lawmakers every month.

Iraq PM Announces Plan To Unite Parties (AP-Y)

By Lee Keath, Associated Press Writer

AP, October 3, 2006

Iraq's prime minister announced a new plan Monday aimed at ending the deepening crisis between Shiite and Sunni parties in his government and uniting them behind the drive to stop sectarian killings that have bloodied the country for months.

The four-point plan, which emerged after talks between both sides, aims to resolve disputes by giving every party a voice in how security forces operate against violence on a neighborhood by neighborhood level.

Local committees will be formed in each Baghdad district — made up of representatives of every party, religious and tribal leaders and security officials — to consult on security efforts. A Sunni representative, for example, could raise a complaint if he feels police are not pursuing a Shiite militia after an attack. A central committee, also made up of all the parties, will coordinate with the armed forces.

"We have taken the decision to end sectarian hatred once and for all," Prime Minister Nouri al-Maliki told reporters. "We have vowed before Almighty God to stop the bloodshed."

In a possible boost to the effort to rein in the violence, a radical cleric who heads one of the most powerful Shiite militias, Muqtada al-Sadr, has ordered his followers to put aside their weapons temporarily, a Sadr spokesman told The Associated Press.

Al-Maliki announced his plan hours after gunmen abducted 14 computer shop employees in a bold, midday attack in downtown Baghdad, the second mass kidnapping in as many days.

The bodies of seven of the 24 captives seized Sunday were found dumped in southern Baghdad. Sunni politicians blamed Shiite militias for both mass kidnappings and demanded the government take action.

Al-Maliki is under increasing pressure to stop the violence, which has killed thousands since February. U.S. Ambassador Zalmay Khalilzad warned this week that al-Maliki must make progress within the next two months to avert a crisis.

But al-Maliki's administration has been plagued by growing mistrust between its Shiite and Sunni members, who each accuse the other of fueling the bloodshed.

Al-Maliki announced a 24-point reconciliation plan when he took office in May, which laid down ways to tackle violence — including an amnesty for militants who put down their weapons as well as security crackdowns. So far, the plan has done little to stem the daily killings.

Sunnis accuse the Shiite-led security forces of turning a blind eye to killing of Sunnis by Shiite militias — some of which are linked to parties in the government. Sunnis have accused al-Maliki, a Shiite, of being hesitant to crack down on the militias.

Shiites, meanwhile, accused Sunni parties of links to terrorists after a bodyguard of a Sunni party leader, Adnan al-Dulaimi, was arrested by U.S. forces on Friday and accused of plotting al-Qaida bombings. Some Shiite politicians demanded a government reshuffle to push out Sunni parties.

The local committees aim to resolve these disputes.

"We will spare no efforts to succeed in this great initiative which we agreed on today to stop the violence and killings in Baghdad and in all Iraq," al-Dulaimi said at a news conference with al-Maliki. The two men signed an agreement with other Sunni and Shiite politicians on the four-point plan.

DOJ_NMG_0073327

In addition to the local and central committees, the plan calls for establishment of a media committee and a monthly review of progress, al-Maliki said.

However, the new plan does not directly tackle the issue of cracking down on Shiite militias, a step Sunnis demand but many Shiites oppose.

In theory, the committees would give Sunnis a venue to press security forces to take action against militias. But Shiites on the committee would have an equal chance to try to prevent action.

The top parties are to meet Tuesday to work out the details of how the committees will work, but already divisions were showing — even over wording. Shiite parties want the new plan to be focused on "terrorism," which would suggest insurgents, while Sunnis want it to address "violence," which would include Shiite militias.

The most well-known of these militias is the Mahdi Army led by al-Sadr, who on Friday ordered his fighters to put aside their weapons temporarily. He told supporters "the resistance (should) be political. ... He does not want to see a single drop of (Iraqi) blood shed," said Sadr spokesman Amir al-Husseini.

The Mahdi Army has been blamed for many attacks on Sunnis since the bombing of a Shiite shrine north of Baghdad in February sparked the wave of sectarian violence. But U.S. commanders have suggested that since then some militants have split from al-Sadr, saying he is not radical enough and carrying out attacks on their own.

Violence has not slowed in the wake of al-Sadr's orders. A curfew slapped on Baghdad on Saturday after the arrest of al-Dulaimi's bodyguard brought a day of calm. But as soon as it was lifted, violence explode.

More than 50 bodies — most bound and many of them showing signs of torture — were found in Baghdad alone on Sunday, apparent victims of sectarian killings, police said.

Midday Monday, gunmen wearing military-style uniforms pulled up to a group of computer stores at the Technical University in downtown Baghdad and pulled out 14 employees, forcing them into SUVs and driving off, police said.

On Sunday, gunmen stormed into a frozen meat factory in Baghdad and forced 24 workers into a refrigerator truck, shooting two others who refused to get in.

Hours later, seven bodies were found in a Sunni district of the Baghdad neighborhood of Dora and were identified as workers from the factory. The fate of the other abducted workers was not known. In similar mass kidnappings in the past, the attackers have sorted out Shiites and Sunnis and killed those of the rival sect.

Lawmakers from the Iraqi Islamic Party, a Sunni political group, said the kidnapped workers were all Sunnis and called on the government to act.

"It is the time the government takes serious and urgent steps to disband these criminal organizations and to save the people from their harm," they said in a statement.

At least 20 other people were killed in attacks around Iraq, including a bomb blast in Baghdad's downtown Al-Nasir Square that killed four people and wounded 13, and mortar barrages against two Sunni neighborhoods that killed two people and wounded dozens.

The U.S command said three U.S. Marines died in Anbar province Saturday — two in combat and the third in a vehicle accident. A British soldier was killed and another wounded in a mortar attack in the southern city of Basra. One shell hit a nearby house, killing two children.

____

AP correspondent Qassim Abdul-Zahra in Baghdad contributed to this report.

Iraqis Plan A Team Effort To End Violence (LAT)

By Solomon Moore

The Los Angeles Times, October 3, 2006

BAGHDAD — Leaders of Iraq's major political blocs announced a plan Monday to create local committees of clerics, tribal leaders and military officers to help quell violence in the capital.

The committees would have no police powers but would work with Iraqi authorities to set up checkpoints and identify dangers in the community, and advise police officers on other security issues.

DOJ_NMG_0073328

The government also announced that a central committee for peace and security would monitor police performance in Baghdad's neighborhoods and report abuses.

The plan, unveiled by Prime Minister Nouri Maliki in a televised news conference, appeared to gain broad support among Iraq's major Sunni and Shiite political blocs Monday night.

Sunni Arab insurgent groups and Shiite Muslim militias, some tied to Iraq's leading political parties, are blamed for most of the slayings in the capital, which has been a sectarian battleground for more than a year.

"The agreement between the leaders of the political blocs is going to be activated tonight, and our brothers will work hard to stop the bloodshed," said Maliki, flanked by political party leaders in Baghdad's fortified Green Zone.

Although the plan appears to conflict with a Shiite proposal to create bands of armed volunteers to guard neighborhoods, Shiite politicians and clerics endorsed Maliki's announcement.

"Despite the bloodshed taking place every day, there is a strong intention by the political blocs," said Hadi Amri, a parliament member and leader of the Badr Brigade, one of the nation's largest Shiite paramilitary groups. "During the last two days, we sensed a universal desire to stop the violence, which is harming all the political blocs and, most importantly, the Iraqi people."

Shiite cleric and legislator Sheik Jalaluddin Saghir urged Iraqis to work with the plan.

"I hope that people from all sects will take this message presented today from the political blocs and understand that the politicians have agreed, and not weaken in their fight against terror," he said.

Ammar Wajeeh, a prominent Sunni Arab politician, was more cautious. "We will see whether this agreement will be effective or not," he said. "The purpose of this initiative is to strengthen national reconciliation and to end the influence of militias."

The announcement came less than a week after senior U.S. military officials in Iraq told reporters that Maliki, a Shiite, was not doing enough to stop sectarian violence in Baghdad, and that he was impeding planned offensives against Shiite paramilitary fighters.

Army Gen. George W. Casey Jr., the commander of ground forces in Iraq, disavowed that criticism last week. On Monday, he issued a joint statement with U.S. Ambassador Zalmay Khalilzad, saying the plan was the result of "two days of frank and intense discussions and negotiation."

"This is a significant step in the right direction and shows that the Iraqi leaders want their country to succeed and are responding to the wishes of their people for security," the statement said.

As the politicians announced their security plan, Al Sharqiya, an Iraqi satellite television channel, reported that the number of violent deaths in Baghdad had reached a high of 1,980 in September.

The figure could not be independently confirmed, but if correct it would undercut assertions by U.S. officials that an offensive in the capital was making headway against sectarian violence.

The announcement also came on a day when Baghdad police found at least 40 bodies, many of them handcuffed and bearing gunshot and torture wounds. Ten of the victims were identified as Sunni Arabs who had been among a group of 22 people kidnapped from a food processing plant Sunday.

At least 20 people were killed throughout Iraq on Monday, including two U.S. soldiers shot to death in Baghdad.

The U.S. military also announced that a Marine was killed in combat and another died in an accident Saturday. Both occurred in Al Anbar province.

In Baghdad, a large force of gunmen dressed in police uniforms and driving seven identical sport utility vehicles commonly used by Iraqi security forces abducted 14 employees from an electronics market.

Interior Ministry officials denied any connection to the incident.

A group of armed men hijacked a minibus, fatally shot the driver and kidnapped four female Finance Ministry employees. Police fought off the attackers and rescued the women.

Gunmen also shot at an Education Ministry security convoy, killing one guard and injuring another.

Mortar attacks on a Sunni Arab neighborhood in southwest Baghdad killed four people and injured 20, and four bomb attacks elsewhere in the capital killed at least seven people and wounded at least 29 others.

North of Hawija, in the Kirkuk oil region, insurgents shot and killed one policeman and injured another.

DOJ_NMG_0073329

In the southern port city of Basra, a British convoy was attacked by gunmen. A soldier was reportedly killed.

In Babil province, a car with four occupants exploded at an Iraqi army checkpoint, killing the motorists.

U.S. forces turned over Forward Operating Base Duke, a military base in the southern province of Najaf, to Iraqi border patrol forces.

Iraq's Interior Ministry assumed control of a wide swath of desert extending from the Saudi Arabian border to Al Anbar province.

Iraq War Draws Foreign Jihadists, But Not In Droves (CSM)

By Peter Grier

The Christian Science Monitor, October 3, 2006

WASHINGTON

It may be true that Iraq is shaping a new generation of terrorist leaders, and that the US presence there is a "cause célèbre" for jihadists, as a recently declassified US intelligence assessment holds.

But that doesn't mean the Iraqi insurgency is a wholly owned Al Qaeda subsidiary. Foreign fighters make up a relatively small slice of the forces targeting the US military in Iraq. Most insurgents are native Iraqi Sunni Islamists or former members of the old Baath party regime.

Thus, to Osama bin Laden, Iraq might be more important as a symbol than a physical battlefield or training ground. Fighting there may not produce as many hardened mujahideen eager to export jihad as did the struggle against the Soviet occupation of Afghanistan.

"It is not obvious now how many Iraqi jihadists will support the global jihad of bin Laden and how many will focus their efforts on Iraq's fledgling state," says a recent analysis of the evolving terrorist threat by the Center for Strategic and International Studies.

The leak of a National Intelligence Estimate on terrorism trends to The New York Times, and President Bush's subsequent move to declassify the NIE's key judgments, has focused new attention on the relationship between the war in Iraq and global jihad.

One NIE conclusion is that US involvement in Iraq has served as a recruiting sergeant for Islamist terrorism. "Perceived jihadist success there would inspire more fighters to continue the struggle elsewhere.... Should jihadists leaving Iraq perceive themselves ... to have failed, we judge fewer fighters will be inspired to carry on the fight," says the NIE.

But the NIE - or at least the portions declassified so far - does not estimate how many of these jihadists are fighting in Iraq today, and how many may be members of terrorist cells elsewhere, looking to Iraq for inspiration. Foreigners a small share of Iraqi opposition

Abu Musab al-Zarqawi, the Jordanian-born leader of Al Qaeda in Iraq killed by a US airstrike in June, was undoubtedly a key insurgent leader, able to rally native Iraqi Sunni Islamists to his cause. Evidence suggests, however, that foreign fighters such as he are a small minority of the overall insurgent force.

Between 50 and 70 foreign fighters sneak over the border into Iraq every month, Maj. Gen. William Caldwell, chief US military spokesman in Iraq, said last week. Most come from Saudi Arabia, Sudan, Egypt, or Syria.

Between January and mid-September, US or Iraqi government forces captured some 630 foreign fighters, according to General Caldwell. Of these, 370 remain in detention in Iraq. The rest have been processed through Iraqi courts and sentenced, or released. Some may have been taken to undisclosed locations elsewhere.

The total number of foreign fighters in Iraq is between 800 and 2,000, according to estimates by the Brookings Institution, a think tank in Washington. In contrast, the total strength of the insurgency is more than 20,000 people, according to Brookings. That means the vast majority of its fighters come from Iraq itself.

"In proportion to the whole insurgency, [the percentage of foreign fighters] is very small," says Aidan Kirby, a terrorism expert at the Center for Strategic and International Studies (CSIS).

DOJ_NMG_0073330

On the one hand, this makes Iraq's effect on the global jihad of Mr. bin Laden unpredictable. The Afghan war against Soviet invaders in the 1980s created substantial numbers of battle-hardened Islamist fighters. It's unclear whether Iraq will have an effect of the same magnitude.

Some native Iraqi insurgents may become part of the larger Al Qaeda network. But many more are likely to be uninterested in uprooting themselves to take the fight to other countries. 'It only takes a few'

On the other hand, numbers are not the sole indicator of the scale of the danger. Already there are anecdotal reports of foreign fighters traveling back to Europe from Iraq, prepared to spread jihad, says Ms. Kirby of CSIS.

"It really only takes a few people," she says. "They're acting as a force multiplier."

Jordan, Kuwait, Syria, Qatar, and Saudi Arabia have seen some spillover of violence from Iraq inside their borders, notes a CSIS analysis of Al Qaeda. And terrorists appear to have won a sanctuary in Iraq's overwhelmingly Sunni Anbar Province. "The likelihood is that this sanctuary will be there for years," says the report.

Moreover, the death of Mr. Zarqawi may affect Al Qaeda's targeting. A charismatic leader with his own agenda, he was focused on attacking "the near enemy," according to Brian Fishman, a scholar at the US Army's Combating Terrorism Center. And Zarqawi's near enemy appeared to be apostate Arabs in the Middle East.

Bin Laden, on the other hand, emphasizes the "far enemy" - the US and the West. "Zarqawi's death may actually strengthen the negotiating position of jihadists dedicated to attacking the US homeland," writes Mr. Fishman in an article in the current issue of The Washington Quarterly.

Torture Site May Be Linked To Security Forces (USAT)

By Rick Jervis

USA Today, October 3, 2006

BAGHDAD — U.S. and Iraqi troops conducting a raid in Baghdad found a blood-soaked torture chamber that may have been operated by a Shiite Muslim militia with ties to the government.

Soldiers found Interior Ministry badges in the compound, and U.S. forces saw an Iraqi policeman on the roof of the compound before Sunday's raid, said Lt. Col. Avanulas Smiley, 40, a battalion commander who led U.S. troops in the raid.

“If there's linkage to Iraqi security forces, then obviously we have a problem and it needs to be addressed,” Smiley said.

One room of the complex contained a long wooden bench stained with a large pool of blood and urine, which could indicate victims were tortured there.

In another room, posters of radical Shiite cleric Muqtada al-Sadr and his white-bearded father, the late Grand Ayatollah Mohammed Sadiq al-Sadr, were plastered on the walls. On the floor were stained mattresses strewn among baseball bats, bayonets and electric drills.

The compound was empty when it was raided, Smiley said. Troops found a hole at the back of the complex, through which its occupants may have escaped, he said.

The compound belongs to a social organization named for al-Sadr's father, who was killed by Saddam Hussein's regime in 1999, said Lt. Col. Jonathan Withington, a 4th Infantry Division spokesman.

On Monday, Brig. Gen. David Halverson, deputy commander of U.S. troops in Baghdad, toured the one-story office complex as investigators looked over evidence.

Members of a special U.S. task force that investigates death squads collected blood samples and placed pieces of evidence in plastic bags. The investigators, who work with Iraqi counterparts, will try to determine whether the site was tied to Muqtada al-Sadr's organization, Smiley said.

U.S. and Iraqi forces launched an offensive in June aimed at securing Baghdad, a city of 6 million. As part of the offensive, an additional 10,000 U.S. and Iraqi troops were moved into the capital to reinforce the roughly 52,000 already here.

The biggest challenge for U.S. and Iraqi forces now is tackling religious violence that has pitted Sunnis against Shiites, particularly in the capital. “Violence carried out by Sunni and Shiite factions appeared to be carving Baghdad, and the country as a whole, into sectarian zones, protected by various armed groups,” said a report last week by Anthony Cordesman of the Center for Strategic and International Studies.

DOJ_NMG_0073331

There have been signs that some of the militias may have ties to the Shiite-dominated government security forces, particularly paramilitary forces in the Interior Ministry.

U.S. and Iraqi officers have pledged to crack down on any illegal militias, regardless of their affiliation or connections. "Whoever's doing the killing, we don't really care what political party they belong to," Halverson said. "If they're breaking the rule of law, we're going to bring them to justice."

U.S. and Iraqi officers have expressed concerns, however, that the Shiite-dominated government may prevent the military from aggressively going after Shiite militias. "The government should announce clearly to the public that all militias should be dissolved," Maj. Gen. Bashar Mahmoud Ayoub said in August.

"There should be a militia policy that is supported by (Iraq's parliament) to enhance the security in Iraq," Halverson said.

Muqtada al-Sadr's militia, the Mahdi Army, battled U.S. forces in 2004. Today, however, al-Sadr's organization has 30 seats in the parliament and controls five Cabinet posts. Prime Minister Nouri al-Maliki, a Shiite, relies on al-Sadr's organization for political support.

Sunday's raid was conducted after Iraqi officers developed the intelligence and planned the operation. The Iraqis then invited their U.S. advisers along, Smiley said.

Smiley said he is impressed with the progress of the Iraqi army and national police troops with whom he has worked. But he said he remains distrustful of some local Iraqi police, who often act on tribal or political loyalties.

"I wouldn't say I find it often, but I suspect it often," Smiley said. "You can't always prove it. And that can cause some frustration on the street with soldiers."

More Troops, Please (WSJ)

By Pete Hegseth

The Wall Street Journal, October 3, 2006

I've heard President Bush repeatedly state he will send more troops to Iraq if the commanders on the ground ask for them. I think, having returned home from Iraq two months ago, that there must be a breakdown in communication somewhere along the line. Maybe units on the ground are painting too rosy a picture for the generals. Perhaps the generals aren't asking because it goes against the "can do" ethos of the Army. Possibly the military is being squeezed by the Pentagon to do more with less. Or maybe the White House doesn't want to admit more troops are needed. In any case, while I do not have the answers nor do I seek to place blame, it is painfully obvious there's a disconnect.

I volunteered to serve in Iraq because I believe in our mission there. I share the president's conviction about the Iraq war -- we can and must win, for the Iraqi people, for the future of our country and for peace-loving people everywhere. But I'm frustrated. America is fighting with a hand tied behind its back. Soldiers have all the equipment we need -- armored humvees, body armor for every body part, superior technology, etc. -- but we simply do not have enough troops in Iraq, and we need them now. * * *

After witnessing two national elections during three months in Baghdad, my Army unit moved north to Samarra, where we spent eight months sowing the seeds of progress. While we had success in uprooting the insurgency and building the local government, it wasn't enough. We had just enough troops to control Samarra and secure ourselves, but not enough to bring lasting stability or security. "Not enough" became the story of my year in Iraq.

The future of Samarra and Iraq as a whole, ultimately lies in the hands of her people -- their sympathies are the ultimate prize in this war. No matter how many insurgents we kill, city leaders we meet or policemen we enlist, it is all for naught if we cannot provide security and stability. Tribal sheikhs told us that even within Samarra -- deep in the Sunni triangle -- a vast majority of people just want peace and order and will side with whoever can provide it. Right now Samarrans rightfully question who that will be.

The end goal in Samarra is for Iraqis to do everything for themselves. But their government and security forces are not ready. Insurgents use death threats and murder to assert power over anyone working with the City Council or joining the police force. This atmosphere forces moderate Samarrans to keep their mouths shut, and their silence abets the insurgents who live and fight in Samarra. Despite killing scores of insurgents, we are unable to provide lasting security, and so the Samarran street slips away.

DOJ_NMG_0073332

Two things are to blame for our predicament, one a corollary of the other. The first reason is that we did not have enough troops in Samarra. The skill and courage of 150 American soldiers prevented chaos, but was never enough to fully secure a city of 120,000 people or maintain the rule of law. The soldiers in the city were preoccupied with defending themselves and conducting night raids, and were therefore largely unable to regularly patrol during the day -- thus giving insurgents reign to move freely and intimidate the local population. A visitor in Samarra on an average day would be hard-pressed to point out a single American humvee traversing local neighborhoods. The same is true for Baghdad.

Our four-vehicle civil affairs patrol was often the only American presence deep inside the city and we were frequently greeted by locals with the question, "Where have you been?" Americans can't of course be omnipresent; but we should at least be there when it matters. When Americans are there, either the insurgents are not or they are on the losing side of a firefight.

Second, because of a lack of troops, American military leaders are forced to make a choice between mission objectives and self-preservation. Many of our leaders are opting to guard supply routes and coagulate on sprawling military bases, rather than consistently moving into dangerous areas and fighting the insurgency. In our case, we had 500 soldiers stationed outside Samarra who made infrequent trips into the city center. There is little reason why most of these troops were not stationed inside Samarra, canvassing every neighborhood with platoon-sized patrol bases and suffocating insurgent operations. Rather than take the risks necessary -- like small patrol bases and frequent foot patrols -- our unit opted to secure itself and its supply routes rather than commit resources inside the city. And while this approach is safer in the short run, it only prolongs mission accomplishment, ultimately endangering more troops. We often speculated our unit would be back next year, driving the same streets with even fewer guys.

In due time, the Iraqi Security Forces will take over Samarra, but they are not ready yet. If the Americans left today, the Iraqis would be co-opted by the insurgents -- who are utterly ruthless, willing to kill family members of policemen or decapitate Iraqi soldiers to preserve disorder. It will take time. Both the Iraqi Army and Samarra Police need to get bloodied a bit and bounce back, proving their strength to the people. They will eventually be ready, but until then, security belongs to us.

I also understand calling for more troops is contrary to conventional thinking inside government and the military. Supporters of the current approach argue sending more troops would further inflame anti-American sentiment, incite more violence and retard independent progress. My experience suggests otherwise. American troops are tolerated, even welcomed when they effectively provide security; but their presence is cursed when it does not accompany progress. Violence persists not because American troops are present, but because our presence is futile. Many local leaders asked us, "How come the most powerful country in the world cannot defeat local criminals and thugs?" They suggested our failure was part of a larger conspiracy to keep the Iraqi people suffering.

I have not lost the optimism that sent me to Iraq. We did make gains. Our 10-man civil affairs team established good relationships with brave Iraqi leaders and sat across from them as equals. I watched city leaders battle insurgents, not only with guns but with newspapers and economic development. By the time we left, the City Council was meeting on its own accord and with increasing legitimacy, forming committees to oversee fuel allocation, new construction and security. Increased home construction was evident and local markets were open.

Even the security situation inside the city improved. Previous summers in Samarra had been extremely violent, but the summer of 2006 was different. Days passed without a significant attack inside the city. Less than 150 Americans, along with Iraqi counterparts, controlled a town of over 120,000 Sunni Arabs through targeted raids and sniper operations. One local insurgent even begged city leaders for amnesty in exchange for good conduct. Our unit killed or captured hundreds of insurgents, knocking the wind out of the local insurgency -- but never crushing it.

I believe, as the president noted, that "the safety of America depends on the outcome of the battle in the streets of Baghdad." Why then do we have just enough troops in Iraq not to lose? Most of the people I've spoken with since coming home -- those both for and against the war -- believe we must finish the job in Iraq. Americans understand a defeat in Iraq would have horrible consequences for America and its allies for decades to come. America has the capacity to win and the will to support a winning strategy.

Why then are we pursuing a bare minimum approach?

DOJ_NMG_0073333

First Lt. Hegseth served as an infantry platoon leader and civil-military operations officer in Iraq with the 101st Airborne Division.

Death Never 'in Vain' (USAT)

By Kathy Roth-douquet

USA Today, October 3, 2006

Died in vain?

President Bush wants to stay the course in Iraq so that those who have died there will not have died "in vain." Anti-war activist Cindy Sheehan urges us to pull out immediately to prevent more Americans from dying in vain.

Bush and Sheehan have both got it wrong.

Too many partisans in the battle for Iraq policy have used soldiers' deaths as a football in a bid to score points. It's cruel (imagine being a family member and being told the death of your loved one was in vain), but even more, it's just wrong. Those who argue that a soldier's death has meaning only if the politics are "right" misunderstand military service in America.

"We think of Kristian (Menchaca) as a hero," says Sylvia Grice of her cousin, 23, one of the soldiers kidnapped, tortured and killed by insurgents last June in Iraq. "He didn't have to do this. He believed in what he was doing." The terrible death's meaning, in other words, came from the soldier's commitment. It is his commitment that gives his life meaning, and even his country's possible errors — staying in too long, leaving too early — can't take that meaning from him.

The phrase "died in vain" comes to us from our great moralist president, Abraham Lincoln. In Gettysburg's graveyard, Lincoln urged the gathered to fight on for the survival of the United States so that those interred in that ground would not have died in vain. He did not argue that a soldier who loses his battle or his war has died in vain. Instead, he noted that America itself — its ideas and ideals — is what gives the soldier's life meaning.

So where does the meaning of military sacrifice come from?

Military service in America flows from our Constitution as a covenant among free people. The parties to this sacred contract are, on one hand, a group of citizens who assent to bear arms for their country for a time, and on the other, the rest of us, the civilians whose task it is to decide whether to send our compatriots into peril. Those bearing arms promise to bring their loyalty, skill and honor to the task; the civilians, for their part, promise to weigh the fate of those soldiers with seriousness and care, and provide the support necessary to those who go.

The meaning in the lives of those who bear arms resides in their loyalty to the democracy that sends them, and the skill and honor they bring to their task. If the civilians who send them falter in their decision-making, it dishonors those who steer and not those who serve.

So let's apply this to the war in Iraq. What if the war is a mistake, or we pull out too early? Are the deaths then for naught?

From the standpoint of a soldier or Marine, or in my case, a Marine's wife, the answer to these questions must be no. Why? Because despite any partisan's passion for the rightness of a position, none of us will know how right or wrong we really are until long after the last shot is fired. So we make decisions the way one does in a self-governing society of 300 million cantankerous souls: imperfectly, inelegantly, with unnecessary suffering.

Whether we are led by Democratic presidents or Republican ones — great men such as Franklin D. Roosevelt or middling men such as Warren G. Harding — there will be mistakes, judged differently at different times in history and perhaps never resolved utterly in consensus. Even in the "good war," there were bad engagements, bad decisions, unnecessary, sad, tragic deaths.

Service, then, is even more ennobling because it represents an act of faith in an unwieldy system — a representative democracy of human beings. The weakness of our system lends poignancy to the decision to serve: Those who go into harm's way recognize that our society is in many ways deeply flawed, but to paraphrase Winston Churchill, it's the best one available yet.

Philosopher Nancy Sherman says the military resolves this tension by adopting a version of the ancient Stoic philosophy, which holds that one may be judged only by the rightness or wrongness of one's own acts, not by the acts of others. A soldier who does his portion morally and well cannot be tarred by the brush of a leader's bad policy. This does not mean that some individuals' willingness to serve translates into a blank check for irresponsible policy — if anything it requires us to constantly scrutinize our policy and commit to do better.

DOJ_NMG_0073334

In complicated times like these, it's important to remember that self-government is perishable — it can be killed not only by enemies outside the gate, but also by indifference and alienation within. The decision to serve is a decision to be part of our country and, ideally, to make the part one touches the best possible. This is what has value, so that even in the tragic cases of friendly fire, or accidental deaths or deaths in battles later lost, those who die did not die in vain. They died in service to an ideal — Lincoln's ideal that the government of the people, by the people and for the people shall not perish from the face of this earth.

There is nothing vain about that.

Kathy Roth-Douquet is the co-author, with Frank Schaeffer, of AWOL: The Unexcused Absence of America's Upper Classes from Military Service — and How It Hurts Our Country. She lives on a military base in North Carolina.

Frist: Taliban Should Be In Afghan Gov't (AP)

By Jim Krane, Associated Press Writer

AP, October 3, 2006

U.S. Senate Majority Leader Bill Frist said Monday that the Afghan war against Taliban guerrillas can never be won militarily and urged support for efforts to bring "people who call themselves Taliban" and their allies into the government.

The Tennessee Republican said he learned from briefings that Taliban fighters were too numerous and had too much popular support to be defeated on the battlefield.

"You need to bring them into a more transparent type of government," Frist said during a brief visit to a U.S. and Romanian military base in the southern Taliban stronghold of Qalat. "And if that's accomplished, we'll be successful."

Afghanistan is suffering its heaviest insurgent attacks since a U.S.-led military force toppled the Taliban in late 2001 for harboring al-Qaida leader Osama bin Laden.

According to an Associated Press count, based on reports from U.S., NATO and Afghan officials, at least 2,800 people have been killed nationwide so far this year. The count, which includes militants and civilians, is about 1,300 more than the toll for all of 2005.

The top U.S. military commander in Afghanistan, Lt. Gen. Karl Eikenberry, told Pentagon reporters last month that while the Taliban enemy in Afghanistan is not extremely strong, their numbers and influence have grown in some southern sections of the country.

President Bush has been criticized for his handling of the war and is trying to contain the damage ahead of midterm elections this fall. On Friday, Bush acknowledged setbacks in the training of Afghan police to fight against the Taliban resurgence but predicted eventual victory.

Frist said asking the Taliban to join the government was a decision to be made by Afghan President Hamid Karzai. Karzai's spokesmen were not immediately able to be reached for comment.

Sen. Mel Martinez, a Republican from Florida accompanying Frist on his trip, said negotiating with the Taliban was not "out of the question" but that fighters who refused to join the political process would have to be defeated.

"A political solution is how it's all going to be solved," he said.

Frist said he had hoped the U.S. would be able to withdraw its forces from Afghanistan soon. But he said the 20,000 U.S. troops in the country are still needed to support the NATO alliance, which will assume direct control over most military operations here.

"We're going to need to stay here a long time," Frist said.

The senator said he was warned to expect attacks to increase. There appears to be an "unlimited flow" of Afghans and foreigners "willing to pick up arms and integrate themselves with the Taliban," he said.

He said the only way to win in places like the volatile southern part of the country is to "assimilate people who call themselves Taliban into a larger, more representative government."

"Approaching counterinsurgency by winning hearts and minds will ultimately be the answer," Frist said. "Military versus insurgency one-to-one doesn't sound like it can be won. It sounds to me ... that the Taliban is everywhere."

DOJ_NMG_0073335

Frist and Martinez flew to this dust-blown mountain city 220 miles south of Kabul during a one-day stop in Afghanistan on a regional tour that includes stops in Pakistan and Iraq.

The pair had intended to visit a new $6.5 million hospital built by the United Arab Emirates, but a group of wounded Taliban fighters were recuperating there, including a midlevel commander, and U.S. commander Lt. Col. Kevin McGlaughlin canceled the visit because of security concerns.

In violence Monday, a suicide bomber blew himself up next to a NATO convoy in the capital Kabul, wounding three foreign soldiers and three civilians, while a roadside bomb in the eastern Paktia province killed three Afghan soldiers and wounded three others, officials said.

Maj. Luke Knittig, a military spokesman, said he could not disclose the nationalities of the NATO soldiers who were wounded. The attack came two days after another suicide bomber killed 12 people and wounded more than 40 outside Afghanistan's Interior Ministry.

In the southern province of Helmand, five civilians were killed when their vehicle hit a mine on a road usually used by NATO and Afghan forces, said Ghulam Muhiddin, the governor's spokesman.

Suspected Taliban on a motorbike, meanwhile, killed two policemen and wounded two others in Gereshk district, he said. NATO-led troops killed three militants in Nawzad district.

After Afghan Battle, A Harder Fight For Peace (NYT)

By Carlotta Gall

The New York Times, October 3, 2006

PASHMUL, Afghanistan — NATO forces scored one of their biggest victories here in ferocious fighting in September, flushing out an area of southern Afghanistan that had been swarming with Taliban insurgents. But almost immediately a new and more difficult battle began — for support of the local people.

Villagers trickling back to their homes broke into an argument over who was to blame for the heavy destruction, NATO or the Taliban.

“My house was bombarded and my grape store destroyed,” said Hajji Bilal Jan, 48, a farmer from the upper part of Pashmul. “The coalition forces are cruel, without reason. There were no Taliban in our house. Why did they bombard the house?”

Another man, Neamatullah, 45, who like many Afghans uses only one name, stopped to listen and then countered: “Why did you let the Taliban come to your village? You brought them to your village.”

The battle here, the biggest for the American-led forces in the country since March 2002, was a long-awaited success for NATO forces in a year in which the Taliban have revived with surprising strength.

But it also showed that fighting the insurgency was not just about winning the battle, but securing the peace. Pushing out the Taliban is one thing, NATO and Afghan commanders emphasize, and keeping them out another.

NATO officials estimate that the Taliban lost 500 fighters over all and say 136 have been captured, mostly as they tried to escape. Five Canadian soldiers died in the operation. But just afterward, four more were killed in a suicide bombing.

To help enlist the support of local villagers, military commanders and the governor of Kandahar Province have started handing out half a million dollars in humanitarian aid and have promised families more help with repairing the war’s damage.

“If the people cooperate with us, the Taliban can do nothing,” said Capt. Majid Khan, commander of a unit of the Afghan Army that took part in the fighting and is now based in Pashmul.

Most villagers here, who grow grapes and pomegranates in the rich soil along the Arghandab River valley, said they opposed the Taliban but had been powerless to stop the groups of armed men who moved into the area over recent months.

But among them were those who fed and sheltered the Taliban and possibly fought alongside them. The villagers said the leader of the Taliban group in this area, Abdul Khaleeq, was from Pashmul, and he had fighters from surrounding villages as well as outsiders.

“Most of the people are with the government,” Mr. Neamatullah said. “Just a few people get special benefits from the Taliban.”

DOJ_NMG_0073336

"He knows everything about the Taliban," he added, pointing out the man he had argued with, Mr. Jan.

"It was very good, the bombing," Mr. Neamatullah said. "I am happy, because the Taliban must be finished off."

The Taliban first moved into two densely populated farming districts in this area, Panjwai and Zhare, west of Kandahar, in May just as NATO forces, led by Brig. Gen. David Fraser of Canada, were taking over command from United States forces in the southern region of the country.

"The whole place was full of Taliban," said Faizullah, 26, a farmer who was later wounded in the bombing of the nearby village of Zehdanan. "They did not stay more than two nights in one place. They were telling people to leave."

In July and August the Taliban began building up their forces there in a clear bid to set up an area of control and threaten the city of Kandahar, the provincial capital, General Fraser said in an interview in his headquarters at the Kandahar air base.

"They put a lot of resources into this area, a lot of intellectual capital and psychological commitment," he said. "This was a fight unlike the fight I've had with the Taliban for the last eight months."

One of the Taliban leaders, Hajji Mullah Abdul Rauf, a former provincial governor, taunted the American military in an interview with Al Jazeera television in the Panjwai area in late August. "Where has the American power gone?" he said. "Why could they not capture the Taliban and mujahedeen in their caves?"

"It is Afghans who are helping us," he said. "They give food, they give help and they have come out against this government. They do not want this government."

But Mr. Neamatullah said he had challenged some of the Taliban fighters he came across. He met a group sitting under a mulberry tree, not far from his village, Char Kutsa, also near Pashmul, where women were washing clothes in a stream.

He said he had asked the men: "Why do you come here? Do you want the women to get bombed?" He said he did the same with another group the next day in the mosque of a neighboring village. "The Taliban's special answer was always that 'somebody ordered us to come here' to this village," he said.

Villagers said the Taliban were mostly Afghans, but from neighboring provinces and districts, as well as from Pakistan. The Taliban were well equipped with radios, satellite telephones and weapons, they said.

NATO and Afghan forces finally mounted a carefully planned operation, beginning on Sept. 2, after warning civilians to leave the area and dropping leaflets promising the Taliban safe passage out if they gave up their weapons.

The Taliban concentrated their fighters in several pockets on either side of the river — at Sperwan, Pashmul and Siah Jui — and NATO deployed forces from the south, north and east in a pincers movement.

More forces guarded the western and southern flanks to cut supply and escape routes. Canadian forces hit a mine on their first attempt to breach the river stronghold from the south into Pashmul and then suffered multiple casualties in an airstrike from an American A-10 attack jet.

The commander of United States forces in southern Afghanistan, Col. R. Stephen Williams, 46, from Anchorage, joined the battle four days later. He gathered Canadian, American and Afghan forces for an attack on Pashmul on Sept. 12.

After wearing the Taliban down for six days with rock music blaring across the river valley, and artillery fire and airstrikes wherever they spotted a concentration of fighters, they found a weak spot in the Taliban's defenses.

Playing his favorite song, AC/DC's "Back in Black," to hide the sound of the armored vehicles, Colonel Williams took the Taliban by surprise, crossing the river and driving through the cornfields from the northeast.

The fighting was intense for a day and a half. The Taliban were dug in under ideal cover in vineyards, with deep irrigation channels and high mud-wall barns for drying grapes. "It was Normandy invasion tactics with bunker systems and trenches," Colonel Williams said as he walked journalists through a battlefield tour.

"We found a lot of bunkers, with metal roofs and air holes with metal pipes running up for ventilation," the colonel said, standing over one bunker that had been destroyed by his forces "They used the canals as trenches and then would pull back to the bunker."

The village school, a cluster of white painted classrooms built with American aid money in the last four years, was destroyed by repeated air and artillery strikes. "The Taliban used this as a weapons cache and their command and control place," the colonel said. "For some reason they kept coming back in here every time we bombed the place."

DOJ_NMG_0073337

In small mud buildings, his soldiers found a makeshift field hospital. “We found tons of bloodied rags, bandages, IV bags and needles,” he said. “We took away five to six garbage bags for examination.”

The Taliban pulled out in groups during the attack, leaving small numbers of men to delay the NATO advance. Colonel Williams calculated from battlefield reports that his force alone had killed 150 to 200 insurgents in 10 days of fighting, and only had four men wounded on their side. Seven to eight Taliban commanders were lost in the fighting, he said.

Although NATO and Taliban forces told villagers to leave before the fighting, some civilians were killed and wounded in the conflict. United Nations officials have gathered reports of at least 40 civilians killed. A government commission sent by President Hamid Karzai to investigate the fighting said that 53 civilians had been killed in the fighting and that it had caused an estimated $750,000 in damage.

Kandahar’s main hospital took in 24 wounded people from the Panjwai and Zhare districts from Sept. 3 to 18, as well as two girls wounded in the suicide bombing, which happened on Sept. 18.

Rahmatullah, 33, a farm laborer, lay in bed with two broken legs. He lost two nephews, ages 3 and 1, when their house in Zangabad was bombed. As family members were trying to save the children’s mother from the rubble, a NATO plane struck a second time, wounding more women and children, he said.

Despite their injuries and losses, there was little sympathy for the Taliban among the patients or other villagers interviewed. In Pashmul, a 19-year-old high school student, also named Neamatullah, and his brother Habibullah, 17, climbed the broken wall where the gate to their house was destroyed.

They gestured with shock at the devastation before them. A bomb had gouged out a 25-foot-deep crater in their yard, smashing the well and the main building of the house.

Asked whom he blamed for the damage, Neamatullah said the Taliban. “Before they came, there was no bombing,” he said.

Afghan Politics - One Chicken Dinner At A Time (CSM)

By Scott Peterson

The Christian Science Monitor, October 3, 2006

NARAY, EASTERN AFGHANISTAN

Bold, full of hope, and with a healthy fear for their speck-on-a-map villages, the Afghan elders arrived at this US firebase recently for a change-of-guard ceremony.

Expected to be a gracious host - but with little suitable food and after being caught off-guard by the elders who had arrived one day in advance - US Army Capt. Dennis Sugrue invited the handful of weathered men to join him for lunch on cushions on the floor.

The air was thick with concerned expectation. The US officers hoped to win these elders as allies against a growing insurgency with promises of development projects and friendship. And there has been some progress: a growing number of project requests, and even help finding insurgent locations.

But would there be enough food, when the lids were removed, to honor the Afghan guests? Or would the two Army captains find themselves embarrassed by a meager offering?

After the lids were swept from two large platters, the assembled party caught its collective breath. Two small grilled chickens would be enough meat to forge closer bonds between these Afghan elders and their American hosts. Business could commence.

"The American help is very important," says elder Haji Hamidullah, who ticks off four US-funded projects in his village of Mandagal, including water pipes and a collection basin, and a microhydro power setup. "Now there is now clean water, but there will be. At night, we stay in the dark. If we have light, it will be very good."

Mr. Hamidullah's village is one of more than a dozen in the poor Kamdesh district of Nuristan along Afghanistan's porous border with Pakistan. US Army units of the 3rd Squadron, 71st Cavalry moved in over the summer to pay attention, with projects and money, to a region that ranks near the bottom of Afghanistan's development index.

DOJ_NMG_0073338

"If some [insurgents] come down to the village, we will fight them," vows Hamidullah, who is here to accept the first installment - more than $6,000 worth of freshly printed red 1,000 Afghani notes, in three bundles - for the $25,000 water-pipe scheme. The day before, US officers had doled out $75,000 for approved projects.

Trust was so high in Mandagal that the Americans would pay, that elders had already hired an engineer and paid with their own money to complete much of the work.

"There are a lot of hills and trees in Nuristan. In the day, the enemies hide in the trees; at night, they plant IEDs [improvised explosive device] and leave night letters," says Hamidullah.

"We're not afraid of these people," boasts Hamidullah. "People are sometimes scared, but they see the government is powerful and fighting them," he says, gilding the lily a bit. But he acknowledges that "without the Americans" there would be "big problems."

A firm stance like Hamidullah's is not easy to maintain, as pressure grows from the Taliban and other insurgents. In the past month, one prominent elder was tortured and killed, and a senior border policeman assassinated. Threats are common, and come in the form of "night letters," which appear overnight from insurgents, warning people that they will die if they cooperate with US or Afghan forces.

"Whenever construction is going on, [militants] come down from the hills to stop it," says Captain Sugrue, a civil engineer from Watertown, N.Y., who launched the first 15 or so projects with discretionary funds available for such work to US commanders. He says the rugged terrain makes Nuristan a "natural refuge" for militants looking for training bases.

"The insurgents can't compete with the money we are going to pour into reconstruction," adds Sugrue. "People who are likely targets are scared. If you are a shura [local council] leader, you are a target."

The learning curve for the Americans has been steep. The first time they set foot in Kamdesh, US troops were fired upon. Later, at a US-sponsored gathering of district elders, a moderate mullah from Mirdish, named Abdullah, explained the need to develop local relationships.

" 'If you had come to me first, you would not have been shot at,' " Sugrue recalls Mr. Abdullah telling him. "What he was saying is that there is a right way to do things."

Local know-how is a requirement to successfully balance the needs of the villages while navigating among the local contractors and spreading wealth. But it's an uncommon trait among US military officers in Iraq and Afghanistan, whose tours are often too short - and whose mandates are too uncertain - to gain such a detailed knowledge of an area.

Sugrue's first big project taught another important lesson. Engineers had chosen the worst 14 sections of the 20-mile road from Naray to Kamdesh village for improvement. To do the job, Sugrue tapped a well-established contractor from Jalalabad - some 70 miles away.

But when it became clear to locals from the Naray region that the road project was proceeding with an outside firm, they began to have second thoughts about initially cold-shouldering the effort. One group of out-of-town road workers was beaten up. While the project is nearly complete, Sugrue says "I have a guy with no vested interest in a doing a good job with the road; he's just trying to get away with his life."

Contracts are now made in conjunction with village leaders "to make sure the right people do the work, and have a stake in it." The trade-off is that, while there is a community approval for the work, there are local limits to technical expertise. Sugrue and his colleagues are now plotting the best way to do another road project that goes through 10 villages, and has become more of a political problem than an engineering one.

Of the 15 or so US-funded projects in Kamdesh so far, half of the biggest ones are now being handed over to the Provincial Reconstruction Teams (PRT), which are purpose-built US military units that are being deployed across eastern Afghanistan in areas controlled by US forces. Each PRT includes two civilian engineers and civil affairs officers to handle big-ticket projects like roads and bridges.

Small, high-visibility projects will still be run by individual squadrons, at least here with the 3-71 Cav., so that US patrols have a reason to keep visiting villages to assess progress and make their presence felt.

DOJ_NMG_0073339

"We are improving our methods, though there are still shortfalls," says Sugrue. Elders understand the long-term importance of such projects for the community, he says, though many villagers are illiterate and see the projects solely as a "job for three months swinging a hammer."

But there are larger issues at stake for some. At the same lunch, Mir Mohamed Khan, an elder from nearby Nangal village - where Army money will help to complete a previous drinking water project started by a European-funded agency called Afghan Aid - breaks off a piece of grilled chicken and wraps it in bread.

He says that recent US shelling from this base at insurgents who had attacked with rockets overshot the target. "They fired from the first village, and you almost hit the third village," says Mr. Khan. "If you come to our village, everyone will let you know where they fired from."

Outside, Khan pointed to the configuration of hills, where he said shepherds had seen insurgents in action. They had been trained by Pakistani intelligence, he claimed, and in religious schools."

"They call it a religious way, but it is not a religious way," says Khan. "They are enemies of both of us....The enemies are trying to stop reconstruction, but they will never do it."

DOJ:

Ohio Prosecutor Named Interim U.S. Attorney (TENN)

By BONNA De La CRUZ, Staff Writer

Nashville Tennessean, October 3, 2006

A federal prosecutor from Ohio will serve as interim U.S. Attorney in Nashville, the U.S. Justice Department said in a statement today.

Craig S. Morford will serve as interim as Jim Vines leaves the job as the top federal prosecutor for the Middle District of Tennessee. Vines' last day was Oct. 1, the statement said. He is returning to private practice with the King and Spalding firm.

Morford has served as the first assistant in the U.S. Attorney's office in the Northern District of Ohio since November, 2003. He has a law degree from Valparaiso University School of Law and a bachelor's degree from Hope College, the statement said.

Contact Bonna de la Cruz at 726-5990 or bdelacruz@Tennessean.com.

CORPORATE SCANDALS:

Feeling 'Slap In The Face' After Fastow's Sentence (WP)

By Carrie Johnson

The Washington Post, October 3, 2006

When a federal judge took four years off the prison sentence of former Enron Corp. finance chief Andrew S. Fastow last week, he surprised legal analysts, angered onetime employees and sparked anew a debate about just punishment for white-collar criminals.

In a much-heralded 2004 plea deal, Fastow admitted to a pair of conspiracy charges that carried a maximum penalty of 10 years. He also agreed not to seek a reduction in his prison term. But one week ago, U.S. District Judge Kenneth M. Hoyt granted some mercy to the architect of the era's biggest accounting fraud and sent him to prison for just six years.

That means Fastow, who improperly took more than $45 million from the coffers of the Houston energy-trading company, could spend closer to 3 1/2 years in prison if he gets credit for completing a drug-treatment program and for good behavior.

The reduction, former Enron worker Rod Jordan said yesterday, "was a slap in the face to employees."

No former employees appeared at last week's sentencing, with most preferring to wait until former chief executive Jeffrey K. Skilling is sentenced on fraud charges Oct. 23. "A lot of them decided to skip Fastow because they thought it was a done deal," Jordan said, referring to the 10-year term.

DOJ_NMG_0073340

Fastow served as one of the government's most important witnesses in the trial of Skilling and Enron founder Kenneth L. Lay, who were convicted in May. Prosecutors in that case told the jury that Fastow had "locked in" a 10-year prison sentence as part of a plea bargain with the Justice Department's Enron Task Force.

But Fastow's lawyer, John W. Keker, implored the judge last week to send Fastow away for five years because of his repentance, his cooperation with prosecutors and shareholders, and the toll on his family. Keker pointed out that Fastow's wife, Lea, spent nearly a year in prison after pleading guilty to underreporting the couple's income.

At the hearing, prosecutors did not object to the proposed reduced sentence. But they had previously filed a document agreeing with a probation department report that would have exposed Fastow to a sentence longer than 10 years.

Daniel M. Petrocelli, a lawyer for Skilling, called Fastow's reduced sentence "disturbing" in an e-mail. During the trial, Petrocelli regularly attacked government witnesses for misrepresenting the sentence reductions they would receive for cooperating with prosecutors. Legal analysts said yesterday that the contention could become a ground for Skilling's expected appeal.

"What is disturbing is that in the trial against Mr. Skilling, Fastow and the prosecutors represented to the jury that Fastow would serve a minimum of 10 years," Petrocelli wrote. "Now, with the trial over, they come into court and argue for a substantially lesser sentence."

Legal analysts said the proceeding, and the debate it provoked, underscore the power that federal judges enjoy. Since Fastow's plea deal was struck in 2004, a U.S. Supreme Court decision made sentencing guidelines advisory, rather than mandatory, for judges. That gave the judge more leeway to give Fastow less time.

However, judicial discretion can cut both ways. A few former Enron workers who agreed to help prosecutors have been sentenced to a wide range of prison terms: from probation to six years behind bars. The Fastow case is drawing the most heated commentary because a week earlier, the same judge who sentenced Fastow was far more stern with former Enron executive David W. Delainey.

Delainey, a Canadian citizen who voluntarily agreed to travel to the United States several times, pleaded guilty to a single insider-trading charge and began cooperating with prosecutors even before his October 2003 deal. Delainey's lawyers had asked for probation, but instead Hoyt reduced his possible sentence by only three months, ordered him to serve 2 1/2 years in prison and warned that he could have faced far more serious charges for his conduct at Enron. The disparity in treatment fueled anger from John Dowd, a Washington lawyer who defended Delainey.

"The message from the court was clear," Dowd said. "If you square your account with the law early, accept the consequences, fully cooperate for three years and receive the enthusiastic support of the government at sentencing: Tough luck; you get a cut of three months. If you fight the truth and get others involved in crime, and receive no support from the government, then you receive the mercy of the court and get a cut of four years off what you agreed to."

Within the next few weeks, former Enron investor relations official Paula H. Rieker, who pleaded guilty to a single insider-trading charge, and former accounting chief Richard A. Causey, who pleaded guilty to securities fraud, will be sentenced by other federal judges in Houston. Causey, who did not reap the same personal gains from Enron that Fastow did, faces the possibility of a longer sentence.

Philip Hilder, a Houston defense lawyer who represented several witnesses in the Enron investigation, said he was "surprised" by the leniency toward Fastow. But, Hilder added, Hoyt appeared to have considered Fastow's circumstances.

"He really has transformed himself from somebody who was vilified to someone who seemed almost sympathetic on the stand and who genuinely accepted responsibility for his actions," Hilder said. "I wish more judges would view defendants as individuals."

Memo Suggests When Hurd Knew Of Phone Data (WSJ)

By Peter Waldman And Don Clark

The Wall Street Journal, October 3, 2006

DOJ_NMG_0073341

Despite hours of testimony before a House subcommittee last week, Hewlett-Packard Co. still hasn't answered a key question about its leak-investigation scandal: When did Mark Hurd, H-P's chief executive officer, learn that private phone records were being examined as part of the probe?

A memo from H-P's outside law firm suggests that Mr. Hurd may have learned about the use of phone records as early as July 2005 -- a few months after the leak probe began -- though it doesn't indicate he knew that they were obtained through means that may have been illegal.

The memo, from the firm of Wilson Sonsini Goodrich & Rosati, says Mr. Hurd recalled that during one meeting, "probably on July 22, 2005," somebody "mentioned obtaining phone records off the Web." Mr. Hurd "remembered thinking" there must be a Web site with such information, according to the memo, which was prepared by Wilson Sonsini lawyers who were asked to investigate H-P's tactics in investigating the leak probe.

Investigators for H-P obtained the phone records of board members, reporters and H-P employees using a technique called pretexting, which involves obtaining records through impersonating a phone customer. Disclosure of H-P's tactics have prompted several government investigations and the resignations of three H-P executives and Chairman Patricia Dunn, who helped lead the leak investigation and recently yielded her title to Mr. Hurd.

TRACKING THE SCANDAL

See a graphical timeline1 and key documents in the H-P scandal. Plus, read profiles2 of former H-P Chairman Patricia Dunn, CEO Mark Hurd and other key players in the leak-probe controversy. • Complete coverage3

The Wilson Sonsini memo, which was based on a telephone interview by the lawyers with Mr. Hurd on Aug. 25, 2006, is the first evidence to emerge that Mr. Hurd may have known about the use of phone records during the investigation. In his House testimony and other statements, Mr. Hurd has said he didn't recall discussion of the methodology of the leak investigation in the July meeting, focusing instead on the results of the investigation so far.

Michael Moeller, an H-P spokesman, yesterday wouldn't go into details of the Wilson Sonsini memo. But he added: "We believe the documents, Mark's witness interview, the memo, and his testimony provide a complete and accurate picture of his knowledge of the investigation."

During a hearing Thursday before a subcommittee of the House Energy and Commerce Committee, Ms. Dunn testified that she learned early in the investigation that phone records were being sought by Ronald DeLia, the Boston-based private investigator that was handling the matter for H-P. But she said she believed that the information was being gathered in a legal way, and that she didn't understand what pretexting meant until much later.

"It was my understanding that these records were available through permitted mechanisms and that it was the common practice within Hewlett-Packard to use phone records to perform investigations," she testified.

But those assumptions were challenged by House members during the hearing. "You honestly believed that it was that simple, that your phone records, that anybody in the world can just call up and get them?" asked Rep. Greg Walden (R, Ore.).

Mr. Hurd has apologized profusely for the affair, and has said he should have done more to learn about the details of the investigation. He has previously disclosed his attendance at the July 2005 meeting, as well as another in March 2006, at which findings of a second phase of the investigation were discussed.

In the Wilson Sonsini memo, the lawyers wrote that Mr. Hurd said he wasn't aware that pretexting was being used to obtain phone records. Mr. Hurd told the lawyers he had only heard the term for the first time recently.

But Mr. Hurd's recollection about the July 22, 2005, meeting, as reported in the lawyers' memo, contains inconsistencies. On the second page of the three-page document, the lawyers wrote that Mr. Hurd confirmed that he attended about 45 minutes of a scheduled, hour-long briefing on the leak probe by H-P's investigators.

Mr. Hurd recalled learning then that the results of the investigation, at that point, were inconclusive, the memo states. He added that he didn't recall what, if any, investigative techniques were discussed at the meeting, or if anyone mentioned phone carriers. On the third page of the memo, however, the lawyers cite his recollection about the possibility that phone records had been obtained off of a Web site.

According to other Wilson Sonsini memos, several other participants at the July 2005 meeting told the lawyers that phone records were discussed, and possibly the use of pretexting as well. H-P investigators Kevin Huska and Tony Gentilucci, who both attended the meeting with Mr. Hurd, told Wilson Sonsini that phone records were discussed, but neither could recall if pretexting was also raised.

Mr. DeLia told the lawyers that any results discussed at the meeting "would have had to include the results of the telephone research." Mr. DeLia also told the lawyers that he explained how pretexting was used at the July 2005 meeting, though he told them he wasn't sure if Mr. Hurd was in the room during the discussion of phone records.

The Wilson Sonsini memo also describes Mr. Hurd's recollection of the March 2006 meeting, which was held in Los Angeles and coincided with H-P's shareholder meeting. Mr. Hurd told the lawyers that Kevin Hunsaker -- an H-P vice president who helped lead the leak probe, and has subsequently resigned -- "explained that they had information regarding phone calls," the memo states.

But questions about the legality of obtaining such records weren't raised, because of Mr. Hurd's previous statements to Ann Baskins, H-P's general counsel, who has also resigned.

"Because Hurd had previously told Baskins that the investigation must be legal, he did not feel the need to question Hunsaker on this point," the memo states, referring to Mr. Hurd.

Write to Peter Waldman at peter.waldman@wsj.com4 and Don Clark at don.clark@wsj.com5

Cingular Wireless Files Suit Against Investigator Over Hewlett-Packard Pretexting (LAW)

By Joe Crea, Legal Times

Legal Times, October 3, 2006

Cingular Wireless filed a lawsuit Friday against Charles Kelly, one of five private investigators who allegedly impersonated Hewlett-Packard Co. board members in an effort to obtain customer calling information.

The case, filed in the U.S. District Court for the Northern District of Georgia, is seeking to get Kelly and his firm, Georgia-based CAS Agency Inc., along with any of its agents, to return confidential caller information and any profits made from the obtained data. The suit asks for an injunction from the court to prevent Kelly and his firm from obtaining any further customer information. It also claims punitive damages.

Kelly, along with other private investigators, was subcontracted through Security Outsourcing Solutions Inc., the company HP hired to determine who on the computer giant's board was leaking sensitive information to the press. Last Thursday, Kelly was subpoenaed to appear before a subcommittee of the U.S. House Energy and Commerce Committee investigating the HP scandal. Kelly and the others took the Fifth Amendment against self-incrimination and were immediately dismissed.

Kelly could not be reached for comment.

Cingular is represented by David Balser and Nathan Garroway of McKenna Long & Aldridge in Atlanta. The suit claims that Kelly and his firm did not obtain authorization from Cingular, its customers or law enforcement agencies to acquire personal customer information, in violation of federal law.

Lawmakers grilled current and former HP executives on Thursday over the scandal, in which hired private investigators for the Palo Alto, Calif.-based company impersonated HP board members, employees, and journalists. The hired guns rifled through people's trash, planted spies in newsrooms, obtained phone records through a practice known as "pretexting," and spied on targeted individuals and their relatives.

On the day of the hearing, Verizon Wireless filed a similar lawsuit in a Trenton, N.J., federal court in response to the HP pretexting scandal.

"Ours is a John Doe lawsuit," says Jeffrey Nelson, executive director of corporate communications for Verizon Wireless. "We don't name any particular individuals [in our suit], but we believe it involved one member of HP's board and potentially a family member of that board member."

Sonsini Received Questionable Novell Options (LAW)

By Justin Scheck, The Recorder

California Recorder, October 3, 2006

As a director and lawyer for several companies suspected of illegally backdating stock options, Larry Sonsini has been under scrutiny the last six months for any role he may have played in option deals for employees.

But a Recorder review of SEC documents suggests Sonsini's involvement with suspiciously dated options wasn't limited to those he approved for other people.

Indeed, records filed by software maker Novell Inc. -- which recently announced it has hired outside counsel to review past option grant practices -- show that in 1999, Sonsini and the rest of the company's board deviated from their normal compensation plan by awarding themselves 50,000 options apiece.

That grant came on Oct. 26, when the stock was priced at a 17-month low. Over the next two months the share price would more than double, making the award worth more than $1 million on paper.

The timing of the Novell grant raises the question of whether the options were actually doled out the day the company said they were, according to corporate governance experts.

But that's not the only issue raised by these options. Less than a month after the grant, Novell announced exceedingly rosy financial figures from the previous fiscal year. From a nadir of $16.69 on the grant date, the stock eventually hit $39.94 by the end of December.

Ultimately, the options would become worthless before vesting due to the tech market crash.

Nevertheless, the series of events makes experts wonder whether the grants were also "spring-loaded" -- that is, intentionally issued just before positive disclosures that the board knew would impact share prices. The SEC does not seem to view spring-loading with nearly the same severity as it does backdating, but the practice still troubles many experts, especially in this case.

"It doesn't smell good," said Boalt Hall School of Law professor Jesse Fried, an expert in corporate governance and insider trading. "This was at the annual low and was an off-cycle grant, and it's highly likely that this was spring-loaded."

Neither Sonsini -- who left the Novell board in 2002 -- nor a spokeswoman from the firm he chairs, Wilson Sonsini Goodrich & Rosati, would comment for this story.

On Aug. 29, though, Novell announced it was reviewing its option grant practices, and that the audit could lead to a restatement of past earnings under SEC rules governing executive pay.

"It's a comprehensive review," said Novell spokesman Bruce Lowry. He wouldn't comment on the ongoing work being done by lawyers at Morgan, Lewis & Bockius. Linda Griggs, a partner at the firm who is working on the probe, said Friday she was too busy to comment.

However, Lowry did confirm that grants to board members would be included in the examination. "It is all grants that are being reviewed," he said.

ABNORMAL PRACTICES

Novell's disclosure came at the tail end of a long train of admissions by companies that their option grants raised suspicion.

Since The Wall Street Journal first reported early this year on the apparently widespread practice of changing dates on stock options, more than 100 companies have come under scrutiny.

At least six companies gave out suspiciously dated options at times when Sonsini sat on their boards. Two of them -- Pixar and Novell -- have publicly announced internal probes of past grants. Another, Brocade, has seen former executives indicted for past options practices. And three others, LSI Logic, Lattice Semiconductor Corp. and Echelon Corp, were identified by The Recorder in August as having suspiciously timed grants to top executives.

Speaking privately because they are involved in stock option probes, several attorneys said questions about director grants have come up at a handful of companies being investigated by the SEC. But, they said, such cases are rare. At the majority of companies, board members only received options once a year at a pre-determined date outlined in a director compensation plan.

Novell had just such a system to keep directors out of the awkward position of awarding options to themselves. Every spring, on the day of Novell's annual shareholder meeting, each director would receive 15,000 options at the share price on the day of the meeting, in accordance with guidelines ratified by shareholders in 1996.

"No person shall have any discretion to select which outside directors shall be granted options, or to determine the number of shares to be covered by options granted to outside directors," the plan said.

DOJ_NMG_0073344

But Novell's directors deviated from that policy three times between 1996 and 2001, granting themselves options at dates other than the annual meetings. On those occasions, the board cited a 1991 stock plan for the authority to make such grants.

The fact that Novell had guidelines for option grants -- and that directors strayed from them -- is particularly disturbing, said lawyers and academics.

"It should be an issue of shareholder concern whenever a board changes its own compensation," said Kirk Hanson, the director of the Markkula Center for Applied Ethics at Santa Clara University and a former Stanford University business professor.

While directors are generally permitted to award themselves whatever they want as long as it is publicly disclosed, Hanson said basic principles of corporate governance hold that they should avoid giving themselves pieces of the company just because they can.

It's not entirely clear from documents filed with the SEC how Novell's board decided to make the out-of-cycle grants in 1997, 1999 and again in 2001. Besides Sonsini, two other ex-board members -- former FCC Chairman Reed Hundt and Jack Messman, who was ousted as Novell CEO earlier this year -- declined to explain.

At the time of the 1999 grant, Hundt served on the company's compensation committee, while Messman sat on both the compensation and corporate governance committees.

"I think it is inappropriate for me to comment," Messman said, especially given the terms of his severance agreement. "I'm in a contract that prevents me from talking."

Hundt, who is also a former Latham & Watkins partner, said he didn't recall discussions about options grants in 1999, and that they wouldn't have been of any importance to him because he didn't exercise Novell options.

MEASURING THE FALLOUT

When the company's 1999 fiscal year ended Oct. 31, the stock options ostensibly awarded a week earlier already looked promising. The company had had a successful fourth quarter, capping off a good year. After sliding by nearly 50 percent over the previous three months, the company's stock had begun climbing again.

On Nov. 10 Messman and Hundt reported their options to the SEC. On Nov. 23 Novell announced that its 1999 financial results were extremely positive. Sonsini reported his options a few weeks later.

"The options were awarded before good news was released, when they probably knew good news would be released," said Fried, the Boalt professor, basing his opinion on a description of the events at Novell. As far as the dates on the grants go, "we don't know if there was backdating, but if options were granted on a low like that, the probability the options would be granted on a low is very low."

None of the other out-of-cycle grants to Novell directors came at annual lows; the 2001 grant, for example, was awarded on Sept. 10 that year -- hardly a good time to receive any stock. Ironically, that grant now is much more valuable than the questionable 1999 award. The 2001 option to buy 50,000 shares came at a strike price of $3.92. With Novell now trading at just over $6 a share, that grant was worth just over $110,000 as of last week. It is unclear whether Sonsini has ever exercised any of those options.

It's also unclear what -- if any -- consequences Novell's directors could face if they're found to have improperly handled options. First, the company will need to disclose the results of its internal investigation. And even if the Morgan Lewis lawyers find wrongdoing, it may not be serious enough to warrant a significant financial restatement, or government interest.

While spring-loading remains troubling to business ethicists, the SEC's chief accountant, Conrad Hewitt, issued a letter Sept. 19 indicating that the SEC won't consider the practice to have significant accounting ramifications.

As far as criminal or civil liability goes, that's less certain: Federal prosecutors and SEC enforcement agents haven't said whether they'll consider the behavior problematic, though white collar defense lawyers say they don't expect it to be a major issue.

"Some may see it as unseemly or distasteful," said one attorney speaking on condition of anonymity because he is conducting probes of several companies where spring-loading questions have come up. "However, if someone felt there was an ironclad theory of prosecution, you would have heard of it by now."

But that doesn't make Fried feel any better.

DOJ_NMG_0073345

"The problem is with disclosure. They were giving themselves in-the-money options," he said. "They were formally at-the-money, but they were really in the money."

And while the SEC might say it's legal, "from a corporate governance perspective, they're doing something improper, or they appear to have done it," Fried said.

Mills Chief Retires But Must Repay Costs For Jet Travel (WP)

By Terence O'hara

The Washington Post, October 3, 2006

Laurence C. Siegel, who ran one of the most successful mall empires in America before a series of operational and accounting blunders cost his investors billions of dollars, retired as Mills Corp. chief executive Friday and is being asked to repay more than $360,000 in personal travel on a company-chartered jet.

Mills, which has lost nearly $2.2 billion of its market value in the past 12 months, will pay Siegel $2.5 million in severance pay and $10.5 million if the company is sold by the end of next year, a likely event because Mills is actively trying to find a buyer for a 42-mall portfolio that includes Potomac Mills in Virginia and Arundel Mills in Maryland.

The Chevy Chase company described the departure of Siegel, 53, as a retirement and said its timing was not related to the personal travel expenses he is being asked to repay or to a soon-to-be completed investigation by the company's independent directors into Mills management and accounting failures.

"They're unrelated," said Mark S. Ordan, a veteran retail real estate executive who was appointed chief operating officer of Mills earlier this year and then was named to succeed Siegel as president and chief executive. "He felt this was a good time to leave, a natural time to leave, given everything that is going on with the company. It had nothing to do" with the travel expenses.

Siegel did not respond to requests for comment. Both he and the company signed agreements not to disparage each other.

Siegel, who became chief executive of Mills in 1996, expanded the concept of the regional mega-mall to spectacular size and ostentation, and shoppers flocked to the company's properties in the 1990s. Mills, fueled by a bull market in real estate stocks and billions in investment from the German real estate fund company Kan Am, planned, built and bought dozens of malls in the last decade to become a rival to such mall companies as Indianapolis-based Simon Property Group Inc., Australia's Westfield Group and New York's Vornado Realty Trust.

The rapid growth masked underlying problems in Mills' operations, which surfaced in a series of accounting errors. As the nature and extent of the problems became clear over the past nine months, Siegel rapidly lost credibility with the investors that had provided Mills with capital to keep its costly developments afloat.

The company's biggest construction project, a $2 billion retail and entertainment complex called Xanadu in northern New Jersey, became emblematic of Siegel's ambitions. Plans include an indoor ski slope and a 30-story Ferris wheel tall enough to be seen in Manhattan, eight miles away. Siegel held a $2 million party at the site two years ago to celebrate the signing of a lease with New Jersey officials. The project is now over budget and under increasingly skeptical scrutiny from its lenders and financial backers, and Mills is negotiating to sell its interest.

Ordan defended the $10.5 million Siegel could receive if Mills is sold.

"Larry has been the CEO of this company for a very long time, and the portfolio of assets that we have were developed and bought under his guidance," Ordan said. "And most of the payments we're talking about are contractual obligations."

Nonetheless, two Wall Street analysts were critical.

"The award seems somewhat excessive given the company's fall from grace," RBC Capital Markets analyst Rich Moore told investors in a research note yesterday.

Bank of America analyst Ross Nussbaum said the $10.5 million in cash Siegel will be paid if the company is sold presents a conflict because Siegel will remain on Mills' board of directors and would vote on any deal. Nussbaum said the sales-related bonus gives Siegel an incentive "to vote for a sale of the company at a lower price than if he were receiving a stock payment."

Siegel agreed to remain non-executive chairman of Mills. If Xanadu is sold, Mills said he might "join the new joint venture" that would acquire the mall and resign his chairmanship, while remaining on the board. Mills is currently in a protracted negotiation with Kan Am and Colony Capital, which would take over the project and agree to fund its remaining construction costs. The closing of the deal has been delayed twice, however, because of the complexities of the transaction, Ordan said. The deal is considered by Wall Street as a vital step in the ultimate sale of Mills. Further complicating matters: Kan Am has three of Mills' 14 board seats and is a large shareholder in Mills.

DOJ_NMG_0073346

Siegel's personal use of the company aircraft was left largely unexplained by the company in a Securities and Exchange Commission filing yesterday. Ordan declined to comment on it. Personal use of jets by chief executives has been a controversial corporate governance issue for years. SEC and Internal Revenue Service rules regarding what makes a trip personal and not business, and whether it should be disclosed, have been toughened in the last two years.

Siegel would have had ample opportunity to use a jet, personally tending to business all over the country and in European capitals where Mills owned or was building malls. While the company did not own such a plane, it had access to several, including a Gulfstream G-III, from a chartering company.

In yesterday's SEC filing, Mills said Siegel must repay "any non-business related perquisites that may have been provided to (him), including $362,156 for personal use of the company chartered aircraft and personal flights paid by the company."

Siegel has two weeks to make the payment, documents said.

Mills has never before disclosed in SEC documents that Siegel or any other executive used corporate aircraft for any purpose. Siegel was paid more than $5 million in cash in 2004, the last year for which Mills reported executive compensation.

In Namibia Court, Arguments Over Bail For Options Fugitive (NYT)

By John Grobler

The New York Times, October 3, 2006

WINDHOEK, Namibia, Oct. 2 — After arriving here two months ago, Jacob Alexander, the former chief executive of Comverse Technology wanted in the United States on stock option fraud charges, transferred about $16 million to Namibia from Israel, bought a house and put his children into a local school, a Windhoek court was told on Monday.

During the hearing on his bail application, Mr. Alexander, 54, showed every sign that he would fight efforts to extradite him to the United States to face charges of conspiracy, securities fraud and money laundering involving a suspected scheme to backdate stock options at Comverse.

A 32-count indictment against Mr. Alexander was unsealed last week by federal prosecutors in Brooklyn.

One of Mr. Alexander's lawyers here, Herman Oosthuizen, said his client would be willing to hand over his Israeli passport and post bail of about $1.36 million. Mr. Oosthuizen also told the court in Windhoek that Mr. Alexander had invested about $1.5 million in local low-cost housing and other start-up business ventures in Namibia and had been granted a two-year work permit.

Mr. Alexander and his wife bought a house in a gated community adjoining the government-owned Windhoek Country Club, according to an affidavit by Mr. Alexander.

An F.B.I. agent, Marilyn Williams, who works out of the United States Embassy in Pretoria, South Africa, urged the court to reject the bail application. She said Mr. Alexander failed to return to New York on July 20 from a vacation in Israel to face questions from federal prosecutors.

Mr. Alexander, she said, had also offered as much as $5 million — and then "a name-your-price offer" — to a colleague at Comverse to take the blame in the stock options case. She did not identify the employee, but said that the person had agreed to cooperate with the investigation.

The bail hearing will continue on Tuesday. Mr. Alexander remains incarcerated.

Ex-Comverse Chief Executive Says He Will Plead Not Guilty (AP)

By Celean Jacobson

AP, October 3, 2006

JOHANNESBURG, South Africa — The fugitive ex-CEO of Comverse Technology Inc., who is wanted in the United States for stock-options fraud, told a Namibian court Monday he intends to plead not guilty and claimed the warrant for his arrest was invalid.

DOJ_NMG_0073347

Jacob "Kobi" Alexander, the former chief executive of the New York-based maker of voice mail software, said he entered the southern African nation openly and lawfully and had invested in businesses there before he was arrested after a two-month international manhunt.

Alexander was arrested Sept. 26 in the Namibian capital of Windhoek at the request of the FBI. He is accused of making about $6.4 million by illegally backdating stock options.

A bail hearing began Monday in a Namibian court and will continue Tuesday. The Namibian government said it opposed bail pending a formal extradition request from the United States, said Justice Ministry official Dennis Khama. Marlene Williams, an FBI agent based in South Africa, also opposed bail.

The U.S. has 30 days to lodge a formal extradition request. U.S. Attorney Roslynn Mauskopf said last week that she would seek Alexander's swift extradition to face charges in federal court in New York.

In an affidavit filed with the court, Alexander, 54, an Israeli citizen, said he had been living in the desert country with his wife and three children since July and had transferred almost $16 million from Israel to Namibian commercial banks.

"While in Namibia I have used my own name openly and publicly in all my encounters and ventures with government officials and private individuals alike," he said. "I entered Namibia openly and lawfully, and I have not in any manner tried to hide my whereabouts from anyone."

Alexander, who has a two-year permit to live and work in Namibia, stays in a $500,000 home he purchased on the Windhoek Country Club Estate. His children attend the city's international school.

According to his statement, he has invested a further $1.5 million in various business ventures in Namibia with local partners.

It is alleged that from 1991 through 2005, Alexander exercised options and sold stock worth approximately $150 million, making a $138 million profit. Of that, about $6.4 million was generated by backdating options.

Checks Already In Place (USAT)

By Dale Oesterle

USA Today, October 3, 2006

Two high profile hedge fund calamities in the past week will no doubt result in renewed calls for more “hedge fund regulation,” whatever that is.

Amaranth Advisors lost a whopping $6 billion in trades of natural gas futures, and Pirate Capital is being investigated of failing to publicly disclose its stock sales. Pirate Capital has been one of the nation's most visible (and colorful) “activist” hedge funds, funds that purchase stock in a company to force through major changes.

The lessons of these events are the reverse of those offered by the hedge fund alarmists. Amaranth's investors quickly accessed the fund books and minimized their losses. There was no general market panic. A maverick trader caused the losses. In a moment of frenzy he simply lost it, exceeding the fund's risk authorization guidelines. There was no institutional intent to defraud anyone. Fund investors will withdraw what money remains, and the fund will whither and die. Pirate Capital has similarly suffered for its transgressions. The Securities and Exchange Commission is after the fund, and several of its top analysts have left.

In other words, the current system of penalties has plenty of bite for funds that misbehave. The plight of Amaranth and Pirate hardly supports a claim for more regulation.

On the other hand, consider the threat of the consequences of regulation too heavy handed. This is an industry of close to 10,000 funds estimated at holding close to $1.3 trillion dollars. It must have some attraction to investors. Overzealous regulation trying to control what cannot be controlled, the financial markets, will encourage more funds to locate offshore and encourage more investors to use foreign markets. Regulation could cost us control over hedge funds, not enhance it. The initial public offering market is already moving from New York to London because of the overly regulatory Sarbanes-Oxley Act of 2002. Our financial industry and its derivative professional communities are suffering as a result.

Hedge funds take huge risks, and inevitably some will fail. A hedge fund failure is not a national calamity, it is a natural and to be expected part of the industry.

DOJ_NMG_0073348

Dale Oesterle is a law professor at Ohio State University.

CRIMINAL LAW:

Foley Enters Alcohol Rehab Center (LAT)

By Noam N. Levey And Chuck Neubauer

The Los Angeles Times, October 3, 2006

WASHINGTON — Former Rep. Mark Foley, the disgraced Florida lawmaker who quit last week after revelations about explicit messages he sent to a former teenage House page surfaced, has begun seeking treatment at a rehabilitation facility for alcoholism, his lawyer said today.

"I strongly believe that I am an alcoholic and have accepted the need for immediate treatment for alcoholism and other behavioral problems," Foley said in a statement released through his attorney, David Roth. The lawyer did not reveal where Foley was receiving treatment.

Pressure has been mounting on Republicans over their handling of the scandal involving Foley. The FBI said Sunday that it had begun a preliminary inquiry to determine whether the disgraced Florida lawmaker had violated federal law by sending sexually explicit instant messages to at least one teenager who had served as a congressional page.

House Speaker J. Dennis Hastert (R-Ill.), who had asked for a federal investigation, told reporters today that no party leaders had seen the messages until ABC News released them Friday.

"Congressman Foley duped a lot of people," Hastert said. "I have known him for all the years [12] he has served in this House, and he deceived me too."

Hastert expressed relief that Foley had resigned. "If he had not," Hastert said, "I would have demanded his expulsion."

Appearing with Hastert, Rep. John Shimkus (R-Ill.), chairman of the board that oversees Congress' page program, said the board in recent years had provided a new dormitory for pages with "state-of-the-art security measures." He said the board would provide a toll-free hotline for family members with concerns about safety.

Hastert and Shimkus refused to take questions from reporters, who wanted to know when they learned about Foley's messages to the teenage page.

Hastert — who has been battling accusations that House Republicans inadequately handled concerns that Foley had sent inappropriate though not overtly sexual e-mails last year to another former page — also asked Florida Gov. Jeb Bush to see whether state laws had been broken.

In response to these charges, Hastert said today, "Since I have been speaker, we have moved aggressively to ensure the safety of these kids."

But the Republicans' effort to distance the party from Foley may be complicated by his close ties with the party's campaign operation.

Foley's longtime chief of staff is now a senior aide to Rep. Thomas M. Reynolds (R-N.Y.), who as chairman of the National Republican Congressional Committee is leading the effort to maintain the GOP majority in the House. In addition, Foley's campaign committee gave $100,000 to the NRCC this summer, campaign finance records show.

Seizing on the campaign donation, which put Foley among the GOP committee's bigger donors, the Democratic National Committee stepped up its accusations that Reynolds and other Republican leaders were more interested in protecting Foley than investigating potential misconduct.

"Why did Republican congressional leaders choose not to ask the critical questions about the nature and full extent of Congressman Foley's criminal actions involving minors at the time they first learned about it?" Democratic Party Communications Director Karen Finney said Sunday.

Foley, a six-term Republican who was co-chair of the Congressional Missing and Exploited Children's Caucus, resigned his seat Friday after ABC News questioned him about the sexually explicit instant messages he reportedly sent three years ago.

DOJ_NMG_0073349

House Republican leaders have been under pressure since then to explain what they knew about Foley's behavior and when they knew it. They acknowledged Saturday that they had known for some time about Foley's "over-friendly" e-mails, sent to a 16-year-old Louisiana boy, but said they had not known about the sexually explicit earlier messages before last week.

In the fall of 2005, the 16-year-old, who had finished a term as a page that year sponsored by Rep. Rodney Alexander (R-La.), complained to a staffer in Alexander's office after receiving a series of e-mails from Foley. In them, the congressman asked for a photo and talked to the teenager about another boy being "in great shape."

After hearing from the teen and his parents, Alexander's staffers discussed their concerns with their counterparts in Hastert's office. As a result, the House clerk and the congressman in charge of the House Page Board met with Foley, who told them that his relationship with the boy was that of a mentor. They instructed him to cease his contacts with the boy.

Earlier this year, Alexander also discussed the matter with Reynolds and with House Majority Leader John A. Boehner (R-Ohio). Reynolds has said that he discussed it with Hastert, though the House speaker has said he has no recollection of the conversation but has no reason to doubt Reynolds.

In his letter to Gonzales, released several hours after Senate Minority Leader Harry Reid (D-Nev.) had demanded a Justice Department investigation, Hastert said the House clerk and the head of the Page Board had believed their private meeting with Foley "resolved the situation."

But the revelation of the sexually explicit instant messages — sent, Hastert said, to "another former page or pages" — warranted criminal referral for two reasons: to determine whether Foley had violated federal laws on interstate communications, and to discover whether "there are persons who knew or had possession of these messages but did not report them to the appropriate authorities."

Given that the instant messages were sent in 2003, Hastert said, "I request that the scope of your investigation include any and all individuals who may have been aware of this matter — be they members of Congress, employees of the House of Representatives, or anyone outside the Congress."

Hastert's efforts did not quell the political storm gathering around the GOP, however.

House Minority Leader Nancy Pelosi (D-San Francisco) on Sunday called on GOP House leaders to explain their actions under oath before the House Ethics Committee.

The Democratic National Committee noted Sunday that Foley's contribution, which the NRCC reported receiving on Aug. 7, came after Reynolds had acknowledged having learned about the Louisiana page's complaint.

NRCC spokesman Carl Forti said the campaign donation had no impact on how Reynolds handled the matter, explaining that Reynolds told Hastert about the problem as soon as he learned about the e-mails.

"This is nothing more than pure politics at its worst," Forti said, dismissing the Democratic charge that Reynolds should have done more.

"Even to insinuate that is ridiculous."

Forti said Reynolds had not known about the explicit instant messages, in which Foley discussed sexual matters with at least one other former page.

But Reynolds did work closely with someone who knew Foley well.

Kirk Fordham, a veteran Republican legislative staffer who has worked on Capitol Hill for much of the last 17 years, served as Foley's chief of staff from 1995 to 2004. Fordham also managed Foley's first campaign for Congress, in 1994.

In 2005, Fordham went to work for DCI Group, a leading GOP political strategy group. The same year, he became Reynolds' chief of staff.

Fordham could not be reached for comment Sunday.

Forti said Sunday he did not know whether Reynolds and Fordham had discussed Foley after Reynolds was told of the page's complaint.

Pressure Grows For G.O.P. Over Foley Scandal (NYT)

By Carl Hulse And Jeff Zeleny

The New York Times, October 3, 2006

WASHINGTON, Oct. 2 — Speaker J. Dennis Hastert faced intensifying questions on Monday about why Republicans had not reacted more assertively to Representative Mark Foley's messages to a teenage page, as members of his party, fearing a political debacle, demanded a strong response.

Straining to hold the party together five weeks from Election Day amid unfolding revelations about the case, Mr. Hastert and his leadership team held a conference call with House Republicans on Monday night and heard blunt advice and criticism from participants who pressed for further action to reassure voters.

"This is a political problem, and we need to step up and do something dramatic," Representative Ray LaHood of Illinois said afterward, adding that he had proposed abolishing the Congressional page program.

Mr. Foley, 52, who resigned Friday after being confronted with sexually explicit instant messages he had sent to pages, released a statement saying he had entered a rehabilitation clinic for treatment of "alcoholism and related behavioral problems."

At a news conference in West Palm Beach, Fla., late Monday, Mr. Foley's lawyer, David Roth, said that Mr. Foley had sent the inappropriate e-mail messages while under the influence of alcohol and that he had kept his drinking problem secret.

A former aide and other associates said in interviews that they did not believe Mr. Foley had a drinking problem.

ABC News, which first reported the sexually explicit messages on Friday, said Monday that additional messages suggested that Mr. Foley had met in person with a teenage page outside Capitol Hill and had sought a relationship.

"I miss you lots since San Diego," Mr. Foley wrote, using his screen name, Maf54, according to a transcript obtained and released by ABC.

"Ya I cant wait til dc," the page replied.

Federal law enforcement officials said the F.B.I. in recent months had been given e-mail messages between Mr. Foley and a page but had found insufficient grounds to open a criminal investigation. A group called Citizens for Responsibility and Ethics in Washington said Monday that it had forwarded the messages to the Federal Bureau of Investigation on July 21 and requested an investigation. The group would not say where it had obtained the messages; it made them public after the ABC report.

Federal agents on Monday began contacting men who were in the Congressional page program in recent years, said government officials briefed on the matter, who asked not to be named because they were not authorized to discuss the inquiry. The officials said the agents were trying to find any former or current pages who had had contact with Mr. Foley and to authenticate e-mail and instant messages attributed to the former lawmaker that had circulated on the Internet in recent days.

The officials said that several pages who had received electronic messages from Mr. Foley had already been located.

At the White House, Tony Snow, President Bush's press secretary, initially characterized the scandal as "naughty e-mails," drawing a blistering response from Democrats who said his words suggested that Republicans did not understand the gravity of the situation.

Mr. Hastert, who returned to the Capitol to deal with the escalating scandal, was pressed by reporters to explain why the first communication between Mr. Foley and a page, which was brought to the attention of Republican leaders last year, had not led to more assertive efforts to determine if it was an isolated case.

Mr. Hastert defended the Republicans' handling of a parent's complaint last year about communication from Mr. Foley to the parent's teenage son. But he acknowledged that the e-mail inquiring about the boy's well being and requesting a photo was potentially troubling.

"I think that raised a red flag, raised a red flag with the kid, raised a red flag with the parents," said Mr. Hastert, who repeated that he could not recall learning of the messages before news of them broke last week. But the speaker said he and others had been "duped" by Mr. Foley, who when questioned about the e-mail said it was an innocent effort to make sure that the young man, who was from Louisiana, had made it through Hurricane Katrina.

Representative John Shimkus, Republican of Illinois, and the House clerk, Jeff Trandahl, instructed Mr. Foley to break off any contact with the former page. At the time, Republicans did not purse the matter further, considering the case closed.

"Would have, could have, should have," Mr. Hastert said, responding to questions about whether Republicans should have done more.

DOJ_NMG_0073351

In Florida, Republicans met on Monday and chose Joe Negron, a conservative state representative, as a replacement candidate for the 16th Congressional District seat held by Mr. Foley. The ballots, however, have already been printed, and Mr. Foley's name will remain. If he wins, the votes will go to Mr. Negron.

The House majority leader, John A. Boehner of Ohio, dismissed that possibility. "To vote for this candidate, you have to vote for Mark Foley," Mr. Boehner said on a conservative radio program hosted by Sean Hannity. "How many people are going to hold their nose to do that?"

The case has led to varying accounts from two members of the leadership. Representative Thomas M. Reynolds of New York, who runs the House Republican campaign effort and is in a close race, has acknowledged learning generally about Mr. Foley's initial e-mail messages this past spring. Mr. Reynolds has said he raised the matter with Mr. Hastert, who said he did not recall the exchange but did not dispute that it happened.

"I did what most of us would have done in the workplace," Mr. Reynolds told reporters in Amherst, N.Y., on Monday night. "I heard something, I took it to my supervisor."

Across the country, in competitive and noncompetitive races, Democrats seized on an issue that they said was resonating with voters. In an effort coordinated in Washington by the Democratic Congressional Campaign Committee, the party's candidates urged their Republican opponents to call for the resignation of Mr. Hastert and other leaders.

In Indiana, Baron Hill, a Democratic candidate for a House seat, asked the incumbent, Representative Mike Sodrel, a first-term Republican, to reject any financial contributions from the national party. In North Carolina, where Representative Robin Hayes, a Republican, is engaged in a tough campaign fight, the state Democratic Party issued a statement asking, "Who does Robin Hayes stand up for — Mark Foley and the Republican House leadership or under-age children?"

As Congressional Republicans campaigned Monday in their districts, they responded to the Democratic criticism and distanced themselves from Mr. Foley's behavior.

"We need to admit that this was done on our watch," Mr. LaHood said. He added that when he arrived home after Congress adjourned early Saturday, the page program was what constituents asked about.

"The first three questions I was asked when I arrived in Peoria," he said, "were not about immigration, the war or taxes. It was, 'What are you going to do about the page program?' "

The Foley case also drew criticism from conservative groups. "It's one of the worst Congressional scandals ever," Cliff Kincaid, editor of the conservative Accuracy in Media Report, wrote Sunday in an editorial circulated by Gopusa.com, a Republican Web site. "A top House Republican who denounced sex predators as 'animals' stands accused of acting like one."

At the news conference Monday night, Mr. Roth, Mr. Foley's lawyer, denied that Mr. Foley had ever had inappropriate physical contact with minors. "Mark Foley has never, ever had inappropriate sexual contact with a minor in his life," Mr. Roth said. "He is absolutely, positively not a pedophile."

On Political Track For Decades, Foley's Career Derails In Days (USAT)

By Susan Page

USA Today, October 3, 2006

WASHINGTON — It may well have been the proudest moment of Mark Foley's career in Congress: standing in the front row of lawmakers in the Rose Garden as President Bush signed a sweeping bill the Florida Republican had helped draft and pass.

The Adam Walsh Child Protection and Safety Act, toughening laws designed to shield children from exploitation, represented "a huge step forward," Foley told USA TODAY in an interview just before the ceremony in July. The Internet had given sexual predators new ways to reach kids, and the laws needed to respond, he said: "We track library books better than we do sex offenders."

Foley's worst moment was, presumably, nine weeks later, when he resigned in the wake of allegations that he had sent improper e-mails and instant messages, some of which were sexually explicit, to teenage boys who had worked as congressional pages.

As the FBI looked into whether federal laws were broken, Foley announced in a statement that he accepted "full responsibility" and was checking himself into a rehabilitation facility for alcoholism treatment.

It was an abrupt end to the political ambitions that began when Foley was 6 and watched admiring constituents flock around his congressman. He has been running for a succession of offices since he was 23. Just three years ago, he was a leading contender for a U.S. Senate seat.

Now, at 52, he has joined the rogues' gallery of members of Congress who resigned in disgrace.

"He was very well-liked, very outgoing, very likable," says Florida state Sen. Dave Aronberg, a Democrat who often ran into Foley at community gatherings. "He was at every event. He used to say, 'I'd go to the opening of an envelope.' "

Foley was the most accessible member of Congress from the area, Aronberg says, adding, "I hope he gets help."

In an interview last year with The Hill, a newspaper for members of Congress and their staffs, Foley recalled riding his bike to the Lantana Shopping Center in South Florida at age 6. Rep. Paul Rogers, who was shaking hands, gave Foley $5 to hand out campaign brochures. "For whatever reason, it stuck," Foley said. "That was my dream."

He was a local boy — born in Newton, Mass., but a resident of Lake Worth since his family moved there when he was 3. He attended Palm Beach Junior College for a year, then opened a restaurant, the Lettuce Patch. At 23, he was appointed to the Lake Worth City Council. He was a Democrat at first but switched to the GOP before he began a slow climb through political offices: vice-mayor of Lake Worth, a member of the Florida House of Representatives, then a Florida state senator at age 38.

Lois Frankel, a onetime Democratic leader of the state House, remembers Foley as a "master" of politics. "No matter what side of the aisle you were on, you had to admire his ability to work a room, to deliver a message," says Frankel, who is now mayor of West Palm Beach.

When state House district lines were redrawn and Foley found himself in a predominantly Democratic district, he ran for a state Senate seat instead. "He kept picking himself up and moving on," Frankel says.

When the local member of Congress decided to retire in 1994, Foley won a three-way Republican primary and trounced his Democratic opponent by 16 percentage points. He has never gotten less than 60% of the vote for re-election.

Once in Congress, Foley generally voted as a conservative Republican but showed an independent streak on social issues. For one thing, he supported abortion rights. He voted in favor of the Defense of Marriage Act, which defined marriage as between a man and a woman, but against amending the Constitution to ban gay marriage.

He sometimes broke with the Bush administration on trade, opposing the Central American Free Trade Agreement last year because, he said, it could hurt Florida's sugar industry.

Foley earned a reputation in Washington as a hard worker, a prodigious fundraiser and a reliable person for Capitol Hill reporters to go to for a quote. "If he said he would do something, he did it," says former Florida senator Bob Graham, a Democrat.

Joe Scarborough, a former Florida congressman first elected with Foley in 1994, says Foley reached out to him. "Mark knew I had never been an elected official before," says Scarborough, now the host of a program on MSNBC. "He said if there was anything he could do to help me out, he'd be glad to do it."

In 2002, Foley was the Republican speaker — freshman New York Sen. Hillary Rodham Clinton was the Democratic one — delivering humorous remarks to the annual dinner sponsored by the Washington Press Club Foundation.

He delivered a David Letterman-style "Top 10" list of "suspicious activities in Washington."

No. 4 was "Defense Secretary Donald Rumsfeld addressing reporters as adults." No. 3 was "former vice president Al Gore saying: 'Pie? No thanks. I'm on a diet.' "

"And the No. 1 most suspicious activity in Washington," Foley concluded to laughter, "is Mark Foley telling a reporter 'no comment.' "

Foley had hopes of moving up one more step — to the U.S. Senate when Graham retired in 2004. The congressman began campaigning across the state. After several publications in Florida and Washington ran stories saying he was gay, Foley called a news conference in May 2003 to address the swirling rumors.

"Everyone's talking about it," he acknowledged, but he called it nobody's business. "My mother and father raised me and the rest of my family to believe that there are certain things we shouldn't discuss in public." He said the speculation was "revolting and unforgivable."

Four months later, he withdrew from the Senate race, saying he wanted to spend more time with his ailing 82-year-old father.

DOJ_NMG_0073353

Rumors about Foley's sexual orientation didn't cause much of a stir in Washington and didn't imperil his re-election to the House. In 2004, he was unopposed in the Republican primary and won the general election with 68% of the vote.

Allegations in recent days of his behavior toward congressional pages, however, have cost him dearly. Some of his colleagues express bafflement at what was apparently a double life. "There were two Mark Foleys," says Rep. Clay Shaw, a fellow Florida Republican. "One was a nice guy and the other is a child predator."

Some of those who worked with him on children's issues — he was co-chairman of the House Caucus on Missing and Exploited Children — are dumbfounded. Patty Wetterling, a children's advocate in Minnesota who is running for Congress as a Democrat, says she feels "a very big sadness and betrayal."

Singer-turned-politician Sonny Bono and his wife, Mary, worked with Foley on a task force designed to boost ties between Republicans and Hollywood. When Sonny Bono died in a skiing accident, Mary Bono sold his 1994 Jeep Wrangler to Foley.

On Monday, Mary Bono, now a Republican House member from California, issued a statement calling Foley's conduct "unacceptable and abhorrent." If he has violated the law, she said, "he should be prosecuted."

Little-known Job Caught In Spotlight (USAT)

By Brad Heath

USA Today, October 3, 2006

Like many former congressional pages, Ben Cavataro said he was drawn to the page program by an interest in politics and the opportunity to see the workings of government up-close.

Cavataro, a 17-year-old high school senior from Palm Beach Gardens, Fla., said Rep. Mark Foley, a Republican representing his district, nominated him to be a page last summer.

On Friday, Foley abruptly quit the House of Representatives after ABC News reported he had sent sexually explicit messages to a former page. House leaders subsequently asked the FBI to investigate.

In the wake of Foley's resignation, the role — and relative security — of these high school students is facing new scrutiny. Rep. John Shimkus, R-Ill., the chairman of the board that oversees the program, said the House will set up a hotline for pages and their parents to report concerns.

The allegations against Foley surprised Cavataro, who only briefly met Foley during his three-week stint as a page last summer.

"There was no indication of anything improper with Foley or anybody else," Cavataro said. "We talked for like two minutes and shook hands."

His experience mirrored those of many of the scores of other pages who ferry messages between members of Congress on Capitol Hill each year. Theirs is typically one of Washington's least-noticed jobs. No longer.

"I hope it doesn't make the page program into a joke like the White House internship program was after (Monica) Lewinsky," said Dave Aronberg, a Democratic state senator in Florida and former House page who was referring to the intern who had oral sex in the Oval Office with President Clinton. "It's given a lot of kids a lot of great opportunities."

The House and Senate each select a group of pages annually to shuttle messages from office to office and to and from the floor of the Capitol. Typically, the job spans a semester of a school year or a few weeks during the summer.

The House takes about 60-70 pages during each period; the Senate takes about half as many. During the school year, the pages attend morning classes at schools that are part of the program.

House and Senate pages must be at least 16 years old when they're nominated. The programs are meant to be strictly supervised. House pages live in a brick dormitory near the Capitol, under a 10 p.m. weeknight curfew.

Rush Seale, who was a Senate page in 1999 and a House page in 2000, said few pages have one-on-one access to members of Congress. "It would have been kind of unusual," Seale said.

In 1983 the House censured two representatives for sexual encounters with 17-year-old pages. As a result, pages were required to live in the program's dorm.

DOJ_NMG_0073354

Rick Gagliano, who was a page in 1976, said the scandals shouldn't overshadow the program. “Yes there have been some terrible situations in the page program history, but like the institution of the House of Representatives itself, the positive experiences and good work the page program does far outweigh the negatives,” he said.

Addictions Are Often Disclosed Amid Scandals (USAT)

By Emily Bazar

USA Today, October 3, 2006

Former congressman Mark Foley's statement that he's an alcoholic, coming after reports that he sent sexually explicit e-mails to congressional pages, makes him the latest public figure to enter rehab in the face of scandal.

Reps. Patrick Kennedy, D-R.I., and Bob Ney, R-Ohio, and actor/director Mel Gibson have sought treatment in recent months for alcohol or drug addiction during trying circumstances.

Doing so removes them from the public eye and may win sympathy, says Gary Jacobson, a political science professor at the University of California, San Diego. It's also a way to shift some of the blame from the person to the addiction, he says.

“This seems to have become standard operating procedure,” Jacobson says. “It's a way of both taking responsibility and denying it at the same time.”

Kennedy checked into treatment in May, a day after he crashed his car near the Capitol. Kennedy, who has a history of drug and alcohol problems, said he was battling an addiction to prescribed painkillers.

Gibson entered an alcohol treatment program this summer after pleading no contest to drunken driving. Gibson made anti-Semitic remarks to arresting officers when he was stopped in Malibu.

Ney announced last month that he was seeking treatment for alcoholism the same day he agreed to plead guilty to corruption charges related to the Jack Abramoff influence-peddling scandal.

Foley's announcement Monday surprised Sarah Chamberlain, executive director of the Republican Main Street Partnership. Foley emceed the group's annual dinner Wednesday.

“At the dinners, he was always working, so usually he didn't have anything to drink,” she says.

Foley has not acknowledged or denied that he sent the e-mails.

Alcoholism may exacerbate other disorders, says Fred Berlin, founder of Johns Hopkins University's Sexual Disorders Clinic. “It can impair a person's judgment and can lead them to become disinhibited with respect to their impulses,” he says. “It's like throwing gasoline on the fire.”

Berlin says alcoholism has reached a level of acceptance that sexual disorders have not. “It's much less socially stigmatizing to admit to alcoholism than it may be to admit to some other problem,” he says.

Foley Joins List Of Sex Scandals On Capitol Hill (WT)

By Eric Pfeiffer

The Washington Times, October 3, 2006

The resignation of former Rep. Mark Foley has shocked Washington, but it is not the first accusation of impropriety with underage congressional pages to make headlines. The investigation of Mr. Foley's misconduct adds to a long history of Capitol Hill sex scandals.

One congressional historian said House members have proven more prone to such scandals.

"With the exception of Bob Packwood, it's mostly been on the House side," said Donald A. Ritchie, associate historian in the Senate's Historical Office. "That doesn't mean there weren't things going on, but it wasn't something that ruined their careers."

Mr. Packwood, Oregon Republican, was forced to resign from the Senate in 1995 in the wake of accusations that he had sexually harassed women.

In 1983, Rep. Gerry Studds, Massachusetts Democrat, was censured by the House for sexual involvement during the previous decade with a 17-year-old male page. Mr. Studds turned his back on members of the House as the charges were read against him. Afterward, Mr. Studds held a press conference with the former page, acknowledging their relationship.

Unlike Mr. Foley, Mr. Studds did not resign from Congress. In fact, he became the first openly homosexual member of Congress and won re-election six more times before retiring in 1996.

DOJ_NMG_0073355

Also in 1983, former Rep. Daniel Crane, Illinois Republican, admitted to having an affair with a 17-year-old female page. Mr. Crane apologized for his actions on the House floor, saying, "I only hope my wife and children will forgive me."

He was voted out of office in 1984.

Why have some members of Congress survived sex scandals while others have not?

"What makes [the Foley scandal] different is that it was off the grid of social acceptability," said Eric Dezenhall, a crisis-management consultant. "You can't spin it. Americans are much more offended by hypocrisy than they are by dishonesty."

Mr. Foley had been co-chairman of the House Caucus on Missing and Exploited Children.

In an interview with CNN yesterday, House Speaker J. Dennis Hastert said he was not aware of Mr. Foley's reported misconduct until the Florida congressman resigned.

"First I was really aware of this was last Friday when it happened," Mr. Hastert said. "And all of a sudden, the press came out and said that there were these e-mails that were from 2003."

Mr. Hastert, Illinois Republican, spent much of the day yesterday meeting privately with the clerk of the House and the Republican chairman of the House page board, CNN reported.

Sex scandals on the Hill have not been limited to those involving congressional pages.

In 1990, Rep. Barney Frank, Massachusetts Democrat, was reprimanded by the House after it was revealed that Mr. Frank's former associate, Steve Gobie, was running a male prostitution ring out of Mr. Frank's apartment. Mr. Frank refused to resign from Congress and has been subsequently re-elected.

In 1989, former Sen. John Tower, Texas Republican, was nominated by President George Bush for secretary of defense. However, Mr. Tower failed to win Senate confirmation after being accused of alcoholism and having affairs with multiple women.

In 1976, Rep. Wayne Hays, Ohio Democrat, resigned after his former secretary, Elizabeth Ray, told reporters that the congressman had hired her and given her raises under the condition that she act as his mistress.

"I can't type. I can't file. I can't even answer the phone," Ms. Ray said at the time.

In 1974, Rep. Wilbur D. Mills, a powerful Arkansas Democrat who was chairman of the House Ways and Means Committee, was a passenger in a car pulled over at 2 a.m. by U.S. Park Police. Mr. Mills was drunk and was accompanied by an Argentine stripper known by the stage name Fanne Foxe, but the ensuing scandal did not prevent him from being re-elected that year.

Later, however, when Mr. Mills was spotted in a nightclub where Miss Foxe was performing, he was stripped of his committee chairmanship and did not seek re-election in 1976.

Foley 'drank In Secret,' Seeking Help, Lawyer Says (PALMBEACHP)

By Brian E. Crowley, Palm Beach Post Political Editor

Palm Beach Post (FL), October 3, 2006

WEST PALM BEACH — Mark Foley is not a pedophile and "never ever" had sexual contact with minors, his attorney said Monday.

Instead, David Roth, a prominent criminal defense attorney with offices in West Palm Beach, portrayed Foley as a troubled alcoholic who has suffered from mental illness much of his adult life.

"Mark is an alcoholic. He drank in secret. He did not drink in public," Roth said. "He had two lives with regard to his alcohol consumption. In public, and in public service, he was sober. When he was alone, he was not sober. He is an acknowledged alcoholic."

Foley is now in treatment for alcoholism and mental illness at an undisclosed center, where he is expected to remain for at least 30 days, Roth said.

Roth said he was contacted by Foley on Friday, minutes after the Fort Pierce Republican resigned from Congress after being confronted with sexually explicit Internet messages he exchanged with a teenage boy.

Asked if Foley, 52, had physical contact with any of the boys with whom he was communicating, Roth said, "Based on all the information that I have, Mark Foley has never ever had an inappropriate sexual contact with a minor in his life."

Asked if Foley is a pedophile, Roth said, "He is absolutely, positively not a pedophile."

DOJ_NMG_0073356

He described Foley as "contrite, remorseful and devastated by the harm that his actions have caused.... He blames no one but himself."

But even as Foley tried to make the case that his problems stemmed from alcohol and mental illness, the FBI and the Florida Department of Law Enforcement were beginning preliminary investigations to determine whether he broke any laws.

On Capitol Hill, House Speaker Dennis Hastert, R-Ill., and other leaders were moving quickly and vigorously to distance themselves from Foley.

Hastert said Monday that House Republican leaders were unaware of the "vile and repulsive" sexually explicit messages Foley had sent to a former page.

"Congressman Foley duped a lot of people," Hastert said at a news conference. "He deceived the good men and women in organizations around this country with whom he worked to strengthen our child predator laws. I have known him for all the years he served in this House. He deceived me, too."

Foley's name was removed from the wall outside his office early Monday. Later in the morning, a congressional employee posted a new sign reading, "Office of the 16th Congressional District of Florida."

His staff now works for the House clerk's office, which also took over his congressional Web site. The staff was warned early Monday not to talk to the media, one staffer said.

And now, what had been considered a safe congressional seat for Republicans is up for grabs. At a hastily called meeting of Republican leaders at the Orlando airport, state Rep. Joe Negron of Stuart was chosen as the nominee.

But Foley's name will remain on the ballot, increasing the odds that turned-off voters will pick Democrat Tim Mahoney, a political newcomer.

House Majority Leader John Boehner, R-Ohio, said in a radio interview with conservative commentator Sean Hannity that Negron is virtually doomed because "to vote for this candidate, you have to vote for Mark Foley. How many people are going to hold their nose to do that?"

Although Hastert said GOP leaders didn't know of the instant messages Foley sent to at least one former page, he conceded earlier that they were aware of other personal but less explicit e-mails Foley had sent to another 16-year-old former page.

In addition to Hastert's office, those informed about the e-mails included Boehner; Rep. John Shimkus, R-Ill., who heads the board overseeing the House page program; and Rep. Thomas Reynolds, R-N.Y., chairman of the National Republican Congressional Committee.

Reynolds said he discussed the e-mails with Hastert. The speaker said he did not dispute Reynolds' account but did not recall the conversation.

Boehner told the Dayton Daily News he was "99 percent" sure he talked to Hastert about the matter, but also said he did not recall their conversation.

Last year, Shimkus said he spoke to Foley about the e-mails, insisting that they cease immediately. But the matter was not made public, taken to the House ethics committee or revealed to Democratic members of the page board.

The GOP leaders' handling of the matter prompted criticism even from some Republicans who said they should have acted more forcefully.

"If they knew or should have known the extent of this problem, they should not serve in leadership," said Rep. Christopher Shays, R-Conn.

Republican leaders also are concerned that the fallout from Foley's exit could hurt other GOP candidates in November. Tony Perkins, president of the Family Research Council, said there is "a real chance" the episode could threaten the GOP's majority status.

"I think the next 48 hours are critical in how this is handled," he said. "When a party holds itself out as the guardian of values, this is not helpful."

Meanwhile, the political firestorm was getting worse in Washington. Democrats were quick to accuse Republicans of not doing enough to protect the congressional pages who live in dorms near the Capitol.

DOJ_NMG_0073357

"Republican leaders admitted to knowing about Mr. Foley's abhorrent behavior for six months to a year and failed to protect the children in their trust," said Minority Leader Nancy Pelosi, D-Calif. "Republican leaders must be investigated by the ethics committee and immediately questioned under oath."

Even the White House was brought into the fray. Spokesman Tony Snow attempted to deflect the political repercussions.

"The House has to clean up the mess, to the extent there is a mess," he said. "This does not affect every Republican in the United States of America, just as bad behavior on Democrats' part is not a reflection on the entire party."

Leaders from dozens of socially conservative groups held a conference call late Monday afternoon, and participants were described as livid with House GOP leaders.

"They are outraged by how Hastert handled this," said Paul Weyrich, a conservative activist who participated in the call. "They feel let down, left aside. How can they allow a guy like that to remain chairman of the committee on missing and exploited children when there is any question about e-mails?"

A watchdog group, Citizens for Responsibility and Ethics in Washington, said it had obtained copies of Foley's e-mails to the 16-year-old former page in late July and immediately turned them over to the FBI.

"They (the e-mails) should have raised a red flag over at the FBI," said Melanie Sloan, the group's executive director and a former prosecutor specializing in sex crimes.

On Monday, the group asked the Justice Department's inspector general to investigate why Foley's e-mails were not pursued.

Sloan said that though the 2005 e-mails were not sexually explicit — asking about the boy's birthday and progress in school, and requesting a photo — "they set off alarm bells for me."

"These are strategies pedophiles often use" to draw in their targets, Sloan said in a conference call with reporters.

Asked about the preliminary inquiry under way at the FBI, Attorney General Alberto Gonzales said Monday: "We're just beginning to look at it right now. I haven't received a report."

The Justice Department sent Hastert a brief letter that said the FBI was "conducting a preliminary investigation into this matter and will work closely with the department's prosecutors to determine whether any violations of federal law have occurred."

The Washington Post reported that a former chief of staff for Foley made one last effort to keep the most damaging messages from going public.

According to media reporter Howard Kurtz, the unnamed chief of staff contacted ABC's Brian Ross, offering to give the network an exclusive about Foley's resignation if Ross agreed "not to publish the raw, sexually explicit messages." Foley resigned after ABC confronted him with those messages.

"I said we're not making any deals," Ross said.

Foley's longtime former chief of staff, Kirk Fordham, did not return a call seeking comment. Fordham is now chief of staff for Reynolds, one of the congressmen who notified Hastert of the complaint from a former page.

Foley Saga No Shock To Some (LAT)

By Noam N. Levey, Maura Reynolds And Richard B. Schmitt

The Los Angeles Times, October 3, 2006

WASHINGTON — Years before sexually explicit electronic messages sent by Rep. Mark Foley to teenage House pages became public last week, some on Capitol Hill say, the Florida Republican was known to have a special interest in younger men.

In interviews with the Los Angeles Times, several current and former congressional employees and others said they recalled Foley approaching young male pages, aides and interns at parties and other venues.

"Almost the first day I got there I was warned," said Mark Beck-Heyman, a San Diego native who served as a page in the House of Representatives in the summer of 1995. "It was no secret that Foley had a special interest in male pages," said Beck-Heyman, adding that Foley, who is now 52, on several occasions asked him out for ice cream.

Another former congressional staff member said he too had been the object of Foley's advances. "It was so well known around the House. Pages passed it along from class to class," said the former aide, adding that when he was 18 a few years ago and working as an intern, Foley approached him at a bar near the Capitol and asked for his e-mail address.

Like most of those willing to discuss Foley, the young man asked not to be named because of concern that speaking openly could harm his career.

Foley resigned from office Friday. His attorney said Monday that Foley had checked himself into an alcohol rehabilitation center. In a statement, Foley said: "I strongly believe that I'm an alcoholic and have accepted the need for immediate treatment for alcoholism and other behavioral problems."

News reports about the messages Foley sent sparked a furor that continues to build. Much of the controversy centers on whether Republican congressional leaders responded aggressively enough when they learned late last year about less salacious e-mails Foley had sent to another page. In those e-mails, Foley asked the page to send a photo of himself and asked how old he was.

The GOP leaders said Monday, as they have since Foley resigned, that the matter had been appropriately handled last year, when the House clerk and congressman in charge of the page program told Foley to cease contact with the page. They also have said they knew nothing about more explicit instant messages — in which Foley graphically discussed sex — and had no reason to be suspicious about Foley's behavior.

House Speaker J. Dennis Hastert (R-Ill.), in public comments Monday, called the explicit messages "vile and repulsive, both to myself and to my colleagues." He added: "No one in the Republican leadership saw those messages until last Friday, when ABC News released them to the public."

ABC reported Monday that in another set of instant messages, Foley tried to arrange a rendezvous with another young teenage page.

Hastert also held a rare off-camera question-and-answer session with reporters Monday, during which he said that Foley's inappropriate contacts with pages appeared to have occurred after the teenagers had left Washington and returned home.

"I understand that these are pages that have all left the program," Hastert said. "This was after the fact. And you know — woulda, coulda, shoulda."

At least one Republican lawmaker, however, has said that GOP lawmakers should have dug deeper into Foley's behavior months ago.

West Virginia Rep. Shelley Moore Capito, who sits on the board overseeing the page program but who has said she was not told of any of the e-mails, told the Charleston Gazette over the weekend that even the less-explicit ones should have been viewed as suspicious

"I don't think it would pass the sniff test," she told the newspaper. "Even asking those questions — that is not normal between a 52-year-old adult and a 16-year-old…. It's not like they're family friends or anything. I think it would raise some serious questions."

The current and former congressional staffers interviewed by The Times, who are from both parties, said it was well known within the Capitol's gay community that Foley was interested in young men.

"Among the gay political community, there was a pretty wide understanding that he had an eye for the interns and the younger staff," said one former congressional staffer.

The staffers said Foley — who was elected to the House in 1994 and is not openly gay — would seek out the young men in bars, restaurants and even around the Capitol.

The former intern said he was approached by Foley at Bullfeathers, a popular restaurant and bar a few blocks from the Capitol. "He asked for e-mail, which I gave him," said the young man. "I was 18. To have a congressman take an interest in you seemed pretty cool."

But he said he quickly regretted it. Foley began sending him e-mails, asking for more information about him. "It was a patented act," he said. He stopped responding to Foley soon afterward.

Beck-Heyman, the former page, said several other male pages in his class also had been approached by Foley. "Mark Foley knew he could get away with this type of behavior with male pages because he was a congressman," he said.

Another former staffer said it was an oft-repeated story around Capitol Hill that Foley's former chief of staff, Kirk Fordham, would sometimes accompany the congressman to keep him out of trouble.

DOJ_NMG_0073359

Fordham represents a link between Foley and House GOP leaders. Shortly after leaving Foley's office last year, he became chief of staff to Rep. Thomas M. Reynolds (R-N.Y.), chairman of the National Republican Congressional Committee.

Reynolds has said he was told this spring about the e-mails that sparked the initial complaint about Foley.

Fordham has not responded to repeated requests for comment from The Times.

Democratic congressional leaders continued Monday to attack the Republican handling of the Foley case.

"This is about a member of Congress who used his position to prey on young children, and a Republican leadership team who set out to cover it up," said Senate Minority Leader Harry Reid (D-Nev.).

As criticism of GOP leaders mounted, the FBI — which reported Sunday that it had launched a preliminary investigation of Foley's behavior — came under fire Monday for not acting more quickly.

The advocacy group Citizens for Responsibility and Ethics in Washington said it sent the FBI the less explicit Foley e-mails in July. The group's officials now have asked the Department of Justice to investigate why the bureau didn't begin its investigation sooner.

FBI officials declined to comment on the complaint.

But a law enforcement official said investigators are trying to determine the scale and scope of potential crimes, and have been reviewing the messages that have become public.

The official, who requested anonymity because of the investigation's sensitivity, said that the bureau hoped to speak with some pages and their families soon to determine whether they would be willing to cooperate with the investigation.

Federal law makes it a crime to use the Internet to solicit sex from anyone under 18 years of age. Offenders can be fined and imprisoned for up to 30 years with a minimum sentence of five years in prison.

As of late Monday, the FBI had not requested access to the computers in Foley's former congressional office.

The office has continued to operate, handling constituent requests and other routine chores, but under the auspices of the clerk of the House.

Follow The Money (RC)

By Mary Ann Akers

Roll Call, October 3, 2006

How fitting that of all the politicians disgraced former Rep. Mark Foley (R-Fla.) chose to give money to this campaign cycle, the only two Members of Congress to whom he donated were Rep. Bob Ney (R-Ohio) and Sen. George Allen (R-Va.).

Foley's campaign committee made a total of three donations: $100,000 to the National Republican Congressional Committee; $2,000 to Friends of George Allen; and $1,000 to Bob Ney for Congress.

What, did Foley have some sixth sense that they'd all implode in the same year? Could he have predicted that he and Ney both would wind up in the tank, out of a job?

Ney, the only Member of Congress to be criminally nailed in the Jack Abramoff lobbying scandal, is scheduled to officially plead guilty in federal court on Oct. 13. Allen, the only Member of Congress ever known to use the word "macaca," is pleading his case to the people of Virginia (forget about the people of America, that dream is over) 24-7 until Election Day; and Foley, well, he's looking like the straw that broke the camel's back on the GOP scandal front.

Worst Pretty Boy in the World. Obviously, Keith Olbermann, host of MSNBC's "Countdown," doesn't know how narcissistic Congressional Chief of Staff Jason Roe is. When Olbermann gave Roe his nightly "Worst Person in the World" award Friday night, Roe wasn't upset in the slightest, he just hoped he looked hot if the show aired a photo of him.

Roe, chief of staff to Rep. Tom Feeney (R-Fla.), has taken a leave of absence to work on GOP candidate Peter Roskam's House campaign in the Illinois 6th district against Democrat Tammy Duckworth, a combat veteran who lost both her legs in Iraq. Olbermann derided Roskam for saying that Duckworth wanted to "cut and run" from Iraq "even though," Olbermann pointed out, "she lost both her legs there while serving as a helicopter pilot."

The reason Roe got the award is because he called "Countdown" to complain that Roskam was misquoted, charging the show with "intellectual dishonesty."

DOJ_NMG_0073360

Well, that just did it. With a big photo of Roe and Roskam up on the screen behind him, Olbermann looked into the camera, addressing Roe, and said, "Hey, pal, this is about campaigning against a woman who has no legs because they were CUT OFF while she served in Iraq. ...You leave the intellectual to us, we'll leave the dishonesty to you."

He thus declared Roskam and Roe "Worst Persons in the World."

A friend of Roe who saw the segment called to tell him about it, saying, "Dude, you're not going to like this. They just named you 'Worst Person in the World.'" Well, he shoulda known. His pal Roe's first reaction: "Did they put my picture up?"

The tanned, toothy and handsome Roe, who never has a wrinkle in his designer clothes or a hair out of place, wrote the producers of "Countdown" an e-mail saying, "Thanks for using a good picture of me. The only disappointment is that since no one watches Olberman [sic], none of my friends will ever get to see my award. Try to get some viewership."

Roe's wife, Patty Roe, chief of staff to Rep. Rick Renzi (R-Ariz.), is a head-turning blonde who, nevertheless, said she's a slob compared to her prissy husband. She told us, "He wakes up looking that beautiful. With all the products not even a pillow can mess up his hair!"

Foley Memories. Boy oh boy (no pun intended) are the Foley "victims" crawling out of the woodwork! One of them, a boyish looking former reporter turned big-shot lawyer living in California, had until Friday tried to suppress the memory of repeatedly being "asked out" by Foley in the mid- to late '90s when the former scribe was in his 20s but looked about 18.

He said the ex-Congressman used to occasionally ask him out for "a beer." Though nothing ever happened, the all-grown-up-now former scribe is wigged out thinking about it.

After Foley resigned over the Pagegate scandal Friday, our source, whom we hesitate to call Deep Throat on the Left Coast, recalled something that happened about 10 years ago — he thinks it was early 1997 — one night at Café Deluxe.

"Last night I remembered another weird Foley incident," DT on the LC told us.

He was out to dinner with a gal pal when he suddenly heard someone yelling his name from across the restaurant. DT on the LC was mortified when he saw Foley, who he said "was drunk," approaching their table and quickly asked his friend to say she was his girlfriend.

Foley, who checked himself into an alcohol rehab clinic over the weekend, came over, exchanged pleasantries with the reporter and his friend and asked if the two were dating.

"Yes," our source recalled his pal saying. Foley, according to our source replied, "Well, I've been asking [name redacted] out for years, and he always says no. What's your secret?"

The former reporter froze. "I swear to God," he said. "We were both so stunned we didn't know what to say. Luckily, the food came at his table and he left right after that."

At some point during Foley's attempted courtship (or beership) of the young reporter, our source went to a party at Foley's house one night with another young male journalist. "I remember very vividly leaving his house and thinking, 'That guy drinks way too much and is going to get himself in big trouble.'"

Please send your hot tips, juicy gossip or comments to hoh@rollcall.com.

Ex-Rep. Foley Checks Into Alcohol Rehab (AP)

By Lara Jakes Jordan, Associated Press Writer

AP, October 3, 2006

WASHINGTON (AP) - Former Rep. Mark Foley, under FBI investigation for salacious e-mail exchanges with teenage congressional pages, has checked himself into rehabilitation facility for alcoholism treatment and accepts responsibility for his actions, his attorney said Monday.

The attorney, David Roth, would not identify the facility, but told the Associated Press in West Palm Beach, Fla., that Foley had checked in over the weekend.

``I strongly believe that I am an alcoholic and have accepted the need for immediate treatment for alcoholism and other behavioral problems," Foley, a Republican, said in a statement, Roth told the AP.

In scorching language, House Republican leaders on Monday condemned Foley's actions as they tried to contain the damage to the party five weeks before midterm elections.

DOJ_NMG_0073361

``Congressman Foley duped a lot of people ... He deceived the good men and women in organizations around the country with whom he worked to strengthen child predator laws," Speaker Dennis Hastert told reporters. ``I have known him all the years he served in the House and he deceived me too."

The Bush administration, meanwhile, sought to distance itself from the scandal and the increasing questions about when members of the House Republican leadership knew of the e-mail exchanges and what did they know of Foley's actions. Coming five weeks before the election, the scandal involving the Republican congressman could cost the GOP control of the House.

``The House has to clean up the mess, to the extent there is a mess," White House spokesman Tony Snow told reporters at a briefing.

Foley abruptly quit Congress on Friday after reports surfaced that he'd sent sexually charged electronic messages to boys working as pages. In the statement, Foley said the ``events that led to my resignation have crystalized recognition of my long-standing and significant alcoholism and emotional difficulties."

``I deeply regret and accept full responsibility for the harm I have caused," Foley said. He also expressed ``gratitude for the prayers and words of encouragement that have been conveyed to me."

The FBI, meanwhile, ``is conducting an assessment to see if there's been a violation of federal law," according to FBI spokesman Richard Kolko.

The Florida Department of Law Enforcement said Monday it was also investigating whether the e-mail communications violated state law. Spokesman Tom Berlinger called the state probe ``a precursor to a possible criminal investigation."

Florida Republicans picked state Rep. Joe Negron to replace Foley as its candidate in the West Palm Beach district, which is largely Republican.

House Republicans went into damage control mode amid charges by Democrats that some House leaders may have known for months about Foley's inappropriate overtures toward the young pages.

Hastert met with his staff, the House clerk and Rep. John Shimkus, R-Ill., the congressman who oversees the page program, to review the procedures on protecting the teenage pages while they are working at the Capitol and after they finish their assignments.

Hastert in a letter sent Sunday to Attorney General Alberto Gonzales, asked the Justice Department to ``conduct an investigation of Mr. Foley's conduct with current and former House pages," including ``any sexually explicit communications between Mr. Foley and any former or current House pages and what actions such individuals took, if any, to provide them to law enforcement."

Democrats demanded that investigators determine whether Republican leaders tried to cover up Foley's actions for political reasons.

``The attorney general should open a full-scale investigation immediately," Senate Democratic leader Harry Reid of Nevada said in a statement, including whether GOP leaders ``knew there was a problem and ignored it to preserve a congressional seat this election year."

FBI cyber sleuths are looking into the text of some of the Foley messages, checking to see how many e-mails and instant electronic messages were sent and how many computers were used, according to a law enforcement official, who spoke on condition of anonymity because of the ongoing investigation.

The FBI also was trying to determine if any of the teenagers who received messages are willing to cooperate with the investigation, the official said.

Ironically, Foley, who is 52 and single, could be found to have violated a law that he helped to write as co-chairman of the Congressional Missing and Exploited Children's Caucus.

Rep. Thomas Reynolds of New York, head of the House Republican election effort, said he told Hastert months ago about the allegations involving a 16-year-old boy from Louisiana.

Hastert acknowledged that his staff had been made aware of concerns about what they termed ``over-friendly" e-mails Foley had sent to the teenager - including one requesting his picture - in the fall of 2005, and that they referred the matter to the House clerk.

DOJ_NMG_0073362

But Hastert said those e-mails were not viewed as ``sexual in nature" and that he was not aware of ``a different set of communications which were sexually explicit ... which Mr. Foley reportedly sent another former page or pages."

AP reporter Brian Skoloff contributed to this story from West Palm Beach, Fla.; AP reporter John Heilprin contributed from Washington

Foley Checks Into Rehab As Republicans Seek Cover (MCT)

By Margaret Talev And Marisa Taylor

McClatchy, October 3, 2006

WASHINGTON - Republicans sought cover Monday from the FBI probe of former Rep. Mark Foley's sexual communications with underage male congressional pages, as the scandal's aftershocks spread across the political world and conservative activists began talking about a possible shakeup of the House Republican leadership.

As Foley, a Florida Republican, entered an alcohol and behavioral rehabilitation program, legal experts said criminal prosecution isn't a foregone conclusion. In some states, 16 is the age of sexual consent.

Yet in an ironic twist, federal laws championed by Foley himself make it a crime in some circumstances to use the Internet to persuade, induce or entice someone under 18 to engage in sexual activity.

While it hasn't been proved that Foley engaged in sexual acts with anyone under 18, ABC News on Monday reported sexually charged instant-message exchanges in which Foley urged a former page to meet him and referred to a prior meeting between them in California.

House Speaker Dennis Hastert, R-Ill., called a news conference on Capitol Hill to state unequivocally that no one in the party leadership knew until late last week of Foley's "vile and repulsive" instant messages, which ABC published online and which included explicit dialogue about masturbation. He said he wanted to find out who did know.

Hastert asked the Justice Department on Sunday to investigate not only Foley's actions, but what anyone in Congress knew about them.

Hastert has been under fire since Foley's abrupt resignation Friday. Hastert then suggested he was just learning there was a problem. But Rep. Tom Reynolds, R-N.Y., chairman of the GOP's congressional campaign committee, has said he made Hastert aware of the situation months ago.

The head of the House Page Board, Rep. John Shimkus, R-Ill., acknowledged learning late last year, along with the House clerk, that Foley had sent a former page an e-mail that wasn't sexually explicit but that asked personal questions that made the young man uncomfortable. Shimkus told Foley to stop communicating with the young man, but didn't share the information with his fellow Page Board members.

None of the Republican leaders acknowledged knowing about the sexually explicit messages.

Democrats are accusing Republicans of an election-year cover-up.

Rep. Dale Kildee, D-Mich., a member of the House Page Board who said Shimkus didn't inform him about Foley's e-mail, accused Republicans of being "more concerned with finding political cover for themselves than with the safety and well-being of the House pages."

Shimkus said the young man's parents didn't want to pursue an investigation and that Foley was questioned, professed innocent motives and agreed not to contact the young man again.

Several conservative leaders voiced anger that House Republican leaders knew they had a potential predator in their ranks and didn't take it more seriously.

"After the elections, if the Republicans are still in power, this may signal a change in the leadership, if it appears they knew more than they have reported to us," said Mike Mears, executive director of Concerned Women for America's political action committee.

Richard A. Viguerie, a leader of the conservative movement for decades, suggested that Hastert's call for a Justice Department investigation "could be part of an effort to cover this up until after the election." He called for the immediate resignation of any House leader who knew of improper conduct and didn't act.

DOJ_NMG_0073363

Tom Fitton, president of the conservative group Judicial Watch, said Hastert, Majority Leader John Boehner, Shimkus and Reynolds have "some serious explaining to do."

David Keene of the American Conservative Union said he doubts that Hastert had any idea of the extent of Foley's communications, but that Hastert nevertheless may pay a political price for not acting sooner.

Republican congressional candidates across the country feared the controversy's potential to depress conservative turnout at the polls in November or sway independent voters toward Democrats.

Republican Vern Buchanan, in a competitive Florida race to succeed Rep. Katherine Harris of Sarasota, gave to charity $2,000 that Foley's political action committee had contributed to his campaign. Buchanan's Democratic opponent, Christine Jennings, called it disconcerting to find Buchanan "in such a small group of recipients to benefit from Mark Foley's PAC."

Rep. Clay Shaw, a Fort Lauderdale Republican in a tight race, is donating $2,000 from Foley's campaign and political action committee to the Center for Missing and Exploited Children. Spokeswoman Gail Gitcho said, "No one is going to mistake Clay Shaw for Mark Foley," but acknowledged that the scandal "has completely eaten up the news cycle."

White House Press Secretary Tony Snow initially minimized the scandal in an interview with CNN.

"Look, I hate to tell you, but it's not always pretty up there on Capitol Hill, and there have been other scandals, as you know, that have been more than simply naughty e-mails," he said.

But he backed away from that line later, telling White House reporters, "Look, this is an awful and disturbing story. ... I think people are trying to put us in a box, and say, you know what, unless you come out and you condemn Denny Hastert, you're saying that this behavior is acceptable. It's not."

Citizens for Responsibility and Ethics in Washington (CREW), a liberal watchdog group, said it asked the FBI to investigate non-explicit e-mails between Foley and a former page back in July, after a "third party" made the e-mails available to the group. CREW asked Monday for the Justice Department's inspector general to investigate why the FBI didn't act. An FBI spokesman wouldn't comment, except to confirm that an investigation had been launched.

John Pierce, a former federal prosecutor of 14 years now in private practice, said if a crime was committed, the Justice Department could investigate members of Congress for knowing about a "commission of a felony" and failing to report it. However, Pierce expressed doubts that Hastert would have called for such a probe if he believed there was a cover-up within his party's ranks.

Barry Coburn, a criminal defense attorney and former federal prosecutor, said the allegations didn't clearly present solicitation of a minor.

"It might have been clearly inappropriate, and it might yet conceivably turn out to be something short of criminal solicitation," he said.

McClatchy Newspapers correspondents Lesley Clark and Alan Bjerga contributed to this report.

Hastert Says He Wasn't Aware Of Explicit E-Mails (Update1) (BLOOM)

By William Roberts

Bloomberg, October 3, 2006

Oct. 2 (Bloomberg) -- House Speaker Dennis Hastert, under fire for his response to Florida Representative Mark Foley's e-mails to teenage congressional pages, said he was unaware of any sexually explicit e-mails until Foley resigned.

``Republican leaders of the House did not have them," Hastert said at the Capitol. ``Someone did have them. And the Ethics Committee, the Justice Department, the news media, and anyone who can should help us find out who."

Hastert's comments are part of an effort to rebut Democratic suggestions that House Republican leaders didn't act aggressively enough after they learned about what they called ``overly friendly" but not sexual message that Foley sent to a teenage former page in 2005. Some Democrats said Republican leaders may have wanted to protect Republican control of Foley's district.

Foley, 52, resigned Sept. 29 after ABC News asked him about explicit e-mails that were sent to teenagers in 2003.

Some Republican congressional candidates distanced themselves from the scandal, fearing it might deal a final blow to the party's bid to keep control of the House in November elections.

`Toleration'

``Toleration of inappropriate behavior is almost as bad as the behavior itself," said Representative Heather Wilson, a Republican from New Mexico who faces a difficult race in November.

Hastert met today with Representative John Shimkus, the Illinois Republican who is chairman of the board that oversees the congressional page program. After their meeting, Hastert and Shimkus read prepared statements in front of news cameras in the Capitol and declined to take questions.

``Congressman Foley duped a lot of people," Hastert said. ``I have known him for all the years he served in this House. He deceived me, too."

House Democratic Leader Nancy Pelosi said in a statement today that Hastert ``failed to answer the question that every mother and father in America is asking: how could Republican Leaders chose partisan politics over protecting children?"

Foley has checked himself into a rehabilitation center for treatment of alcoholism, Palm Beach, Florida, television station WPBF reported. Joe Negron, a Republican state representative, has been chosen to replace Foley as the party's nominee in the 16th District, which stretches from Jupiter Beach on Florida's east coast across Lake Okeechobee to Port Charlotte on the west coast, CNN reported.

A Letter

Hastert yesterday sent a letter to Attorney General Alberto Gonzales asking for a criminal investigation of Foley.

In his letter to the attorney general, Hastert defended his handling of the matter, noting that after learning of Foley's 2005 e-mails to a male former page, Shimkus and the House clerk confronted Foley, demanded he stop contacting the page and believed the issue had been resolved privately as the parents had requested.

The FBI has opened an initial assessment of the matter ``to determine if there has been a violation of federal law," said Stephen Kodak, a spokesman for the agency in Washington.

FBI

Melanie Sloan, executive director of Citizens for Responsibility and Ethics in Washington, said she received the non-sexual e-mails July 21 from an unnamed congressional aide and gave them to an FBI agent.

She called for an investigation into the FBI's failure to act on them until now, saying agents should have recognized them as more than ```overly friendly."

Cynthia Schnedar, counselor to the Justice Department's inspector general, Glenn Fine, said officials are reviewing Sloan's complaint.

Democrats said any Justice Department investigation of Foley should include how House Republican leaders responded after the first indications that Foley had sent inappropriate e-mails to teenage pages in 2005. House Democrats demanded that the chamber's ethics committee produce a preliminary report on the matter within 10 days.

``Central to the investigation is immediately questioning, under oath, the House Republican leadership," Pelosi wrote in a letter to lawmakers on the committee yesterday.

Quickly Enough

White House officials declined to say whether Republican leaders in Congress had reacted quickly enough to warnings about Foley.

``The House is responsible for enforcing its standards," White House spokesman Tony Snow said. ``That has always been the case."

He rejected the suggestion that the scandal would harm his party's prospects in the November elections.

``This does not affect every Republican," Snow said. ``If you try to paint with a broad brush, I think you run the risk of tarring respectable people."

Democrats, advocacy groups and some Republicans demanded full disclosure by Republican leaders of how the episode unfolded. Representative Peter King, a New York Republican, said yesterday that House leaders ``have to get all the facts out as quickly as possible."

Representative Rob Simmons of Connecticut said yesterday that all lawmaker should be held accountable for their actions.

DOJ_NMG_0073365

``If it is found that any member of Congress or staff willingly participated in a cover-up of Mr. Foley's actions, that individual should resign immediately," Simmons said.

To contact the reporter on this story: Laura Litvan in Washington at llitvan@bloomberg.net ; Jay Newton-Small in Washington at jnewtonsmall@bloomberg.net

FBI Knew In July About Foley E-Mails To Teen (WP)

By Charles Babington And Jonathan Weisman

The Washington Post, October 3, 2006

The FBI acknowledged yesterday that it did not begin an investigation in late July after receiving copies of e-mails sent in 2005 by then-Rep. Mark Foley (R-Fla.) to a Louisiana teenager -- messages that troubled the boy's parents.

Key House Republicans learned of the e-mails in 2005 and chose to deal with Foley privately, warning him to cease contact with the 16-year-old former House page. Top aides to Speaker J. Dennis Hastert (R-Ill.) did not inform him about the incident, Hastert said yesterday, and he defended their actions in a Capitol Hill news conference.

But the GOP's handling of the Foley matter has rocked the party since it was revealed last week that Foley had sent far more sexually explicit electronic messages to teenage former pages in 2003 and 2004.

Many Democrats and some Republicans sharply criticized the decision by key House GOP members to handle the matter of the Louisiana e-mails so quietly that only one of the three lawmakers who oversee the page program knew anything about it. The other two -- one Democrat, one Republican -- expressed anger yesterday that they had been kept in the dark.

Also yesterday, ABC News posted on its Web site instant messages -- reportedly between Foley and another former House page -- in which the lawmaker repeatedly tried to set up a dinner date and indicated that the boy had spent time with him in San Diego. Previously disclosed messages had not indicated that Foley was trying to make personal contact with the boys, who had served as runners and helpers for a year in Washington.

Foley abruptly resigned Friday, and his attorney David Roth said yesterday that the six-term lawmaker is now at an alcohol-treatment center in Florida. In a statement faxed to news outlets Sunday night -- Foley's only public comments since his resignation -- he said: "I deeply regret and accept full responsibility for the harm I have caused."

Roth, interviewed last night on CNN, said that Foley is "absolutely, positively not a pedophile" and "has never, ever had an inappropriate sexual contact with a minor in his life." He said Foley wrote the e-mails "under the influence of alcohol" and was "suffering from mental illness."

Officials from the liberal-leaning group Citizens for Responsibility and Ethics in Washington said yesterday that they received copies of the Louisiana e-mails on July 21 and turned them over to the FBI the same day. Melanie Sloan, the group's executive director, said she spoke with a special agent in the Washington field office, and she questioned yesterday why the FBI did not investigate Foley weeks ago.

An FBI official, who spoke on the condition of anonymity because the investigation is ongoing, said the field office concluded that the e-mails "did not rise to the level of criminal activity." The bureau announced Sunday that it would begin a preliminary investigation into Foley's more explicit electronic exchanges with teenagers.

Some House Republicans said yesterday that the FBI and House leaders erred in not considering the e-mails -- and the concern they raised among the recipient's parents -- as justification for an inquiry.

"This thing should have been looked into months ago," said Rep. Walter B. Jones Jr. (R-N.C.), who said he is "disgusted" by his leaders' response. "That's abnormal for a 52-year-old man having those kinds of e-mails going to a 16-year-old child."

In a written statement, Rep. Christopher Shays (R-Conn.) said the Republican leadership needs to be shaken up. "If they knew or should have known the extent of this problem, they should not serve in leadership," he said.

Hastert, as the House's top officer and the man in line after the vice president to succeed the president, has been the main target of questions and barbs from both parties. He reiterated yesterday that he recalled hearing nothing about Foley's e-mails until last Friday, but he does not dispute the assertion of Rep. Thomas M. Reynolds (R-N.Y.) that he informed the speaker last spring.

DOJ_NMG_0073366

"If Reynolds told me, it was in a line of things, and we were in the middle of another crisis this spring, so I just don't remember that," Hastert told reporters. He defended the decision by several top staffers to handle the Foley matter without telling him. "I see no reason to bump it up to me at that time," he said.

Hastert noted that the 2005 e-mails to the Louisiana teenager were ambiguous. In one, Foley asked the boy to send a picture of himself, which reportedly alarmed the youth and his parents. Hastert agreed yesterday that an adult's request for a teenager's photo "would raise a red flag." But he said he would not second-guess his party's handling of the situation.

The boy's parents approached the office of Rep. Rodney Alexander (R-La.) in late 2005, asking that Foley stop contacting their son and that the matter be kept quiet, according to House accounts.

Reynolds, who chairs his party's House campaign committee, and Majority Leader John A. Boehner (Ohio) were among prominent Republicans who also knew of the parents' concerns earlier this year. But the matter was left to Rep. John M. Shimkus (R-Ill.), who chairs the House Page Board, and then-House clerk Jeff Trandahl, also a board member.

Shimkus has said that Foley assured them that the e-mails were innocent, and that they closed the discussion by telling him to respect pages and to cease contacting the Louisiana boy. Trandahl, now executive director of the National Fish and Wildlife Foundation, did not return phone calls yesterday.

Hastert said that he and other House leaders knew nothing of the instant messages between Foley and former pages in 2003 and 2004, which, ABC has reported, were much more graphic and discussed topics including masturbation.

ABC reported yesterday that Foley used the screen name "Maf54" and wrote a former page: "I miss you lots since san diego," to which the teenager responded, "ya I cant wait til dc." The youth asked, "did you pick a night for dinner." Maf54 replied, "not yet . . . but likely Friday."

In another exchange, Maf54 wrote, "I want to see you." The teenager replied, "Like I said not til feb . . . then we will go to dinner." Maf54: "and then what happens?" Teenager: "we eat . . . we drink . . . who knows . . . hang out . . . late into the night." When Maf54 pressed further, the teenager wrote, "hmmm, I have the feeling that you are fishing here . . . im not sure what I would be comfortable with . . . well see."

Rep. Shelley Moore Capito (W.Va.), Shimkus's fellow Republican on the Page Board, said she knew nothing of Foley's electronic exchanges until last week.

"As a member of the Page Board -- and, more importantly, as a mother -- I am appalled by Mark Foley's despicable conduct," she said. "I deeply regret not being made aware of this situation as a member of the Page Board."

White House spokesman Tony Snow contributed to the political firestorm yesterday when he told CNN the scandal involved "simply naughty e-mails." Democrats assailed the comment, and Snow later called the messages "disturbing," "appalling" and "reprehensible."

Hastert Defends Handling Of Page Scandal (AP-Y)

By Andrew Taylor, Associated Press Writer

AP, October 3, 2006

House Speaker Dennis Hastert on Monday defended his office's handling of questions raised about Rep. Mark Foley last year, saying the parents of a former male page were concerned about an e-mail Foley sent their son but didn't want the matter pursued.

Hastert said neither he nor other GOP leaders were aware until last Friday of far more lurid computer exchanges two years earlier between the Florida Republican and another page.

Hastert, R-Ill., acknowledged that Foley's 2005 e-mail to a Louisiana boy seeking a photograph raised a "red flag" with the Louisiana congressman who sponsored the page, but said his staff aides and Rep. John Shimkus, another Illinois Republican who chairs a board of House members who oversee the page program, did not know the contents.

Rep. Tom Reynolds, the House GOP campaign chairman, said he told Hastert in the spring of this year about the questionable e-mail. Hastert says he does not recall the conversation but does not dispute Reynolds' account.

Shimkus, appearing with Hastert on Monday, said new measures would be implemented to keep pages safe, including a toll-free hotline for pages, former pages and their families to confidentially report any incidents.

Democrats protested that those decisions should be made by the bipartisan page board.

"Once again, the House Republican leadership is following the same pattern of unilateral decision-making that caused this problem in the first place," said Rep. Dale Kildee of Michigan, longtime Democratic member of the board.

Hastert's media offensive came as the burgeoning scandal entered its fourth day, souring the outlook for Republicans in the November elections and raising questions about the judgment of senior House officials who handled the controversy. GOP leaders scheduled a late-afternoon conference call on the matter with rank-and-file Republicans.

Shimkus and the House clerk called Foley last fall and told him to cut off all communication with the former page. Only after ABC News reported the 2005 e-mail late last week did the more lurid material surface, as pages forwarded further messages to ABC.

The network reported instant messages between Foley and a San Diego teenager, who suggested he was uncomfortable in an exchange discussing dinner plans for when the boy was to come to Washington.

"and then what happens," Foley messaged at one point.

"I have the feeling that you are fishing here ... im not sure what I would be comfortable with ... well see," the teen replied.

Democrats hammered at GOP leaders' handling of the Foley subject as an internal party matter instead of bringing it to the attention of the page board or the House Ethics Committee.

"Republican Leaders admitted to knowing about Mr. Foley's abhorrent behavior for six months to a year and failed to protect the children in their trust," said Minority Leader Nancy Pelosi, D-Calif. "Republican Leaders must be investigated by the Ethics Committee and immediately questioned under oath."

The FBI has begun an inquiry into Foley's computer contact with pages, and Hastert wrote a letter to Florida Gov. Jeb Bush asking for an investigation into whether state laws were broken.

Meanwhile, Florida newspapers — who were leaked copies of the e-mail with the Louisiana boy last year — defended their decision not to run stories. Both The St. Petersburg Times and The Miami Herald were given copies of the e-mail, as were other news organizations, including Fox News.

"Our decision at the time was ... that because the language was not sexually explicit and was subject to interpretation, from innocuous to 'sick,' as the page characterized it, to be cautious," said Tom Fiedler, executive editor of the Herald. "Given the potentially devastating impact that a false suggestion of pedophilia could have on anyone, not to mention a congressman known to be gay, and lacking any corroborating information, we chose not to do a story."

Hastert called on any person who was aware of the 2003 instant messages to speak to law enforcement authorities. He said no Republican leader in Congress was aware of those exchanges until Friday, when ABC News reported it had questioned Foley about them.

A watchdog group, Citizens for Responsibility and Ethics in Washington (CREW), said it had obtained copies of Foley's e-mails to the 16-year-old former page in late July and immediately gave them to the FBI.

"They (the e-mails) should have raised a red flag over at the FBI," said Melanie Sloan, the group's executive director and a former prosecutor specializing in sex crimes. The group on Monday asked the Justice Department's inspector general to investigate why Foley's e-mails were not pursued.

Asked about the preliminary inquiry under way at the FBI into Foley's actions, Attorney General Alberto Gonzales told reporters Monday afternoon, "We're just beginning to look at it right now. I haven't received a report."

The Justice Department sent Hastert a brief letter that said the FBI "is conducting a preliminary investigation into this matter and will work closely with the department's prosecutors to determine whether any violations of federal law have occurred."

The congressional page program has traditionally been a starting point for young people interested in making a career of politics.

There currently are 72 House pages, 48 selected by Republicans and 24 by Democrats, according to a recent report by the Congressional Research Service. The Senate breakdown is 30 pages, 18 chosen by Republicans and 12 by Democrats.

Leadership officials had been aware since last year of the 2005 e-mail exchange, which they said was "over friendly" but did not include overtly sexual references. They said they did not follow up other than to instruct Foley to not communicate with the Louisiana page.

DOJ_NMG_0073368

But Sloan of the CREW watchdog group said that while the 2005 e-mail was not sexually explicit — asking about the boy's birthday and progress in school and requesting a photograph — "they set off alarm bells for me."

"These are strategies pedophiles often use to draw in their" targets, said Sloan in a conference call with reporters.

Foley, 52, checked into an alcohol rehabilitation center over the weekend, his attorney said Monday. In a statement, Foley said, "I strongly believe that I'm an alcoholic and have accepted the need for immediate treatment for alcoholism and other behavioral problems."

Florida Republicans on Monday chose a member of the state Legislature, Rep. Joe Negron, to replace Foley as the party's candidate for the state's 16th congressional district, which covers an area north and west of Palm Beach.

Democrat Tim Mahoney said Monday that his campaign learned about the Foley e-mails through a reporter and wasn't sure what to believe until actually seeing them.

"There was information that obviously had been out and about. It had to be one of the biggest open secrets in Washington D.C."

White House spokesman Tony Snow attempted to deflect the political repercussions, saying, "The House has to clean up the mess, to the extent there is a mess."

"This does not affect every Republican in the United States of America, just as bad behavior on Democrats' part is not a reflection on the entire party," Snow said.

Pelosi Wants GOP Leaders' Testimony (RC)

By John Bresnahan

Roll Call, October 3, 2006

House GOP leaders and the FBI faced new questions on Monday over their handling of the sex scandal surrounding former Rep. Mark Foley (R-Fla.), with Democrats and a Congressional watchdog group suggesting Foley's activities were covered up or deliberately ignored for months to keep his seat under Republican control.

House Minority Leader Nancy Pelosi (D-Calif.) has asked for Speaker Dennis Hastert (R-Ill.) and other top Republicans to be questioned under oath by the ethics committee regarding their handling of the Foley scandal, including what they knew, and when, about a series of July 2005 e-mails from Foley to a 16-year-old former Congressional page and how they responded to the incident.

Hastert has said repeatedly that he was not personally aware of the initial batch of Foley e-mails since the scandal first broke last Thursday, although Majority Leader John Boehner (R-Ohio) and National Republican Congressional Committee Chairman Tom Reynolds (N.Y.) have both stated publicly that they informed the Speaker of the messages in the spring or early summer of this year. Boehner now says he cannot remember whether he told Hastert, and Hastert himself does not "recall or remember" any conversation with Reynolds regarding Foley.

"Republican Leaders admitted to knowing about Mr. Foley's abhorrent behavior for six months to a year and failed to protect the children in their trust," Pelosi said in a statement released by her office. "Republican Leaders must be investigated by the Ethics Committee and immediately questioned under oath."

Three of Hastert's top aides were made aware of the Foley e-mails in the fall of 2005 by Rep. Rodney Alexander (R-La.), according to a timeline released by the Speaker's office on Saturday. The teen lived in Alexander's district, and his parents sought Alexander's help in getting Foley to stop contacting their son.

The July 2005 e-mails do not include sexually explicit language but were disturbing enough that Rep. John Shimkus (R-Ill.), chairman of the House Page Board, and Jeff Trandahl, the former Clerk of the House, interviewed Foley about them last year. Foley agreed to stop the e-mails, and Hastert's staff was then informed of his promise but took no further action, according to Hastert's office. Hastert told reporters on Monday that "there [was] no reason to bump it up to me at that time."

Since ABC News first reported on the July 2005 e-mails last Thursday, a series of electronic messages between Foley and other former pages have surfaced, a number of which include sexually graphic comments by the former lawmaker to teenage boys. Foley resigned from the House on Friday, and his Congressional office was taken over by the Clerk of the House. Foley has reportedly checked himself into alcohol rehabilitation in Florida, becoming the second GOP lawmaker to do so in the past month.

DOJ_NMG_0073369

The House approved a resolution late Friday evening directing the ethics panel to look into the Foley scandal, although Reps. Doc Hastings (R-Wash.) and Howard Berman (D-Calif.), chairman and ranking member of the committee, have not announced yet if or how they would conduct any investigation.

The ethics committee traditionally has deferred to the Justice Department or other law enforcement agencies in the handling of criminal matters, although in this case, sources close to the panel said the two lawmakers are anxious to have the panel weigh in on this matter as quickly as possible.

The ethics committee would need a quorum of at least six of its 10 members present to approve any investigation or appoint an investigative subcommittee to undertake a probe, and that has not occurred as of Monday night, according to House insiders. Members of the committee also would have to physically present to approve subpoenas to any lawmakers or current or former House staffers.

At this time, Pelosi has not called for a special or independent counsel to oversee the investigation, although some Democrats privately are suggesting their leadership should back that proposal. But the appointment of an outside counsel would almost certainly slow down any committee investigation, and Hastings and Berman are under intense pressure to show some results in the five weeks before the midterm elections.

Hastert asked for both Attorney General Alberto Gonzales and Florida authorities to begin a criminal investigation of Foley. FBI officials said the bureau now has begun a "preliminary review" of the Foley messages to determine their authenticity and whether any federal laws were violated by the Florida Republican.

Hastert also has vowed that the ethics committee and House officials will work in tandem with any federal probe. "Well, obviously, if federal investigators come in, we always cooperate with them," Hastert said.

But Melanie Sloan, head of the liberal watchdog group Citizens for Responsibility and Ethics in Washington, told reporters on Monday that she had turned over the July 2005 e-mails to an FBI special agent on July 21 of this year. Sloan questioned whether the FBI, at the behest of the White House or other Republican officials, covered up Foley's allegedly improper behavior to protect his House seat for the GOP.

Sloan has asked the Justice Department's Inspector General office to look into the FBI's handling of the Foley e-mails. The IG's office had no comment on Monday other than to say it had received Sloan's request.

"Since the FBI has known about Rep. Foley's e-mails since July, the question arises: Did the administration help to cover up Rep. Foley's conduct and leave a potential sexual predator on the loose? Was the administration more concerned with protecting a powerful ally in Congress than with protecting children?" Sloan said in a Monday conference call with the press.

Sloan, a former federal prosecutor and House Democratic staffer, said the initial batch of Foley e-mails, which included no explicitly sexual references, were disturbing enough that they warranted a criminal probe as soon as the FBI became aware of them. Sloan did not name the FBI special agent to whom she turned over the e-mails.

"There are the strategies that pedophiles use to draw in their victims," Sloan said of the initial Foley e-mails, which included Foley asking former pages some friendly questions, followed by a request for a photo of one teen.

Sloan said she "never heard back from the FBI" after turning the e-mails over to the special agent but was not alarmed by that since the bureau would not inform her of their actions in the case. When the Foley scandal broke last week, Sloan said she became concerned that GOP leaders or Bush administration officials blocked a probe of the former lawmaker.

"The American public deserves to know not just how and why members of Congress failed to take action to protect the youngsters entrusted to the care of the House of Representatives, but also why the FBI — an agency charged with protecting the public — failed to safeguard other youngsters from a potential sexual predator," Sloan said in her letter to the Justice IG's office.

A potentially thorny legal question facing House leaders is what to do with any documents or materials still in Foley's Cannon Building office or district offices.

Although he has resigned from Congress and the Clerk of the House is officially running his former office and has changed the locks on the office doors, Foley still personally owns any documents, materials or electronic records in those offices, and the House may not be at liberty to turn them over to criminal investigators short of a subpoena, which Foley could potentially contest in court on the grounds that some of the materials may be privileged, similar to the claim that has arisen in the corruption probe of Rep. William Jefferson (D-La.).

In addition, it is unclear what electronic or telephone records the House has in its possession at this time relating to Foley, and how such records could be turned over to investigators.

With Foley facing potential federal and state criminal investigations, legal experts also are divided as to whether he will be able to spend freely on his legal defense from his $2.8 million campaign account that is left over from his aborted re-election bid.

If forced to pay legal bills out of his own pocket, Foley will find it a difficult endeavor if any investigation is prolonged and requires a well-financed team of advisers.

According to a review of his financial disclosure statement for 2005, Foley is not among the most wealthy Members of Congress, with a net worth of at least $237,000.

In recent years, most Members of Congress caught up in federal investigations have been granted free reign by the Federal Election Commission to spend from their campaign accounts on their defenses, with the commission usually applying a standard that allows such expenses if the probes are clearly related to the Member's status as a federal candidate or actions taken as a Member of Congress.

Some defense lawyers believe the FEC would not place any limits on Foley and his ability to pay for his legal team with leftover campaign funds, citing the generally broad leeway other lawmakers have been given by the commission to pay legal bills.

Cleta Mitchell, a GOP campaign finance expert at the firm Foley & Lardner, said this investigation falls under the "but for" standard that the FEC applies — but for Foley being a Member of Congress, this investigation wouldn't have started.

"It is pretty broadly interpreted — and all the Members who've had to deal with allegations of criminal misconduct have been advised that their excess campaign contributions can in fact be used to defray legal expenses arising from their service as Members of Congress. Even if the costs are associated with defending allegations of a criminal nature," the GOP lawyer said.

But other lawyers say that standard may not apply to Foley, particularly if the FEC decides that these actions under scrutiny had no connection to his actual work as a Member of Congress.

"It's not a slam dunk," said Marc Elias, a Democratic attorney with Perkins Coie.

Elias noted a 2003 decision by the FEC that was a split verdict for James Treffinger, a GOP Senate candidate from New Jersey in 2000 and 2002 who came under a 19-count federal indictment for extorting contributions to his campaign from county contractors who were awarded local business. In that case, the FEC ruled that half of Treffinger's actions were not related in any fashion to the Senate campaign and were about local corruption, forbidding him from using the leftover funds to defray legal costs.

In Foley's case, Elias said the FEC may rule that his actions with the teenagers was "purely personal conduct," particularly if the investigation were to lead to actions with other minors not connected to the House Page program.

Paul Kane contributed to this report.

Papers Knew Of Foley E-Mail But Did Not Publish Stories (NYT)

By Anne E. Kornblut And Katharine Q. Seelye

The New York Times, October 3, 2006

WASHINGTON, Oct. 2 — At least two news organizations were tipped off to e-mail messages sent by Representative Mark Foley long before the story of his sexually explicit remarks to teenage pages broke last week and forced him to resign.

The St. Petersburg Times and The Miami Herald received copies of an e-mail exchange between Mr. Foley, Republican of Florida, and a teenager, but neither paper gathered enough solid material to publish a story, according to statements by the papers' editors.

It was not until the exchanges were published online last week, first by an anonymous blogger, then on the ABC News Web site, that the story gained momentum and grew more damaging as other teenagers came forward.

The trickle of information about Mr. Foley's messages, first made known to the news media almost a year ago, has raised questions not only for Congressional officials but also for news organizations about how to handle anonymous sources making explosive accusations in an election year.

DOJ_NMG_0073371

At the same time, the papers' decisions not to report the accusations are being cited by Republican leaders as justification for why they themselves did not step forward earlier to try to stop Mr. Foley.

"He deceived his in-state newspaper when they each questioned him," Speaker J. Dennis Hastert said Tuesday. "He deceived me, too."

The St. Petersburg Times said that last November, it received copies of an e-mail exchange between Mr. Foley and a former page from Louisiana. The newspaper said the boy, who was under age, did not want his name used, and the paper said it did not want to publish accusations based on unnamed sources. The Miami Herald apparently received the same information, although it is not clear when it received it.

Brian Ross of ABC News said he learned about the e-mail messages in August but was too busy with Hurricane Katrina and the anniversary of the Sept. 11 attacks to pursue them immediately. None of the organizations seemed to anticipate how big the story would become.

"I never thought it would lead to his resignation," Mr. Ross said.

When The St. Petersburg Times received its first tip on the e-mail messages in late 2005, the editors decided it was "friendly chit-chat," with nothing overtly sexual, but nonetheless assigned two reporters to find out more, according to an editor's note.

The reporters tracked down the teenager, but he refused to let them use his name in a story. They found a second page who had corresponded with Mr. Foley and was willing to let them use his name but said he did not have a problem with the messages, undercutting the premise.

When the newspaper asked Mr. Foley about the messages, he "insisted he was merely trying to be friendly," Scott Montgomery, the newspaper's government and politics editor, wrote Saturday in a note to readers.

The editor of The Herald, Tom Fiedler, said the initial messages did not seem to justify writing a story. "We determined after discussion among several senior editors, including myself, that the content of the messages was too ambiguous to lead to a news story," Mr. Fiedler was quoted in his paper as saying.

Then, in June, the reports resurfaced on Capitol Hill, where a neighborhood resident struck up a conversation in a bar with someone who had provided the e-mail messages. He said he passed them on to several news outlets. The resident, who said he was not affiliated with either party and was motivated by concern for the teenager, would talk only on condition of anonymity.

No one acted on the information until last week, and even then, it was a Web site that first posted the exchange. It is not clear who maintains the Weblog, stopsexpredators.blogspot.com, which appears to be largely devoted to the Foley scandal.

ABC News had its first account several days later on its Web site.

Mr. Ross said he was surprised by how quickly the congressman's office confirmed the authenticity of the e-mail messages, first when ABC reported them on Sept. 28, and again a day later when confronted with much more explicit exchanges.

Mr. Ross dismissed suggestions by some Republicans that the news was disseminated as part of a smear campaign against Mr. Foley.

"I hate to give up sources, but to the extent that I know the political parties of any of the people who helped us, it would be the same party," Mr. Ross said, referring to Republicans.

Your Page, M'Lord (NYT)

By John Tierney

The New York Times, October 3, 2006

Suppose Nike's founder, Phil Knight, asked taxpayers to subsidize a program for 16-year-olds to leave their homes to become "squires" running errands at Nike headquarters. Or suppose, before his death, Sam Walton had asked Congress to build a dormitory in Arkansas to house teenage "serfs" spending a semester away from their schools to work on a Wal-Mart loading dock.

These executives would become national jokes. They'd be denounced for trying to revive 19th-century child-labor practices and 12th-century feudalism. There would be no public money appropriated for Knight's Squires or Sam's Serfs.

DOJ_NMG_0073372

Yet Congress sees nothing strange about dragging teenagers from their families and schools to become pages, one step below a squire in the feudal food chain. They're not being forced to wear Prince Valiant haircuts, but they have to do scut work that's probably even less useful than what they could learn at Nike or Wal-Mart.

Congressional pages spend much of their time hand-delivering documents, a job that's done electronically in most 21st-century institutions. When educators talk about preparing youth for jobs in the Information Age, they're not talking about training messengers.

The justification for the page program is that it gives teenagers an insider's glimpse of how Congress works. But why disillusion them at such a tender age? If they stayed in school, they could maintain their innocence by reading the old step-by-step textbook version of how a bill becomes law. By going to Capitol Hill, they see how the process has changed:

1. A bill is introduced to build highways.
2. A congressman receives a donation from a constituent who wants to open a go-kart track.
3. The congressman persuades his committee chairman to slip in a $350 million "earmark" for an "alternative sustainable transportation research facility" in his district.
4. The chairman quietly adds similar earmarks for all members of the committee.
5. The bill is passed unanimously.
6. The president complains about the "wasteful spending" but signs it into law anyway.
7. The congressman attends a fund-raiser at the new go-kart track.

What lesson has the page learned? That Congress is the closest thing in modern America to a medieval court: an enclave governed by arcane ancient rules of seniority, a gathering of nobles who spend their days accepting praise and dispensing favors to supplicants.

They're so secure in their jobs, and so used to being surrounded by groveling minions, that they assume the privileges of feudal lords when dealing with pages and other lieges. Which is why, on occasion, they try to exercise the droit du seigneur.

Unlike previous scandals, in which members were censured for having sex with pages, the current one so far doesn't involve physical contact. But it features lewd messages from Representative Mark Foley to a teenager asking about his sex life and requesting a picture. When you are chairman of the House Caucus on Missing and Exploited Children, as Foley was, this does not qualify as research for your job.

Even if you could somehow quell Congressional libidos, even if this scandal taught members of Congress not to hit on teenagers, the page program still wouldn't be worth paying for. It should be eliminated, as Representative Ray LaHood has proposed, for the sake of both Congress and the pages. They need to be spared not just from lustful congressmen but from the chief lesson taught by the program: that success is all about making the right connections.

To get into the program, you (or your parents or their well-connected friends) have to find a member of Congress to sponsor you. Once in, the supreme goal is to ingratiate yourself with someone powerful enough to help you move up the Washington hierarchy. As Rachel Swarns reported in The Times, Foley was a favorite of the pages because he offered them the gift of access.

"If a congressman was talking to you, it was the best thing in the world," said one former page, Patrick McDonald.

Spend enough time as a page, and you can easily believe it's not what you know, it's who you know — and whom you flatter. Granted, toadying can be a useful skill in most lines of work. But it's not a lesson teenagers need to study for a whole semester, especially when it's being taught in text messages from a lord on Capitol Hill.

Foley May Be 1st Member Prosecuted Under Strong Internet-crime Laws (HILL)

By Jackie Kucinich

The Hill, October 3, 2006

Former Rep. Mark Foley (R-Fla.) is not the first member of Congress to face a firestorm of public outrage for engaging in inappropriate conduct with underage pages, but he could be the first to be prosecuted under strong Internet-crime laws.

DOJ_NMG_0073373

Ex-House counsel Stanley Brand said that the difference between the current page incident and an incident two decades ago involving two other lawmakers is the passage of cyber crime laws in recent years and the presence of Internet communication.

"It's not just someone's word against another; there are e-mails," he said. "The difficulty of proving an illicit solicitation is not there. I'm sure that is what the FBI is looking into."

Foley resigned suddenly on Friday after ABC News reported about questionable e-mails and sexually explicit instant messages between a page and the six-term legislator Thursday and Friday. On Monday, Foley checked himself into an alcohol rehabilitation center for treatment.

House GOP leaders, Brand said, could also face consequences politically and legally if the FBI discovers that members of the leadership team knew about Foley's behavior before ABC News released the e-mails and instant messages.

In 1983, the House censured Reps. Daniel B. Crane (R-Ill.) and Gerry E. Studds (D-Mass.) after their inappropriate relations with House pages were discovered.

Crane lost his election shortly thereafter while Studds was reelected and remained in the House until retiring in 1997.

While Crane and Studds escaped prosecution, Foley likely will not. According to Orin Kerr, an associate professor at George Washington University, Foley could have broken the law under 18 U.S. Code 2422(b), which states that an individual "using the mail or any facility or means of interstate or foreign commerce … who knowingly persuades, induces, entices, or coerces" an individual who is under the age of 18 to "engage in prostitution or any sexual activity" can be charged with a criminal offense. If convicted, the individual can be imprisoned for five to 30 years.

As a result of Crane and Studds's misconduct, the House created the Page Board, a body of lawmakers and House officials, which oversee the activities and education of pages.

Three members of the House as well as House Sergeant at Arms Wilson Livingood, Clerk of the House Karen Haas and former clerk Donald Anderson make up the Page Board, according to House Administration Committee spokeswoman Sally Collins.

Reps. John Shimkus (R-Ill), Shelley Moore Capito (R-W.Va.) and Dale Kildee (D-Mich.) are the board's House members.

Speaker Dennis Hastert (R-Ill.) announced several changes to the page program yesterday at a joint press conference with Shimkus including the establishment of a hotline for "parents, grandparents, pages, former pages …"

"Anyone who has a concern about improper contact … can confidentially report improper contact," Hastert said.

Although many improvements have been made to the page program in order to provide more supervision of students, Hastert said House leaders should do more to ensure that pages are safe after they leave their positions in the House.

Shimkus added that he plans to meet with the Page Board in the coming weeks to construct further programs to protect pages.

One member of the board said he was left out of the discussions entirely.

"I am now equally outraged to learn that Republican House Speaker Dennis Hastert announced today that there will be changes in the policies of the House page program," said Kildee. "Once again, I was not informed of the meeting today, nor was I consulted in any way about any proposed changes."

"Speaker Hastert's announcement this afternoon is yet another example of the House Republican leaders being more concerned with finding political cover for themselves than with the safety and well being of the House pages," he added.

Capito, for her part, directed all of her outrage towards Foley.

"As a member of the Page Board — and more importantly as a mother — I am appalled by Mark Foley's despicable conduct and hope that his actions be held accountable by the full weight of our justice system," she said in a release.

The board typically meets two times a year to discuss the agenda for the pages, plan activities, arrange seminars and discuss enrollment, according to Collins.

There are 63 pages admitted to the program each year; Republican members choose 45 of them and Democrats choose 18.

In order to be admitted to the competitive program, applicants must be at least 16 years old, a junior in high school and have a grade point average of 3.0 or above during the academic year.

DOJ_NMG_0073374

Members of Congress sponsor page applicants and then page program staffers interview them. The Clerk's office manages the page program.

Once accepted, pages live in an on-campus dormitory and attend classes in addition to their service in the House.

The program is highly regimented. Pages attend classes in the Jefferson Building of the Library of Congress at 6:45 a.m. and are taught a range of topics including mathematics, social studies and foreign languages.

When they are not in class, their duties are mainly to deliver correspondence and legislative material between members, answer phones in party cloakrooms and prepare the House Floor for sessions. They have a 10 p.m. curfew on weeknights, which extends to midnight on weekends.

They are paid an annual rate of $17,540, with a monthly gross salary of $1,461.67, according to informational materials provided on several members' websites. They are required to pay a residence hall fee of $400 a month, which includes meals and is automatically deducted from their paychecks.

At all times during the workday they are to remain in uniform: blue blazers, a white shirt and gray slacks or skirts.

The page program has had its share of problems traditionally associated with teenagers. In 2002, 11 pages were dismissed for marijuana use. In 1996, five pages were suspended from the program for alcohol use.

Matthew Loraditch, a 21-year-old former page, told the Chicago Tribune Sunday that he had known about the "creepy" e-mails for years. Loraditch runs the House Page Alumni Association's Internet messaging board. That website was shut down Monday.

"Because of the current situation. I am shutting down the board until I can provide a proper statement about my part in what has been going on. I appreciate your patience," the site said. The site was taken down entirely yesterday afternoon.

Loraditch is listed as the website's licensee at the bottom of the home page.

Man Shoots 11, Killing 4 Girls, In Amish School (NYT)

By David Kocieniewski And Gary Gately

The New York Times, October 3, 2006

NICKEL MINES, Pa., Oct. 2 — A dairy truck driver, apparently nursing a 20-year-old grudge, walked into a one-room Amish schoolhouse here Monday morning and systematically tried to execute the girls there, killing four and wounding seven before killing himself, the police said.

The heavily armed gunman first ordered the 15 boys in the room to leave, along with several adults, and demanded that the 11 girls line up facing the blackboard. As the gunman lashed the students' legs together with wire and plastic ties, the teacher dashed from the room and called the police around 10:35 a.m.

The gunman, identified as Charles C. Roberts, 32, killed himself as the police stormed the West Nickel Mines Amish School, which is set back in a cornfield on a street of stone houses, barns and silos in Lancaster County, about 50 miles west of Philadelphia. Several of the wounded were in critical condition in area hospitals.

"He wanted to find female victims," said Col. Jeffrey B. Miller, commissioner of the Pennsylvania State Police. "This was a target of opportunity."

Mr. Roberts had no criminal record or history of psychiatric illness, the authorities said. But notes he left at his home — where he lived with his wife, Marie, and their three children — said he was distraught about a slight that had occurred more than 20 years ago.

The police would not describe the incident that had upset him. But Colonel Miller said Mr. Roberts, who lived near the school but was not Amish, did not appear to have been motivated by religious bias. The police said they were looking into a report that the couple lost an infant daughter in 1997.

When Mr. Roberts arrived at the school shortly before 10:30 a.m., he was carrying a 9-millimeter handgun, Colonel Miller said, and asked the teacher, "Have you seen anything like this?" referring to the weapon. "Can you help me find it?"

When the state police arrived around 10:45, Mr. Roberts had barricaded the doors with bolts and lumber he had brought in his pickup truck, Colonel Miller said.

DOJ_NMG_0073375

After a brief cellphone exchange with his wife and then with the state police, Mr. Roberts began shooting, aiming the handgun and a shotgun at the children as they stood lined in front of the room. As the police began charging the building around 11, Mr. Roberts fired a shot into his head, Colonel Miller said.

"He was angry with life; he was angry at God," Colonel Miller said. "It appears he chose this school because it was close to his home, it had the female victims he was looking for, and it probably seemed easier to get into than some bigger school."

The rampage was the third fatal shooting at a United States school in the past week but seemed nearly incomprehensible to many residents of the Amish community, where crime rates are so low that many homeowners do not lock their doors and many towns have no police force.

The Amish community in Pennsylvania, which numbers about 55,000, lives an agrarian lifestyle, shunning technological advances like electricity and automobiles. And many say their insular lifestyle gives them a sense that they are protected from the violence of American society. But as residents gathered near the school, some wearing traditional garb and arriving in horse-drawn buggies, they said that sense of safety had been shattered.

"If someone snaps and wants to do something stupid, there's no distance that's going to stop them," said Jake King, 56, an Amish lantern maker who knew several families whose children had been shot.

Mr. Roberts's relatives said they, too, were stunned by his violent outburst and had had no indication that he had been planning any attack. His wife issued a written statement offering sympathy to the families of his victims and said she could not reconcile the day's events with the man she had loved.

Her statement was read by a family friend, Dwight Lefever, and described Mr. Roberts as a devoted father who had always taken the time to play with his three children, ferry them to soccer practice and birthday parties, and had "never once refused to help change a diaper."

"The man that did this thing is not the Charles I was married to for nearly 10 years," Mrs. Roberts said in the statement.

The police did not release the names of the victims but said all had been girls from 6 to 13.

Once the police entered the building, they found a cache of weapons and supplies that indicated Mr. Roberts had prepared for a long siege. He had a 9-millimeter semiautomatic pistol, two shotguns, a stun gun, two knives, two cans of gunpowder and 600 rounds of ammunition.

In a toolbox near his body, the police discovered bolts he had used to barricade the school doors with two-by-fours, pliers and wires he had used to bind the girls' legs. Another five-gallon bucket he brought into the building contained earplugs, bathroom tissue and a clean change of clothing, the police said.

Mr. Roberts lived just over a mile from the school in the town of Bart, in a modular home that had a trampoline and sandbox in the yard and was already decorated for Halloween. Neighbors said he was jovial and generally well liked, and they were struggling to understand what had driven him to violence.

"I am dying to know what kind of insult from a girl 20 years ago could have led to this," said Mary Miller, who lived on his street.

The police said, however, that Mr. Roberts's co-workers had noticed changes in his behavior over the past several months. While he had long been known as an upbeat and outgoing person, this year he began to appear sullen, his co-workers told the police. Then, late last week, Mr. Roberts once again appeared upbeat at work, Colonel Miller said.

"We think that's when he decided to do what he did," Colonel Miller said. "It's like his worries and burdens were lifted from him."

The police said most of Mr. Roberts's weapons appeared to be legal. He bought the 9-millimeter semiautomatic, which he fired at least 13 times during his rampage, from a store five miles from the schoolhouse in 2004. The shotguns and ammunition also appeared to be legal, the police said, although it was not clear whether his possession of a stun gun violated any law.

The police said Mr. Roberts had bought the ammunition and other supplies from area stores over the past several months, so there was no glaring sign that might have alerted store owners that he was about to burst out in violence.

The police said Mr. Roberts called his wife from a cellphone while he was inside the school just moments before the shooting. During the call, Colonel Miller said, Mr. Roberts made a reference to the grievance that he blamed for his despair, then told her: "The police are here. I'm not coming home."

DOJ_NMG_0073376

Colonel Miller said that once the gunfire began troopers charged the building and broke in through several windows in the school. By the time they arrived, however, the children lay dead or wounded in the front of the classroom and Mr. Roberts's body was a few feet away. One child died in the arms of a trooper as he rushed her out of the building to get medical help, Colonel Miller said.

Lancaster County school officials held an emergency meeting last night to try to ease the concerns of school administrators and parents unnerved by the shooting. County officials said that despite the bloodshed, residents should be confident that most of the schools were safe.

That reassurance gave little comfort, however, to people like Dwylin Bieler, 42, whose 8-year-old daughter played with one shooting victim.

"You think something like this will never happen, especially in a place like this," said Mr. Bieler, who is Mennonite, and says the Amish community makes him and others feel welcome. "You pray that it won't happen. But you just never know. You can't know. And that's hard to accept."

Four Girls Killed At Pa. Amish School (WP)

By Raymond Mccaffrey And Paul Duggan

The Washington Post, October 3, 2006

BART TOWNSHIP, Pa., Oct. 2 -- A truck driver armed with three guns, two knives and 600 rounds of ammunition burst into a one-room schoolhouse in this Amish community Monday, lined at least 11 girls against a blackboard and shot them "execution style," fatally wounding four before taking his life, police said.

The fourth girl died late last night at a hospital, a spokeswoman for the Pennsylvania State Police said. Of the seven other girls who were shot, as many as six were critically wounded. Their conditions were "very, very dire," said Col. Jeffery B. Miller, commissioner of the state police.

Miller called it "a horrendous crime scene" and said the victims, at least one as young as 6, were shot at close range in the back of the head. The condition of one girl, a 13-year- old, was upgraded last night to serious, a hospital official said.

The shootings in this Lancaster County farming community occurred as police outside the schoolhouse were trying to make contact with the assailant, Charles Carl Roberts IV, 32, who drove a milk tank truck and lived in the area, Miller said.

"It was over within a matter of seconds," he said last night.

Miller said Roberts -- armed with a semiautomatic handgun, a rifle, a shotgun and a stun gun -- apparently was motivated by rage over a long-ago incident unconnected to the school or the Amish.

"Apparently there was some sort of an issue in his past that he, for some reason, wanted to exact revenge against female victims," Miller said. "It's obvious to us that this was a premeditated hostage scenario where, I believe, based on what the investigators have so far, he intended not to walk out of there alive. But he also intended to kill innocent victims."

Three young students and a teacher's aide who was believed to be about 15 or 16 were fatally wounded in the rampage, police said.

Miller said that 15 rounds were fired from the handgun and three from the shotgun. One shotgun blast was directed toward police outside the building, the police official said.

Roberts left notes for his wife and three children "along the lines of suicide notes," Miller said.

The school had 26 students in attendance yesterday, 15 boys and 11 girls, authorities said. The attack shocked the quiet people of this community, whose religion and traditions require them to remain separate from the outside world and shun the trappings of modern life, including electricity and motor vehicles. Roberts was not Amish, and Miller said he had no known criminal history.

The shootings here were the third at a U.S. school in five days.

On Wednesday, a 53-year-old drifter took six girls hostage in Platte Canyon High School in Bailey, Colo., sexually assaulted them and fatally shot a 16-year-old girl before killing himself. Two days later, a 15-year-old former student allegedly shot and killed a principal in Cazenovia, Wis.

DOJ_NMG_0073377

Elsewhere, three teenagers were charged in Green Bay, Wis., on Thursday in an alleged plot to bomb and burn a high school and shoot students as they emerged. And on Monday, officials in Las Vegas said they locked down four schools after a student was spotted entering a high school carrying a gun.

Bart Township, about 60 miles west of Philadelphia, has about 3,000 people and a landscape of grain silos, dairy farms and tobacco fields. Its country roads host the horse-drawn buggies of the Amish.

According to Miller, Roberts's wife, Marie Roberts, told police that her husband worked until 3 a.m. Monday delivering unprocessed milk from Amish farms to a dairy and then went home. He took his children to a bus stop about 8:45 a.m. before driving to the Amish school on White Oak Road.

Roberts apparently was prepared for a long siege, Miller said. In addition to the weapons and rounds of ammunition, he had two cans of smokeless gunpowder, rolls of tape, tools and a change of clothes.

Marie Roberts later found several suicide notes and tried to call her husband, Miller said. About 11 a.m., Roberts called his wife from the schoolhouse and "told her he wasn't coming home," Miller said. Roberts told her that "he couldn't go on anymore" and that "he was getting revenge for something that happened 20 years ago," Miller said.

Miller also said that "there may have been a loss of a child some time in his life."

From the notes to his family and telephone calls, it was clear Roberts was "angry at life, he was angry at God," Miller said. Co-workers at the dairy said Roberts, once given to joking, had seemed to grow despondent not long ago, according to Miller.

But in the past two or three days, Miller said, Roberts changed again. Miller said police were told that Roberts appeared more at ease, which might suggest that he had come to a decision about what he would do.

Miller said he did not believe that Roberts was influenced by the recent school shootings but instead settled on his course independently.

"The man who did this today is not the Charlie that I've been married to for almost 10 years," Marie Roberts said in a statement released to the news media.

Quoting a teacher who escaped, Miller said that when Roberts entered the school, he showed students the handgun and spoke to them in a "rambling discourse," Miller said.

In a news conference, Miller said Roberts arrived at the school in the morning in a borrowed pickup. He said Roberts separated the boys, ages 6 to 13, from the girls at the school.

Roberts then told the girls to line up against a blackboard and bound their feet with wire ties and plastic handcuffs, Miller said, his voice choked with emotion. Roberts allowed the boys to leave, along with a pregnant woman and three women with infants.

As the women, who apparently are teacher's aides, were leaving, a teacher was able to flee, and she called police from a nearby farm at 10:36 a.m., Miller said.

As officers arrived at the school and a hostage negotiator tried to contact Roberts, he called a police dispatcher and warned that he would start shooting in 10 seconds if police did not withdraw, Miller said. Seconds later, shots rang out, and state troopers carrying ballistic shields rushed the building. Miller said Roberts had barred the doors with lumber that he had brought for that purpose and with desks from the classroom.

Roberts spoke to his wife by cellphone moments before he opened fire, Miller said. In addition to shooting at the girls, he fired out a window at approaching state troopers but did not hit them. Miller said troopers did not fire. One was injured slightly by broken glass while going in a window.

Police found Roberts face down on the floor, with the weapons beside him, Miller said, adding that "one of the girls died in the arms of one of my troopers."

Television news footage showed ambulances and police vehicles on the road outside the schoolhouse, which is surrounded by a white fence. A blue pickup with a white cap over the bed was backed up to the front of the schoolhouse. At one point, firefighters and Amish men walked abreast through nearby fields, looking for students who might have fled and were not accounted for.

The wounded were taken to several hospitals, in locations that included Hershey, Pa., Philadelphia and Delaware.

DOJ_NMG_0073378

At the Penn State Milton S. Hershey Medical Center in Hershey, a 6-year-old girl and an 8-year-old girl remained in critical condition last night in the pediatric intensive care unit, a hospital spokesman said.

He said the girl who was upgraded to serious had undergone about five hours of surgery and was able to communicate with family members by blinking her eyes and giving hand signals.

The death of the fourth girl, about 12 hours after the shooting, was reported by Trooper Linette Quinn, a state police spokeswoman. It was not clear at what hospital she died.

The first Amish settlers arrived in Lancaster County in the early 18th century, according to the Pennsylvania Dutch Country Web site.

Donald Kraybill, a leading national scholar of Amish communities, said violence is rare at Amish schoolhouses, which he said are characterized by an emphasis on order, but where pranks and giggles are not uncommon. About 150 small Amish schoolhouses dot Lancaster County.

Monday, Amish people gathered on a farm near the school, bearded men in black pants, suspenders and broad-brimmed straw hats and women in long dresses and bonnets.

Irene Moyer, who is Amish, said she was contacted by the parents of one of the children at the school. "One of the Amish neighbors knocked at the door and said: 'Can you take care of my children? There's a gunman at the school.' "

A family spokesman, Dwight LeFever, read a statement from Roberts's wife, saying: "Our hearts are broken, our lives are shattered, and we grieve for the innocence and lives that were lost today. Above all, please, pray for the families who lost children and, please, pray, too, for our family and children."

Staff writers Daniel de Vise, Tamara Jones, Kari Lydersen, Dan Morse, Clarence Williams and William Branigin, researcher Meg Smith and the Associated Press contributed to this report.

Gunman Slays 4 Amish Schoolgirls (WT/AP)

By Mark Scolforo

The Washington Times, October 3, 2006

NICKEL MINES, Pa. -- A milk-truck driver carrying three guns and a grudge stormed a one-room Amish schoolhouse yesterday, sent the boys and adults outside, barricaded the doors with two-by-fours, and then opened fire on a dozen girls, killing four of them before committing suicide.

It was the nation's third deadly school shooting in less than a week, and it sent shock waves through Lancaster County's bucolic Amish country, a picturesque landscape of horse-drawn buggies, green pastures and neat-as-a-pin farms, where violent crime is virtually nonexistent.

Most had been shot, execution-style, after being lined up along the chalkboard, their feet bound with wire and plastic ties, authorities said. The names and ages of the dead were not released.

"This is a horrendous, horrific incident for the Amish community. They're solid citizens in the community. They're good people. They don't deserve ... no one deserves this," State Police Commissioner Jeffrey B. Miller said.

Two young students were killed, along with a female teacher's aide, Col. Miller said. Authorities said the aide was about 15. Late last night, Philadelphia's Fox affiliate WTXF and CNN said a fourth student had died.

At least six other victims were critically wounded, state police said.

The gunman, Charles Carl Roberts IV, a 32-year-old truck driver from the nearby town of Bart, was bent on killing young girls as a way of "acting out in revenge for something that happened 20 years ago," Col. Miller said, though he gave no details on what the grudge was.

Roberts was not Amish and apparently had nothing against the religious community, Col. Miller said. Instead, Col. Miller said, he apparently picked the school because it was close by, there were girls there and it had little or no security.

Col. Miller said Roberts was apparently preparing for a long siege, arming himself with a 9 mm semiautomatic pistol, a 12-gauge shotgun and a rifle, along with a bag with about 600 rounds of ammunition, two cans of smokeless powder, two knives and a stun gun on his belt. He also had rolls of tape, various tools and a change of clothes.

DOJ_NMG_0073379

Roberts had left several rambling notes to his wife and three children that Col. Miller said were "along the lines of suicide notes." The gunman also called his wife during the siege by cell phone to tell her that he was getting even for some long-ago offense, Col. Miller said.

The shooting took place at the one-room West Nickel Mines Amish School, a neat white building set amid green fields about 55 miles west of Philadelphia, with a square white horse fence around the schoolyard. The school had about 25 to 30 students, ages 6 to 13.

From the suicide notes and telephone calls, it was clear Roberts was "angry at life, he was angry at God," Col. Miller said. And it was clear from interviews with his co-workers at the dairy that his mood had darkened in recent days and that he had stopped chatting and joking around with fellow employees and customers, the officer said.

Col. Miller said Roberts had been scheduled to take a random drug test yesterday. But the officer said it was not clear whether that played a role in the attack. The colonel also said investigators were looking into whether the attack was related to the death of one of Roberts' own children. According to an obituary, Roberts and his wife, Marie, lost a daughter shortly after she was born in 1997.

Reporters were kept away from the school after the shooting, and the Amish were reluctant to speak with the press, as is their custom. The victims were members of the Old Order Amish. Lancaster County is home to some 20,000 Old Order Amish, who eschew automobiles, electricity, computers, fancy clothes and most other modern conveniences, live among their own people, and typically speak a German dialect known as Pennsylvania Dutch.

Bob Allen, a clerk at a bookstore in the Amish country tourist town of Intercourse, said residents see the area as being safe and the Amish as peaceful people.

"It just goes to show there's no safe place. There's really no such thing," he said.

After entering the building, Roberts released about 15 boys, a pregnant woman and three women with babies, Col. Miller said.

"Very, very traumatic situation. Some of my troopers, actually one of the girls died in the arms of one of our troopers," Col. Miller said.

A Roberts family spokesman, Dwight Lefever, read a short statement from Mrs. Roberts that said, in part, "Our hearts are broken, our lives are shattered, and we grieve for the innocence and lives that were lost today. Above all, please pray for the families who lost children and please pray too for our family and children."

Seclusion Shattered By School Slayings (USAT)

By Thomas Frank And Alan Levin

USA Today, October 3, 2006

BART TOWNSHIP, Pa. — They shun electricity, telephones and the court system to try to stay disconnected from a world they consider polluted by modern convention and comfort.

But the rural seclusion the Amish have here in central Pennsylvania's rolling hills was shattered Monday by the execution-style shooting of three Amish girls in a one-room schoolhouse.

“You read about it, you hear about it. But you don't expect it to happen this close to home,” said John Fisher, 33, an Amish man who lives a half-mile from the school.

The killings — the girls were bound together and had to be cut apart by rescue workers according to the Pennsylvania State Police — devastated the ordinarily composed Amish. Many were “crying and weeping and hugging, and the Amish people don't usually show too much emotion,” said Annie Beiler, 66, whose farm abuts the school property. “They are quiet, private people.”

Lancaster County District Attorney Don Totaro said, “It's beyond comprehension that anyone would slaughter children in this manner.”

“It's like a dream. It's something you hear of in a city,” said Naomi Fisher, whose runs an auction house nearby. “You read it in the paper. But not in a quiet little country school.”

DOJ_NMG_0073380

David Bernard, 66, of Parkesburg works as a driver for some Amish neighbors and accompanied them to the school Monday night. Bernard said the Amish viewed the violence as a demonstration of the problems posed by the modern world.

"This is a place of blood," he said of the school. "People died here, so they'll probably tear it down."

The violence seemed unlikely to change the tight religious sect that is rooted in non-violence and resistance to change.

"I don't see it as having a large effect on their lifestyle," said David Weaver-Zercher, a professor at Messiah College in Pennsylvania. "In a certain way, it confirms a general orientation about the world not being a very good place."

Since the Amish emerged as a small Protestant sect in late-17th-century Switzerland, its adherents have strived to maintain religious purity. Nonviolence — or "non-resistance" — was an early tenet that arose from a literal reading of the New Testament.

"They take the words of Jesus seriously: to love your enemies and not to do evil to fellow people," said Donald Kraybill, an Amish expert at Elizabethtown College in Pennsylvania. "There is very little violence in the Amish community."

Crime by the Amish is so rare that only one adherent is thought to have been convicted of murder: an Amish man from western Pennsylvania who killed his wife in 1993 saying he wanted to excise the devil.

The gunman Monday, Charles Carl Roberts IV, was not Amish and was not targeting the Amish but apparently picked the school because it was near his home and had little security, said Col. Jeffrey Miller of the Pennsylvania State Police. Roberts killed himself in the school building.

Amish schools — typically one-room schoolhouses with 25-30 students and a young, female teacher — reflect the community's efforts to protect itself against the dangers of worldliness. The Amish went to the U.S. Supreme Court in 1972 to preserve their right to end classroom education after eighth grade.

They won a decision in 1972 that said the Amish weren't against education itself but oppose "conventional formal education" in high school years "because it comes at the child's crucial adolescent period of religious development."

"The Amish view is that they should provide the basic education for children to live productively in the Amish community," said Herman Bontrager of the National Committee for Amish Religious Freedom, which brought the Supreme Court case. "Additional things really aren't necessary for living productively in their community. They distract and maybe lead you into another world."

The Amish have negotiated a tricky path between accepting and rejecting convention since the rise of technology in the mid-19th century. They number about 200,000. The largest communities are in Ohio, Pennsylvania and Indiana.

Many have moved away from farming, particularly in Lancaster County, Pa., the site of Monday's shooting and the setting for the acclaimed 1985 film Witness, in which Harrison Ford plays a Philadelphia police officer who takes refuge on an Amish farm.

About 60% of Lancaster's Amish run businesses such as greenhouses, woodworking shops and farmer's markets, said Kraybill.

That has challenged the Amish's effort to "separate from the world," said Weaver-Zercher, the Messiah College professor. "They look at various technology and how that would connect them."

The Amish eschew electricity that would literally connect them to society through power lines, but they use self-contained power sources such as batteries and gas to run refrigerators and stoves.

They pay federal income taxes and local property taxes, but they won an act of Congress to exempt them from paying and receiving Social Security benefits. "They feel the church should provide support for its own members," Kraybill said.

Amish avoid phones in their homes, where they would enable intrusions that interrupt family life. Phones are in some Amish businesses and at roadside booths where families share them.

After the gunman took students hostage in the school, a teacher ran to a farmhouse where someone called 911.

Although Amish enjoy police protection, many of them are reluctant to cooperate with criminal investigations, viewing prosecution as a form of force.

Steven Nolt, a historian at Goshen College in Indiana who's written several books about the Amish, recalled cases in which Amish people were murdered but relatives refused to help win convictions "because they weren't going to engage in that kind of retributive violence."

Weaver-Zercher of Messiah College said he expects the Amish to "reach out" to the gunman's widow.

"They'll try to express their forgiveness," he said, "and sense that in some ways, this woman is a victim."

DOJ_NMG_0073381

Gunman At Amish School Kills 4 Girls, Wounds 7 (PPG)

By Tom Barnes And Tracie Mauriello, Pittsburgh Post-gazette

Pittsburgh Post-Gazette, October 3, 2006

Lancaster County milk truck driver kills himself after slaughter

NICKEL MINES -- It was a bloodbath, made even more horrible by its location and its innocent victims, who became targets of a lone gunman apparently because they simply lived near his home.

Charles Carl Roberts IV, 32, a rural milk truck driver and father of three, walked into West Nickel Mines School, the tiny schoolhouse less than 2 miles from his home that housed children in grades one through eight.

Armed with three guns and 600 rounds of ammunition, he ordered all but the girls to leave, then barricaded the doors with lumber, bound the children's legs and lined them up against the chalkboard.

He called his wife to say he was "angry at life, angry at God" then shot each girl, most of them in the back of the head and all at close range.

Police had arrived on the scene before the shots were fired and tried to hail Mr. Roberts using loudspeakers.

Mr. Roberts used a cell phone to call a 911 center and tell them he would begin shooting if state police did not leave. When police at the scene tried to call Mr. Roberts back, that's when they heard the sound of gunfire.

By the time police managed to break into the school, they found Mr. Roberts dead.

Mr. Roberts, apparently seeking revenge for a mysterious incident 20 years ago when he was a boy, had planned the slaughter for days, based on the weapons, tools and other equipment police recovered inside the school.

"It's clear to us he did a great deal of planning in this," said state police Commissioner Jeffrey Miller. "It was clear he intended to be prepared for a lengthy siege. It was not a spur of the moment thing. He intended to harm these kids and himself."

Two young girls and Mr. Roberts died inside the schoolhouse, a third female, a 15-year-old teacher's aide, died later at Lancaster General Hospital. Another girl died later last night, and seven others were fighting for their lives at hospitals in Philadelphia, Hershey and Wilmington, Del.

It was the nation's third deadly school shooting in the last week, and it prompted the Bush administration to call for a national conference next week on school violence.

"It would be a miracle if we were able to somehow not have any further loss of life," Col. Miller said. Police did not release the names of the victims.

Two had such severe head wounds they could not be identified for hours. State police showed photographs of the wounded children to families of the victims so they then could be taken to the correct hospital to see their daughters.

"They were killed at close range, execution style," Col. Miller said. "I have never seen anything like this. This was a horrendous tragedy."

The incident did not appear to be related to the Amish. Mr. Roberts is not Amish.

Col. Miller would say little else about a motive except that something might have happened 20 years ago, when Mr. Roberts was 12. Col Miller refused to elaborate.

"It seems as though he wanted to attack young, female victims," Col. Miller said.

He also said the death of Mr. Roberts' infant daughter in 1997 may have played a part in yesterday's tragedy.

"How these pieces fit together we don't know. We may never know," he said. "We believe he was going through some sort of personal strife, something from 20 years ago."

Neighbors and distant relatives said they did not know about any incident from 20 years ago.

"I completely don't know anything about anything like that," said Ken Scott, who used to work with Mr. Roberts.

"It appears this location was probably picked because it was close by. It was a target of opportunity," Col. Miller said. "He was able to locate individuals in the age group he was looking for."

Police say Mr. Roberts, who lived in the town of Bart, dropped off his children at a school bus stop, then drove a borrowed pickup truck to the school at about 9:45 a.m. Brandishing a semiautomatic pistol, he also carried a range bag containing a shotgun, a rifle, two knives, a stun gun, two cans of smokeless gunpowder, a change of clothes, a hammer, a hacksaw, tape and lumber, which he used to secure the doors and to prevent police from storming inside.

Before securing the building, Mr. Roberts allowed 15 boys, a pregnant woman and three women with infants to leave the building, then lined up 11 girls, age 6 to 15, against a chalkboard, their feet bound with wire ties and flexible plastic ties, Col. Miller said.

It was about that time that the teacher and another adult at the school fled to a nearby farmhouse, and someone there called 911 around 10:30 a.m. to report a gunman holding students hostage.

Most of the victims were shot in the back of the head, although some were hit in other parts of their bodies.

It was over in seconds.

Police could not easily enter the schoolhouse because Mr. Roberts "had taken extreme measures to fortify this location. He took two-by-sixes and two-by-fours and nailed them to the doors and then used flex-ties so there was practically no way we could get in quickly."

Police believe Mr. Roberts held the hostages for about 45 minutes before the teacher got away and reached a telephone to call for help.

About the same time, police received another call from Mr. Roberts' distraught wife, Marie, who had returned home to find suicide notes left by her husband for her and their children.

Most of the injured were badly hurt.

Two girls -- ages 8 and 6 -- remained in critical condition last night at the Penn State Children's Hospital in Hershey, while a 13-year-old girl was upgraded to serious condition after surgery, spokeswoman Amy Buehler Stranges said.

Three girls, ages 8, 10 and 12, were flown to Children's Hospital of Philadelphia, where they were still in surgery last night, spokeswoman Peggy Flynn said. The youngest girl was being treated for gunshot wounds of her neck and arm. The 10-year-old was suffering from head injuries. The oldest girl was being treated for arm and leg injuries.

One victim was transported by helicopter to Christiana Hospital in Delaware, spokesman Spiros Mantzavinos said. He declined to give the person's age or release information about the condition or type of injuries, citing confidentiality laws.

The incident left the peaceful Amish farming community of about 300 looking for answers.

"Our children are defenseless. He picked an easy target. It takes a real target to do that," said John Fisher, 33, one of several dozen Amish men clustered at an informal state police command post, about 300 yards from the school.

"This is a sad day, something I never expected in this community," said another Amish man, Jacob King, a 31-year-old stonemason and lifelong resident.

Many of the Amish neighbors spent a lot of time being interviewed by reporters, although some objected to television interviews because they didn't want their pictures taken.

Some Amish and non-Amish residents speculated the incidents might affect relations between the cultures.

Daniel Beiler, 30, who is Amish, said it could make the Amish even further reject the outside world. But Mr. Fisher wasn't so sure.

"We have a very good relationship with the non-Amish. We get along very well," he said.

Longtime residents of the area were equally shocked.

"I can't believe anybody could do this to children," said Shirley Woerth, who has lived here for 53 years.

Mr. Roberts had no criminal history and no active warrants out against him. He grew up in the area, and his and his wife's families still live in the area.

State police were examining his milk truck, which was found parked several hundred yards from the shooting scene.

A family spokesman, Dwight LeFever, read a short statement from Mr. Roberts' wife that said, in part, "Our hearts are broken, our lives are shattered, and we grieve for the innocence and lives that were lost today. Above all, please pray for the families who lost children and please pray too for our family and children."

The Amish live among their own people and maintain a lifestyle that eschews modern conveniences, such as television and radio. They typically speak a German dialect known as Pennsylvania Dutch.

Land O'Lakes, based in Arden Hills, Minn., issued a statement confirming that Mr. Roberts was employed as a truck driver and assigned to Northwest Food Products, a wholly owned Land O'Lakes subsidiary.

DOJ_NMG_0073383

The shootings were disturbingly similar to an attack last week at Platte Canyon High School in Bailey, Colo., where a man took several girls hostage in a school classroom and then killed one of them and himself. Authorities said the man in Colorado sexually molested the girls.

"If this is some kind of a copycat, it's horrible and of concern to everybody, all law enforcement," said Monte Gore, undersheriff of Park County, Colo.

Col. Miller, though, said he believed the Pennsylvania attack was not a copycat crime: "I really believe this was about this individual and what was going on inside his head."

Three Killed, 8 Hurt In Pennsylvania School Attack (Update8) (BLOOM)

By Todd Zeranski And Chris Dolmetsch

Bloomberg, October 3, 2006

Oct. 2 (Bloomberg) -- Three people were killed and eight were critically wounded by a gunman at a one-room Amish school in rural Lancaster County, Pennsylvania, authorities said.

The gunman, Charles Carl Roberts, 32, a milk truck driver who lived in the area, also killed himself, state police Commander Jeffrey Miller said in a televised press conference. Roberts left a suicide note saying he was seeking revenge for something that happened 20 years ago, Miller said.

``He split them up, males and females," Miller said. ``He let the males go, some of the adults go. He bound the females at the blackboard, and apparently executed them."

Roberts was armed with a semi-automatic handgun, a shotgun, a stun gun and several knives, in addition to tools such as a hammer, hacksaw and wooden boards he used to barricade the classroom after letting some of the people go, said Miller, who added that Roberts had no previous criminal record.

The attack took place at Georgetown Amish School in Bart Township, a farming area with about 3,000 people, 60 miles (97 kilometers) west of Philadelphia. The Amish are a Christian sect that stress separation from the modern world. Many drive horses and buggies rather than cars and don't have electricity in their homes.

``This is the last place on earth that something like this would happen," said Raymond Bial, author of the books ``Amish Home" and ``Visit to Amish Country."

`Don't Fight Back'

``The Amish are pacifists," he said in a phone interview. ``They don't believe in taking part in any conflict, and sometimes people take advantage of that because they don't fight back."

The contents of Roberts's suicide note, which was left at home for his wife and three children, weren't immediately disclosed, nor what drove Roberts to seek revenge.

The killings were the third attack at an American school in six days. A gunman took six students hostage at Platte Canyon High School in Bailey, Colorado, before killing one girl and himself on Sept. 27. A principal in Wisconsin was shot to death by a former student on Sept. 29.

President George W. Bush instructed Attorney General Alberto Gonzales and Education Secretary Margaret Spellings to convene a meeting in Washington next week among educators and law enforcement officials to come up with ways to deal with school violence.

``The president is deeply saddened by the recent school shootings," deputy White House press secretary Dana Perino told reporters today traveling aboard Air Force One to a political rally for Representative Dean Heller in Reno, Nevada.

Emergency Call

Police surrounded the Pennsylvania school after receiving an emergency telephone call at about 10:36 a.m., Miller said. When officers attempted to contact the attacker, multiple shots rang out inside the schoolhouse, Miller said.

Police stormed the school and broke windows to get inside, only to find the attacker and his victims dead, Miller said.

``This was a premeditated hostage scenario," Miller said. ``He intended not to walk out of there alive, but he also intended to kill innocent victims."

DOJ_NMG_0073384

Fifteen boys were freed, as well as one pregnant adult and three women with infants, Miller said. A teacher who escaped called the police.

None Unharmed

``I don't believe, based on the numbers we had, that there was a female student or teacher's aide that got out of the building alive or not hit by a bullet," Commander Miller said.

The critically injured children were flown to pediatric hospitals in Philadelphia, Hershey and Reading, Pennsylvania, and Delaware, Lancaster General Hospital spokesman John Lines said.

Three girls, aged 8, 10 and 12, who were taken to the Children's Hospital of Philadelphia are out of surgery and no longer in critical condition, the hospital said in a statement sent by PR Newswire.

Miller said he didn't think the attack was targeted against the Amish. Roberts wasn't Amish, he said.

Amish children attend schools until eighth grade, according to the Pennsylvania Dutch Convention & Visitors Bureau's Web page.

``I don't recall ever a story like this, going into a school and taking the most innocent of innocent," said Herman Bontrager, chief executive officer of New Holland, Pennsylvania- based Goodwill Mutual Casualty Co., located about 10 miles from the site of the shooting. ``It has people in shock pretty much around here."

There are about 25,000 Amish in Lancaster County, the bureau said, citing Raber's 2004 Almanac.

To contact the reporters on this story: Todd Zeranski in New York at tzeranski@bloomberg.net ; Chris Dolmetsch in New York at cdolmetsch@bloomberg.net .

Milk-Truck Driver Kills 3 Girls, Critically Wounds 8 (LAT)

By Ellen Barry And Stephanie Simon, Times Staff Writers

The Los Angeles Times, October 3, 2006

NICKEL MINES, Pa. -- Calling on their faith for guidance, the Amish community here coupled sorrow with forgiveness Monday after a milk-truck driver armed with a small arsenal burst into a one-room schoolhouse, killing three girls and critically wounding eight before committing suicide.

The attack was methodical, gruesome and baffling. Charles Carl Roberts IV, a 32-year-old father of three with no criminal record, entered the schoolhouse with a gun in his hand about 10 a.m., State Police Commissioner Jeffrey B. Miller said. Roberts, who was not Amish and had no known connection to the school, ordered the 15 male students, the teacher and several aides with infants to leave. Then he set about preparing for a siege.

According to Miller, Roberts lined up 10 female students, ages 6 to 13, and a young teacher's aide against the chalkboard. He wrapped wire and plastic ties around their ankles, binding their feet together -- or to one another. He barricaded the door with wooden boards and piled-up desks.

Outside, the teacher and the boys raced for help, cutting through fields to the nearest farmhouse. The Amish eschew most modern technology, so none of them had a cell phone. Many homes here -- like the schoolhouse -- do not have phones, although Amish farmers often have a line running to the barn or corn crib.

At 10:36 a.m., the teacher reached a phone and dialed 911.

Inside the schoolhouse, Roberts waited. He had a shotgun, a semiautomatic pistol and a rifle, 600 rounds of ammunition, explosive powder, a stun gun, two knives, a change of clothes, and a bucket with pliers, a hacksaw and wire. At some point, Roberts called his wife on his cell phone. He talked of a grudge from long ago, said he was getting even. He kept the girls silent as he talked. On the other end of the line, his wife heard nothing but his voice.

State police pulled up to the pale-yellow building at 10:45 a.m., nine minutes after the call for help. They tried to contact the gunman using the public-address system on their squad cars. Roberts did not respond. Instead, he called 911 and demanded they leave. If they did not back off within 10 seconds, he said, he'd start shooting.

Seconds later, gunfire erupted.

DOJ_NMG_0073385

Roberts shot the girls in the head -- one after another, in quick order -- with his 9-millimeter automatic, stopping once to reload. He opened fire briefly on the troopers as they stormed the school but did not hit them. Then he turned the gun on himself; he fell face-down on the floor, dead.

"It was all over in a matter of seconds," Miller said.

One girl died instantly. A second passed away moments later, in a trooper's arms. A third was pronounced dead when she arrived at the hospital. Eight other children were in critical condition Monday night; Miller said "it would be a miracle" if they all recovered.

"He executed those children," Miller said.

Authorities said Roberts apparently was looking to take revenge on young girls, and found the school a convenient target -- "a location of opportunity," as Miller put it.

Employed by Land O'Lakes and assigned to deliver milk for a subsidiary called Northwest Food Products, Roberts was known around the community as outgoing and personable. Co-workers told authorities that Roberts had seemed tense of late, not his usual, quick-to-joke self, but had been more relaxed in the past few days.

When he finished his milk route about 3 a.m. Monday, Roberts parked the truck on a hill outside the school, as was his custom. He slept a few hours at his nearby home, but was up by 8:45 a.m. to take his children to the bus stop. His wife, Marie, noticed nothing wrong; the day was unremarkable, routine. "His family had no inkling," Miller said.

Marie Roberts released a statement Monday night to the media saying: "The man who did this today is not the Charlie that I've been married to for almost 10 years. My husband is loving, supportive, thoughtful, all the things you'd always want and more. ... Our hearts are broken our lives are shattered, and we grieve for the innocence and lives that were lost today."

Before driving to the school in a borrowed pick-up truck, Roberts left notes for each of his young children. His suicide letters, like his final call to his wife, alluded to resentment over a past grievance. Miller speculated that it could have something to do with a child that Roberts and his wife lost years ago. Mostly, Miller said, the notes expressed rage: "He was angry with life. Angry with God."

But Roberts' brutality evoked very little anger among the community Monday. Men in broad-brimmed hats and suspenders and women in bonnets and long dark dresses expressed grief and shock, but in hushed, muted tones. "It's a sad day," Jacob King, a 31-year-old stonemason said. He could think of nothing else to add, just repeated that one word, "sad."

Rather than dwell on the victims -- though this is a close-knit community, where few are strangers -- Amish residents spoke of their concern for Roberts' family; their sorrow that a man could become so unhinged, so alienated from the Lord.

"I wish someone could have helped him out, poor soul. It's obvious that something was troubling him," said Steve, a 54-year-old carpenter who, like many here, would not give his full name.

Of the tragedy, he would say only that it was "uncalled for," and unexpected.

An Amish woman who gave her name as Irene also expressed compassion for the gunman. "I am very thankful," she said, "that I was raised to believe you don't fight back. You should forgive."

About 20,000 Old Order Amish live among the dairy farms and cornfields in Lancaster County, about an hour's drive west of Philadelphia. They shun modern conveniences such as computers and television; many do not have electricity, and some do not have indoor plumbing. Their children usually walk the mile or two to the local schoolhouse, often a one-room building with a few dozen students from first grade through eighth. Most Amish children leave school after eighth grade to work on the family farm.

Communities do not typically have their own police force, but rely on the county sheriff or state troopers. "There's no need for police," said Aaron Meyer, 60, who owns a local business giving buggy rides to tourists.

Monday's attack in many ways echoed a fatal school shooting last week in rural Bailey, Colo. In that incident, a drifter named Duane Morrison, 53, entered a high school English class, ordered the teacher and male students to leave, and kept six girls as hostages. He sexually molested some of them during a four-hour standoff. When police swarmed the classroom, Morrison fatally shot one girl and then killed himself.

Also last week, a 15-year-old boy shot and killed his principal at a school in Cazenovia, Wis. And on Monday, school police in North Las Vegas, Nev., spotted a former student on campus with a gun; he fled before firing any shots.

DOJ_NMG_0073386

Here in Lancaster County, violence also is not completely unknown: Just this past spring, a young man confessed to killing six of his relatives, aged 5 to 64. A few months later, the county was hit with a string of robberies, including the knifepoint mugging of a buggy driver.

As night fell, the wooden schoolhouse remained cordoned off with crime-scene tape. A pumpkin sat out front; in the back, the doors to two outhouses were propped open. A few orange flags marked the places where evidence had been retrieved.

But for a cluster of TV trucks, the valley was still and dark.

Barry reported from Nickel Mines and Simon from Denver.

Gun Reported At North Las Vegas School (AP)

By Ken Ritter, Associated Press Writer

AP, October 3, 2006

LAS VEGAS, Nev. — Four public school campuses were locked down Monday while police searched for a teenager who was spotted at a high school with a gun, authorities said.

No shots were fired, and police said they had no indication the teen _ a former student who had been banned from Mojave High School _ had threatened anyone.

Police gave up their search of a residential area in suburban North Las Vegas after more than three hours.

"We know who he is," North Las Vegas police spokesman Tim Bedwell said. "He will be found eventually."

Bedwell would not disclose the teen's name or age, but said he believed the youth had been expelled or transferred from the high school for academic or disciplinary reasons.

The teen ran from the Mojave High campus when school police recognized him and confronted him about 7 a.m., authorities said. School police reported finding a .25-caliber handgun behind a nearby church.

About 2,300 students at the high school and 2,900 youngsters at two nearby elementary schools and a middle school were locked down during the police search of a square-mile residential area. The security measure meant students were kept in rooms while instruction continued, said David Sheehan, a school district spokesman.

The Clark County School District, with about 300,000 students and 325 schools, is the fifth-largest district in the nation.

Bedwell said the teen could face charges including trespassing, possession of a handgun by a minor and possession of a weapon on school property, a felony.

School districts across the country have been especially sensitive to threats after deadly shootings last week at schools in Wisconsin and Colorado, and then another on Monday in Pennsylvania's Amish country.

On Friday, a school principal was gunned down in Cazenovia, Wis., and a 15-year-old student was charged with murder. Just two days earlier, an adult gunman held six girls hostage in a school at Bailey, Colo., before killing a 16-year-old girl and then himself.

Expelled Boy Shows Up At School Armed, Then Flees (NYT)

By Cathy Scott

The New York Times, October 3, 2006

NORTH LAS VEGAS, Nev., Oct. 2 — A 15-year-old boy who had been expelled from his high school returned to the grounds there Monday morning with an automatic pistol and an AK-47 assault rifle, but fled when he was recognized and remained at large, the police said.

The youth, whose name was not released, did not fire the weapons and apparently did not threaten anyone, the police said, but four public schools were locked down throughout the morning as the neighborhood around the high school was searched.

The youth was expelled from the school, Mojave High, in the last academic year, though it is not clear why. The authorities were waiting for him there Monday morning, having received a tip from a student, said Sgt. Phil Gervasi of the Clark County school district police.

When the youth recognized the officers, Sergeant Gervasi said, he dropped the loaded .25-caliber pistol and fled. After three hours, the search in the neighborhood was called off, he said.

“They’re still looking for an AK-47 he stole from his parents’ house,” Sergeant Gervasi said.

DOJ_NMG_0073387

A growing number of guns in schools has been a pressing issue in Clark County, which, with 300,000 students enrolled at 325 schools, has the fifth-largest school district in the country. Last Thursday 50 members of the school police protested at a school board meeting, seeking the hiring of more officers.

Bail In School Attack Is $750,000; Safety Cited (MJS)

By Journal Sentinel Staff And The Associated Press

Milwaukee Journal Sentinel, October 3, 2006

A Sauk County prosecutor told a judge Monday that 15-year-old Eric Hainstock may have had other targets in mind when he entered his high school and killed his principal Friday.

Advertisement

District Attorney Patricia Barrett disclosed the potential of other targets in successfully arguing for a bail amount of $750,000 for the teen, who remains in the Sauk County Law Enforcement Center.

Hainstock appeared in court with his attorneys through a video feed from jail. When Circuit Judge Patrick Taggart asked him if he understood he could face life in prison, Hainstock replied calmly and firmly, "I do."

In following Barrett's bail recommendation, the judge said, "It goes without saying the public does need protection in this matter."

Barrett told the judge there were other "persons of interest" for Hainstock when he went to Weston Schools Friday morning and shot Principal John Klang.

"There were potentially other people that he had a beef with at the time," she said, but did not elaborate.

Hainstock's attorneys asked for $10,000 bail.

He has been charged with one count of first-degree intentional homicide in Klang's death. Taggart set a pretrial conference for Hainstock for Oct. 13.

According to the criminal complaint, Hainstock carried a shotgun and a .22-caliber revolver to the school on Friday morning. A custodian tugged the shotgun away from the youth, who then ran down a hallway while pulling the revolver from a pocket.

Klang, the 49-year-old school principal, confronted the boy and struggled with him in the hallway. He was shot three times while wrestling Hainstock to the floor, the complaint says.

Judge Sets Bail At $750,000 In Weston Schools Shooting (AP)

By Todd Richmond, Associated Press Writer

AP, October 3, 2006

BARABOO, Wis. -- A judge set bail at $750,000 Monday for a 15-year-old boy accused of killing his high school principal after prosecutors said the teen may have been looking for others to attack as well.

Sauk County District Attorney Pat Barrett told the judge there were other "persons of interest" for Eric Hainstock when he went to Weston Schools in Cazenovia Friday morning and shot Principal John Klang. She told reporters after the five-minute hearing that Hainstock may have had additional targets picked out.

"There were potentially other people that he had a beef with at the time," she said, but did not elaborate.

Hainstock's attorneys asked for $10,000 bail, saying the teen has lived in the Sauk County area his whole life and has no convictions.

But Circuit Judge Patrick Taggart agreed with Barrett.

"It goes without saying the public does need protection in this matter," he said.

If Hainstock were to post the $750,000 cash bond, he would have to submit to electronic monitoring, the judge said. He also would be barred from leaving Sauk County or having contact with anyone at the schools or the Klang family.

A handful of students attended the hearing.

Hainstock and his attorneys appeared in court through a video feed from jail. He sat with his chin in his hand. When Taggart asked him if he understood he faces life in prison, Hainstock replied calmly and firmly, "I do."

He has been charged with first-degree intentional homicide. Wisconsin does not have the death penalty.

DOJ_NMG_0073388

Taggart set a pretrial conference for Hainstock for Oct. 13.

Search warrants show deputies found a note at Hainstock's house from him to his father, along with boxes of ammunition, discipline reports from Weston Schools and a photo of a girl with her eyes poked out. Klang gave Hainstock a disciplinary notice for having tobacco in the school Thursday, the day before the shooting, according to the criminal complaint.

Investigators had been to the Hainstock home before. Court records show Hainstock's 35-year-old father, Shawn Hainstock, was charged in 2001 with felony child abuse.

Shawn Hainstock kicked his son several times in the hip for not giving water to some pets, put hot sauce or hot peppers in the boy's mouth for lying or using foul language, and spanked the child with a wooden paddle marked "the board of education," the complaint in that case said.

The elder Hainstock pleaded no contest to misdemeanor battery in 2002 as part of a deferred prosecution agreement, which allows people facing criminal charges to have them dismissed if they fulfill certain conditions. The charge against Shawn Hainstock was dismissed in 2003.

Court records also say Eric Hainstock had a medical condition that affected his behavior but he was not receiving treatment because the family could no longer afford drugs or counseling.

The pain from Friday's violence was still apparent Monday in Cazenovia, a tiny farming community of 300 people about 70 miles northwest of Madison.

"Forever changed. 9-29-06," read billboards outside of the town's only gas station and its municipal building, referring to the date of Klang's death.

Flags at the school complex were at half-staff. Some students and staff met with counselors, while others walked the halls, talking and holding each other.

About a half dozen Sauk County investigators also were in the school reviewing the shooting, but Superintendent Terry Milfred said things were starting to get back to normal. Volleyball practice went on Monday morning, and Friday's football game was still scheduled, he said.

"The spectrum varies from grief ... all the way to seeing a group that is absolutely normal," he said. "That's especially noticeable with students, who are live and vibrant even though they are grieving."

A funeral Mass for Klang will be celebrated at 11 a.m. Wednesday at the Weston High School gymnasium.

National School Violence Conference Set (AP-Y)

By Nedra Pickler, Associated Press Writer

AP, October 3, 2006

The Bush administration will host a conference next week to discuss the recent string of school violence across the country, the White House said Monday.

Presidential spokeswoman Dana Perino said the conference will bring together education and law enforcement officials to talk about the nature of the problem and federal action that can help communities prevent violence and deal with its aftermath.

Three schools have been hit by deadly attacks in the past week. A gunman killed himself and three others Monday at a one-room Amish schoolhouse in Pennsylvania; on Friday a 15-year-old Wisconsin student shot and killed his principal; and last Wednesday a man took six girls hostage in Colorado, sexually assaulting them before fatally shooting one girl and killing himself.

"The president is deeply saddened and troubled by the recent school violence and shootings that have taken place in different communities across America," Perino said. "It breaks America's collective heart when innocent children who are at school to learn are violently taken hostage and cut down in their own schools."

Perino said the conference was still in the planning stages, so a specific date, location and other details were not ready to be announced. It was not clear whether President Bush would attend.

Education Secretary Margaret Spellings, Attorney General Alberto Gonzales and Bush's domestic policy adviser, Karl Zinsmeister, met Monday at the White House to discuss the conference. They met while the president was on a cross-country flight to begin a three-day fundraising trip for Republican candidates in the midterm election.

DOJ_NMG_0073389

Perino said participants on the education side would include groups like the National Parent Teacher Association, school principals and teachers' unions. The Federal Bureau of Investigations would be among those representing law enforcement, she said.

Perino said the president plans to use his fundraising spree through Nevada, California, Arizona and Colorado to draw a clear line between Democrats and Republicans, particularly on the war on terror, as the campaign begins its final month.

Bush began Monday evening at an airport hangar in Reno, Nev., where a few hundred people who donated a combined $360,000 gathered to support Secretary of State Dean Heller's congressional campaign. Heller is up against Democrat Jill Derby for the seat being vacated by Rep. Jim Gibbons, who is running for governor.

"I want you all to remember when you go to the polls here in Nevada, what political party supported the president to make sure we have the tools necessary to protect the American people and which political party didn't," Bush said.

Bush criticized some Democrats for voting against legislation authorizing warrantless monitoring of phone calls and e-mails to detect terror plots and another bill that would allow tough interrogation of terror suspects.

"It sounds like they think the best way to protect the American people is to wait until we're attacked again," Bush said. "That's not the way it's going to be under my administration."

The donors paid $500 to attend the reception, held on a cement-floored hangar decorated with blue curtains, or $2,100 to also be photographed with the president.

Republicans have held the seat since it was created 25 years ago to represent more than 100,000 square miles — nearly the entire state except for Las Vegas. Republicans hold an edge of more than 47,000 registered, mostly rural voters, but polls make it a close race.

About 100 protesters rallied near the fundraiser, chanting, "Vote for change."

"I think it's an indication of how desperate the Republicans have gotten to try to hang onto a seat that just a year ago was considered a slam dunk for the Republicans," said Pam duPre, executive director of the Washoe County Democratic Party.

___

Associated Press Writer Scott Sonner contributed to this report.

___

On the Net:

http://www.whitehouse.gov

Three Killed, 8 Hurt In Pennsylvania School Attack (Update8) (BLOOM)

By Todd Zeranski And Chris Dolmetsch

Bloomberg, October 3, 2006

Oct. 2 (Bloomberg) -- Three people were killed and eight were critically wounded by a gunman at a one-room Amish school in rural Lancaster County, Pennsylvania, authorities said.

The gunman, Charles Carl Roberts, 32, a milk truck driver who lived in the area, also killed himself, state police Commander Jeffrey Miller said in a televised press conference. Roberts left a suicide note saying he was seeking revenge for something that happened 20 years ago, Miller said.

``He split them up, males and females," Miller said. ``He let the males go, some of the adults go. He bound the females at the blackboard, and apparently executed them."

Roberts was armed with a semi-automatic handgun, a shotgun, a stun gun and several knives, in addition to tools such as a hammer, hacksaw and wooden boards he used to barricade the classroom after letting some of the people go, said Miller, who added that Roberts had no previous criminal record.

The attack took place at Georgetown Amish School in Bart Township, a farming area with about 3,000 people, 60 miles (97 kilometers) west of Philadelphia. The Amish are a Christian sect that stress separation from the modern world. Many drive horses and buggies rather than cars and don't have electricity in their homes.

``This is the last place on earth that something like this would happen," said Raymond Bial, author of the books ``Amish Home" and ``Visit to Amish Country."

DOJ_NMG_0073390

`Don't Fight Back'

``The Amish are pacifists," he said in a phone interview. ``They don't believe in taking part in any conflict, and sometimes people take advantage of that because they don't fight back."

The contents of Roberts's suicide note, which was left at home for his wife and three children, weren't immediately disclosed, nor what drove Roberts to seek revenge.

The killings were the third attack at an American school in six days. A gunman took six students hostage at Platte Canyon High School in Bailey, Colorado, before killing one girl and himself on Sept. 27. A principal in Wisconsin was shot to death by a former student on Sept. 29.

President George W. Bush instructed Attorney General Alberto Gonzales and Education Secretary Margaret Spellings to convene a meeting in Washington next week among educators and law enforcement officials to come up with ways to deal with school violence.

``The president is deeply saddened by the recent school shootings," deputy White House press secretary Dana Perino told reporters today traveling aboard Air Force One to a political rally for Representative Dean Heller in Reno, Nevada.

Emergency Call

Police surrounded the Pennsylvania school after receiving an emergency telephone call at about 10:36 a.m., Miller said. When officers attempted to contact the attacker, multiple shots rang out inside the schoolhouse, Miller said.

Police stormed the school and broke windows to get inside, only to find the attacker and his victims dead, Miller said.

``This was a premeditated hostage scenario," Miller said. ``He intended not to walk out of there alive, but he also intended to kill innocent victims."

Fifteen boys were freed, as well as one pregnant adult and three women with infants, Miller said. A teacher who escaped called the police.

None Unharmed

``I don't believe, based on the numbers we had, that there was a female student or teacher's aide that got out of the building alive or not hit by a bullet," Commander Miller said.

The critically injured children were flown to pediatric hospitals in Philadelphia, Hershey and Reading, Pennsylvania, and Delaware, Lancaster General Hospital spokesman John Lines said.

Three girls, aged 8, 10 and 12, who were taken to the Children's Hospital of Philadelphia are out of surgery and no longer in critical condition, the hospital said in a statement sent by PR Newswire.

Miller said he didn't think the attack was targeted against the Amish. Roberts wasn't Amish, he said.

Amish children attend schools until eighth grade, according to the Pennsylvania Dutch Convention & Visitors Bureau's Web page.

``I don't recall ever a story like this, going into a school and taking the most innocent of innocent," said Herman Bontrager, chief executive officer of New Holland, Pennsylvania- based Goodwill Mutual Casualty Co., located about 10 miles from the site of the shooting. ``It has people in shock pretty much around here."

There are about 25,000 Amish in Lancaster County, the bureau said, citing Raber's 2004 Almanac.

To contact the reporters on this story: Todd Zeranski in New York at tzeranski@bloomberg.net ; Chris Dolmetsch in New York at cdolmetsch@bloomberg.net .

Bush 'Troubled' By School Shooting (AFP-Y)

AFP, October 3, 2006

US President George W. Bush was "deeply saddened and troubled" by a shooting at a Pennsylvania schoolhouse that left at least three girls dead, the White House said.

Bush ordered cabinet officials to find ways for the government to help in the aftermath of recent school shootings, said Dana Perino, a White House spokeswoman.

Bush is "deeply saddened and troubled by the recent school violence," Perino told reporters on a presidential trip to Reno, Nevada.

DOJ_NMG_0073391

"It breaks America's collective heart when innocent children who are at school to learn are violently taken hostage and gunned down," Perino said.

Attorney General Alberto Gonzales and US Education Secretary Margaret Spellings will convene a conference next week with education and law enforcement groups to discuss school violence, she said.

Gonzales and Spellings met Monday with Bush's domestic policy adviser, Zinsmeister, to discuss the issue, Perino said.

A truck driver burst into an Amish schoolhouse in rural Pennsylvania Monday and killed at least three girls "execution style" after lining them up in a classroom, police said.

It was the third fatal killing in a US school in the past week.

Last week a 16-year-old schoolgirl was killed when a gunman took six hostages at a Colorado school before opening fire and turning the gun on himself as police stormed a classroom.

On Friday, the principal of a Wisconsin high school was killed after being shot by a student.

'A Horrendous Crime Scene' (USAT)

By Alan Levin And Laura Parker

USA Today, October 3, 2006

NICKEL MINES, Pa. - A milk-truck driver claiming to have a 20-year-old grudge barricaded himself inside a one-room Amish schoolhouse Monday and shot 12 girls, killing three of them, before he committed suicide in the latest shocking attack at a U.S. school.

At least eight girls were in critical condition at area hospitals, said Col. Jeffrey Miller, commissioner of the Pennsylvania State Police. Most were shot in the head, he said.

"It's a horrendous crime scene," Miller said. "One of the children died in the arms of one of our troopers."

The shootings stunned this quiet, insular community in the rolling cornfields and pastures of Amish country, about 60 miles west of Philadelphia. It was the third fatal school shooting in the USA in six days. The attack was similar to one in Bailey, Colo., last week. There, a gunman took several girls hostage at a high school and killed one of them.

In Washington, meanwhile, the White House said President Bush will convene a conference on school violence next week.

The Pennsylvania gunman was identified as Charles Carl Roberts IV, 32, who lived near the school. Miller said Roberts backed a pickup to the front door of the yellow schoolhouse around 10:35 a.m., then began boarding up the doors with lumber that he had brought in the truck. He had a handgun, a rifle and a shotgun, Miller said.

Roberts took over the classroom, but quickly allowed several people to leave, including about 15 boys ages 6-13, Miller said.

He also released four adult women, including the teacher, a pregnant woman, and other women who had infants. He lined the girls up in front of the blackboard, where he bound their feet with "flex-cuffs," disposable handcuffs, Miller said.

The teacher and adults ran to a nearby farm to call police. The school has no electricity or phone service.

After Pennsylvania State Police officers arrived at the scene, Roberts contacted the Lancaster County sheriff's office and warned the state police to back off "within 10 seconds" or he would start shooting, Miller said.

He began shooting moments later "in rapid succession," Miller said. The dead girls included two students and a student aide about 15 years old, Miller said.

Roberts left "rambling" suicide notes at his home Monday morning for his three children, Miller said. He was not Amish. Police believe that he chose the school because it was an easy target, Miller said. After seeing the notes, Roberts' wife called her husband's cellphone about 11 a.m., Miller said. Roberts told her he was "seeking revenge" for something that happened 20 years ago, Miller said.

Miller declined to elaborate about what drove Roberts to attack the girls, but he said investigators were looking into the possibility that Roberts had been affected by the death of a child. He would not say whether the child was Roberts' or someone else's.

Roberts also told his wife that "the police were here and that 'I'm not coming home.' He told her he loved her and that was it," Miller said.

DOJ_NMG_0073392

Roberts apparently planned for a long siege, Miller said. He had brought a change of clothes, a bucket and toilet paper. With the three guns, he brought 600 rounds of ammunition. He shot the students with a 9mm handgun and reloaded, Miller said.

Miller said co-workers described Roberts as friendly and talkative — but said he had become less so recently. In the past few days, a calm came over him, they told police. Miller said he believed that was an indication that Roberts had decided to attack the school.

"He was angry at life. He was angry at God," Miller said.

Most Amish live in rural communities and are seldom exposed to crime. In nearby Strasburg, the FBI recorded just two violent crimes in 2005: a robbery and an assault.

"They just don't take provisions for or expect outsiders to come walking in," said Steven Nolt, a historian at Goshen College in Indiana who's written books about the Amish.

Experts: Events Might Weigh Heavily On Kids (USAT)

By Robert Davis, Usa Today

USA Today, October 3, 2006

School safety experts say that the first order of business in classrooms across the nation today should be to take the psychological pulse of children.

The slayings at a Pennsylvania schoolhouse Monday most likely sent shivers of fear through students, teachers and parents everywhere, they say.

"This has been one of the most gruesome weeks I've ever encountered in 20 years of dealing with school safety," says Ronald Stephens, executive director of the National School Safety Center, which helps schools prepare for and respond to crisis. "It's hit an entirely new low. Parents are going to be wondering if their children are safe returning to school."

He and others hope that counselors are available today in the nation's schools. "Students are going to have a number of feelings they need to express," Stephens says. "It's going to be very difficult for a whole lot of learning to take place until some of these emotional issues have been given some attention."

Experts such as Stephens say children can be upset even if they're not directly involved with a tragedy. They say disturbing events can stir up the memory of trauma from a child's past. Signs of emotional distress include lethargy or withdrawal and changes in personality, appetite or sleep.

Security has become more visible since the shootings at Colorado's Columbine High School in 1999. About 15,000 schools now have their own police officer, says William Lassiter of the Center for Prevention of School Violence. But schools remain easy targets.

"You have this unease about who can we trust and who is safe," says George Greger-Holt, a school counselor who focuses on safety in Chatham County, N.C.

Three School Shootings (NYT)

The New York Times, October 3, 2006

No one will rise up to defend a man who walks into an Amish school, lines young girls up against a blackboard, ties up their feet, and then kills them before killing himself. But a surprising number of people will inevitably rise up to defend his guns, to call the man guilty but his weapons innocent.

When Charles Roberts snapped, the tools lay ready to hand. It is not clear what led him to seek out a quiet country school in Lancaster County, Pa., but it is possible he chose it because he knew that it belonged to a trusting, insular community, where there would be no one to stop him from entering with a shotgun, a rifle and an automatic pistol.

This is the third school shooting in a week. What will stick in almost everyone's minds is the gross disparity between Mr. Roberts's murderous intentions and the bucolic peacefulness of an Amish school in early October. But this killing is no different from the ones that took place in Wisconsin and Colorado recently.

The weapons were the same, and so was the conflict between the hideous assault of a damaged mind and the atmosphere of openness and trust that makes education possible. There are no simple solutions to this conflict. It is neither possible nor tolerable to secure every school or guard every child. Nor is it possible or politically tolerable to keep tabs on every gun. But in these killings we see an open society threatened by the ubiquity of its weapons, in which one kind of freedom is allowed to trump all others. Most gun owners are respectable, law-abiding citizens. But that is no reason to acquit the guns.

DOJ_NMG_0073393

Common Tragedy And Culprits (WP)

The Washington Post, October 3, 2006

A SCHOOL shooting is, by definition, obscene, yet there is a special horror to the tragedy in Nickel Mines, Pa. Perhaps it is because the setting, a picturesque community in Lancaster County, was so peaceful. Or that the target was a one-room Amish school amid fields of green. Or that the victims were young girls. Yes, there are unique features that make yesterday's attack a singular tragedy. There is, however, one aspect that makes it shamefully commonplace -- guns.

The 32-year-old man who walked into the Georgetown Amish School in a rural area about 60 miles west of Philadelphia had, authorities said, armed himself with a shotgun, a rifle and a semiautomatic handgun. After releasing all the boys and some women, the gunman barricaded the doors with boards and, having bound the feet of his victims, shot to death three girls before killing himself. Eight others were critically wounded; one of the wounded later died. "This is the last place on Earth that something like this would happen," Raymond Bial, author of books on the Amish, told Bloomberg News, as if being pacifist guarantees protection from the world.

Yesterday marked the third time in less than a week that a school was the site of a fatal shooting. In Colorado, on Sept. 27, a man armed with two handguns sexually assaulted some of the six girls he held hostage before killing one of them and himself. In Wisconsin, just two days later, a 15-year-old student fatally shot a principal. Like yesterday's shootings, each incident was tragic and certainly each had unique circumstances, but all -- including near-tragedies in Florida, North Carolina and Nevada that barely made headlines -- shared the fact of the far-too-easy availability of guns.

At this early stage, it is not known what drove Charles Carl Roberts IV to yesterday's rampage or whether it could have been prevented. Indeed, there are those who will argue that nothing -- least of all laws controlling guns -- can stop a madman. That doesn't mean, though, that we shouldn't try. Sadly, rather than making it harder for the wrong people to get guns, some in Congress are seeking to make it easier. Witness the recent vote by the House of Representatives to make it more difficult for authorities to crack down on bad gun shops. Thankfully, the Senate didn't have time to take up that measure.

Our sympathies go to the people of Nickel Mines. We hope that the singular calamity that befell this community will wake up the nation to do something about the madness it can control.

Online Gambling Set For Takeover Wave (FT)

By Roger Blitz, Leisure Industries Correspondent

Financial Times, October 3, 2006

Internet gambling companies face a wave of consolidation in the wake of the US clampdown on online gaming, which could see American casinos and gambling businesses swooping for bargains in the sector, the heads of two of the biggest online gambling sites said on Monday.

Mitch Garber, chief executive of PartyGaming, and Gigi Levy, who takes over as chief of 888 Holdings this year, made their predictions as the sector felt the impact of the bill passed in the Senate on Friday making it illegal for banks and credit card companies to process online gaming payments from the US.

Investors wiped $7bn (£3.7bn) off the market value of what at the start of trading was an industry worth $12bn, as heavyweight internet gambling companies said they would suspend indefinitely their US operations.

PartyGaming, the biggest company in the sector, lost 57.94 per cent after announcing it would suspend all money gaming business with the US indefinitely when President George W. Bush signs the bill into law.

Across the sector, internet gambling stocks went into freefall. Sportingbet lost 64 per cent of its value, falling to 66p.

888 Holdings, which has also indefinitely suspended US operations and expects to take a charge, dropped 26 per cent.

Mr Garber told the Financial Times that he expected the pace of consolidation to quicken, with MGM and Harrah's, which built their gaming empires around the fully regulated Las Vegas casino industry, likely to step in. However, Harrah's had other matters on its mind yesterday with news that it had received a $15bn takeover offer from private equity companies Apollo Management and Texas Pacific.

DOJ_NMG_0073394

Now that listed internet gambling companies are expected to quit the US en masse, the remains of their businesses will be free from the spectre of illegality that in the past might have put off investors and prospective buyers.

Mr Garber said: “I wouldn’t be surprised if they [MGM and Harrah’s] didn’t have an interest in winning non US-facing companies as a means of tipping their toes in the internet world.”

Mr Garber said he expected PartyGaming to be involved in buying up companies likely to suffer heavily from the impact of the new US legislation. “We are very focused on mergers and acquisitions. I see our liquidity as being very attractive to smaller players who may not be able to survive on their own.”

A banking adviser in the sector said: “This is going to create a round of consolidation but what format and nature and how broad is a different matter.”

Mr Levy said consolidation would happen first between online operators in order to restore the high margins lost by the US debacle followed by takeovers by big onshore operators coming from both the US and the UK.

U.K. Online Gambling Sites Mull Exiting U.S. Market (WSJ/AP)

Associated Press

The Wall Street Journal, October 3, 2006

LONDON -- Several British online gambling companies may cease doing business in the U.S. as a result of Congress passing legislation prohibiting the use of credit cards, checks and electronic fund transfers for online gaming.

PartyGaming PLC, the world's biggest online gambling company, said it would pull out of the U.S. if President Bush signs the legislation into law. Meanwhile, 888 Holdings PLC said it's suspending online betting operations in the U.S. and Sportingbet PLC said it called off takeover talks with World Gaming PLC.

The legislation was part of a port securities bill passed by the House and Senate on Saturday. It is expected to be signed by President George W. Bush

Shares of all three companies tumbled in trading on the London Stock Exchange Monday.

The companies hit hardest by the ruling are those that offer betting markets denominated in U.S. dollars, and usually operate from bases in the Caribbean or Central America. Most of the big British and Irish sites, by contrast, keep their operations in Europe and take deposits only off credit cards denominated in pounds and euros.

Investec Private Bank commented that it was difficult to assess the value of online betting companies with heavy exposure in the U.S. because the allocation of costs is unclear.

Sportingbet, which does more than 60% of its business in the U.S., said the impact of the legislation was unclear. However, the company called off talks about a potential bid for World Gaming.

"The precise effect of the legislation is unclear," 888 Holdings said in a statement. "However, this legislation indicates Congressional intent to treat Internet gaming, whether sports-related or not, as illegal."

The legislation, if enacted, "will make it practically impossible to provide U.S. residents with access to its real money poker and other real money gaming sites," PartyGaming said. "If the president signs the act into law, the company will suspend all real money gaming business with U.S. residents."

Austrian-based Bwin.com Interactive Entertainment AG, which gets 22% of its revenue from the U.S., said it was reviewing its options. "It's a difficult situation right now, and we need to have our lawyers take a close look, review the situation and what it could mean to us," Bwin spokeswoman Karin Klein said in Vienna.

William Hill PLC, one of Britain's biggest bookmakers, announced on Sept. 27 that it would cease accepting casino and poker business from clients with a U.S. address or a credit card issued in the U.S.

Paddy Power, the Irish bookmaker, gets about half its revenue from online betting but "we have made every effort to block U.S. play," said spokesman Breon Corcoran. "We would be excited about bringing an Irish brand to the States, but given the climate there, it's unlikely to happen," Mr. Corcoran said.

Copyright © 2006 Associated Press

Online Gaming Shares Plummet In Bill's Wake (WP/AP)

By Robert Barr

The Washington Post, October 3, 2006

LONDON, Oct. 2 -- Shares in British online gambling companies dived Monday after Congress passed legislation prohibiting the use of credit cards, checks and electronic fund transfers for online gaming.

PartyGaming, the world's biggest online gambling company, said it would pull out of the United States if President Bush signs the legislation into law.

The company 888 Holdings PLC said it is suspending online betting operations in the United States as a result, and Sportingbet PLC said it called off takeover talks with World Gaming PLC.

The legislation was part of a port securities bill passed by the House and Senate on Saturday.

Shares in PartyGaming plunged 58 percent yesterday to end at 84 cents, shares in 888 sank 26.1 percent to finish at $2.03, while Sportingbet shares dropped 64.5 percent to close at $1.24.

The companies hit hardest by the ruling are those that offer betting markets denominated in U.S. dollars and usually operate from bases in the Caribbean or Central America. Most of the big British and Irish sites, by contrast, keep their operations in Europe and take deposits only off credit cards denominated in pounds and euros.

Investec Private Bank said it was difficult to assess the value of online betting companies with heavy U.S. exposure because the allocation of costs is unclear.

Sportingbet, which does more than 60 percent of its business in the United States, said the impact of the legislation was unclear. However, the company called off talks about a potential bid for World Gaming.

"The precise effect of the legislation is unclear," 888 Holdings said in a statement. "However, this legislation indicates congressional intent to treat Internet gaming, whether sports-related or not, as illegal."

The legislation, if enacted, "will make it practically impossible to provide U.S. residents with access to its real money poker and other real money gaming sites," PartyGaming said. "If the president signs the act into law, the company will suspend all real money gaming business with U.S. residents."

William Hill PLC, one of Britain's biggest bookmakers, announced on Sept. 27 that it would cease accepting casino and poker business from clients with a U.S. address or a credit card issued in the United States.

Bad Luck For Online Gaming (LAT)

By Michael A. Hiltzik

The Los Angeles Times, October 3, 2006

Online gambling companies were grappling with a new crisis Monday after the Senate quietly passed a bill forbidding American banks and credit card companies from processing payments to them.

Shares of publicly traded Internet gaming operators plummeted on the London Stock Exchange after the measure was attached as a rider to a bill designed to enhance U.S. port security and passed late Friday.

The House passed a similar bill this year, and the legislation is expected to be signed by President Bush. It prohibits banks and credit card companies from making payments to online gaming websites that appear on a list to be drafted within nine months by the Justice Department and the Federal Reserve.

Online websites also would be prohibited from accepting U.S. payments, but because most are based overseas, the ability of U.S. authorities to prosecute them is uncertain.

Also unclear is what sort of gambling falls under the prohibition. Although Internet sports betting is plainly outlawed by the federal Wire Act, there is some doubt whether online poker or other games fall under the same prohibition.

"That's a major weakness" of the new measure, said I. Nelson Rose, an expert in gambling law at Whittier Law School.

"It left out expanding the reach of the Wire Act, so poker sites can say, 'We're not covered by that.' "

The gambling provision's late-night passage took many in the gaming world by surprise. Many thought the Senate bill was dead in the current session, meaning that both houses of Congress would have to start from scratch next year.

U.S. casinos were neutral on the bill. Although they don't like the offshore competition, domestic gambling companies might someday want to open their own online casinos.

DOJ_NMG_0073396

Online gaming companies headquartered in Britain were among those taking the biggest hit from the measure. Although most have been trying in recent months to wean themselves from the U.S. market as the threat of congressional regulation has risen, American customers still account for the greatest share of their business.

"This development is a significant setback for our company, our shareholders, our players and our industry," said Mitch Garber, chief executive of PartyGaming Ltd., the operator of the PartyPoker website, in a statement.

Shares of PartyGaming, based in Gibraltar, lost 58% in Monday's trading in London.

Shares of Neteller, a British payment processing company based on the Isle of Man, fell more than 60%. Such companies have sprung up in recent years after American payment processors, such as the PayPal subsidiary of EBay Inc., voluntarily ceased accepting payments to online gambling sites.

In a statement issued after the Senate vote, Neteller said, "It is currently unclear how Neteller, a European company, with no assets, presence or employees in the U.S., would be affected by this bill." The company said it would have a "clearer view" after U.S. authorities issued the regulations.

U.S. banks and credit card companies have generally ceased transferring funds for internet gambling over concerns that they could be charged with aiding and abetting illegal activities. But they have opposed legislation that makes them criminally liable for such transfers, arguing that in many cases they don't have the ability to determine whether a recipient is a gambling website.

Representatives of industry groups said Monday that they were satisfied that the new bill took that difficulty into account.

"We wanted to be sure that there was some protection if we act in good faith," said Floyd Stoner, executive director for congressional relations at the American Bankers Assn.

The Senate's action followed a string of other legal attacks in the U.S. on the online gaming industry. In July, David Carruthers, CEO of London-listed firm BetOnSports, was arrested while making an international air connection in Dallas. Charges against him include racketeering and mail fraud.

Last month Peter Dicks, then chairman of Sportingbet, a British online company, was arrested at New York's Kennedy Airport on a warrant alleging that he violated a Louisiana law barring online gambling. Dicks was released and returned to Britain on Friday.

michael.hiltzik@latimes.com

New Legislation May Pull The Plug On Online Gambling (USAT)

By Michael Mccarthy And Jon Swartz, Usa Today

USA Today, October 3, 2006

The $12 billion online gambling industry could turn into a house of cards now that the Congress has passed a law banning the use of credit cards, checks and electronic fund transfers for Internet gaming, industry experts warn.

President Bush is expected to sign the Unlawful Internet Gambling Enforcement Act, which makes it illegal for banks, credit card companies and online payment systems to process payment to online gambling companies.

Senate Republican leader Bill Frist of Tennessee tacked the bill on to the popular Safe Port Act bill on Saturday, before Congress went into recess for November's elections.

The surprise passage of the law threw the online gambling industry into a tailspin Monday. Shares of publicly traded companies PartyGaming, Sportingbet and 888 Holdings tumbled in heavy trading on the London Stock Exchange, wiping out nearly $8 billion in market value. PartyGaming, the world's largest online-gambling company, said it will stop taking bets from 920,000 active U.S. customers as soon as Bush signs the proposed law. Sportingbet said it is calling off its bid for World Gaming.

Shares in the publicly traded PartyGaming plunged 60% to 81 cents on the British market and 888 Holdings said it is suspending online betting operations in the USA. Its shares tanked 48% to $1.42 on the British market.

Sportingbet, which gleans more than half its business in the USA, said the bill's impact is unclear. Sportingbet shares slumped 67% to $1.12 on the British market.

"This develop is a significant setback for our company, our shareholders, our players and our industry," said Mitch Garber, PartyGaming's CEO.

DOJ_NMG_0073397

The federal government has been cracking down on Internet betting on sports, poker and other casino games that it considers illegal under the 1961 Wire Act. Considering that American bettors generate 50%-60% of industrywide revenue, many operators will be forced to either cash in their chips and go out of business or sell or merge with another provider, experts say.

Roughly half the estimated 500 companies operating 2,300 gambling websites across the Caribbean, Central America and Europe could be wiped out, predicts Sue Schneider, publisher of Interactive Gaming News. The survivors will have to make do on sharply reduced revenue, while seeking ways around the U.S. ban and building up their business in Asia.

After the bill is signed, U.S. Attorney General Alberto Gonzales will have 270 days to determine how the law will be enforced.

Most credit card companies already ban customers from paying gaming sites as the result of a settlement between New York Attorney General Eliot Spitzer and several major credit card issuers a few years ago.

PartyGaming generated 80% of its $1 billion in 2005 revenue from the U.S. market. During the first half of 2006, American bettors accounted for 78% of $662 million in revenue, says John Shepherd, a spokesman for the Gibraltar-based company.

"If you lop off 80% of somebody's revenues, it's going to hurt," Schneider says. "A lot of them have been trying to build up their non-U.S. business."

Unfortunately for players, the companies eliminated in the shakeout are more likely to be publicly traded operators that answer to regulators in Britain than privately held firms more likely disappear into the ether of the Web, warns Linda Goldstein, a partner with Manatt, Phelps & Phillips.

"The upshot is the legislation will drive away larger, more reputable gaming operators, leaving consumers with less reliable options," says Ken Dreifach, an Internet lawyer who once worked for Spitzer. That could expose consumers to more fraudulent operators, he says.

A stock listing is no guarantee, however. Many U.S.-based customers of BetOnSports have been waiting to cash out the money in their accounts since July, when a federal grand jury issued a 22-count indictment charging CEO David Carruthers with racketeering, conspiracy and fraud.

"We're telling folks 30-90 days," says BetOnSports spokesman Kevin Smith, who declined to comment on how many players are owed how much money.

Michael Bolcerek, president of the Poker Players Alliance, says he'll seek congressional support for a legislative exception for online poker, similar to the carve-outs for fantasy sports, horse racing and state lotteries in the proposed law. Bolcerek argues poker is a uniquely American sport, enjoyed by 23 million Americans.

"We believe poker is a skill game that should be separated from other forms of gambling," he says.

Attorney General Creates Domestic Violence Unit (AP)

AP, October 3, 2006

JACKSON, Miss. - A new domestic violence unit is being established by the Mississippi attorney general's office and funded by a $1.5 million grant.

The unit will act as a resource for law enforcement, prosecutors, judges and all other individuals or entities having legal duties related to domestic violence victims or providing services to victims.

"What this division does is bring a cohesiveness to the state's efforts to fight domestic violence," said Attorney General Jim Hood. "Our state ranks second highest in the nation for domestic violence. That dubious distinction alone is enough to say we have to improve our efforts and that's what we are dedicated to doing."

Hood's office said the unit will partner with the Administrative Office of Courts, the Judicial College, the Mississippi Department of Public Safety Planning and the Mississippi Coalition Against Domestic Violence.

"When a group of dedicated individuals and organizations make a commitment to act as one, the possibilities to create positive change are endless," Michele Carroll, executive director of the Mississippi Coalition Against Domestic Violence, said in a statement. "With the award of this grant and the development of this program we have a truly unique opportunity to work collaboratively to end the violence."

The two-year grant was awarded by the U.S. Justice Department's Office on Violence Against Women.

Philadelphia Police Dispatchers Charged With Selling Information (AP)

AP, October 3, 2006

PHILADELPHIA (AP) — Two police department radio dispatchers are facing federal extortion charges after investigators said they provided names and addresses connected to auto license tags to someone they thought was going to rob the homes.

Patricia Bradley, 35, and Tamara Mitchell, 38, both civilian dispatchers employed by the Philadelphia Police Department, have been charged with extortion and aiding and abetting, U.S. Attorney Patrick Meehan said Monday.

The women ran license tags on the police department's computer system and gave the names and addresses connected to those tags to a man they believed was going to rob the residences, according to investigators with the FBI and the city police department's internal affairs division.

Investigators said Bradley and Mitchell believed that the vehicles, two registered in Pennsylvania and two in New Jersey, belonged to drug dealers. Authorities said they made deals to share in the proceeds of the planned robberies with the man — identified in court documents only as "I.B." — to whom they provided the privileged information.

"These defendants deliberately undermined the work of the very officers they were supposed to be supporting," Meehan said.

Bradley worked as a dispatcher from March 2003 until she was fired in February. Mitchell, who has worked as a dispatcher from 2001 until the present, also will be fired, Meehan said.

A police department spokeswoman said she was not aware of the case and had no immediate comment.

If convicted, Bradley faces a maximum sentence of 80 years in prison and a $1 million fine; Mitchell faces a maximum of 40 years in prison and a $500,000 fine, authorities said.

Neither of the women had listed phone numbers and it was not immediately clear whether they had attorneys.

Court documents did not state whether any of the planned robberies occurred. U.S. Attorney's spokesman Rich Manieri said he could not immediately elaborate on details of the case not included in the documents released Monday.

2 Police Dispatchers Charged In Scheme (PHI)

By Michael Hinkelman

The Philadelphia Inquirer, October 3, 2006

Federal prosecutors yesterday charged two Philadelphia police dispatchers with extortion for allegedly selling information from the Police Department's computer system.

The two civilian dispatchers, Patricia Bradley and Tamara Mitchell, were charged with extortion by way of criminal information, a process that indicates they intend to plead guilty.

The two women used license tags listed in the Police Department's computer system to get names and addresses that they then sold to a man who said he intended to commit robberies at the addresses, according to the charges.

The alleged extortion occurred from August 2003 until May 2006.

The two dispatchers believed that the names and addresses they sold were those of drug dealers, according to the charges.

Unfortunately for Bradley, 35, and Mitchell, 38, the man to whom they peddled the names and addresses turned out to be a government informant, identified only as "I.B." in the court filing.

"These defendants deliberately undermined the work of the very officers they were supposed to be supporting," said U.S. Attorney Patrick Meehan.

The feds said the informant had given money to the defendants in exchange for names and addresses related to the tags.

The amount of money handed over by the informant typically ranged from $50 to $100 per name and address, said a person familiar with the investigation.

A police spokesman said yesterday that Bradley no longer works for the department and that proceedings to dismiss Mitchell should begin shortly.

The FBI and the Police Department's Internal Affairs Division investigated the case.

2 Police Radio Dispatchers Face Jail Time (PHI)

By Stephanie L. Arnold

The Philadelphia Inquirer, October 3, 2006

Two Philadelphia police radio dispatchers face a combined 120 years in federal prison and more than $1 million in fines if convicted on charges of using police computer equipment to obtain and distribute personal information about cars and homes to a man they believed was robbing the victims.

"These defendants deliberately undermined the work of the very officers they were supposed to be supporting," U.S. Attorney Patrick Meehan said in a statement yesterday.

Charged were Patricia Bradley, 35, of the 1300 block of Lippincott Street, and Tamara Mitchell, 38, of the 600 block of Chew Street. They are accused of running license tags and giving the names and addresses associated with those tags to a man who used the information to commit crimes at those addresses.

According to court documents, Bradley and Mitchell believed that the vehicles, two registered in Pennsylvania and two in New Jersey, belonged to drug dealers.

They thought they were setting up the dealers to be robbed.

Bradley worked as a dispatcher for the Police Department from March 2003 until she was fired in February 2006. Mitchell, who still works for the department, has worked as a dispatcher since 2001. The U.S. Attorney's Office said Mitchell would be fired upon the filing of the charges.

The department hires civilian dispatchers whose responsibilities include providing information and support to police officers via police radio. A computer database is used to obtain identifying information about civilians and vehicles as requested by police officers. This database, authorities said, is prohibited from being used for personal purposes.

Newark: Bank Robber Sentenced (NYT)

By The New York Times

The New York Times, October 3, 2006

A man who once served as an F.B.I. informant was sentenced in Federal District Court yesterday to 90 years in prison for a series of bank robberies, prosecutors said. The man, Michael Giubilo, 61, of Belleville, was convicted on Feb. 10 of robbing banks in West Caldwell and Millburn in 2003 and 2004, said Christopher J. Christie, the United States attorney for New Jersey. Mr. Giubilo was arrested by federal agents as he was about to enter the Bank of New York in Millburn, Mr. Christie said. At trial, he said, Mr. Giubilo claimed that he had been set up by the F.B.I. In 1997, a federal judge ordered that Mr. Giubilo stop working as an informant because of his continued criminal activity, including weapons possession and eluding the police, Mr. Christie said.

Jemal Defense Team Questions Deal For Prosecution's Witness (WP)

By Carol D. Leonnig

The Washington Post, October 3, 2006

No witness is more crucial or more awaited in the bribery trial of downtown developer Douglas Jemal than the D.C. government refugee expected to testify today: Jemal's former drinking buddy and disgraced former city official Michael A. Lorusso.

Since the days in 2001 and 2002 when he and Jemal were standing shoulder-to-shoulder chomping on cigars at the Capitol Grille, much has changed for Lorusso. He's no longer flying high as a flashy D.C. government dealmaker; instead, he was forced out of his job and began cooperating with federal prosecutors. Lorusso, 40, pleaded guilty in 2004 to taking cash bribes and gifts from Jemal and his development company's officers in exchange for crafting sweetheart deals that would give Jemal's company millions of city taxpayer dollars it didn't earn.

But in newly filed court papers, Jemal's defense attorneys say jurors should not believe Lorusso and that the former deputy director of the D.C. Office of Property Management got a sweet deal himself by tantalizing prosecutors with tales of bribes from a big local fish. Jemal has maintained that anything he gave Lorusso was a gift to a friend, without any strings attached -- just as when the developer picks up the Friday night tab for his pals at the Capitol Grille.

Jemal's attorneys argue that prosecutors appear willing to overlook Lorusso's other shady dealings in District government and in his hometown of Boston so they can go after the more famous Jemal, his son and another company officer. That includes evidence that Lorusso helped bilk city taxpayers of millions of dollars through phony invoices for work renovating One Judiciary

Square, a municipal building, soon after joining city government in November 2000 -- a project involving another company, they wrote. Also, they said, in 1998 and 1999, Lorusso persuaded people to invest hundreds of thousands of dollars in two illegal Ponzi schemes in Massachusetts that led to the indictment of one associate.

"In return for his stories about cash (bribes), Lorusso received full absolution," Jemal's defense attorneys wrote. "In return for testifying against his prominent former friends, Lorusso has capped (his future prison sentence)."

As part of his deal, Lorusso pleaded guilty to two counts of accepting bribes. He now faces a maximum of 57 to 71 months in prison but would likely get less due to his cooperation when he is sentenced after Jemal's trial.

Yesterday, Thomas Mason, Lorusso's attorney, declined to comment on his client's deal. Also yesterday, U.S. District Judge Ricardo M. Urbina denied a defense request that the government be forced to turn over more material to them about how they reached this deal.

The fate of Jemal, his son Norman Jemal and leasing agent Blake Esherick hangs to a great degree on whether jurors believe Lorusso's explanation of why he crafted city leasing and purchase deals that were so favorable to Jemal's Douglas Development Corp. and so lousy for city taxpayers.

Lorusso is expected to testify that he took cash, trips and gifts, including a Rolex watch and pricey cowboy boots, in exchange for personally arranging exorbitantly priced leases and fraudulent invoices. Jemal denies wrongdoing.

In 2001, Lorusso proposed that the city pay Jemal $12.5 million for a Prince George's County parcel the city could use as a new vehicle-impoundment lot, records show. Lorusso presented his bosses with an appraisal saying that amount was a fair market price, but he didn't mention that he had given the appraiser inaccurate information about the site that drastically inflated the appraisal. What raised eyebrows on the D.C. City Council was that Jemal had paid $1.5 million for the land just four years earlier; the $12.5 million deal did not go through.

All told, Lorusso negotiated deals that helped Jemal and his company generate $14 million a year in income on city leases.

Yesterday, the government responded to the defense's contentions about Lorusso's credibility and favorable plea deal with the written equivalent of a smirk. Prosecutors wrote in court papers that the Jemal defense team's arguments "deserve little in the way of comment" except to note one irony.

"(T)he defendants maintain that Mr. Lorusso had corrupt relationships with nearly every person and entity with which he was involved -- with the sole exception of the defendants," prosecutors wrote.

Jemal and Lorusso may have never uttered the word "bribe," prosecutors wrote, but Lorusso will tell jurors that he "understood and believed that the defendants were in essence taking care of him in exchange for his taking care of the defendants."

D.C. Council member Jim Graham (D-Ward 1) led a council investigation into Lorusso's deals with Jemal and other city contractors, turning up revelations that helped federal investigators. Yesterday, Graham said Lorusso was surely pressured to cooperate because of the evidence against him, but that doesn't mean he's lying.

"I mean, is Lorusso a choir boy? Forget it," Graham said in an interview. "But we found a lot of shenanigans going on. And of course now he's going to do everything he can to cooperate and reduce his exposure."

Miss. Resident Sentenced For Making False Claims To FEMA (AP)

AP, October 3, 2006

JACKSON, Miss. - A Vicksburg man convicted of making false claims to the Federal Emergency Management Agency for Hurricane Katrina relief funds has been sentenced to two years in prison.

U.S. Attorney Dunn Lampton announced in a news release on Monday that Bryan Michael Beets also will be under three years' probation after he serves his sentence.

U.S. District Judge David C. Bramlette ordered Beets to pay $3,854 in restitution, which is payable to FEMA and the American Red Cross.

Beets was accused of falsely claiming to live in a Long Beach dwelling that was damaged by Katrina, when he actually was living and working in Vicksburg. Beets was convicted in federal court in June.

DOJ_NMG_0073401

"The prosecution and sentence today show the continuing commitment of the Katrina Fraud Task Force to uphold the U.S. Attorney General's mandate of zero tolerance of Katrina fraud," Lampton said in the release.

BR Woman Gets Prison In Disaster Fraud (AP)

AP, October 3, 2006

A 27-year-old Baton Rouge woman was sentenced to 18 months in prison on Monday for making a false claim to get disaster aid after Hurricane Katrina, a U.S. attorney said.

Tarsha Johnson pleaded guilty May 8 to making a false claim. U.S. District Judge Frank J. Polozola sentenced her to prison with three years of supervised release, said U.S. Attorney David Dugas.

Polozola also ordered her to perform 50 hours of community service and to pay $2,000 in restitution.

FBI Joins Expressway Inquiries (SPT)

By Michael Van Sickler, Times Staff Writer

St. Petersburg Times, October 3, 2006

The state Auditor General's Office started an audit. Now a member of the authority confirms FBI and U.S. DOT inquiries.

TAMPA — The FBI and the U.S. Department of Transportation are conducting a criminal investigation into the Tampa-Hillsborough Expressway Authority, an agency board member confirmed Monday.

Hillsborough County Commissioner Tom Scott, who sits on the seven-member board, said he spoke with investigators from the two federal agencies last week for more than 90 minutes.

"I was invited to meet with them and they are looking at the (Expressway Authority)," Scott said. "But I can't disclose the content of their questions in order not to hinder their investigation."

Neither the FBI nor the DOT's Office of Inspector General would confirm the investigation.

The inspector general's office frequently conducts criminal investigations with the FBI in cases of alleged waste, fraud or abuse in transportation agencies and projects, said spokesman David Burnes.

State lawmakers created the Expressway Authority in 1964 to build toll roads in Hillsborough.

A once obscure agency, the Expressway Authority came under greater scrutiny in 2004 when its key project, the elevated lanes of the Lee Roy Selmon Crosstown, encountered serious construction problems.

The criminal inquiry is the third investigation into the agency since late August, when details emerged about possible conflicts of interest, violations of ethics and public record laws, and questionable billings by lobbyists.

An investigation in early September by Gov. Jeb Bush's general counsel found no laws were broken, but it concluded that enough questions were raised to warrant a state audit of what the agency pays in legal and lobbying fees.

The state Auditor General's Office began an audit last week that will review Expressway Authority finances.

Rhea Law, the agency's interim legal counsel, said those investigators have requested billing records dating as far back as 2001.

Law would not say whether the FBI and the U.S. DOT are conducting a third inquiry.

Later, after Scott confirmed he had spoken with FBI and DOT officials, followup questions to Law were referred to Expressway Authority spokesman Mathias Bergendahl. He e-mailed a response from Law late Monday that did not acknowledge the investigation.

"(We) do not want to create any speculation about the Expressway Authority or the results of any review," Law wrote.

"As results are forthcoming, they will be shared with … the public."

This isn't the first time federal officials have looked into the Expressway Authority.

In June 2004, Santos Ramirez, a special agent with the DOT's Inspector General's Office, asked the Expressway Authority for information about a possible conflict of interest involving Bob Clark, a board member who owns Tampa Steel Erecting Co.

At issue was whether Clark could vote on materials to be used in projects that could benefit his company.

Steven Anderson, the Expressway Authority's legal counsel at the time, wrote an opinion urging Clark to abstain from votes that determine which materials will be used in road projects.

DOJ_NMG_0073402

In an interview Monday, Anderson said Ramirez called him in 2004 and asked for the opinion about Clark. He said Ramirez asked other questions about Clark but Anderson would not disclose what they were.

The U.S. Department of Transportation wouldn't confirm that Ramirez is working this case. A call to his downtown Tampa office was not returned.

It was another opinion that Anderson wrote about a possible conflict involving Clark that ignited the current round of investigations.

The governor appointed Clark to the board in 2003. At the time, the Expressway Authority was completing a purchase of $366,000 from Clark's steel company.

Anderson flagged that purchase as questionable. More than three years later, on Aug. 28, Clark and four other board members, all appointed by Bush or one of his employees, voted to fire Anderson without a public discussion.

Board members Gwen Miller and Scott voted to retain Anderson.

When the law firm of Gray Robinson, which has strong ties to Bush, won the contract replacing Anderson, Scott claimed it was political payback.

A possible criminal inquiry could look into allegations that Expressway officials unlawfully steered the legal services contract to Gray Robinson.

It also might look into the billing practices of lobbyist John Beck, who met with Gray Robinson attorneys before the vote.

Beck's partner, Cynthia Henderson, a former top official in Bush's administration, double-billed the Expressway Authority last year for about $1,000.

On Monday, Beck's firm reimbursed the agency another $5,731 after it acknowledged it had overbilled again this year.

Other board members said they had not heard about the FBI investigation.

"I haven't heard anything. Let me know when you hear something," Clark said.

"I don't have any comment on an FBI investigation," said former state Sen. James Hargrett, D-Tampa. "I have not been contacted."

Miller, who said revelations about Beck's double billings should result in his termination from the authority, said she didn't know about the FBI inquiry, either.

"Nobody has called me or anything," she said. "I wasn't aware the FBI was involved until today when you told me."

Times staff writers Rebecca Catalanello and Janet Zink and researcher John Martin contributed to this report. Michael Van Sickler can be reached at mvansickler@sptimes.com or (813) 226-3402.

Rell, Blumenthal Announce Reviews Of Troubled Highway Project (AP)

AP, October 3, 2006

WATERBURY, Conn. -- Gov. M. Jodi Rell ordered an independent audit Monday into contracts, work performance and the Department of Transportation in connection with construction defects plaguing a $52 million improvement project of Interstate 84.

Also Monday, state Attorney General Richard Blumenthal said his office is investigating the project, which involves a 31/2-mile stretch of the highway between Waterbury and Cheshire.

The governor and attorney general's announcements came a day after The Hartford Courant reported that federal investigators are looking into why hundreds of storm drains are defective in the project.

Fixing the problems could cost the state millions of dollars and require newly paved parts of the highway to be torn up, the newspaper reported, citing state documents and people familiar with the project.

"Connecticut citizens deserve every assurance that their tax dollars are being spent and invested wisely," Rell said in a prepared statement. "They also deserve to know that multimillion dollar road projects are being performed in a complete and competent fashion."

Rell is asking an independent auditing firm to review all contracts awarded to L.G. DeFelice Inc. of North Haven, a now-defunct company that had the $52 million contract to rebuild the highway, and to New Britain-based Maguire Group Inc., which had a $6 million contract to inspect work on the project.

DeFelice, which went out of business last year and reformed as Hallberg Contracting Corp., was fired for failure to perform, the governor said. Maguire Group was fired by the DOT, at Rell's direction, last month.

The auditing firm will also review the DOT's internal oversight processes, Rell said.

Blumenthal said his investigation began several months ago "as a result of apparent failures in quality and timeliness of work done by various contractors. It is an active and intensive inquiry that will support claims for monetary recovery and other remedies as appropriate," he said in a written statement.

Authorities with the FBI and other federal agencies are investigating the problems, which could also add months to a project that was supposed to be completed a year ago.

Many of the drains lead nowhere, some are clogged with debris and others were apparently connected with substandard, cracked and leaking pipes, the newspaper reported.

In a memo written two weeks ago, a top DOT engineer blamed the defective drains on a "complete breakdown" in the inspection process.

"The numerous types of deficiencies, the particular as well as the general defects and omissions in the work, were and are stunning," Arthur W. Gruhn, chief engineer at the DOT's bureau of engineering and highway operations, wrote in the memo.

Gruhn said last week that it remains a mystery why the work is shoddy and why the inspection process failed.

"We may never know what was in somebody's mind as they were doing this," Gruhn said. "It just is so far beyond the norm that appropriate action had to be taken."

The drains, also known as catch basins, and related underground piping are designed to remove water from the roadway. Gruhn said improper drainage can create a hazard for motorists and damage roads through erosion and other forces.

The highway project includes about 300 catch basins. Inspectors have taken another look at about 280 of them, and all but 10 need additional work, Gruhn said. As many as 100 of the drains will require major reconstruction, Gruhn said, including some that are below new pavement.

Gruhn said there was no estimate yet on how much it will cost to fix the problems, but he said it could cost more than the liability insurance coverage provided by the contractors.

No one has stepped forward to accept responsibility for the problems. Nothing has been found to suggest DOT workers were partly to blame, Gruhn said.

A former vice president at DeFelice who ran the now-defunct company's cost department said he was not aware of the drainage problems.

"As far as I know, the work was installed correctly and it was inspected," said Stephen Hallberg.

The Maguire Group is not conceding it was responsible, but a lawyer for the company said it intends to help the state correct any problems.

"Obviously we are in the process of reviewing the findings of the Department of Transportation," attorney Richard R. Brown said. "We absolutely want to cooperate in terms of correcting the situation at no expense to the state of Connecticut."

The DOT has clashed with The Maguire Group in the past. In 1992, then-DOT Commissioner Emil H. Frankel cited Maguire's "serious disregard for standards of professional ethics" in suspending the company for two years from doing work for the Transportation Department.

'Inappropriate' Expenditures Found At Getty (LAT)

By Jason Felch And Ralph Frammolino

The Los Angeles Times, October 3, 2006

A yearlong investigation by the California attorney general's office has concluded that the J. Paul Getty Trust's former chief executive Barry Munitz and the organization's board of trustees made several "inappropriate" expenditures, but will not be the subject of legal action because the money has been returned.

The misuse of the Getty's tax-exempt money included excessive travel expenses by Munitz and his wife, Munitz's extensive use of his staff for personal errands, his payment of consulting fees to a former Getty intern, and gifts of artwork to retiring trustees, according to the report released today by the attorney general's office.

For the first time in its history, Atty. Gen. Bill Lockyer has appointed an independent monitor, former state Atty. Gen. John K. Van de Kamp, to ensure the Getty carries through with its promised reforms over the next two years.

The attorney general will take no legal action against the trust, Munitz or board members, the report said.

Lockyer concluded that Munitz, whom he describes as a close friend, had compensated the trust for the inappropriate expenditure by agreeing to repay the Getty $250,000 and forgo more than $2 million in benefits when he was ousted in February.

The report also found that several other transactions were appropriate under California law, which allows the Getty to settle potential claims and spend money as long at it furthers its broad charitable purpose, the "diffusion of artistic and general knowledge."

Among them: the $3-million severance payment to former museum director Deborah Gribbon was appropriate because she had valid legal claims against the Getty; questioned grants went to nonprofit organizations and furthered the Getty's mission; and the Getty received fair market value when it sold property to Munitz's friend, philanthropist Eli Broad.

The attorney general's probe was launched in July after a Los Angeles Times investigation revealed that Munitz had used the Getty's resources for personal benefit amid controversies over his management and leadership of the trust. Further reports over the last two years showed that board members did not review Munitz's expenses and had benefited personally from the trust's vast resources.

Since those reports, much of the Getty's senior management and several members of its board of directors have left, including Chairman John Biggs, who retired early in August. The Getty is in the process of implementing a series of reforms it says are intended to correct problems highlighted in the Times reports.

The troubles of the Getty Trust, one of the country's richest private foundations, came amid a national debate about oversight of the nonprofit sector in which the art institution became a symbol of the need for reforms. Federal legislation passed this year has increased the penalties for violations of the federal tax code, which prohibits using public funds for personal benefit.

Van de Kamp will review progress reports made under oath by the Getty every six months, gather additional information if necessary and advise the attorney general's office about the organization's progress.

Aside from the appointment of the independent monitor, the report offers no specific consequences for the violations by Munitz and the board that it identifies, and gives no recommendations for reform or improved governance.

The investigation was carried out by the attorney general's charitable trust division, which regulates all nonprofits doing business in California and can impose civil penalties, remove trustees or recommend the revocation of an organization's tax-exempt status if it discovers gross mismanagement or fraud.

Lockyer approved the report before it was released. The Times reported in July that Lockyer, who is running for state treasurer in the November election, met privately with Munitz in the midst of the probe. Lockyer said Munitz disclosed he was leaving the Getty during the meeting, which the attorney general described as "therapy with a friend." In the past, Lockyer said he had sought Munitz's advise on political issues.

The report shows that the attorney general's probe focused narrowly on issues identified in the Times articles — investigators identified no new issues in their 13-page report, which provided little detail about the expenditures it criticized.

The report stated in two places that the probe found no evidence that Munitz or trustees committed any crimes. "The payments to Dr. Munitz from the trust were authorized, and there was no indication that he obtained such authorization by making false statements, submitting false billings or through some other form of deceit."

In its June 2005 investigation of Munitz, The Times reported that on his frequent travels, he regularly flew first class, stayed in luxury hotels and ate dinner with friends at expensive restaurants, all at Getty expense. Many of the trips had a questionable tie to Getty objectives.

In one case, Munitz billed the Getty more than $35,000 for a trip with his wife and friends to Tuscany, where they rented a 15th century villa and toured the countryside visiting Getty-sponsored projects.

The Getty trustees had specifically approved Munitz's first class travel and the participation of his wife on his trips in his employment contract. The board was responsible for reviewing his expense accounts regularly, but delegated the task to one of Munitz's deputies.

DOJ_NMG_0073405

The attorney general's report concluded that trustees had acted inappropriately in allowing the reimbursement of Munitz's wife's travel expenses. It concluded that Munitz's justification that his wife's participation was expected of his high office was "unpersuasive," and said the implication that an unmarried official could not perform adequately "an absurd proposition."

The report also said some of Munitz's travel expenses were "inappropriate or clearly unreasonable," though no clear rule prohibited them.

The investigation also characterized as "an improper private benefit" the more than $20,000 worth of artwork given to four retiring trustees. The Times reported that Munitz's office had ignored warnings from the trust's attorneys that such gifts violated Getty's will, which prohibits compensation for board members.

It was also critical of Munitz's frequent use of Getty staff to run personal errands for him and his wife. The Times reported he regularly sent his driver from Brentwood to Long Beach to pick up taped episodes of his favorite television programs, and on one occasion asked a secretary to track down blood orange juice for his wife, who had enjoyed it on a recent trip to Europe.

A Times article last month reported that among several "senior advisors" that Munitz hired to advise him was Iris Mickein, a young woman who had previously been an intern at the Getty. Munitz later had the Getty pay the Museum of Modern Art in New York to employ Mickein and flew her around the country to meet his friends at Getty expense.

The attorney general's report concluded that Mickein's MOMA job was appropriate because the Getty's mission includes the training of art students, but took issue with her consulting fees, for which she did "insufficient work."

The investigation concluded that there was nothing improper about Munitz steering a $200,000 Getty grant to a Russian museum at the request of a female Russian researcher with whom Munitz went to a movie, a concert and met with on several business trips.

While acknowledging that Munitz had socialized with the researcher, the attorney general found that the grant was legitimate because "it served the charitable purpose of the trust, specifically art education."

The Russian grant was one of several identified in The Times stories that the attorney general found were appropriate because they went to organizations "engaged in the diffusion of artistic and general knowledge."

jason.felch@latimes.com

ralph.frammolino@latimes.com

Monitor Named To Oversee Reforms At Getty Trust (NYT)

By Edward Wyatt And Randy Kennedy

The New York Times, October 3, 2006

LOS ANGELES, Oct. 2 — Ending a 14-month investigation, the California attorney general appointed an independent monitor on Monday to oversee reforms at the J. Paul Getty Trust, one of the world's richest cultural organizations. The inquiry determined that the trust's former president, with the approval of the Getty board, misspent trust money on his wife's travel, used employees for personal errands and made improper payments to a graduate student.

Although the attorney general, Bill Lockyer, found that the former president and the board violated their legal duties, he declined to take civil or criminal action against them. The report stated that the misuse of funds did not result from fraud and that the value of a settlement between the former president, Barry Munitz, and the trust exceeded the value of the losses from any improper payments.

The Getty, which has adopted several reforms since Mr. Munitz resigned under pressure in February, expressed satisfaction with the results of the inquiry.

Louise H. Bryson, who took over as chairwoman of the Getty board of trustees in August, said she was "pleased the attorney general acknowledged the work done by the board to change the policies and procedures" that resulted in the violations.

After reports of questionable expenses and suspect grants by Mr. Munitz and gifts to retiring board members began appearing in 2005 in The Los Angeles Times, the Getty board changed its policies to restrict travel expenses, prohibit the use of employees for personal ends and forbid gifts from the Getty to its trustees.

In February, the board reached a settlement with Mr. Munitz in which the former president resigned while repaying $250,000 in cash for improper expenditures and forfeited more than $2 million in expected benefits.

DOJ_NMG_0073406

Notably, the attorney general found that a number of actions by Mr. Munitz that were approved by the board were consistent with the trust's charitable purposes. These included sending a staff member to Israel to observe an academy for chess, a game that is one of Mr. Munitz's favorite hobbies; furnishing the office of a former Getty Trust executive at another Los Angeles County arts institution; and sponsoring a luncheon at which Mr. Munitz was given an award.

The attorney general also found that the sale in 2002 of a piece of property in the Los Angeles suburb of Brentwood to Eli Broad, the billionaire philanthropist and a friend of Mr. Munitz's, for $2 million was reasonable. An assessment by an independent appraiser hired by the attorney general's office found that the property had a fair market value of $1.8 million at the time.

The report also found that there were no improprieties in a $3 million severance payment to Deborah Gribbon, the former director of the J. Paul Getty Museum, who resigned in 2004 after months of disagreements with Mr. Munitz. The attorney general's report said that the trust, in paying the money, reasonably based it on damages that Ms. Gribbon might have received in a wrongful termination lawsuit.

"Indeed, those damages might well have greatly exceeded the amount of the approved separation payment," the report found.

Through his lawyer, Mr. Munitz said yesterday: "I'm relieved that this is behind me and the Getty." Mr. Munitz stressed the findings in the report that all payments to him had been authorized by the trust, and that there was no indication that he obtained any money by making false statements or submitting false bills.

John Van de Kamp, a former state attorney general, is to serve as the independent monitor of the Getty Trust for two fiscal years, reporting to the attorney general's office on whether the trust's planned reforms are being followed.

The procedure calls for the trust to make reports to the attorney general's office every six months; those reports will be reviewed by the monitor, who can then ask for additional information from the trust. Tom Dresslar, a spokesman for the attorney general's office, said the Getty had agreed to provide further information or documentation should the monitor request it.

In a statement, Mr. Lockyer said that because charitable trusts are subsidized by taxpayers, "board members and executives have a legal duty" to make sure that spending is lawful and used to further the trust's charitable purpose. "With some expenditures and gifts, Mr. Munitz violated his duty and Getty's trustees failed to do their governance job," Mr. Lockyer said.

Mr. Lockyer and Mr. Munitz are known to be personal friends, and the attorney general has acknowledged that they met privately while the inquiry was under way.

Asked about that relationship, Mr. Dresslar said the investigation was conducted by the attorney general's charitable trusts division and that it was not influenced by the friendship.

The report's conclusions and recommendations were essentially unedited by Mr. Lockyer before he approved them, Mr. Dresslar added.

It is the first time that the California attorney general has imposed an independent overseer in an enforcement action against a charitable trust, although the procedure has been used in consumer settlements, including one this year with Ameriquest Mortgage Company after an investigation into allegations of predatory lending practices.

Jack B. Siegel, a Chicago lawyer who is an expert on nonprofit law, said he was somewhat surprised that the attorney general's findings were not more critical of the Getty. "The focus seems to be on — I don't want to say trivial things — but on very specific things like travel reimbursement," Mr. Siegel said. "They don't really seem in this to be addressing fundamental governance issues, about the overall way things are run."

DNA Test Result Casts Doubt On Two Convictions In 1987 Murder (WP)

By Ernesto Londoã±o

The Washington Post, October 3, 2006

Two of Colleen Williar's neighbors were convicted of murder after the 24-year-old woman was raped, strangled with a sock and repeatedly stabbed in her Baltimore home nearly two decades ago.

Now, a vaginal swab from the autopsy that was recently compared with DNA samples from the men might win new trials for James L. Owens, 41, and James Thompson, 47.

DOJ_NMG_0073407

The men were convicted in 1988 during separate trials in which relatively weak physical evidence was supported by a last-minute confession by Thompson. He later recanted, and both men now say they were innocent bystanders who came under suspicion after telling a series of lies that began as an attempt to cash in on police reward money.

Defense lawyers said the case could mark the first time in Maryland history that a post-conviction DNA test clears co-defendants convicted of murder.

DNA tests, which became commonplace in criminal investigations in the mid-1990s, have led to the exoneration of dozens of convicts in recent years, including a handful in Maryland.

Stephen Mercer, Owens's attorney, said the DNA test yielded a profile of a man who is neither Owens nor Thompson -- a finding at odds with the state's theory in the case.

"Someone's gotten away with murder for 20 years," said Mercer, who this year persuaded a Baltimore City Circuit Court judge to allow him to have the swab tested.

Baltimore prosecutors say they are ready to meet their burden of proof again if the case goes back to court, a prospect Williar's relatives find disturbing.

"In my heart of hearts, I believe they did it," said William C. Winkler, Williar's stepfather, who raised her. "There's not a day that goes by that I don't have to take a deep breath to get through a thought."

Mercer, a Rockville lawyer who teamed up with attorneys from the Innocence Project division of the Maryland Office of the Public Defender, said they intend to file motions seeking new trials based on the new evidence.

The Baltimore City State's Attorney's Office opposed the motion to test the swab, arguing that the convictions were supported by physical evidence and Thompson's confession.

"There was a lot of compelling evidence that was presented," said Margaret Burns, a spokeswoman for the office. Jurors "found that there was proof beyond a reasonable doubt. Not only did the jury find that, the appeals process confirmed that several times."

She said prosecutors will examine the methodology used to test the sample as well as its chain of custody over the years. Winkler said semen residue collected from the body could have been from an earlier, consensual sexual encounter, although a state witness testified that Williar had broken up with her boyfriend months before she died, and was not seeing anyone at the time.

Prosecutors argued that the semen was evidence of the rape.

Staff researcher Madonna Lebling contributed to this report.

Judge Keeps Karr Pornography Case Sealed (HC/AP)

By Marcus Wohlsen, Associated Press Writer

Houston Chronicle, October 3, 2006

SANTA ROSA, Calif. — A judge refused to unseal police documents in the child pornography case against former JonBenet Ramsey slaying suspect John Mark Karr, whose attorneys are fighting to have the misdemeanor charges tossed out.

The Press Democrat of Santa Rosa had sought to view the documents in the case against the high-profile suspect, but Sonoma County Judge Cerena Wong agreed with prosecutors who argued it could harm the investigation and prejudice potential jurors.

Authorities said they found five images of child porn on Karr's computer when he was arrested in April 2001. He fled before he went to trial. Investigators conceded they lost Karr's computer some time in the past five years, but claim to have found copies of the data recently.

Karr's trial was originally scheduled to start Monday, but was postponed for further hearings Tuesday on defense motions to dismiss the case or throw out newly revealed computer data.

Investigators said they think they have other computer equipment linked to Karr that could contain more than 1,000 other images.

Prosecutors "don't know how the images got there," defense lawyer Robert Amparan said. "They don't know whether Mr. Karr knew they were there. They don't know when if ever they were viewed."

DOJ_NMG_0073408

Sonoma County Deputy County Counsel Anne Keck told the judge the FBI was comparing images of teenagers found on Karr's computer equipment with a national database of child porn victims.

She said the digital images were not related to child pornography charges against Karr.

But FBI spokesman Joe Schadler later said the bureau's role in the Karr investigation had ended, and was limited to providing expert testimony and forensic analysis of five pictures discovered on Karr's computer in 2001.

"We're not doing any further forensic work," he said.

Keck did not immediately return phone messages to The Associated Press seeking comment.

Karr, 41, who was extradited from Colorado last month to face the five-year-old charges, appeared briefly at the hearing, looking tired and worn.

Karr has rejected a plea deal that would have put him on probation. Prosecutors have conceded he probably won't serve more time if convicted because he already spent several months in jail awaiting trial five years ago. They said they want Karr to register as a sex offender.

The former teacher was arrested in Thailand last month after suggesting he killed JonBenet, a 6-year-old beauty queen, in her Boulder, Colo., home in 1996. The Ramsey case quickly collapsed after DNA failed to connect him to the crime.

Police Investigate '03 Death After Charge Against Nurse (NYT)

By Steve Friess

The New York Times, October 3, 2006

LAS VEGAS, Oct. 2 — One day before his apparently healthy wife stopped breathing and collapsed, Chaz Higgs, a critical care nurse, is said to have engaged in what seemed at the time to be idle chatter with a co-worker about the best way to kill a spouse, according to an indictment returned last week charging Mr. Higgs with his wife's murder.

The way to do it and get away with it, Mr. Higgs is said to have told another nurse, is with an injection of the paralytic drug succinylcholine because it frequently goes undetected in autopsies.

That alleged conversation — and a laboratory test that turned up suc- cinylcholine in the body of Mr. Higgs's wife, Kathy Augustine — formed the basis of the indictment. Now, the investigation into the death of Ms. Augustine has prompted the authorities to look into another death three years ago, that of her first husband, Charles Augustine, 63, who died in a Las Vegas hospital where he was being cared for by Mr. Higgs.

David Roger, the district attorney for Clark County, announced Monday that investigators would exhume Mr. Augustine's body to check for traces of the same drug that officials say killed Ms. Augustine.

Mr. Higgs, who was arrested on Friday in Hampton, Va., where he was staying with relatives, waived extradition on Monday and will be returned to Nevada. He has not made any public remarks since an impassioned denial of wrongdoing in an interview with The Las Vegas Review-Journal on July 13, in which he insisted he loved his wife and called suspicion of his involvement "just crazy."

The day after those remarks, Mr. Higgs was found with his wrists slit in the Las Vegas home he and Ms. Augustine had shared. He was treated at a local hospital and released but did not attend his wife's funeral on July 15.

The death of Ms. Augustine, 50, who was the Nevada state controller, and the case's potboiler-style twists have captivated Nevadans.

According to police reports, Mr. Higgs called the police the morning of July 8 and said he had found his wife unresponsive and not breathing at their second home in Reno. He suggested to paramedics that she might have had a complication from a heart condition.

Ms. Augustine died three days later, and an autopsy by the Reno coroner found no evidence of heart disease or heart attack.

With no visible explanation for the death, Ms. Augustine's blood samples were sent to the F.B.I. laboratory in Quantico, Va. Last week, the lab reported the presence of succinylcholine, and Ms. Augustine's death was ruled a homicide. On Friday, Mr. Higgs, 42, was arrested on one count of first-degree murder.

DOJ_NMG_0073409

"It's a major punch in the gut to the family," Greg Augustine, 36, son of Charles Augustine and stepson of Kathy Augustine, said Saturday. "We were holding out hope that there wasn't any foul play. Now we know she was killed."

Now that Mr. Higgs has been accused in this death, questions have arisen about the death of Charles Augustine.

"My dad was getting better, and they were moving him to a rehab area," Greg Augustine said in July, "but very soon after that, he had massive organ failure."

No criminal investigation was conducted at the time of Mr. Augustine's death.

Mr. Higgs and Ms. Augustine were married three weeks after the death of Mr. Augustine in 2003, and the newlyweds received $1 million from his life insurance policy.

Greg Augustine said his father and stepmother were in the midst of a divorce after 17 years of marriage when the elder Mr. Augustine was hospitalized. Greg Augustine said he had had little contact with his stepmother after his father's death but does not suspect she was involved in his father's death.

The indictment against Mr. Higgs says he injected succinylcholine into Ms. Augustine's buttocks on July 8 before calling the police. Succinylcholine is a muscle relaxant used by anesthesiologists to briefly paralyze patients in order to install breathing tubes, but it has also been used as a murder weapon. Efren Saldivar, a respiratory therapist, confessed in 2001 that he injected it into some of his more than 50 victims in California. The indictment against Mr. Higgs said he had mentioned his marital discord as well as the use of succinylcholine to a fellow nurse at the Reno-area hospital on July 7. The two were discussing a high-profile arrest of a man charged with gunning down his wife, and Mr. Higgs reportedly remarked that such a means of killing someone was "stupid." The nurse, not named in the indictment, informed the police of the conversation as Ms. Augustine lay comatose before her death three days after her collapse.

Ms. Augustine's only biological child — a daughter, Dallas Augustine, 26 — could not be reached for comment, but her spokesman said the recent developments had devastated her. "Everyone knows that your parents are probably going to precede you in death, but the idea that somebody stole half of her life is an entirely different story," said the representative, Mark Fierro. "This is 10 times, 1,000 times harder than the original situation."

Husband Faces Charges In Nevada Official's Death (WT)

By Jerry Seper, The Washington Times

The Washington Times, October 3, 2006

Critical care nurse William Charles Higgs told co-workers he knew how to commit the perfect murder just before his wife, Nevada State Controller Kathy Augustine, died of what initially was called a heart attack.

Yesterday, during a court hearing in Hampton, Va., the man who met his wife while caring for her dying husband in 2003 waived extradition to face first-degree murder charges in Nevada.

Arrested Friday by FBI agents in Hampton, where he had been staying with relatives, Mr. Higgs is suspected of killing Mrs. Augustine with an injection of a powerful muscle relaxant. Handcuffed and wearing an orange jail jumpsuit, Mr. Higgs said nothing during the brief hearing.

Police reports said Mrs. Augustine, 50, was found unconscious on July 8 and was rushed to a hospital, but died three days later. She never regained consciousness.

Mr. Higgs, 42, a nurse at Carson-Tahoe Regional Medical Center, told authorities he found his wife unconscious in bed at their home in Reno and called police, saying she had suffered a heart attack. He told police she was suffering from extreme stress from an ongoing campaign for state treasurer, where she faced fundraising problems and opposition from her own party.

But Reno Police Deputy Chief Jim Johns later confirmed that a preliminary autopsy found no evidence of heart disease that would trigger an attack and a complete autopsy was ordered. Police think Mrs. Augustine was injected with succinylcholine, a muscle relaxant often used in hospitals to temporarily paralyze a patient so a breathing tube can be inserted into the windpipe.

According to a police report, medical examiners found a needle mark on Mrs. Augustine's buttocks that could not be explained.

DOJ_NMG_0073410

The report also said Mr. Higgs told co-workers he was having marital problems and was planning on ending his marriage. Investigators said Mr. Higgs also told co-workers just before his wife's death that if he intended to kill someone he would use a paralyzing drug such as succinylcholine because it could not be detected after death.

Mr. Higgs, known to his family and friends as "Chaz," attempted to kill himself at the couple's Las Vegas home by slashing his wrists three days after his wife died. He was treated and later released from a Las Vegas hospital. He did not attend his wife's funeral, held a day after his release from the hospital.

After the FBI laboratory in Quantico, Va., confirmed finding succinylcholine in Mrs. Augustine's urine, Reno police obtained an arrest warrant. FBI agents staked out the Hampton house where Mr. Higgs had been visiting relatives and arrested him Friday as he pulled into the driveway.

Mr. Higgs met Mrs. Augustine when he was caring for her first husband of 17 years, Charles Francis Augustine, 63, who died in 2003. They married six months after the funeral. Investigators yesterday said they will exhume Mr. Augustine's body to look for traces of the same drug that authorities said killed Mrs. Augustine.

Mrs. Augustine served in the Nevada Assembly and Senate until her 1998 election as the state's first female controller. In September 2004, she admitted violating state ethics laws during her 2002 re-election campaign and was fined $15,000 by the state Ethics Commission. She was impeached by the state Assembly and convicted and censured at a state Senate trial, but she was allowed to resume her office.

She announced her candidacy for state treasurer in January. Despite her death in July, her name remained on the ballot in the August primary, where she received 18 percent of the vote.

Manuscript Used To Convict Molester (WT)

By Cheryl Wetzstein

The Washington Times, October 3, 2006

A man thought to be one of the nation's most prolific child molesters has been convicted in a California court based on testimony from eight of his victims and a manuscript he was writing about his 35 years as a pedophile.

Dean Arthur Schwartzmiller, 64, of San Jose, Calif., faces up to 153 years in prison when he is sentenced Oct. 16 on 12 charges of child molestation, taking obscene pictures of a minor and possession of child pornography.

Law-enforcement officials said the case is unique because of the memoir manuscript and seven spiral notebooks, written in code, that contained more than 36,000 entries about Schwartzmiller's sexual activities with children.

"When we found the notebooks and the manuscript, we realized we had come across a serial child molester and essentially a sociopath," said Steve Fein, deputy district attorney in Santa Clara County, who prosecuted the case.

"I haven't seen too many people keep code or that detailed a log on their sexual contacts with children," said Detective Robert Dillon, who works in the San Jose Police Department's child exploitation unit and testified at the trial in Santa Clara County Superior Court.

Mr. Dillon said that based on the notebooks' 1,500 pages, Schwartzmiller abused between 250 and 300 children -- predominantly boys in early adolescence. Boys were listed in categories such as hair color ("Blonde boys"), behavior ("Boys who say no") and explicit sex acts.

Schwartzmiller also had been writing a memoir about his life and his political views. Most chillingly, the manuscript had "paragraph summaries" of more than 100 boys, including "their names, specific characteristics about them and what he had done with them," Mr. Dillon said. "I've heard of other [pedophiles] with 10, 15, 20 victims but nobody as extensive as this."

Schwartzmiller came to the attention of California authorities after he fled the scene of a traffic accident. Police visited his home and met his roommate, Fred Everts, a convicted child molester. Police arrested Everts after discovering he had violated his parole.

Schwartzmiller learned of Everts' arrest and fled to Washington state, but called one of the boys he was later convicted of molesting and asked him to go to his home and destroy certain materials. The boy told his mother and she went to police with the pornographic materials they found including photos of her own semi-naked son, press reports said. Schwartzmiller was soon arrested.

DOJ_NMG_0073411

The boy and his cousin, now 13, testified against Schwartzmiller. Schwartzmiller defended himself, and accused the cousins, who are in California illegally, of striking a deal with prosecutors to gain legal residency in exchange for lying about him. Schwartzmiller further argued that consensual sex with boys shouldn't be a crime if the boys have reached puberty.

Jurors found Schwartzmiller guilty Sept. 18 after four hours of deliberation.

Mr. Fein described Schwartzmiller as having "no remorse. He has no feelings that anything he has done is wrong. He's essentially proud of how he's led his life and what he's done."

As prolific as Schwartzmiller is thought to be, the nation's most notorious child molester may still be Rex King, described as "Mr. X" in Alfred Kinsey's research.

King, a forestry official who traveled for work, is estimated to have molested 800 children, including infants, according to his meticulous records. Kinsey included King's sex acts in his 1948 book on male sexual behavior.

Husband Faces Charges In Nevada Official's Death (WT)

By Jerry Seper

The Washington Times, October 3, 2006

Critical care nurse William Charles Higgs told co-workers he knew how to commit the perfect murder just before his wife, Nevada State Controller Kathy Augustine, died of what initially was called a heart attack.

Yesterday, during a court hearing in Hampton, Va., the man who met his wife while caring for her dying husband in 2003 waived extradition to face first-degree murder charges in Nevada.

Arrested Friday by FBI agents in Hampton, where he had been staying with relatives, Mr. Higgs is suspected of killing Mrs. Augustine with an injection of a powerful muscle relaxant. Handcuffed and wearing an orange jail jumpsuit, Mr. Higgs said nothing during the brief hearing.

Police reports said Mrs. Augustine, 50, was found unconscious on July 8 and was rushed to a hospital, but died three days later. She never regained consciousness.

Mr. Higgs, 42, a nurse at Carson-Tahoe Regional Medical Center, told authorities he found his wife unconscious in bed at their home in Reno and called police, saying she had suffered a heart attack. He told police she was suffering from extreme stress from an ongoing campaign for state treasurer, where she faced fundraising problems and opposition from her own party.

But Reno Police Deputy Chief Jim Johns later confirmed that a preliminary autopsy found no evidence of heart disease that would trigger an attack and a complete autopsy was ordered. Police think Mrs. Augustine was injected with succinylcholine, a muscle relaxant often used in hospitals to temporarily paralyze a patient so a breathing tube can be inserted into the windpipe.

According to a police report, medical examiners found a needle mark on Mrs. Augustine's buttocks that could not be explained.

The report also said Mr. Higgs told co-workers he was having marital problems and was planning on ending his marriage. Investigators said Mr. Higgs also told co-workers just before his wife's death that if he intended to kill someone he would use a paralyzing drug such as succinylcholine because it could not be detected after death.

Mr. Higgs, known to his family and friends as "Chaz," attempted to kill himself at the couple's Las Vegas home by slashing his wrists three days after his wife died. He was treated and later released from a Las Vegas hospital. He did not attend his wife's funeral, held a day after his release from the hospital.

After the FBI laboratory in Quantico, Va., confirmed finding succinylcholine in Mrs. Augustine's urine, Reno police obtained an arrest warrant. FBI agents staked out the Hampton house where Mr. Higgs had been visiting relatives and arrested him Friday as he pulled into the driveway.

Mr. Higgs met Mrs. Augustine when he was caring for her first husband of 17 years, Charles Francis Augustine, 63, who died in 2003. They married six months after the funeral. Investigators yesterday said they will exhume Mr. Augustine's body to look for traces of the same drug that authorities said killed Mrs. Augustine.

Mrs. Augustine served in the Nevada Assembly and Senate until her 1998 election as the state's first female controller. In September 2004, she admitted violating state ethics laws during her 2002 re-election campaign and was fined $15,000 by the state Ethics Commission. She was impeached by the state Assembly and convicted and censured at a state Senate trial, but she was allowed to resume her office.

DOJ_NMG_0073412

She announced her candidacy for state treasurer in January. Despite her death in July, her name remained on the ballot in the August primary, where she received 18 percent of the vote.

CIVIL RIGHTS:

FAYETTE LOCKUP IS TARGET OF RIGHTS VIOLATIONS INQUIRY (LEXHL)

By Beth Musgrave, Michelle Ku And Linda Blackford, HERALD-LEADER STAFF WRITERS

Lexington Herald-Leader (KY), October 3, 2006

Jail officer says he alerted FBI

John Vest said he has been working with the FBI for an "undisclosed" time.

An officer at the Fayette County jail who is running for jailer in Jessamine County says he alerted the FBI to allegations of excessive force at Lexington's jail.

John Vest, a corporal who has worked at the Fayette jail since 2003, said at a press conference yesterday that he has been working with the FBI in its investigation of alleged unnecessary force and civil rights violations against prisoners for "an undisclosed period of time."

Vest said he was not authorized to talk about the FBI investigation or his involvement.

David Beyer, an FBI spokesman, said he could neither confirm or deny that Vest has been working with federal officials on the case. The FBI typically does not comment on ongoing cases or who its informants are.

After Vest's announcement, jail officials questioned Vest's credibility, saying he has been involved in three use-of-force incidents during the three years he's been at the jail.

Ron Bishop, director of the Fayette County Detention Center, said he wasn't surprised that Vest had been talking to federal investigators.

"It makes a lot more sense now, when you look at the timing and his running for office," Bishop said.

On Thursday, the FBI announced that the Civil Rights Division of the Department of Justice, the U.S. attorney for the Eastern District of Kentucky and the FBI were conducting an investigation into possible civil rights violations involving excessive force at the 1,000-bed facility.

On Tuesday, FBI agents served a sealed search warrant at the jail on Old Frankfort Pike. Federal authorities have said that they cannot go into specifics about the investigation until the search warrant is unsealed.

The Fayette County jail has not been without problems over the past several years. Since August 2005, five inmates have died at the facility. It's unclear whether the current investigation has anything to do with those deaths.

Bishop said yesterday that Vest has been investigated four times in the last year. Two of those investigations involved use of force. One investigation was for improper documentation involving use of force. The second case involving alleged excessive use of force remains open, he said.

Vest has also been investigated for insubordination and for improperly filling out his time card, Bishop said.

Bishop said Vest was suspended this year for 16 hours for the insubordination incident. He received written reprimands for the other two closed cases: the time-card incident and the use of force.

Vest has worked in the jail's intake area on the third shift, from midnight to 8 a.m., for the last year, Bishop said. Vest makes $27,110 a year, according to city records.

"I'm disappointed that Director Bishop is attempting to intimidate a federal witness," Vest said after learning that Bishop had disclosed his personnel records.

Vest said that he had no written reprimands before he was transferred in November 2005 to intake, where the FBI could be focusing its investigation. According to several people who witnessed the FBI search last week, agents spent hours going through documents in the intake area, where inmates are processed before being booked.

DOJ_NMG_0073413

Vest said he has been told by his supervisors that the case that remains open has been resolved and the use of force was determined to be appropriate. But Vest said he expected to receive a written reprimand because his supervisors said he had not included everything in his report that was required.

In another incident, Vest was investigated in December 2003 after an altercation with an inmate. Vest allegedly pepper-sprayed an inmate who refused to follow an order. The inmate allegedly hit Vest with a mop handle before Vest subdued him. Both men were treated at a hospital.

Vest said the pepper spray incident was reviewed by the jail staff and was deemed an appropriate use of force. He received no reprimands.

The inmate involved was charged with assault third degree. He eventually pleaded guilty, court records show.

Jail spokesman Lt. Darin Kelly said he did not know whether Vest was disciplined in the pepper spray incident because the FBI took those records.

Vest is still employed at the Fayette jail but is requesting administrative leave with pay. He also is requesting protection under the federal Whistle-blower Protection Act, aimed at preventing workplace retribution. Bishop said he was unaware that Vest had requested leave.

Vest's spokesman, David Adams, said neither he nor Vest could discuss whether Vest's work with the FBI came before or after he decided to run for office.

"Unfortunately, the timing of Corporal Vest's involvement is part of the investigation, so I can't answer that," Adams said. "John is sincerely interested in holding people accountable in the Jessamine County jail, and that's his reason for running for office in his home county of Jessamine."

Vest, 42, the Republican candidate, was born in Winchester, in Clark County, Adams said.

Adams said Vest has already been personally attacked for his actions and he expected attacks against Vest to accelerate now that he has gone public. Adams said he could not elaborate on who has attacked Vest.

"Soon, retribution will begin for those who have perpetrated crimes in the name of government entities and those who helped the perpetrators hide their crimes," Adams said, reading from a prepared statement.

Cecil Moss, Vest's Democratic opponent in the Nov. 7 race for Jessamine jailer, had little to say about Vest's announcement.

"That's Fayette County, and I really don't know what they're doing up there," Moss said. "I don't know Mr. Vest very well."

Frank Hubbard, the current jailer, did not seek re-election.

Herald-Leader reporter Greg Kocher contributed to this story.

Fayette Jail Employee Says He Assisted FBI Investigation (AP)

AP, October 3, 2006

LEXINGTON, Ky. - A Fayette County jail employee who has asked for whistleblower protection said Monday he had been working with the FBI in its investigation of unnecessary force and civil rights violations against inmates at the facility.

John Vest has worked at the jail since 2003 and is running for jailer in Jessamine County. He is still employed at the Fayette jail but has asked for administrative leave with pay, the Lexington Herald-Leader reported on its Web site Monday.

The newspaper said Vest is requesting protection under the federal Whistleblower Protection Act, aimed at preventing workplace retribution.

The FBI announced Thursday that the Department of Justice Civil Rights Division, the U.S. attorney for the Eastern District of Kentucky and the FBI were investigating possible civil rights violations involving excessive force at the 1,000-bed facility. FBI agents served a sealed search warrant Tuesday at the jail.

Vest said at a news conference Monday he had been working with the FBI in the investigation for "an undisclosed period of time."

Vest has been involved in at least three use of force incidents in the three years he's been at the jail, the Herald-Leader reported. He received written reprimands in two cases, and one remains open, the newspaper said.

DOJ_NMG_0073414

Ron Bishop, director of the Fayette County Detention Center, said he wasn't surprised that Vest had been talking to federal investigators.

Vest has worked in the jail's intake area on the third shift for the last year, Bishop said.

"It makes a lot more sense now, when you look at the timing and his running for office," Bishop said.

Vest declined to comment on the disciplinary actions against him, saying it was part of the FBI investigation.

"I really wish that I could, but it violates the integrity of the case," Vest said. "The people that have been victimized will be cheated if I violate the integrity of this case."

Vest's spokesman, David Adams, said neither he nor Vest could comment on whether Vest's work with the FBI came before or after he decided to run for office.

"Unfortunately, the timing of Corporal Vest's involvement is part of the investigation, so I can't answer that," Adams said. "John is sincerely interested in holding people accountable in the Jessamine County jail, and that's his reason for running for office in his home county of Jessamine."

Vest was born in Winchester, in Clark County, Adams said.

FBI officials could not be reached for comment.

Jail Informant Goes Public (WTVQ-TV)

By Greg Stotelmyer, Action News 36

WTVQ-TV, October 3, 2006

John Vest has been an employee at the jail in Fayette County since June of 2003. He won't say how long, but he confirms he's a federal whistleblower working with the FBI on its probe into the use of unnecessary force at the jail. Vest made that revelation Monday morning, six days after the detention center was searched by the FBI. Vest refused to answer questions about his roll as an inside informant, repeatedly telling Action News 36 "I'm not authorized to talk about it." Vest is a corporal, working third shift in the jail's intake area, which is where inmates are booked. Vest has requested administrative leave with pay claiming he would be working "in a hostile work environment."

The detention center's director, Ron Bishop says he's not surprised Vest is the whistleblower, but he did not know who the informant was before Vest went public. Bishop says the FBI search bothers him. He claims the jail has handled the use of force and allegations of excessive force properly. He says Vest never approached him about problems. "We always follow up and we always take appropriate action," Bishop said about reports of force.

Bishop also questions Vest's motives because Vest is the Republican candidate for jailer in next month's election in Jessamine County. "Let me say that I am a little suspicious of the timing and given his track record here, it is a little suspect," said Bishop. Vest says his informant roll and a run for office are "two separate things".

Vest says being "deep inside" the jail as a whistleblower made him concerned. "I was scared to death," Vest told Action News 36 in a follow up phone interview. Bishop says Vest has four disciplinary actions against him in the three plus years he's worked at the detention center. Bishop says there's an open investigation on Vest for possible use of excessive force. Vest has been reprimanded for failing to report a use of force incident and suspended for insubordination. Vest claims he has been told he's been cleared of excessive use of force.

FBI spokesman David Beyer would "neither confirm nor deny" that Vest is an informant. The search warrant allowing the FBI to raid the jail last Tuesday remains under court seal.

Bishop says the FBI carted away personnel files, incident reports and shift logs. It also took video and DVD's of events taped that involved the use of force. Bishop says he "rests easy at night" despite the federal probe.

Vest says before the FBI used him they "checked me out, my credibility, my integrity." Vest says he's done a good job as an inside informant. "I did a lot and what I did, I did good," said Vest. "John Vest knows right from wrong, John Vest has integrity."

EEOC Rules In Favor Of Chesapeake Deputies Who Were Fired (VAPILOT)

By Cindy Clayton, The Virginian-pilot

Hampton Roads Virginian-Pilot, October 3, 2006

DOJ_NMG_0073415

CHESAPEAKE - The Equal Employment Opportunity Commission has ruled in favor of two sheriff's deputies who said they were fired in retaliation for a discrimination lawsuit that alleged a hostile, racist work environment.

The agency sent a letter to Tony Ellis notifying him of the ruling and suggesting an agreement that would require Sheriff John R. Newhart's office to reinstate Ellis, who was fired Dec. 30. The suggested agreement also requires Newhart to give Ellis back pay and benefits, punitive and compensatory damages, and attorneys' fees and to conduct on-site EEOC training for all supervisors and expunge all references to Ellis' dismissal in his personnel file.

David Cahoon, who was set to testify in Ellis' case last year, also was fired and received the same ruling last week from the EEOC.

Ellis said EEOC officials told him that if the Sheriff's Department doesn't respond within 10 days, the case will be sent to the U.S. Justice Department.

Col. David Newby, undersheriff, said the department doesn't plan to respond.

"We don't mediate these things," Newby said. "We tell them that if they wish to do so, we'll try it in court and not before. That's been our practice for 15 or 20 years."

Ellis was demoted from the rank of lieutenant in May 2004 because he didn't file a report about the use of force on a jail inmate on time. He filed a discrimination complaint with the EEOC and was given a right-to-sue letter, he said.

Ellis filed suit in U.S. District Court against the sheriff and the department in November 2004 alleging he was demoted because he is black and that racial disparities in the department led to inmate mistreatment, violence among employees and other incidents.

A federal judge dismissed the suit in November 2005. A month later, on Dec. 30, Cahoon and Ellis were fired. Ellis had worked for the department for 20 years; Cahoon for 21 years.

Earlier this year, Newby said the two men were not reappointed after Newhart's re-election in November. State law allows sheriffs to reappoint employees at will.

Ellis said he was told he was being fired because he didn't speak when the sheriff greeted him inside the booking section of the jail.

Cahoon said he was told he was let go because he kept a journal of his experiences at the department. Included in Ellis' lawsuit was an affidavit written by Cahoon about incidents and experiences he had while working for Newhart. Cahoon said he had told the department's attorney during an interview that he kept a journal during his years with the department.

Cahoon and Ellis said they were taught during law enforcement training to keep a log of their actions and experiences.

Ellis' lawsuit alleged several incidents that involved white employees with rank who were charged with crimes in other cities, had threatened black employees or had failed to follow orders but were not demoted.

In one instance, a sergeant threatened a deputy and a "physical confrontation," ensued, according to the suit. The sergeant retrieved a weapon from his locker and threatened the deputy. The sergeant was not demoted, according to the suit.

Another allegation, labeled the "Thunder Dome Incident," involved inmates being put into a "dangerous cell block" where another inmate had been beaten the previous week, the suit stated. The lieutenant in charge wasn't demoted.

At a Christmas party at the sheriff's home, a white employee got into an argument with a black employee and a fight followed, the suit stated. The white employee is said to have used several racial slurs.

"There is a hostile work environment created by the lack of discipline required by Sheriff John R. Newhart," the lawsuit stated, "and due to the racial climate in the department."

Bible-Reading Student Gets Lesson In Litigation (WP)

By Eric Rich

The Washington Post, October 3, 2006

Amber Mangum was a frequent reader during lunch breaks at her Prince George's County middle school, silently soaking up the adventures of Harry Potter and other tales in the spare minutes before afternoon classes. The habit was never viewed as a problem -- not, a lawsuit alleges, until the book she was reading was the Bible.

DOJ_NMG_0073416

A vice principal at Dwight D. Eisenhower Middle School in Laurel last month ordered Amber, then 12, to stop reading the Bible or face punishment, according to a lawsuit filed Friday by Amber's mother. The lawsuit, filed in U.S. District Court in Greenbelt, alleges that the vice principal's actions violated the girl's civil rights.

"Amber's a new Christian, and she's trying to learn all she can," said Maryann Mangum, the girl's mother. "She reads her Bible and she goes to Sunday school. . . . It really upset me when she was not allowed to read it on her own time."

John White, a spokesman for the school system, said administrators learned of the lawsuit Friday and were not prepared to comment on its claims. "We're just beginning to look into it," he said.

Mangum said her daughter was reading her Bible on Sept. 14 when Vice Principal Jeanetta Rainey approached. According to Mangum and the lawsuit, Rainey told Amber that reading the Bible violated school policy and that she would face discipline if she continued to do so.

Later that day, Amber recounted the episode to Mangum, who is her adoptive mother and also her biological grandmother. James Baker, a family friend, sent a note to the school asking that the principal identify any policy barring students from reading the Bible during their free time.

The note quoted a section of the school system's administrative procedures, saying that students "may read their Bibles or other scriptures, say grace before meals, and pray before tests to the same extent they may engage in comparable, non-disruptive activities."

The principal, Charoscar Coleman, did not respond, the lawsuit says. A friend at Mangum's church suggested that Mangum contact the Rutherford Institute, a nonprofit legal organization specializing in cases that involve issues of religious and civil liberties.

The institute's president, John W. Whitehead, said yesterday that the law is clear and that Amber's rights were violated. He said the lawsuit does not specifically seek monetary damages but rather that a judge declare that students cannot be barred from reading the Bible during free time at school.

"This is a seventh-grader who's probably overwhelmed by what's going on around her," Whitehead said. "This is a chance for her to get some comfort during the day. . . . What would you rather have a kid doing, throwing spit wads or sitting there silently reading a few passages from the Bible?"

Euclid OKs Election Plan Hoping To End U.S. Lawsuit (CLPD)

By Leila Atassi, Plain Dealer Reporter

The Cleveland Plain Dealer, October 3, 2006

Redistricting aims to add black representation

Euclid -- City Council unanimously approved a redistricting plan to help settle a federal lawsuit that contends the city's election system prevents black candidates from winning council seats.

Under the new system, which will take effect in time for the 2007 election, Ward 4's black population would decrease from 54 percent to about 51 percent, and the percentage of black residents in Ward 3 would increase from about 39 percent to 45 percent.

About 13 percent of residents would be assigned a new ward, and the city's five at-large seats would remain.

City officials hope the plan will satisfy the Justice Department, which filed suit in July after a three-year investigation concluded that broadly drawn districts and a system for electing at-large council members have diluted minority voting strength.

Leading into council's vote Monday night, city officials did their best to ease the worries of residents who stepped to the lectern and said that although they believe the Justice Department's accusations are out of line, adopting the proposal seems to be an admission of guilt.

"This administration and City Council are united in our belief that this community has done nothing wrong," Mayor Bill Cervenik told residents. "Be proud of Euclid. Don't be ashamed of these accusations, because none of them are true."

In June, the Justice Department proposed that the city shore up minority voting power by breaking four wards into eight -- two of which would be predominantly black -- and eliminating all at-large seats but the council president's.

DOJ_NMG_0073417

Attorney Hilary Taylor, who is representing the city in the case, said that in drafting its proposal, the Justice Department relied on inadequate census data that does not accurately reflect the demographics of the city.

The city's counterproposal was created with help from Cleveland State University researchers using new demographic data compiled by GeoLytics, a New Jersey-based company.

EUCLIDB5

ANTITRUST:

Justice Department, State Settle Suit With Dairy Industry (AP)

AP, October 3, 2006

LONDON, Ky. - A Kentucky dairy company will be sold to a competitor under a settlement between the U.S. Department of Justice, the state of Kentucky and the Dairy Farmers of America.

Prairie Farms Dairy Inc., of Carlinville, Ill., will buy Southern Belle Dairy Co., of Somerset, from the Dairy Farmers of America to settle an antitrust suit filed by the federal government.

The Allen Family Limited Partnership will also have to sell its interest in Southern Belle as part of the deal. The settlement was filed Monday in U.S. District Court in London.

Thomas O. Barnett, assistant U.S. Attorney General over the department's Antitrust Division, said the deal will mean better prices and quality of service in Kentucky and Tennessee.

The Justice Department and Kentucky filed suit in 2003 challenging the Dairy Farmers' Association's purchase of the Southern Belle dairy.

The lawsuit said the association's acquisition of Southern Belle and the nearby Flav-O-Rich dairy in London hurt competition since both competed for school milk contracts in Kentucky and Tennessee.

Dairy Co-op In KC Settles With U.S. (KCS)

The Kansas City Star, October 3, 2006

Dairy Farmers of America, the country's biggest dairy cooperative, agreed to divest its interest in a Kentucky milk processor after a three-year battle with the federal government.

The Department of Justice said Monday that its settlement with the Kansas City-based cooperative would restore competition in the bidding for school-milk contracts in eastern Kentucky and Tennessee.

Dairy Farmers of America will sell its interest in Southern Belle Dairy Co. to Prairie Farms Dairy Inc. under the Justice Department's approval. Also selling its interest in Southern Belle to Prairie Farms is Dairy Farmers of America's partner, the Allen Family Limited Partnership.

A spokeswoman for Dairy Farmers of America indicated that the cooperative would have a statement, but had not provided it by late Monday.

The dispute began in 2003 when the federal government sued Dairy Farmers of America over its 2002 acquisition of a 50 percent interest in Southern Belle in Somerset, Ky. That purchase followed Dairy Farmers of America's earlier acquisition of a 50 percent interest in National Dairy Holdings, which owns Flav-O-Rich Dairy of London, Ky.

The government alleged that Dairy Farmers of America's acquisitions gave the cooperative ownership interest in the two dairies that competed against each other to supply milk to 45 school districts in eastern Kentucky. The purchases also reduced the number of bidders from three to two for 55 other school districts in eastern Kentucky and Tennessee, according to the federal government's suit.

FCC OKs Alltel Buy Of Midwest Wireless (AP-YBIZ)

AP, October 3, 2006

FCC OKs Alltel Buy of Midwest Wireless Holdings With Conditions

DOJ_NMG_0073418

WASHINGTON (AP) -- The Federal Communications Commission on Monday approved Alltel Corp.'s $1.1 billion purchase of Midwest Wireless Holdings LLC on the condition that it sell some of its assets.

The companies must sell cell-phone businesses in Minnesota regions covering Chippewa, Lac qui Parle, Pipestone, and Le Sueur, the FCC said. The approval came more than three weeks after the Justice Department approved the transaction, with similar conditions.

The FCC voted 5-0 to approve the acquisition.

Little Rock, Ark.-based Alltel share closed Monday at $55.31 on the New York Stock Exchange, down 19 cents. Privately held Midwest Wireless is based in Mankato, Minn.

McAfee, Others Criticize Vista Security Policies (MERCN)

By Sarah Jane Tribble

The San Jose Mercury News, October 3, 2006

Computer security provider McAfee joined a chorus of complaints Monday and accused software programming giant Microsoft of abusing its monopoly by controlling what security products can run on its new operating system.

The Santa Clara company ran a full-page advertisement in the Financial Times saying that Microsoft, which started selling its own security products this summer, was trying to ``hamstring" competitors.

``Microsoft seems to envision a world in which one giant company not only controls the systems that drive most computers around the world but also the security that protects those computers from viruses and other online threats," the advertisement states. ``... when it fails, it fails for 97 percent of the world's desktops."

Microsoft's Vista, which is expected to be released to business customers next month, was designed in cooperation with the security firms and with the goal of providing customers as many security options as possible, said Stephen Toulouse, senior product manager in the security technology unit of Microsoft.

``Customers have asked us to make a more secure operating system and that's been our goal," Toulouse said. ``We just want to protect the customers and we know we can't do it alone."

To be sure, the $3.6 billion security market was largely created because of Microsoft's weak operating systems, said Andrew Jaquith, senior analyst with the Yankee Group.

``Windows has for years been a monumentally insecure platform and there are a number of companies like Symantec and McAfee that have made their reputation and money on security of this platform," Jaquith said.

Now that Microsoft is trying to address those security concerns, the companies that have long benefited from operating system weaknesses have much to lose, he said.

In a joint phone interview Monday afternoon, McAfee chairman and chief executive George Samenuk along with the company's chief security architect John Viega said that if Microsoft's intention was truly to protect customers, than it ``would allow legitimate security."

McAfee's sentiment echoes San Jose-based Symantec, which announced its opposition to Vista limitations two weeks ago.

At issue are two main points:

First, the security companies say they fear consumers will be confused when Microsoft's new security center pops up along with their own but relays different information. Microsoft argues its own dashboard relays very basic information that should be compatible with the information provided by security firms.

Second, the firms allege that Microsoft has blocked their ability to review the operating system's kernel, or core. Microsoft's Toulouse said Monday that the company never wanted that code to be open for the public.

Microsoft, instead, has been offering a ``relatively unprecedented level access" to the security firms, he said. McAfee and Symantec have both had office space and lab space on the Microsoft campus, he said.

Both Symantec and McAfee said they have not taken any formal action yet, but there are many options, including filing lawsuits and waging antitrust complaints.

Security firms aren't the only ones in Silicon Valley crying foul over Microsoft's new operating system.

DOJ_NMG_0073419

This summer, San Jose-based Adobe Systems took the software behemoth to task for plans to let users save documents as a PDF, an Adobe file format. Microsoft dropped the plan after reports Adobe threatend legal action.

Supreme Court Denies Northwest Airlines Appeal In Key Antitrust Case (AP)

The Associated Press

AP, October 3, 2006

The Supreme Court Monday refused to consider a significant antitrust case involving Northwest Airlines and a low-cost competitor that could have set some rules for competition between large airlines and smaller, no-frills rivals.

The case, Northwest Airlines Corp. v. Spirit Airlines Inc., stems from a six-year-old Spirit Airlines suit in which Spirit charged that Northwest engaged in predatory pricing to force Spirit to drop two flights from Detroit, one to Boston, the other to Philadelphia. The case raises key antitrust issues, such as the type of evidence needed to prove that a company engaged in below-cost pricing to drive a competitor out of business.

A district court sided with Northwest, but the 6th U.S. Circuit Court of Appeals overturned the ruling and found for Spirit Airlines. But the Supreme Court Monday refused to hear the case due to procedural issues related to the timing of an appeal filed by Northwest. The airline filed a petition July 17 but the petition was removed from the court's docket because it was filed five days late.

Northwest asked the court to consider the case despite the late filing, but the court refused, issuing an order denying the "out-of-time" petition.

JUSTICES REFUSE TO HEAR GLORIA ALLRED CASE

The Supreme Court on Monday refused to step into a First Amendment issue involving Gloria Allred, a prominent California lawyer who was the subject of a judge's gag order in a high-profile murder case that is now over.

Allred, an outspoken television personality, represented a teenage girl who testified at the trial of Scott Dyleski, now 17. Dyleski was sentenced last week to life in prison without parole for the killing of Pamela Vitale, the wife of television legal analyst Daniel Horowitz.

Allred's client, Jena Reddy, is Dyleski's ex-girlfriend. She told the jury that while Dyleski never admitted or denied killing his neighbor, he told her he would take the blame to protect her and his best friend. Reddy also testified that hours after Vitale was slain, Dyleski told friends it would take at least three dozen blows to bludgeon someone and it would likely be a slow, painful death.

Late last year, amid intense media attention, a Superior Court judge in Contra Costa County, Calif., issued a gag order aimed at attorneys for witnesses in the case, as well as police, prosecutors and defense lawyers.

Allred's lawyers, including constitutional lawyer Erwin Chemerinsky, say judges increasingly are engaging in prior restraint of free speech rights in important cases.

The Supreme Court has never articulated a legal standard for when, if at all, gag orders on lawyers, parties and witnesses are permissible, said Allred's lawyers. They said that in the absence of guidance from the Supreme Court, judges have developed "quite different standards" on whether and when to gag the speech of attorneys, parties and witnesses.

Horowitz found his wife, who had been beaten to death, in the mobile home of a hilltop estate where the couple were building a California dream home, up the road from where Dyleski lived.

Allred also represented Amber Frey, the former lover and star witness against Scott Peterson, who is on death row for murdering his pregnant wife, Laci, in 2003.

The First Amendment case is Gloria Allred and Allred, Maroko & Goldberg v. Superior Court of the State of California, 05-1505.

HIGH COURT SIDES WITH FIRED NEWSPAPER WORKERS

The Supreme Court sided Monday with Detroit newspaper unions and employees who were fired for their actions during an 18-month strike in the mid-1990s.

Justices declined to hear the newspapers' appeal of a National Labor Relations Board ruling ordering the partnership that prints, distributes and sells advertising for The Detroit News and Detroit Free Press to reinstate fired employees.

DOJ_NMG_0073420

The workers lost their job after the newspapers said they blocked entrances at a distribution facility and the Detroit News Building in violation of court orders during the strike that ran from July 1995 to February 1997.

The labor relations board determined that the employees had not engaged in misconduct, but were instead exercising their right to strike. It ordered the employees reinstated with backpay.

The U.S. Court of Appeals for the D.C. Circuit upheld the board's ruling. Solicitor General Paul Clement, representing the labor relations board, urged justices not to take the appeal from the Detroit Newspaper Agency.

The Detroit News was owned by Gannett Co. during the strike, while the Detroit Free Press was owned by Knight-Ridder Newspapers Inc. The Free Press now belongs to Gannett and the News is owned by MediaNews Group Inc.

The case is Detroit Newspaper Agency v. National Labor Relations Board, 05-1427.

Supreme Court Rejects UnitedHealth Ohio Doctor Rate Appeal (MRKTWTCH)

Market Watch, October 3, 2006

WASHINGTON (MarketWatch) -- The U.S. Supreme Court Monday rejected an appeal from UnitedHealth Group Inc.'s (UNH) Ohio unit on whether doctors can go to court with antitrust challenges on reimbursement rates despite existing arbitration pacts.

UnitedHealth contends the Cincinnati area doctors are bound by arbitration clauses in the insurance agreements. Ohio state courts, however, have ruled the doctors can pursue their claims in court.

The doctors and two medical societies allege UnitedHealth and other insurance companies violated antitrust laws by conspiring to set unreasonably low insurance reimbursements to health-care providers. At issue in the case is whether the antitrust claims fall outside the contract requiring that disputes be handled through arbitration.

The case is UnitedHealth Care of Ohio v. Academy of Medicine of Cincinnati, 05-1465.

-Contact: 201-938-5400

Supreme Court Won't Hear Calif. Competition Case Against AT&T (MRKTWTCH)

By Mark H. Anderson

Market Watch, October 3, 2006

WASHINGTON (MarketWatch) -- The U.S. Supreme Court on Monday said it won't decide whether a California company can use state laws to sue AT&T Inc. (T) for alleged anticompetitive conduct in other states.

RLH Industries Inc., a surge-protection technology company in Orange, Calif., sued the telecommunications giant in a California court over restrictions in several states that prevented it from selling high voltage protection equipment to local phone companies in markets served by subsidiaries of AT&T.

The lawsuit remains pending in a California state trial court after a state appeals court allowed the case to continue. AT&T has argued constitutional limits on state interference with interstate commerce bar the lawsuit from proceeding.

"A state is and should be flatly forbidden from attempting to govern commerce occurring wholly outside that state," AT&T said in a court petition. "Under the decision below, California's antitrust and unfair competition laws would control markets throughout the country."

RLH Industries maintains that California state courts have jurisdiction to review anticompetitive practices by companies that impact it, even if those practices are taking place in other states. According to the RLH brief, lower courts are still considering some of the issues raised in the AT&T petition to the Supreme Court, making high court review premature.

The case is AT&T v. RLH Industries, 05-1493.

-Contact: 201-938-5400

Broadcom Seeks To Bar Qualcomm Chips In Patent Fight (Update4) (BLOOM)

By Peter J. Brennan And Susan Decker

Bloomberg, October 3, 2006

Oct. 2 (Bloomberg) -- The global patent battle between Qualcomm Inc. and Broadcom Corp. for supremacy in a fast-growing segment of the wireless-telephone industry may be decided in an obscure corner of the Washington bureaucracy.

DOJ_NMG_0073421

Broadcom, of Irvine, California, is asking an International Trade Commission official to decide next week to bar imports of handsets that use technology from San Diego-based Qualcomm. Broadcom says the Qualcomm technology, which provides high-speed Internet access and lets users view high-quality videos, violates patents on its chips.

The outcome of the fight may determine control of the U.S. market for so-called 3G, or third-generation, wireless phones, a market that topped $1 billion last year. The stakes are so high for both companies that some experts say they would be foolish not to reach a settlement, rather than risk an adverse decision.

``I can guarantee you that their customers are calling them every day and pushing them to settle," says Lyle Vander Schaaf, a patent lawyer with Bryan Cave in Washington who isn't involved in the dispute. Vander Schaaf is a former lawyer with the trade commission.

Charles Bullock, an administrative law judge at the commission, is due to decide on Oct. 10 whether the government should bar the Qualcomm-powered phones. Bullock's decision will be reviewed by the six-member commission, which is made up of three Republicans and three Democrats. After that, it may be challenged in a federal appeals court in Washington.

Stealth Agency

The commission, which is charged with protecting domestic markets from unfair trade practices and patent infringement, is ``sort of a stealth agency," says patent lawyer Charles F. Schill of Steptoe & Johnson in Washington, who handles cases before the agency. It ``can completely shut down your source of supply and just put you out of the market," he says.

In the past, the commission has blocked imports of knockoff Sharpie pens and some disposable cameras. In 2001, it persuaded President George W. Bush to impose tariffs of up to 40 percent to protect the U.S. steel industry.

The commission is just the latest front in the two-year-old patent fight between the two companies that began when Broadcom announced it was going to start competing with Qualcomm after the companies had worked together on a project. Broadcom and Qualcomm, the world's second-largest maker of chips for mobile phones, are battling in courtrooms and administrative agencies in Europe, South Korea and California.

A Stable of Supporters

Each combatant has enlisted a stable of big companies to support its cause.

In Qualcomm's corner are customers that use its chips in their phones, such as Seoul, South Korea-based LG Electronics Inc., and service providers such as Verizon Wireless -- a joint venture of Verizon Communications Inc. and Vodafone Plc -- and Sprint Nextel Corp. that distribute the phones to their customers. They say their products should be permitted in the U.S. even if the trade commission decides Qualcomm chips infringe Broadcom's patents.

Broadcom has the backing of Dallas-based Texas Instruments Inc., the world's biggest maker of cell-phone chips, and Espoo, Finland-based Nokia Oyj, the world's biggest maker of wireless phones.

Broadcom and its allies filed complaints with the European Commission claiming Qualcomm used its patents to create a dominant position for the advanced phones. Texas Instruments and Broadcom also have filed a complaint with the South Korean Fair Trade Commission. Broadcom also claimed that Qualcomm was using its patents to shut it out of the market. A judge threw out that antitrust suit in New Jersey, although Broadcom can seek to refile the complaint.

A Coordinated Assault?

The various cases have prompted Qualcomm to accuse its competitors of coordinating lawsuits and government investigations around the world, a charge Broadcom denies.

Qualcomm also is seeking an order today from U.S. District Judge Rudi Brewster in San Diego to prevent Broadcom from using trade secrets Qualcomm alleges were stolen. David Rosmann, a Broadcom spokesman, calls those charges ``false and incredible."

Broadcom got its start by selling chips for cable television set-top boxes and has expanded into such devices as computer switches, headsets and modems. The company's effort to expand into cellular phones has met with limited success, in devices such as Palm Inc.'s Treo 650 and with small Chinese makers such as Konka Group.

While Qualcomm's profit from royalties on all of its chips tripled -- to $1.66 billion -- between 2000 and 2005, its shares are down 13 percent this year on concern that it won't successfully renegotiate its license with Nokia, which sells one out of every three mobile phones in the world.

DOJ_NMG_0073422

Options Irregularities

Broadcom shares have fallen 1.9 percent this year as it restates results to reflect $1.5 billion in costs related to options irregularities.

The stock rose 51 cents to $30.85 at 4 p.m. New York time in Nasdaq Stock Market composite trading. Qualcomm shares fell $1.69, or 4.7 percent, to $34.66 in Nasdaq composite trading and have declined 20 percent this year.

The outcome in the ITC is anybody's guess. Qualcomm investors are betting against a commission decision to bar imports of the disputed phones: ``An injunction to not allow Qualcomm's chipsets inside the U.S. is pretty drastic," says John Krause, an analyst at Minneapolis-based Thrivent Financial for Lutherans, which manages $63 billion in assets including shares of Qualcomm.

On the other hand, Broadcom says it has an edge in the fight because commission staff attorneys have backed its patent-infringement claims -- and administrative law judges often follow the position taken by the staff attorneys.

If the two sides want to reach an accommodation, they'll have plenty of opportunities -- and not a little pressure -- to do so before the Oct. 10 ruling.

`In Earnest'

U.S. Magistrate Anthony Battaglia, hearing a related matter, has ordered the billionaire chairmen of the two companies -- Qualcomm's Irwin Jacobs, 72, and Broadcom's Henry Samueli, 52 -- to ``discuss a global resolution in earnest." The two are due to appear before Battaglia in San Diego on Oct. 4 to report on their progress.

While Qualcomm Chief Executive Paul Jacobs, Irwin Jacobs's son, said in a Sept. 27 interview that his company has offered to settle on terms that are ``extremely favorable" to Broadcom, there's still no deal.

Even with the commission decision looming, Broadcom and Qualcomm still have time to reach a settlement that would resolve their differences, says Ehud Gelblum, an analyst with JPMorgan Chase & Co. in New York. In a Sept. 28 note to clients, he said the companies have ``one last chance to kiss and make up."

To contact the reporters on this story: Susan Decker in Washington at sdecker1@bloomberg.net ; Peter J. Brennan in Los Angeles at pbrennan3@bloomberg.net .

Harrah's Gets $15B Private Equity Bid (USAT)

By Roger Yu And Matt Krantz

USA Today, October 3, 2006

Harrah's Entertainment, the world's largest casino operator, was considering Monday an unsolicited $15 billion joint takeover bid from private equity firms Apollo Management and Texas Pacific Group.

The bid is the latest in a string of large deals sought by private equity firms, which combine debt, investors' money and their own funds to buy undervalued companies and resell them for profit.

If completed, it would be the third-largest private buyout this year of a U.S. company, says deal tracker Dealogic. Bigger takeovers this year: hospital operator HCA and tech company Freescale Semiconductor.

In a statement, Las Vegas-based Harrah's said it has formed a committee of board members to review the proposal to buy the company for $81 a share in cash, a 22% premium over Harrah's Friday close. “There is no assurance that Harrah's will enter into this or any other transaction,” the statement said.

Apollo couldn't be reached. Texas Pacific Group declined comment. In Monday trading, investors bid up Harrah's shares by 14%. They closed at $75.68.

In acquiring Harrah's, the private equity firms could get an undervalued company in a fast-growing industry. Harrah's operates about 40 casinos in Las Vegas, Atlantic City and other cities. Holdings include Caesars Palace in Las Vegas, Harrah's Las Vegas and Bally's, Horseshoe, Showboat and other brands.

“They traded at a relative discount compared to its peer group,” says Rod Petrick, an analyst at broker Stifel Nicolaus.

The gaming industry also has been active this year with mergers and acquisitions — 58 deals, Dealogic says.

But private equity firms have stayed away from gaming companies, says Peter Fitzpatrick of law firm Bryan Cave. Making them attractive now: They're flush with cash and can generate predictable returns.

DOJ_NMG_0073423

The annual gaming revenue for U.S. commercial casinos rose to $30.3 billion last year, nearly doubling in 10 years. Harrah's has added to its appeal by buying Caesars Entertainment in 2004, which broadened its reach into more upscale customers. It also runs one of the industry's best guest-loyalty programs, Petrick says.

Its shares have fallen in recent months partly because it has been unsuccessful in penetrating Asia, the hottest emerging market for gaming, says Jake Balzer, an analyst at Guzman & Co. Harrah's has no presence in Macau, the largest Asian market, and lost a bid for a gaming license issued by Singapore earlier this year.

Balzer says, "The deal doesn't make a whole lot of sense" for the company because it would stifle Harrah's growth.

Licenses Are The Biggest Hurdle To A Deal For Harrah's (WSJ)

By Peter Sanders

The Wall Street Journal, October 3, 2006

While Harrah's Entertainment Inc. considers a roughly $15.1 billion offer from private-equity firms Apollo Management and Texas Pacific Group, the biggest hurdle to a deal may be the long and arduous process of obtaining casino licenses in the many jurisdictions where Harrah's operates.

The companies yesterday confirmed the $81-a-share offer for Harrah's, the world's largest gambling operator by revenue. The offer represented a 22% premium over the company's closing price of $66.43 a share Friday. Also, Harrah's has about $10.8 billion in debt.

Harrah's, Las Vegas, said it had formed a special committee of nonmanagement directors to review the proposal. The company said, "The special committee has not determined that a transaction is in the best interests of Harrah's and its stockholders. ... Accordingly, there is no assurance that Harrah's will enter into this or any other transaction."

WALL STREET JOURNAL VIDEO

Reporter Peter Sanders discusses1 the complexities of the deal and why it may not be in shareholders' best interest.

It is unclear whether other suitors will emerge. But for potential buyers, the attraction of Harrah's may not lie only in its existing casinos -- which comprise Caesars Palace and other properties -- but also in its real-estate holdings in Las Vegas and elsewhere. The company owns more than 350 acres around the Las Vegas Strip alone, said Charles Atwood, Harrah's vice chairman.

Harrah's intends for some of that land to be part of a major redevelopment on the Strip that would include new hotels, retail and entertainment venues as well as casinos. Harrah's has for months been consolidating its land holdings for that project, a process that continued yesterday when it announced a land swap with Boyd Gaming Corp. that gives it the Barbary Coast casino site in exchange for 24 acres near Boyd's Stardust casino. With land on the Strip recently going for more than $23 million an acre, the real estate is attractive.

Beyond Las Vegas, Harrah's has a trove of casino properties in a dozen states. It is possible that an acquisition of Harrah's could lead to a breakup of the company that would see Harrah's casinos sold piecemeal.

But the biggest wrinkle could involve licensing for any new owners and the time it could take. Neither Apollo nor Texas Pacific executives hold gambling licenses. Individual states issue licenses to casino owners and operators, subjecting applicants to detailed investigations. Officials from Nevada, New Jersey and Missouri -- all states where Harrah's operates casinos -- estimate the licensing process could take as long as two years. Such licensing investigations usually delve deeply into financial and criminal backgrounds of the applicants.

But Apollo and Texas Pacific have already begun exploring the options with various state regulators. On Sept. 15, officials in Missouri received a detailed request from Las Vegas attorney Frank Schreck outlining a potential acquisition of an unnamed public company by three private firms.

In an interview, Mr. Schreck said he was hired by Apollo, Texas Pacific and a third firm to explore the regulatory options in various states. Mr. Schreck said he received a waiver from Harrah's, which is also a client, to work with the private-equity firms. He declined to name the third firm, although he confirmed the third entity was based in Great Britain but has dropped out.

DOJ_NMG_0073424

The rules that dictate who holds casino licenses vary by state. In Nevada, for instance, officers, directors, controlling shareholders and anyone with more than a 10% stake must apply for a casino license. At closely held concerns, the state requires every shareholder to hold a casino license, said Dennis Neilander, chairman of the Nevada Gaming Control Board.

The private firms seeking to buy Harrah's could be helped by waivers often granted to institutional investors that exempt them from the licensing process, according to state regulators and Mr. Schreck.

Traditionally, private equity has shied away from major casino investments because of the heavy regulatory scrutiny. But in recent years, private equity has begun to seek out deeper investment in the sector. The first was Colony Capital of Los Angeles, which isn't involved in the current deal. It was granted a casino license in 1999 when it bought the Harveys Casino Resorts chain. In that case, Nevada awarded casino licenses to Colony's Thomas Barrack and Kelvin Davis, who were then deemed the casino's "beneficial owners," Mr. Neilander said. Nonvoting shareholders who were "basically passive investors concerned only with the assets' income" weren't required to be licensed.

Mr. Davis has since left Colony and is now a partner at Texas Pacific. He would have to reapply for a casino license if his firm acquires Harrah's.

Despite the difficulty and complexity of any take-out by private equity, investors sent the stock soaring on the news. Harrah's shares were up $9.25, or 14%, to $75.68 apiece in 4 p.m. New York Stock Exchange composite trading. Analysts said a potential deal could be a good option for the gambling company.

"We believe that Harrah's board of directors is hard-pressed to come up with an alternative equity value creating plan to rival this proposal," Joe Greff, a casino analyst at Bear Stearns in New York, wrote in a research note. "We suspect the board of directors will just seek a higher price, citing its global development pipeline and Las Vegas land bank as a reason that the current proposal is inadequate."

--Randall Smith contributed to this article.

Write to Peter Sanders at peter.sanders@wsj.com2

Not Our Bag, Coach Says In A Lawsuit Alleging Target Sold Counterfeit Purse (WSJ)

By Vanessa O'Connell, Kris Hudson

The Wall Street Journal, October 3, 2006

Target Corp. has thrived by selling stylish apparel and accessories on the cheap. But handbag maker Coach Inc. is accusing the big-box retailer of crossing the line by marketing a fake Coach bag.

In a lawsuit filed in federal court in Manhattan Friday, Coach alleged that Target was a counterfeiter by selling a Coach-style purse, complete with a hang tag that says "Coach," according to Coach Chief Financial Officer Mike Devine. The allegedly fake bag has Coach's signature C-pattern and a touch of snakeskin-like fabric in the center of the bag, according to a photo of it included in the lawsuit. The bag, purchased from a Target store in Largo, Fla., is an "exact replica of a genuine Coach handbag" bearing at least one Coach trademark, the suit says.

Target, which isn't a licensed distributor of Coach products, said the bag in question is an authentic version and therefore the suit is without merit.

"Target has procedures in place to ensure that we do not sell counterfeit products to our guests," Target said in a statement. "We have been assured that the Coach product showcased in our store is authentic therefore we believe the lawsuit is without merit."

A subsequent message to The Wall Street Journal said "we are not providing any more information than what is in the statement."

Coach said the bag was sold at Target for about $200 -- less than the original Coach bag, but far more than Target bags usually sell for. The original bag was called the Python Signature Striped Demi. It was offered by Coach about a year ago, but is no longer in the product offering.

The Coach suit is seeking at least $1 million as well as information about where the bag was made. "This is a counterfeit," Mr. Devine says. "We have gone into stores in Florida and purchased this ourselves. It isn't ours."

DOJ_NMG_0073425

The suit illustrates a new aggressiveness on the part of luxury-goods companies to hold retailers responsible for suspected instances of counterfeiting of their high-end products. Mr. Devine says this is the first time Coach has sued a major U.S. retailer over counterfeits. Last month, French luxury-goods brands Louis Vuitton and Dior Couture filed a complaint in a French court against eBay Inc., alleging the online auctioneer isn't doing enough to keep people from selling counterfeit goods through its site. That suit, which seeks an estimated $47 million in damages, alleges that nine out of every 10 Louis Vuitton brand items for sale on eBay are counterfeit. (Louis Vuitton is owned by LVMH Moet Hennessy Louis Vuitton SA. Christian Dior SA, the holding company of luxury-goods mogul Bernard Arnault, controls LVMH and owns Dior Couture.)

Designers and manufacturers are getting more assertive about protecting their brands and designs, in part because of a bill that would protect fashion trademarks from uses that blur their distinctiveness or tarnish their reputations. The bill was recently passed by the Senate and is headed to President Bush's desk.

Fashion designers also are pushing for separate federal legislation that would offer three years of copyright-like protection for designs ranging from dresses and shoes to belts and eyeglass frames. Peter Raymond, partner at the New York office of the law firm Reed Smith LLP says the legislative push has "given some confidence to a number of manufacturers" to take new measures to fight infringements of their design.

Putting a well-known trademark like Coach on a bag isn't considered copying but counterfeiting and would be illegal under current laws, Mr. Raymond says. He says the bag might have wound up at Target through the "gray goods" market, in which genuine brand-name products get beyond their usual chain of distribution and make their way to store shelves.

Though Coach has encountered other instances of stores selling Coach counterfeit goods, those stores were "usually small mom-and-pops" against which Coach sought criminal actions, working with police, Mr. Devine says. "What we don't see is reputable retailers selling counterfeits, which is what is so surprising about the Target situation," he said.

The Coach lawsuit against Target is the latest in a string of designer brands suing large retailers for alleged trademark infringement. Coach itself sued department-store chain Kohl's Corp. earlier this year, accusing Kohl's of infringing on its trademarks for its Sonoma handbags, among other goods. LVMH's Fendi brand sued Wal-Mart Stores Inc. in June for allegedly selling counterfeit Fendi handbags at its Sam's Club warehouses.

Sometimes, the manufacturers win. In 1999, Wal-Mart agreed to pay Tommy Hilfiger Corp. $6.4 million to settle a lawsuit alleging it sold fake Hilfiger apparel.

In its suit against Target, Coach cited more than 20 trademarks that it registered from the years 1963 to 2005, including the signature Coach hang tag to distinctive patterns of open-ended ovals on its fabrics.

Sales of the allegedly fake Coach bag aren't the only issue Coach has with Target. Mr. Devine says Coach in the past had discovered Target knocking off its bags. "We had in the past been able to reach an agreement with them to stop selling the bags," he says.

As recently as Sept. 21, Mr. Devine says, Coach sent Target a letter regarding an Isaac Mizrahi tote bag that was sold under the Isaac brand but allegedly infringed on one of Coach's existing styles. Then, in the past week to 10 days, Coach learned of another item under Target's Cherokee label that was using Coach's so-called Optic C design and retails for $11.89 compared with $170 and up for Coach bags.

Coach has a signature "C" fabrication, with interlocking Cs, as well as a more abstract version called Optic C, Mr. Devine says, and it has trademark protection on both. Neither the Isaac Mizrahi nor the Cherokee purse is mentioned in the suit, however.

"Success frequently breeds imitation and counterfeiting, so naturally we're seeing more activity" in the realm of knockoffs, says Mr. Devine.

Gilead Agrees To Buy Myogen For $2.5 Billion (WSJ)

By Angela Moore, Bob Sechler

The Wall Street Journal, October 3, 2006

DOJ_NMG_0073426

Biopharmaceuticals company Gilead Sciences Inc. agreed to acquire Myogen Inc. for about $2.5 billion, a move aimed at gaining ownership of the biotechnology company's lead product candidate, a potential treatment for pulmonary arterial hypertension.

The $52.50-a-share offer is a 50% premium over Myogen's share price of $35.08 on Friday. The Westminster, Colo., company's shares rose 47%, or $16.36, to $51.44, while Gilead shares were off $4.49, or 6.5%, at $64.28, both as of 4 p.m. in Nasdaq Stock Market composite trading.

With the transaction, the Foster City, Calif., company would acquire Myogen's main drug candidate, Ambrisentan, a treatment for pulmonary arterial hypertension that is in late-stage clinical trials. Pulmonary hypertension involves a narrowing of blood vessels in the lung, making it difficult for the heart to pump blood through the lungs and causing shortness of breath even when resting.

Myogen expects to file a new-drug application for Ambrisentan with the Food and Drug Administration as early as the fourth quarter, Gilead said. British drug maker GlaxoSmithKline PLC holds rights to the product outside the U.S.

Get alerts for breaking news -- such as Fed moves, major world events and big mergers -- delivered straight to your desktop. Alerts will appear in a small window on your screen, much like an instant-messaging window. See a sample and get more information.2

Executives from Gilead said that the "scarcity value" of a drug in late-stage testing that addresses an unmet medical need justified the premium price offered for Myogen.

"We felt that the premium was a fair value for what we were doing here, and that this was in fact a product that we could build a franchise around," Gilead Chief Financial Officer John Milligan said.

Datamonitor, a business-information provider based in London, estimated in March that the market for pulmonary hypertension treatments could grow to around $2 billion by 2014 from $636 million in 2004, driven by new treatments. Ambrisentan is expected to lead that market with sales topping $500 million by 2014, Datamonitor said.

The current market leader for treatment of pulmonary hypertension is Tracleer from Swiss pharmaceuticals company Actelion Ltd.

Gilead Chief Executive John Martin said Tracleer had $339 million in sales during the first half of 2006.

"We believe we have a product with a stronger profile" that can take market share as well as grow with overall demand, he said.

About 88,000 people in the U.S. have pulmonary arterial hypertension, according to Gilead, but only 30% are diagnosed and even fewer are receiving treatment. About 5,000 new patients are diagnosed each year.

Write to Angela Moore at angela.moore@dowjones.com3 and Bob Sechler at bob.sechler@dowjones.com

Gilead Plans To Acquire Myogen In $2.5B Deal (USAT/AP)

USA Today, October 3, 2006

DENVER — Gilead Sciences, a leading producer of HIV drugs, said Monday that it plans to acquire biotech Myogen for about $2.5 billion in cash, signaling an expansion into treatments for pulmonary diseases.

Gilead agreed to pay Myogen shareholders $52.50 per share, a premium of 50% over the stock's closing price Friday of $35.08 a share. Myogen's stock hit a 52-week high, while Gilead's shares closed down 6.5% Monday.

The news caught many off guard, not only for the acquisition price but because it represented a shift for Gilead out of its area of expertise in infectious diseases.

Sanford C. Bernstein analyst Geoff Porges said the offer indicates a possible bidding war for Myogen and also reflects the scarcity of late-stage drugs in the pulmonary disease category. “It's a very generous offer,” he said.

During a conference call with analysts, Gilead President and Chief Executive Officer John Martin said the acquisition will help Gilead build on its $365 million buyout of privately held Corus Pharma in August.

“Our planned acquisition of Myogen represents both a scientific and strategic step,” Martin said.

DOJ_NMG_0073427

Gilead, a Foster City, Calif.-based biopharmaceutical company with a market value of $29.2 billion, is known for its HIV drugs. It manufactures two of the three drugs in a once-a-day pill called Atripla that was approved last summer for HIV and AIDS treatment. The company also makes the Tamiflu flu treatment.

Gilead posted second-quarter net income of $265 million, or 56 cents per share, up 34% from $196 million, or 41 cents per share, in the previous second quarter. The company credited the jump to strong sales of its HIV treatments.

Myogen, a 10-year-old biopharm based in the Denver suburb of Westminster, had a market value of about $2.2 billion as of Monday. It posted a net loss of $18.5 million, or 44 cents a share, in the second quarter compared with a net loss of $21.7 million, or 61 cents a share, in the second quarter of 2005.

Myogen is developing a drug called Ambrisentan to treat pulmonary arterial hypertension. It believes information developed from two studies will support a new drug application that it expects to file with the Food and Drug Administration by year's end.

It also has a drug for treatment of primary pulmonary hypertension and a late-stage study for a drug that could treat resistant hypertension.

Argus Research analyst David Coleman, who follows Myogen, said Gilead likely will be able to capitalize on the drug better than Myogen.

"I do believe it is a very good deal for Myogen shareholders," he said.

In a research note to clients, Piper Jaffray analyst Thomas Wei said Gilead will be able to draw on its marketing expertise to build buyers for Ambrisentan.

The deal is structured in two phases, with Myogen slated to become a wholly owned subsidiary of Gilead. Myogen's board approved the deal, which is expected to close by the end of the year, pending regulatory and other standard approvals.

Gilead said the deal will boost earnings in 2007 and 2008. It does not expect Myogen to add to 2009 profit.

Myogen stock rose $16.36, or 47%, to close at $51.44 a share in Nasdaq trading. It has traded between $17.96 a share and $42.27 a share in the past year.

Shares of Gilead fell $4.49 or 6.5%, to close at $64.28 in trading on the Nasdaq. In the past year, it has traded between $44.73 a share and $68.77 a share.

You've Got It Backward: Intel Is Bullying AMD (WSJ)

By Thomas M. McCoy

Wall Street Journal, October 3, 2006

In his Sept. 23 Rule of Law column "Tigers by the Tail," Ron Cass asserts that Advanced Micro Devices is attempting to "restrain a dominant competitor through the courts than beat it in the market." This brief for Intel is wrong. AMD is an innovation leader working as hard as it can to win in the market; the only thing missing is a competitive market free from monopoly abuse. AMD is the company leading consumer choice and value, not vice versa.

It is not competition when Intel pays a computer maker millions of dollars to cancel a new product containing AMD CPUs or when Intel threatens them with retaliation if they publicly support new AMD products. And the list of Intel tricks goes on. That's why computer makers tell us, "We think that you have great products and we wish that we could buy more of them but Intel prevents us from doing so."

The Japan Fair Trade Commission has already found that Intel violated its antitrust laws by imposing illegal, exclusive contracts on computer manufacturers. The Korean FTC is investigating and last year the European Commission gathered evidence via dawn raids about Intel's behavior. Most recently, the Financial Times Deutschland revealed the existence of an illegal and secret deal between Intel and Germany's largest retailer, Media Markt, to exclude AMD from the consumer segment.

Despite its technology leadership, AMD has reached only 18% revenue share of the microprocessor market and, not surprisingly, most of its recent gain came after the ruling in Japan, AMD's lawsuit in the U.S. and the European Commission's dawn raids.

Thomas M. McCoy

Executive Vice President, Legal Affairs, and Chief Administrative Officer

AMD (Advanced Micro Devices)

DOJ_NMG_0073428

Sunnyvale, Calif.

Competition And Antitrust Law Can Protect The Internet (HILL)

By Robert W. Hahn And Robert E. Litan

The Hill, October 3, 2006

If you doubt the effectiveness of simple slogans, the current debate over net neutrality should change your mind. As the heat of the rhetoric rises, the quality of the information has declined.

The "net neutrality" controversy centers on whether firms providing higher-speed broadband should be allowed to charge both the content providers and consumers for faster, more reliable service — pitting Silicon Valley firms like Google and eBay against the telecommunications and cable industries (which rarely find themselves on the same side, this being a notable exception).

On examination, however, one truth is clear – while both sides are prone to hyperbole and exaggeration, net neutrality enthusiasts are also just plain wrong. And the error is dangerous. If the net neutrality proponents prevail, it is less likely that phone and cable companies that operate most of the Internet pipes will have sufficient economic incentives to build needed new capacity.

Net neutrality enthusiasts believe that if Internet service providers are allowed to charge content providers like CNN.com, they will block websites for their own private gain—thus crippling the Internet. Those opposing net neutrality assert the opposite—that pricing freedom is the key to Internet innovation and the deployment of the expanded networks needed to handle rapidly growing Internet traffic.

The fact is, pricing freedom is a key to the success of the Internet. And, existing government oversight, including antitrust authority, is sufficient to rein in any potential anticompetitive behavior in those unlikely circumstances where market forces fail.

Lost in the incredibly contentious net neutrality debate in Congress and the media is the role that competition and antitrust law should play in assuring that consumers continue to have access to their preferred websites. Although net neutrality proponents have loudly complained about the danger that an Internet service provider would block access to websites they compete with or whose views they don't like, there are to date no real life examples that this has occurred (except where governments, like the one in China, block certain traffic). The reason is competition.

Network providers know that if they block access to a favored web site, their customers' swift and sure response will be to take their business elsewhere. And, in the unlikely event that a provider risks alienating its customers, the Department of Justice, the Federal Communications Commission and the Federal Trade Commission have ample legal authority under existing laws to stop the offending practice.

That is why Congress created these agencies, and already has instructed them to ensure that communications (and other) firms play fair. The FCC has already used that authority to slap down one local North Carolina Internet Service Provider, Madison River, for blocking Internet-based phone service offered by Vonage. And there remains the ability of private parties to enforce the antitrust laws – encouraged by the prospect of treble damages. Indeed, Google has recently warned that it may bring antitrust actions against Internet service providers that abuse their market power. What better evidence can there be that current law is sufficient?

Why not add even more legislative language to require regulators to issue even more rules to ensure that all Internet providers treat all websites equally? Because of another "law" – the law of unintended consequences. Net neutrality regulations could very well interfere with the carriers' abilities to enhance the capacity of their broadband networks by limiting their ability to get an adequate return on investment. This, in turn, could chill innovations ranging from telemedicine to those we could only predict with hindsight, such as eBay or Google.

Rather than heavy-handed government mandates that presume to know the best way for the Internet to evolve, we should continue to keep the "hands-off" policy that has enabled the Internet to become the powerful engine of innovation we enjoy today. The genius of competition, backed by long-standing and proven laws that block the abuse of corporate power, has worked in the past. It should be allowed to work in the future.

Hahn and Litan are directors of the AEI-Brookings Joint Center for Regulatory Studies.

DOJ_NMG_0073429

ENVIRONMENT:

Supreme Court To Take On Con Ed Case (AP)

AP, October 3, 2006

WASHINGTON — The Supreme Court indicated Monday that it is likely to consider a case involving New York City-based utility Consolidated Edison Inc. and its efforts to require UGI Utilities, a subsidiary of UGI Corp., to help pay for the environmental cleanup of several gas power plants.

The court requested an opinion on the matter from the Justice Department's Solicitor General, which usually indicates that the court will consider the matter during its current term.

The case addresses the issue of whether Con Ed can sue UGI Utilities in order to recover a share of the cleanup costs related to several gas power plants currently owned by Con Ed. The company argued that UGI formerly owned and operated the plants. UGI has countered that under the federal "Superfund" law, Con Ed cannot seek to recover costs from UGI, because Con Ed has not resolved its liability for the cleanup with the state.

The case is UGI Utilities v. Consolidated Edison Co. of New York, Inc. (05-1323).

Shares of Con Ed rose 24 cents to $46.44 in midday trading on the New York Stock Exchange. Shares of UGI jumped 12 cents to $24.57 on the NYSE.

U.S. To Delay Buying Strategic-Reserve Oil (WSJ)

The Wall Street Journal, October 3, 2006

WASHINGTON -- The Department of Energy will delay purchasing oil to fill the nation's Strategic Petroleum Reserve until after the winter-heating season, a spokesman said yesterday.

President Bush had ordered the department to halt filling the emergency crude stockpile ahead of the summer-driving season, when gasoline prices edged up to nominal highs.

Last year, the U.S. sold crude from the reserve -- a federal oil depository of 727 million barrels designed to cushion the country against supply disruptions and subsequent petroleum price rises -- to meet emergency demand in the wake of a destructive hurricane season. In June, the reserve held almost 688 million barrels of oil.

Spokesman Craig Stevens said the department had agreed to hold off collecting 1.7 million barrels owed to it from oil companies until the second quarter of 2007. Given that the department is "satisfied with the [reserve's] current level," and that it was wary of affecting the market ahead of the high-demand winter-heating season, "we have no plans currently to use the $600 million [from last year's oil sale] to fill the reserve."

He said if the department decides to start buying crude, it would be done during a period of months to minimize the impact on the market.

FBI/DEA/ATF/USMS:

Court Upholds Polygraph Tests For FBI, Secret Service Applicants (AP)

By Matt Apuzzo

AP, October 3, 2006

WASHINGTON - The FBI and Secret Service may keep using lie-detector tests to screen potential employees, a federal judge ruled Monday.

U.S. District Judge Emmet G. Sullivan's ruling ends a six-year lawsuit brought by six applicants who failed polygraph tests and were denied jobs. They said the policy violated their rights to privacy and due process.

The Secret Service has required polygraph tests for potential agents since 1985. All FBI employees have been tested since 1994.

DOJ_NMG_0073430

Applicants are asked questions about their medical histories, finances, sex lives, drug use and mental health. Secret Service applicants are asked whether they have committed adultery or other sex crimes.

While those questions are personal, Sullivan said, they're not an unconstitutional invasion of privacy. Because the applicants sought positions of public trust, the agencies have the right to inquire about the backgrounds of their agents, he said.

"With regard to the Secret Service's specific questions, the agency has made a reasonable determination that there is a danger if its employees in sensitive positions could be blackmailed for some reason," Sullivan wrote. "The court will not second-guess that conclusion."

Four of the six applicants who brought the case probably were turned down based on their answers to drug-related questions, according to court documents. All denied using drugs.

"Three people know you're lying: me, you and God," a Secret Service polygraph agent said to one applicant, according to court documents.

"No, God and I know I'm telling the truth," the applicant, Eileen Moynahan replied.

A fifth applicant was denied because she had lied about marijuana use on a Baltimore police application, prosecutors said. The sixth applicant was accused of holding his breath to try to beat the polygraph.

The lawsuit claimed the tests are unreliable, yet there is no way for applicants to clear their name. They said the stigma attached to failing the test would prevent them from getting other law enforcement jobs.

Sullivan denied that claim, noting that some of the applicants who brought the lawsuit now work in federal law enforcement jobs.

"Ultimately this will be an issue for the Supreme Court or Congress to take care of," attorney Mark Zaid said.

Ex-FBI Agent Gets 6 Years In Stock Case (WSJ)

The Wall Street Journal, October 3, 2006

NEW YORK -- Former Federal Bureau of Investigation special agent Jeffrey Royer was sentenced to a six-year imprisonment for his role in a stock-manipulation case involving a handful of penny-stock companies.

Mr. Royer also was sentenced to three years of supervised release.

He was found guilty of racketeering conspiracy and securities fraud in 2005 along with short-seller Anthony Elgindy. The government accused the two men of using confidential FBI information to depress the shares of companies that Mr. Elgindy and members of his online investment group sold short -- or bet against using borrowed shares.

"Elgindy was the master manipulator," said Judge Raymond Dearie of U.S. District Court in Brooklyn. But "without this chap and the information he sold, we would have no conspiracy."

Mr. Elgindy was sentenced to more than 11 years in prison and ordered to forfeit $1.5 million in June.

6-Year Sentence In Trading Case (NYT)

By Bloomberg News

The New York Times, October 3, 2006

By Bloomberg News

A federal judge in Brooklyn sentenced a former F.B.I. agent yesterday to six years in prison for racketeering and securities fraud related to the inside-trading prosecution of a former stock picker, Anthony Elgindy.

The former agent, Jeffrey A. Royer, 39, who was convicted after a trial with Mr. Elgindy, will be allowed to surrender to federal prison authorities by Nov. 6, said Robert Nardoza, a spokesman for the United States attorney for Brooklyn, Roslynn R. Mauskopf.

Mr. Royer was an F.B.I. agent from 1996 to December 2001, when he left to work for Mr. Elgindy, prosecutors said.

In June, Mr. Elgindy was sentenced to 11 years and 3 months in prison and ordered to forfeit $1.5 million for using inside information to make short sales and extort money from companies he criticized in an online newsletter. He was convicted last year of racketeering conspiracy, securities fraud, wire fraud and extortion. According to witnesses at the trial, Mr. Elgindy used information supplied by Mr. Royer, then an F.B.I. agent, to spread negative publicity about companies through his Web site, AnthonyPacific.com.

DOJ_NMG_0073431

Prosecutors say Mr. Royer also supplied Mr. Elgindy with information about investigations of companies by the F.B.I. and the Securities and Exchange Commission.

Mr. Royer's lawyer, Lawrence D. Gerzog, did not return a call made to his office after business hours seeking comment.

Short sellers seek to profit by correctly predicting a decline in a stock's price. They sell borrowed shares, planning to buy them later at a lower price and return them to holders. Mr. Elgindy's gains from trading shares of 32 companies using illegally leaked information totaled $3.02 million, the government said.

Ex-agent Gets 6 Years In Fraud (NSDY)

By Anthony M. Destefano, Newsday Staff Writer

Long Island Newsday, October 3, 2006

Calling it a tragic case of a public official gone wrong, a federal judge in Brooklyn sentenced a former FBI agent to 6 years in prison yesterday for tipping off a Web-based stock market adviser with inside law enforcement information.

The former agent, Jeffrey Royer, betrayed no emotion as Judge Raymond Dearie sentenced him for his January 2005 conviction.

Dearie gave Royer, who remains free on bail, until Nov. 6 to surrender to a designated federal prison.

"We must ask more of our public officials, we must," said Dearie as he sentenced Royer, 43, for conspiracy, securities fraud, racketeering, witness tampering and other crimes.

Royer was convicted with stock trader Amr Elgindy for plotting to use information about FBI investigations of companies in order to profit on the stock market.

Prosecutors charged that Elgindy, who ran a subscription-based Web site, used information leaked to him by Royer to shake down companies that were the object of negative reports by his Web service.

Elgindy, of southern California was sentenced to 13 years in prison earlier this year. Dearie said that Elgindy orchestrated the scheme, dangling the prospect of a job and other benefits to entice Royer.

Dearie noted that, without Royer's involvement, the stock schemes and extortion wouldn't have happened, although he said Royer shouldn't be held responsible for Elgindy's shakedown attempts.

Early in the case, investigators speculated that Elgindy, of Egyptian ancestry, might have had advance warning about the Sept. 11 terror attacks because of the timing of his trades, but that never was substantiated.

Just before sentencing, Royer said he leaked the information because he thought he was helping to put shady companies out of business.

The former agent apologized to his family and also to his ex-girlfriend, Lynn Wingate. Prosecutors said she was another FBI agent whom Royer persuaded to continue to leak him confidential information after he left the FBI in 2001 to work for Elgindy.

"She trusted and loved me," Royer said about Wingate, who pleaded guilty to obstruction of justice charges and received 3 years' probation in July.

City Briefs (NYDN)

New York Daily News, October 3, 2006

A man walking on the upper East Side was struck and killed yesterday by an SUV that sent him flying 30 feet, witnesses said.

"I saw something flying through the air, and I didn't know what it was. Then I thought, 'My God, that's a dude!'" said Hank Ley, 33, a doorman near the scene at 90th St. and York Ave.

The driver stayed at thescene, witnesses said. The 56-year-old victim, Yao Huang of W. 24th St., was taken to New York-Presbyterian Hospital Weill Cornell, where he was pronounced dead, officials said.

Christina Boyle and Michael White

Crane accident violations

The Tishman Construction Corp. and others involved in a near-fatal crane accident last week were socked with violations yesterday for "unsafe operation of a crane."

An 8,000-pound chunk of a tower crane that was being disassembled fell from the 21st floor of an apartment building under construction at 108 Third Ave. at 13th St. on Friday.

"Tishman Construction will do anything in its power to provide any and all information required or asked for by the Department of Buildings and the Office of Emergency Management," said Tishman spokesman Bud Perrone.

Frank Lombardi

B'klyn deliveryman shot

A man delivering merchandise to a Brooklyn 99-cent store was shot in the chest yesterday by a thug who accosted him near his truck and demanded his wallet, police said.

The unidentified 27-year-old victim was in stable condition after the 11:15 a.m. shooting in Flatbush. Police said he was trying to hand over his wallet when the gunman shot him.

Noah Fowle and Ernie Naspretto

G-man gets 6 for scam

An ex-FBI agent was sentenced yesterday to six years in prison for passing confidential information to rogue insider trader Amr (Anthony Pacific) Elgindy.

Jeffrey Royer, who quit the FBI in 2001, furnished Elgindy with criminal histories and ongoing investigations of executives that Elgindy posted on his Web site to force stock prices of companies down.

John Marzulli

Inaccuracies Have To Do With Names In Times Report (ESPN)

ESPN.com, October 3, 2006

SAN FRANCISCO -- The federal prosecutor overseeing an investigation of steroids in baseball said Monday that a newspaper report indicating that five players, including Roger Clemens, had used illegal performance-enhancing drugs contained "significant inaccuracies."

The inaccuracies have to do with the names as they appear in the report, a spokesman for San Francisco U.S. Attorney Kevin Ryan said. The spokesman did not elaborate.

Citing sealed court filings, the Los Angeles Times reported that former pitcher Jason Grimsley had named Clemens, his Houston Astros teammate Andy Pettitte, and Baltimore Orioles Miguel Tejada, Brian Roberts and Jay Gibbons. The story first appeared on the Times' Web site on Saturday and was quickly seized on by print and broadcast media outlets.

Ryan issued a statement Monday, saying: "In view of the recent news reports purporting to identify certain athletes whose names had been redacted from the government's search warrant filings in the Grimsley matter, and in the interests of justice, please be advised that these reports contain significant inaccuracies."

A spokesman for the Times had no immediate comment. The newspaper reported that an unidentified source with access to the document allowed the newspaper to view it, and a second source provided additional details about the document.

Federal agents raided Grimsley's Arizona home in June after the pitcher admitted using human growth hormone, steroids and amphetamines. The pitcher later was released by the Arizona Diamondbacks.

In a search warrant affidavit, IRS Special Agent Jeff Novitzky said Grimsley had identified the other players as drug users. Those names were blacked out when the document was originally released.

All five players immediately denounced the story, with Clemens calling it "dangerous and malicious and reckless."

"As I have said all along, and as Andy and Roger said quite clearly yesterday, they have never used performance-enhancing drugs," Randy Hendricks, the agent for Pettitte and Clemens, said Monday.

He added that Clemens "signed up to play for his country in the World Baseball Classic this year and submitted to Olympic standard testing, including blood work, and then went out and had another good year for the Astros."

Grimsley played with Clemens and Pettitte on the New York Yankees, and is now out of baseball. The reliever has admitted using a variety of banned substances and was suspended for 50 games by Major League Baseball.

Information from The Associated Press was used in this report.

GRIMSLEY AND HGH

Former Diamondbacks pitcher Jason Grimsley told federal investigators in June he used illegal performance-enhancing drugs. A day after they searched his house, Grimsley asked for and was granted his release from the team.

Doubt Cast On Report That Named Players (NYT)

By Jack Curry

The New York Times, October 3, 2006

Two days after it was reported that Roger Clemens was among the six major league players who investigators said had been identified as having used performance-enhancing substances, a federal prosecutor said the news media coverage contained "significant inaccuracies."

The Los Angeles Times reported late Saturday that Clemens, a seven-time Cy Young Award winner; Andy Pettitte, Clemens's teammate and workout partner with the Houston Astros; Miguel Tejada of the Baltimore Orioles; and three other current or former Orioles were reportedly named by Jason Grimsley, a former pitcher, as players who had used the drugs. The names were blacked out in a federal affidavit that was made public in June.

But Kevin V. Ryan, the United States attorney for the Northern District of California who is investigating steroids in baseball, issued a brief statement that cast some doubt on what was in The Times's article.

"In view of the recent news reports purporting to identify certain athletes whose names had been redacted from the government's search warrant filings in the Grimsley matter, and in the interests of justice, please be advised that these reports contain significant inaccuracies," Ryan said.

The prosecutor's office declined to elaborate. A message left for a Times spokesman was not immediately returned.

Grimsley's agent, Joe Bick, said Grimsley, who was released by the Arizona Diamondbacks after he acknowledged using steroids and other drugs and who subsequently retired, is not responsible for the naming of any players in the affidavit.

"In terms of how those names got in the document, Jason disputes the fact that he put them there," Bick said. "Jason's attorney made that statement a while ago, and he still feels that way."

Edward F. Novak, Grimsley's lawyer, did not return a telephone message yesterday. But Novak told The Arizona Republic in June that Grimsley did not volunteer any names of current or former players and merely answered questions when the investigators quizzed him about specific players.

Clemens and Pettitte, two former Yankees, both denied the accusations that were reported in The Times, as did Tejada, Brian Roberts and Jay Gibbons. David Segui, the sixth player, had previously said that he used human growth hormone.

"I'm here talking to you guys about something that is pretty much hearsay," Clemens said on Sunday. "It's ridiculous."

Pettitte said, "This has no weight behind this, as far as I'm concerned."

Randy Hendricks, who represents Clemens, noted that Clemens was on the United States team in the World Baseball Classic last March. He was subject to Olympic-style drug testing, which is stricter than baseball's testing policy. Clemens and Pettitte were teammates with Grimsley on the Yankees in 1999 and 2000.

Prosecutor: Steroids Story 'Inaccurate' (AP)

By David Kravets, The Associated Press

AP, October 3, 2006

SAN FRANCISCO -- The federal prosecutor overseeing an investigation of steroids in baseball said Monday a newspaper report that five players, including Roger Clemens, had used illegal performance-enhancing drugs contained "significant inaccuracies."

Citing sealed court filings, the Los Angeles Times reported that former pitcher Jason Grimsley had named Clemens, his Houston Astros teammate Andy Pettitte, and Baltimore Orioles Miguel Tejada, Brian Roberts and Jay Gibbons. The story first appeared on the Times' Web site on Saturday and quickly was seized on by print and broadcast media outlets.

San Francisco U.S. Attorney Kevin Ryan issued a statement Monday, saying: "In view of the recent news reports purporting to identify certain athletes whose names had been redacted from the government's search warrant filings in the Grimsley matter, and in the interests of justice, please be advised that these reports contain significant inaccuracies."

A spokesman for Ryan declined to elaborate.

DOJ_NMG_0073434

A spokesman for the Los Angeles Times had no immediate comment. The newspaper reported that an unidentified source with access to the document allowed the newspaper to view it, and a second source provided additional details about the document.

All five players immediately denounced the story, with Clemens calling it "dangerous and malicious and reckless."

Federal agents raided Grimsley's Arizona home in June after the pitcher admitted using human growth hormone, steroids and amphetamines. The pitcher, who played with Clemens and Pettitte on the New York Yankees, later was released by the Arizona Diamondbacks and suspended for 50 games.

In a search warrant affidavit, IRS Special Agent Jeff Novitzky, the lead investigator in the Bay Area Laboratory Co-Operative steroids probe, said Grimsley had identified other players as drug users, the Times reported. Those names were blacked out when the document was released.

"As I have said all along, and as Andy and Roger said quite clearly yesterday, they have never used performance-enhancing drugs," Randy Hendricks, the agent for Pettitte and Clemens, said Monday.

He added that Clemens "signed up to play for his country in the World Baseball Classic this year and submitted to Olympic standard testing, including blood work, and then went out and had another good year for the Astros."

Pete Rose Admits Taking Amphetamines (AP)

AP, October 3, 2006

NEW YORK (AP) -- Pete Rose says he took "greenies" in his playing days, if only to lose a few pounds. Oh, and he doesn't bet on baseball anymore, but if he did, he'd pick the Twins and the Padres.

In an appearance on the "Late Show" taped Monday, Rose was asked by host David Letterman whether he ever used any performance-enhancing drugs as a player. Rose said he never did, but when prodded about "greenies," explained that he used them -- though they were nothing more than "diet pills."

"Well, I don't think greenies would ever help you do anything," he said. "You know, I took greenies before in spring training only because I tried to lose some weight, see."

Letterman then asked whether the pills ever helped him ward off fatigue.

"No, not like steroids," Rose replied. "If I took steroids, I'd have gotten 5,000 damn hits."

Neither Letterman nor Rose used the word "amphetamines," which were commonly nicknamed "greenies" at the height of their supposed popularity in baseball. The sport added amphetamines to its list of banned substances last year.

Rose said he still enjoys watching baseball -- as many as three games a day -- and still holds out hope that he'll be reinstated. Letterman asked Rose who he likes in this year's playoffs.

"You sound like you're betting on baseball," Rose said, drawing laughter and applause. "You know, baseball's going to hate me -- the two teams I like are San Diego and Minnesota. And I liked the Yankees until they lost Randy Johnson, I liked the Mets, who've had a fantastic year, until they lost (Pedro) Martinez. St. Louis is going into the playoffs playing as bad as you could play. Detroit, I don't think they have the experience."

He added that he can't bet on baseball anymore "because I know too damn much about it."

"It wouldn't be fair," he said.

Rose, the career hits leader banned from baseball for betting on games as a manager, also explained the story behind the balls he signed with the words "I'm sorry I bet on baseball" that hit the market last month.

He said he signed the balls in 2005 for a friend who planned to keep them for 10 or 15 years. But the friend passed them on to a partner, and they wound up in the hands of a collector who put them up for auction -- prompting Rose to sign and market his own apology balls.

Drug Ring Suspect Pleads Guilty (ETPA)

By Tom Quigley, The Express-times

Easton Express-Times, October 3, 2006

one of 23 residents nabbed in sting. One charge dismissed in deal, but man still faces prison.

DOJ_NMG_0073435

TRENTON | A Phillipsburg man has pleaded guilty in connection with Operation Stateline, a sweeping undercover drug sting that shut down a network operating in the Phillipsburg-Easton area.

Ray Edward Carter, 48, of the first block of Sitgreaves Street, faces a federal prison sentence of between 10 years to life under the terms of the agreement reached Thursday with the U.S. Attorney Christopher Christie's office.

Princeton, N.J., attorney Kim A. Otis was assigned to represent Carter, the first to plea to the federal charges.

"His nickname is Pops," the attorney said. "He's actually a very decent and straightforward honest man."

Otis said his client has a problem with drugs.

"Unfortunately he has an addiction," Otis said. "I'm hoping to do the best for him that I can."

Carter pleaded guilty Thursday before U.S. District Judge Joel A. Pisano to a single count of conspiracy to distribute and possession with intent to distribute more than 50 grams of crack. A remaining charge of conspiring to distribute the drug will be dismissed, according to the plea bargain.

Carter must also serve five years on supervised release. If he violates the conditions of the program, he faces up to five years of additional prison time, records show.

The six-month investigation conducted by the federal Drug Enforcement Agency and local authorities ended last month. The sting resulted in state narcotics charges against 23 area residents.

Phillipsburg residents Keisha Fredericks, 29, of the 300 block of Washington Street, and Edward "Sugar Ray" Rayshawn Carter, 31, of the first block of Sitgreaves Street, are considered the ringleaders of the alleged $17,000-a-week cocaine ring, a DEA spokesman said.

Investigators dubbed the investigation Operation Stateline because the dealers in the Phillipsburg-based organization often sold drugs in the Easton area, authorities allege. Federal investigators monitored cell phones, employed confidential informants, videotaped drug transactions and made undercover drug buys as they infiltrated the alleged drug network, court records show.

Investigators seized about 3 pounds of cocaine and $17,000 in cash. The cash was seized from Tim "Big Daddy" Hartwell as he tried to elude capture, authorities allege.

Hartwell, 33, of the 2200 block of Rogers Street, Bethlehem, is one of those facing federal charges along with Fredericks and Edward Rayshawn Carter.

Also facing federal drug charges are James "Unc" Armstrong, 30, of the 500 block of Green Street, Phillipsburg, Pasqual "Paco" Colon, 27, of the 600 block of Berwick Street, Easton, and Daniel "Groove" Groover, 45, of the 100 block of Washington Avenue, Phillipsburg.

All seven people facing federal charges remain in federal custody, records show. All face possible life sentences.

Court records show attorneys for Hartwell, Groover and Edward Rayshawn Carter have requested extensions from the court for further plea negotiations with the government.

Supreme Court Denies Oakmont Doc's Appeal (PTR)

Pittsburgh Tribune-Review, October 2, 2006

The U.S. Supreme Court today declined to hear an appeal filed by a doctor convicted of trading prescription painkillers for sex at his Oakmont office.

Dr. Bernard Rottschaefer, 63, of Plum, was convicted in 2003 of 153 counts of illegally prescribing powerful painkillers, such as OxyContin, to drug-addicted female patients. He denies trading drugs for sex and has remained out of prison pending the outcome of his appeal.

Rottschaefer's lawyers filed a second appeal for a new trial last month. They claim to have found new evidence that could clear the doctor.

The five patient-witnesses who testified against Rottschaefer at trial have since sued him for malpractice. They testified during his criminal trial that they were drug addicts and that Rottschaefer prescribed the drugs to them for no medical reason, with four of the women saying they provided oral sex for prescriptions.

The women now say in sworn statements in the civil cases that the drugs were prescribed to treat chronic pain, Rottschaefer's lawyers say.

DOJ_NMG_0073436

They also accuse prosecutors of allowing two witnesses to lie on the stand during trial, claiming that they were not receiving leniency from the government in other criminal cases in exchange for their testimony against Rottschaefer.

U.S. District Judge Gary Lancaster dismissed the second appeal, because the first was still pending. Rottschaefer's lawyers now can re-file the second appeal.

Doctor Again Challenges Drugs-for-sex Conviction (PPG)

By Paula Reed Ward, Pittsburgh Post-gazette

Pittsburgh Post-Gazette, October 2, 2006

An Oakmont doctor who was convicted more than two years ago of 153 counts of illegally doling out OxyContin in exchange for sexual favors will take one more shot at beating the charges.

That chance will not come from the U.S. Supreme Court, which yesterday denied a petition from Dr. Bernard Rottschaefer asking the court to hear his case on appeal.

Instead, Dr. Rottschaefer's lawyers have filed a third motion for a new trial in U.S. District Court -- the last was rejected back in January 2005 -- claiming that they again have newly discovered evidence that could have changed the outcome of his trial.

This time, the evidence is testimony in a civil malpractice case against Dr. Rottschaefer in which the women he allegedly victimized all said they had various ailments that the OxyContin helped to treat.

That contradicts the prosecution's theory in the criminal case, in which it claimed that Dr. Rottschaefer prescribed the powerful pain medication to those women with "no legitimate medical purpose," said defense attorney Eli Stutsman.

In hundreds of pages of depositions given by the five women, they admit that parts of their testimony against Dr. Rottschaefer in his criminal trial were falsified.

Mr. Stutsman called the fact that all of the women changed their stories "extraordinary."

He hopes to use the new information in the depositions, as well as letters that were written by one of the women to her boyfriend while she was incarcerated, to prove "a comprehensive scheme to tell a lie to get a better deal" in their own criminal cases.

U.S. Attorney Mary Beth Buchanan declined to comment.

Dr. Rottschaefer was convicted in March 2004 of 153 counts -- though he was acquitted of 55 more -- and was sentenced in September of that year to 61/2 years in prison. He has yet to serve any time, though, while his case continues in appeals.

Four of the five women testified at Dr. Rottschaefer's trial that they were drug addicts and had no medical need for the prescriptions they were given. But now, Mr. Stutsman said, that story has changed.

"Every complaining witness lied under oath in Dr. Rottschaefer's prosecution," he wrote. "The false testimony went to the heart of the case: whether the prescriptions were issued for medical treatment or as drug dealing."

In their depositions, the women listed ailments that were treated by the OxyContin, including migraines and a fractured tailbone.

Adolescence: When Young People Use, Parents Seldom Know (NYT)

By Nicholas Bakalar

The New York Times, October 3, 2006

Parents consistently and substantially underestimate their children's use of alcohol and other drugs, a new study has found.

Researchers interviewed 591 adolescents ages 12 to 17 about their drug and alcohol use and then questioned at least one parent of each about what he or she thought the children were using. The analysis appears in the October issue of Alcoholism: Clinical and Experimental Research.

Parents consistently said they believed that their children were using substances less frequently than the children reported. Alcohol use was most common, with 54.4 percent of the teenagers reporting having consumed at least one drink in their lifetimes, and 23.6 percent saying they had been intoxicated. But only 30.5 percent of parents believed that their children had ever had a drink, and only 8.1 percent said their children had ever been drunk.

While 44 percent of the adolescents reported smoking cigarettes, only 27 percent of their parents knew they smoked.

Almost 23 percent of the adolescents admitted to using marijuana, while only 13.2 percent of their parents were aware of it.

DOJ_NMG_0073437

With drugs other than marijuana, the results were similar: 8.5 percent of teenagers said they had used other drugs, while 3.1 percent of parents knew it.

"Parents of 12- and 13-year-olds had the lowest rates of knowledge," said Dr. Laura J. Bierut, the senior author of the study and an associate professor of psychiatry at Washington University in St. Louis. "That's worrisome, because there is good evidence that the younger you start to use substances, the more likely you are to develop addiction."

"Children are not telling you about their drug use," Dr. Bierut added. "You have to ask. Kids have access to drugs, they use them, and most parents are clueless."

New Evidence Surfaces In Bombing Case (FWST)

By Max B. Baker

The Fort Worth Star-Telegram, October 3, 2006

Six years ago, Texas Death Row inmate Michael Toney made headlines when he tried to sell seats to his execution over the Internet.

But now Toney, convicted of blowing up three people in Lake Worth on Thanksgiving Day in 1985, may create another stir as he tries to avoid the death chamber for one of North Texas' most notorious crimes.

The Texas Court of Criminal Appeals recently ruled that new evidence — including reports from the federal bureau of Alcohol, Tobacco, Firearms and Explosives discrediting the prosecution's key witnesses — is sufficient to support Toney's innocence claim and warrants another review by state District Judge Everett Young.

The Tarrant County district attorney's office says that some of the claims have been made in previous appeals. But a defense attorney representing Toney says he is convinced that Toney is innocent.

"It's one of the most egregious cases I've seen," said Jared Tyler, an attorney with the Texas Innocence Network. "For me, there is not a shred of evidence that he did it."

Toney, 40, was sentenced to death in 1999 for the briefcase bombing that killed Angela Blount, 15; her father, Joe Blount, 44; and her cousin Michael Columbus, 18.

The case had gone unsolved for a decade until Toney, who was in jail for another offense, told another inmate that he was hired to put the briefcase bomb at the mobile home. Investigators later presented evidence showing that Toney — who they said was to be paid $5,000 for the bombing — put it at the wrong trailer.

Toney always proclaimed his innocence and his efforts in 2000 to sell seats to his future execution to the highest bidder was part of a publicity stunt to attract attention to his case. The state forbade him to sell the seats.

Nicknamed "Cowboy," Toney is a prolific e-mail correspondent, writing regularly not only to reporters but also to members of the jury that convicted him. He also has a Web site on which he proclaims his innocence.

"Lies got me sentenced to death for a crime I did not commit," Toney writes on his Web site. "Since the charade of a Texas trial people have came forward and told me who killed the Blounts and why they did it."

Tarrant County Assistant District Attorney Debra Windsor, who will defend her office in court, says the way the case is being presented by the defense attorneys involves more than questions about Toney's innocence.

"It is actually an attack on this office," she said. A troubling case

Tyler and David Dow, attorneys for the Innocence Network at the University of Houston Law Center, accuse Tarrant County District Attorney Tim Curry's office of offenses including withholding reports from the Texas Department of Public Safety and the ATF that attack the credibility of the state's key witnesses, Chris Meeks and Michael Toney's ex-wife, Kimberly Toney.

Released to the defense this year for the first time, the reports suggest that Meeks and Toney may have been manipulated and intimidated into giving statements fitting investigators' preconceived notions of how and why the crime occurred.

Defense attorneys point out that by the time Michael Toney was indicted in 1997, the crime was 12 years old. The Lake Worth incident was the longest-running unsolved bombing investigation in the country, court papers state. Defense attorneys suggest that there was a renewed interest in this case by a federal agency trying to rebuild its image after the Oklahoma City bombing.

DOJ_NMG_0073438

Prosecutors were led to Toney when he allegedly confessed to committing the crime to Charles Ferris, a fellow inmate in the Parker County Jail. Already serving time in prison on a burglary charge, Toney had been transferred to the Weatherford jail on an unresolved burglary charge. Toney reportedly told Ferris that he had put the explosive briefcase on the front porch of the mobile home.

After that, investigators began looking into Toney's possible involvement in the case, which led them to Meeks and Kimberly Toney. Neither one had ever talked to authorities about Toney's role in the bombing.

Kimberly Toney testified during the trial that she, Meeks and Michael Toney went out together the day of the bombing and that they drove to a business near the mobile home park where the Blounts lived. She said Michael Toney, who was then her boyfriend, got out of their pickup, grabbed a briefcase and disappeared behind the business. He came back later without the briefcase.

Meek told basically the same story during the trial.

Defense attorneys contend that recently released reports from the DPS and the ATF show that investigators used what they call "cognitive interviewing techniques" to plant false memories into Meeks' and Kimberly Toney's minds. Those reports should have been released to Michael Toney's attorneys at the time of the trial, to show that they had not always given the same account of the crime.

Both witnesses' testimony was crucial to the state's case against Toney.

Kimberly Toney's memories in particular were "unscrupulously recovered, reshaped, and reformed, by aggressive investigators desperately trying to close" the case, court papers said.

The defense also contends that Kimberly Toney's testimony is questionable because of recently uncovered evidence that she may have suffered memory loss from chemicals she was exposed to in 1991 during the Persian Gulf War.

"At the time the investigation into the Blount bombing was reopened, it was the longest-running unsolved bombing investigation in the country. The bombing of the Alfred P. Murrah Federal Building in Oklahoma City had just occurred, and the ATF was determined to solve this crime, one way or another," court papers state. Testimony recanted

A memorandum from Tarrant County Assistant District Attorney Mike Parrish and two ATF reports that cast doubts on the testimony of Tucker Finis Blankenship were also not provided to defense attorneys at the time of the trial. Blankenship met Toney while they were in jail together, according to court documents.

Blankenship said Toney said that another man was going to pay him $5,000 for making and delivering the bomb, but that he had put it by the wrong mobile home. Since then, Blankenship has recanted those statements, and court papers indicate that Blankenship believed the cases against him would be dropped in return for his testimony.

Information was also uncovered that pointed to another man who had built a pipe bomb similar to one used in the Blount bombing and that the man's family told authorities that components used in the briefcase bomb were missing from their home. The man had also told more than one other person that he was responsible for the three deaths, court papers state.

"The fact of the matter is that the Blount bombing remains unsolved to this day, even as Mr. Toney remains on death row," court papers state.

But during the trial, Toney also admitted that he lied frequently. During the trial he acknowledged telling some people that his father is dead, others that his mother is dead, and others that he had a master's degree in chemistry.

He has also said since his conviction that he unwisely told Ferris that he could tell authorities he was involved in the Blount bombing if it would help him get out of jail by getting his charges reduced or dismissed. Ferris has since recanted that testimony, too.

Parrish has no doubts that he convicted the right person. The district attorney's office has until early next year to file its initial response to Toney's request for a review of the evidence and possibly a new trial.

"All that's been raised on state appeal," Parrish said. "There must be some new, slightly different kitchen sink they are throwing in here." <body.end> Max B. Baker, 817-390-7714

maxbaker@star-telegram.com

© 2006 Star-Telegram.com and wire service sources. All Rights Reserved.

http://www.dfw.com

Man Wanted In Shooting At Ohio Football Game Arrested In Wash. (AP)

AP, October 3, 2006

BREMERTON, Wash. - Authorities on Monday arrested a man accused of killing a man during a youth football game in Youngstown, Ohio, standing over the wounded victim on the field and shooting him several more times.

Anthony M. Caulton, 25, also known as Anthony Pfeifer, was arrested at a home in Bremerton, across Puget Sound from Seattle, after investigators developed leads that he might be hiding in Washington state, the U.S. Marshals Service said.

Caulton was wanted for investigation of a shooting at a Volney Rogers Youth Football League game on Aug. 19 at the former South High School stadium.

As many as 800 people were at the game when Caulton shot Larry D. Jones, 31, in the grandstand, police said. Jones then fled onto the field, and when he collapsed the shooter shot him several more times.

Among the witnesses were cheerleaders as young as 4.

Caulton was booked into the Kitsap County Jail pending his return to Ohio, where he has been charged with the killing in Youngstown Municipal Court.

Youngstown police said several initial requests for information about the killing got no response, and some people said they were afraid for their safety to get involved. But within days, detectives collected information that led to an arrest warrant against Caulton.

Police said the two had argued near the stadium before the shooting. The nature of the argument wasn't disclosed.

IMMIGRATION:

Supreme Court Rejects Appeal Of Nazi Concentration Camp Guard (FINDLAW/AP)

By Pete Yost, Associated Press Writer

AP, October 3, 2006

(AP) - WASHINGTON-A former Nazi concentration camp guard lost a Supreme Court appeal on Monday over the government's decision to revoke his U.S. citizenship.

Justices declined to review the case of John Hansl, a member of the SS Death's Head battalion that guarded concentration camps at Sachsenhausen near Berlin in 1943 and Natzweiler in France in 1944.

Hansl, who lives in Des Moines, Iowa, sought to distinguish his case from other former Nazi camp guards by arguing he did not hide his wartime past when he asked for a visa to enter the United States in the mid-1950s or personally assist in persecution.

An appeals court, however, agreed with a lower court ruling that Hansl's work as an armed guard with orders to shoot escaping prisoners was sufficient evidence that he "personally assisted in persecution."

In one instance, Hansl helped search for an escaped prisoner who was later shot to death, although Hansl did not pull the trigger, court records show.

The Justice Department has said that more than 70 people who assisted in Nazi persecution have been stripped of U.S. citizenship since the Office of Special Investigations began operations in 1979. The office pursues war criminals.

The Supreme Court's action means the government could begin proceedings to have Hansl deported. He was born in Croatia to parents of German descent and conscripted into the SS after Germany invaded Yugoslavia in 1941.

Hansl's attorney, James Benzoni, had told justices that U.S. immigration policy after World War II allowed visas to be issued to former concentration camp guards unless they were directly involved in committing atrocities.

On the Net:

Supreme Court: http://www.supremecourtus.gov/

Border Fence Called Impractical (WP)

The Washington Post, October 3, 2006

DOJ_NMG_0073440

Building a fence in an attempt to secure the U.S. border with Mexico is impractical and would simply lead illegal immigrants to cross elsewhere, according to former U.S. Customs and Border Protection agents and other experts.

And the Mexican government agreed in a diplomatic note sent yesterday to the U.S. government, warning that the fence would damage relations between the two countries.

The Senate voted Friday to build about 700 miles of double-layered fence with access roads, lighting, cameras and sensors, to try to block five heavily used crossing points along the 2,000-mile border.

The plan, which awaits President Bush's signature, includes a sweep of fencing along most of the Arizona border, where about half of the almost 1.2 million people arrested crossing from Mexico last year were caught.

The fence would also stretch through parts of California, New Mexico and Texas.

Former U.S. customs agents who have hunted drug traffickers in the mountains and deserts near the Arizona border said the new barrier would be defeated by the rugged terrain.

"You can't build a wall across the mountains of southern Arizona, as much of the terrain is inaccessible even on foot," veteran agent Lee Morgan said as he stood along the proposed route of the fence, east of Douglas.

The barrier would have to traverse the rugged Huachuca Mountains and other craggy ranges west of Nogales, Ariz., which are marked by bluffs and ravines that make them inaccessible to vehicle traffic, Morgan noted.

Another former customs special agent said the fencing would also struggle to bridge hundreds of creek beds spanning the Arizona-Sonora border, which are prone to flash floods from May to October.

Republican backers of the proposal contend it is necessary to prevent entry to the United States by illegal immigrants and extremists, and to prevent smuggling of weapons and drugs.

Mexican President Vicente Fox, who leaves office Dec. 1, has called the barrier "shameful" and compared it to the Berlin Wall. His spokesman yesterday urged Bush to veto the bill.

"This decision hurts bilateral relations, goes against the spirit of cooperation needed to guarantee security on the common border, creates a climate of tension in border communities," Ruben Aguilar told reporters.

Crackdown On Immigrants Empties A Town And Hardens Views (CSM)

By Patrik Jonsson

The Christian Science Monitor, October 3, 2006

STILLMORE, GA.

As Department of Homeland Security agents in black SUVs tooled up and down the dirt avenues of Stillmore, Ga., hundreds of undocumented people scattered into the woods like "flushed quail," one witness said.

Many of those who weren't arrested fled, some to Kentucky. One family hid for two nights in a tree. As night sets now, a sprinkling of solitary lights glow from once-crowded trailer parks. Since the Labor Day raid, Stillmore, where the wishful sign at the city limit reads "A town that is still growing," has shrunk by at least a third after more than 120 people were arrested and perhaps as many as 300 others disappeared.

"It's a ghost town," says resident Bennett Byrd.

As federal, state, and local officials crack down on illegal immigrants across the country, attitudes continue to harden among those who want them to stay and those who want them to go. In places like Stillmore, Ga., Arkadelphia, Ark., and Charlotte, N.C., raids and crackdowns have uncorked a phenomenon for those left behind: a sense of moral confusion about mass roundups and midnight raids.

"There's a tension between working alongside these people, understanding their impact on the economy, and then some of the issues of a community being able or not able to sustain this kind of immigration," says Allan Burns, an anthropologist at the University of Florida in Gainesville. "People are divided."

In Stillmore, the Crider plant does everything from poultry processing to packing M&Ms for the military to grilling the ribs for restaurant franchises, employees say. In a town of about 1,000 people, more than half of them were working there. The plant's success was driven by a hardworking labor supply that began arriving about four years ago.

Workers had "very good" fake documentation that fooled managers, a Crider plant spokesperson says.

DOJ_NMG_0073441

In the town, few complained about the immigration status of the workers as Stillmore, once a thriving train depot, again became a destination. "People got along. The town was growing," says Don Hadden, a local carpenter.

Then, earlier this year, an investigation began by Immigration and Customs Enforcement (ICE) agents in the Department of Homeland Security (DHS). ICE agents arrested a Stillmore man in the spring, accusing him of supplying counterfeit documents to workers. The man's records were then used to identify other workers. For 10 weeks, ICE trained company managers to spot forgeries and check Social Security numbers. About 30 people who had not been weeded out by the company were arrested at the plant in an orderly fashion over Labor Day weekend, according to a plant spokesperson.

ICE agents also raided several homes in town. Witnesses say agents popped up through floor boards and broke windows.

"Everything we did [in this investigation] was in accordance with the immigration laws of this country," says Marc Raimondi, DHS spokesman.

But some, including the Southern Poverty Law Center, have voiced concerns about the searches.

"Hispanics came to Stillmore and opened up stores that had been closed for years, and now there's a sadness in how they were treated," says Father Vic Subb, who worked for a Catholic ministry in town for six years.

Proponents of immigration law enforcement say the government has a right to get tough on illegal immigrants and those who employ them. Led by Gov. Sonny Perdue, Georgia lawmakers say they will go after people who have broken immigration laws. Georgia has the fastest growing population of illegal immigrants, estimated at 470,000.

"I firmly believe that we [as a nation] are taking in more immigrants than we have the capacity to feed, educate or employ," says D.A. King, president of Dustin Inman Society in Marietta, Ga., which opposes illegal migration of workers across the border.

This year, ICE has rounded up 2,100 people in workplace raids nationwide compared with 1,145 in 2005.

Meanwhile, more communities are signing agreements to work with ICE to undertake deportation proceedings for scofflaws and prisoners. In Charlotte, more than 600 people have been deported through hearings initiated by local officials.

It's a debate that's galvanized Congress. Sen. Mark Pryor (D) of Arkansas said immigration reform should consider the community impact of enforcement, noting a 2005 raid in Arkadelphia that detained 119 people and left 30 children behind. But last week, Rep. Russell Pearce (R) of Arizona argued for reviving Operation Wetback, the controversial 1950s-era deportation program. To deal with illegal immigration, Congress has so far approved a border fence project.

The law-and-order tack is heightening tensions, experts say.

"Because of [stepped-up raids], you're going to see more pro-immigrant activity, and anti-immigrant folks are going to want even more enforcement," says Bill Hing, an immigration law professor at the University of California, Davis.

In Stillmore, the raids forced Americans to confront their own beliefs. Residents such as Larry Hadden saw friendly and "clean" people invigorating the town's economy. To see them chased "like rabbits" through the underbrush troubled him, as did watching as women and children were left behind without resources.

Others, including resident Carolyn Byrd, see the ICE roundup as justified. Her son, Bennett, was a manager of the Crider plant for years. He said that Hispanics worked harder than anyone else. But they also took jobs, including his.

Now the plant is paying a dollar more an hour than before the raid, to draw new workers from neighboring counties. "With the illegals gone, Americans have a chance to make more money," says Mr. Byrd.

Still, there's a feeling among some that, as the undocumented go, so does the town of Stillmore. "It was very good here, but now I am too sad I can't find a good job," says Samuel Villalobos, an undocumented worker who hid out with his family in his trailer during the raid. "The trailer parks are empty, people leave very, very worried, no income, no money. It's too hard over here. Stillmore is too quiet."

Immigration Resolution Passes Early Test (CHIT)

By Josh Noel

Chicago Tribune, October 3, 2006

Despite a dissenting vote from Tony Peraica, the Republican candidate for Cook County Board president, a resolution passed a subcommittee Monday that could make the county a sanctuary for undocumented immigrants.

DOJ_NMG_0073442

Modeled on legislation adopted by several large cities, including Chicago, the resolution will go before the full board after passing 3-2. It would forbid county agencies from asking about immigration status when providing services.

The co-sponsor of the resolution, Commissioner Roberto Maldonado (D-Chicago), said the measure offers symbolic support for undocumented immigrants as well as protection from real abuses.

During a brief hearing of the Law Enforcement and Corrections Committee, Maldonado cited two examples of such abuse. One was an allegation made last month that a Stroger Hospital police officer roughed up Agustin Sotomayor, 77, during an arrest and asked whether the man was in the United States legally.

The other, he said, came from the owner of Los Dos Compadres restaurant in unincorporated Franklin Park, who reported that a Cook County sheriff's police officer checked identification of would-be patrons late last month and turned away anyone without proof of being in the United States legally.

"We are sending a moral message through our government to the undocumented that we are in support of their struggle to achieve social justice," Maldonado said. "As we await comprehensive immigration reform, we stand with them."

Cook County sheriff's office spokesperson Sally Daly said the agency was unaware of the allegation against its officer until Monday. Neither Maldonado nor any citizen made a complaint, she said.

"Certainly it is concerning, but why Commissioner Maldonado would wait this long to mention it is unclear to us," Daly said. "If it's true, we take it seriously, and we will conduct an investigation."

Joining Maldonado in support of the resolution were Commissioners Joseph Mario Moreno (D-Chicago), a co-sponsor, and Mike Quigley (D-Chicago).

In a long preface to his dissent, Peraica criticized the resolution as a "feel-good piece of legislation" that violated the Constitution because county government cannot make immigration law.

"The proper channel for this is the United States Congress and the United States Senate," he said. "We would be setting a dangerous precedent if we embarked down that road."

Peraica had previously said that Sotomayor's arrest was a reflection of the poor training of county employees, but he said on Monday that the officer's behavior, if true, can't be legislated away.

"What happened to Mr. Sotomayor is absolutely wrong and was done as the result of an ill-trained employee acting in an ignorant manner," he said. "No resolution can change that."

He called for more training for county law-enforcement officials to make clear the limits of their power regarding immigration.

Commissioner Jerry Butler (D-Chicago) joined the dissent, saying that anyone seeking services at a county health facility should be required to answer basic questions about where they live or have lived.

Maldonado said the issue will go before the full board sometime after Wednesday's scheduled meeting.

jbnoel@tribune.com

Bridging A Racial Rift That Isn't Black And White (NYT)

By Rachel L. Swarns

The New York Times, October 3, 2006

WILLACOOCHEE, Ga. — The ministers close their eyes and raise their voices to the heavens and, for a moment, they are colorless. Two men who grew up desperately poor, who picked tobacco in the fields and hauled boxes at Wal-Mart and whose life journeys ultimately led them to the Lord and to each other.

"It's like praying with a brother," said the Rev. Harvey Williams Jr., 54, who is black.

"He looks out for me and I look out for him," said the Rev. Atanacio Gaona, 45, who is a Mexican immigrant. "In the eyes of the Lord, there are no colors."

In this immigrant boomtown in Atkinson County, about 45 miles north of the Florida border, the ministers have forged a rare friendship that transcends the deep divide between blacks and Hispanics here.

DOJ_NMG_0073443

For centuries, the South has been defined by the color line and the struggle for accommodation between blacks and whites. But the arrival of hundreds of thousands of Hispanic immigrants over the past decade is quietly changing the dynamics of race relations in many Southern towns.

The two pastors find that the fault lines that separate their communities sometimes test their friendship and challenge their efforts to bring blacks and Hispanics closer together.

Blacks here, who had settled into a familiar, if sometimes uneasy, relationship with whites, are now outnumbered by Hispanics. The two groups, who often live and work side by side, compete fiercely for working-class jobs and government resources. By several measures, blacks are already losing ground.

The jobless rate for black men in Georgia is nearly triple that of Hispanic men, labor statistics show. More blacks than Hispanics fail to meet minimum standards in Atkinson County public schools. And many blacks express anguish at being supplanted by immigrants who know little of their history and sometimes treat them with disdain as they fill factory jobs, buy property, open small businesses and scale the economic ladder.

"If you have 10 factory openings, I would say Hispanics would get the majority of the jobs now," said Joyce Taylor, the Atkinson County clerk, who is black. "And if you look at the little grocery stores, there are more Hispanic businesses than black businesses."

"It's kind of scary," said Ms. Taylor, 44, whose daughter was laid off from a factory here. "My children, looking forward, it may be harder for them."

Some Hispanics say African-Americans treat them with hostility and disparage them with slurs, even though blacks know the sting of racism all too well. They say many blacks are jealous of their progress and resent the fact that whites, who dominate the business sector, look increasingly to Hispanics to fill work forces. Blacks say employers favor immigrants because they work for less money.

An Area of Intense Feelings

The killing of six Mexican farm workers in a robbery last year in Tifton, about 30 miles away — and the arrest of four black men in the case — has heightened the friction. Nothing so violent has occurred here, but some Hispanics say black criminals focus on immigrants in this town, too.

Speaking of blacks, Benito González, 51, a Mexican who has worked alongside them at a poultry plant, said: "They don't like to work, and they're always in jail. If there's hard work to be done, the blacks, they leave and they don't come back. That's why the bosses prefer Mexicans and why there are so many Mexicans working in the factories here."

Such images stoke the debate over how to overcome tensions, which flared nationally this year when some African-Americans expressed anger and unease as immigrant groups hailed efforts to legalize illegal immigrants as a new civil rights movement. Although the push in Congress to create a guest-worker program has stalled, concerns about competition between black and immigrant low-wage workers remain.

Those feelings resonate with particular intensity in the South, home to the nation's largest share of African-Americans and its fastest-growing population of immigrants, according to an analysis of census data by William H. Frey, a demographer at the Brookings Institution.

The two Pentecostal ministers who pray together are men of faith who say they believe that blacks and Hispanics should be allies in the struggle to overcome discrimination and economic adversity, even though they acknowledge that interethnic unity is often hard to come by.

Mr. Williams, a thoughtful man who studied psychology in community college, ruminates in a weekly newspaper column on topics like spirituality, ethnic relations and his recovery from cocaine addiction 20 years ago.

Mr. Gaona, whose boyish looks belie his intensity, left school after second grade to help his father work the fields in Mexico. He entered the United States illegally and started picking tobacco here when he was 24. Over the past decade, he has received his citizenship and built his church from the ground up.

The two men met working on a Wal-Mart warehouse floor in neighboring Coffee County around 1993 when Mr. Gaona was starting to deepen his faith and Mr. Williams, already a pastor, was looking for a ride to work.

Neither expected much from the acquaintanceship.

DOJ_NMG_0073444

Mr. Gaona, who said his perceptions of black Americans were shaped in Mexico by news reports of crime and violence in poor urban areas, recalled, “I was thinking: ‘He’s black. Who knows what he wants from me?’ I was just trying to keep my distance.”

Mr. Williams said he never envisioned a friendship because he had never known blacks and Hispanics to be friends.

“I think I probably saw him as being a Hispanic,’ he said, “and I was only going to get so close.”

Over the next five years, in their hourlong weekday commuting trip in Mr. Gaona’s 1988 Oldsmobile and later in Mr. Williams’s 1982 Ford station wagon, they discovered common ground. Both are divorced fathers. Mr. Williams has two sons and two daughters. Mr. Gaona has five boys.

Both grew up poor, working in the fields. And both were trying to advance at Wal-Mart and searching for pathways to God. It was Mr. Williams who helped persuade Mr. Gaona to quit Wal-Mart to open the first Spanish-language church in this town.

Today, the men are remarried, full-time ministers who chat by telephone and disregard the diners at local restaurants who still gawk at the sight of a black man and a Hispanic man eating together.

But they also remain painfully aware of the fear and prejudice that remain in their communities.

Mr. Williams, who leads a working- and middle-class congregation of teachers, Civil Service workers and factory workers at the Union Holiness House of Deliverance, shakes his head as he describes the jokes about Mexicans with poor hygiene that circulate among some black people he knows.

“It was not so long ago that we were the object of jokes,” Mr. Williams said. “I’m constantly having to remind people.”

Mr. Gaona, whose flock at the Iglesia Alfa y Omega is dominated by factory and farm workers, says his members often describe American blacks as moyos, a derogatory Spanish term that sometimes refers to a black insect. He used the term, too, he admits, before he found God and his friend Mr. Williams.

“Every now and then, I remind them that we need to respect people, no matter how they look or their color,” Mr. Gaona said. "But mostly, we don’t know them, and they don’t know us. There’s no real communication going on.”

Gaps and Similarities

The tension simmers just below the surface in the quiet communities of bungalows and trailers where the two churches are situated. Five years ago, these neighborhoods were overwhelmingly black. Today, Hispanics and blacks account for 21 percent and 19 percent of the county population of about 8,000, respectively.

Lyrical Spanish chatter competes with the sweet Georgia drawl as blacks and Hispanics share streets, assembly lines, classrooms — and hardships — that could prove to be the basis of community and political alliances. The two groups appear more likely to be poor than whites. About 36 percent of Hispanics and 31 percent of blacks live in poverty in Atkinson County, census data shows; 17 percent of whites are poor.

The two ethnic groups report experiencing some discrimination from non-Hispanic whites, who account for 60 percent of the population, and they view the blue-collar jobs in the factories that manufacture industrial fabrics and mobile homes as steppingstones to prosperity.

School administrators and sociologists suggest that the gap between blacks and Hispanics in employment and education may stem in part from immigrant parents who push their children harder to succeed in schools and the immigrant zeal to find work, regardless of how much it pays.

Many black adults, who typically have more formal education than new immigrants, seethe at the disparities. In a town where neighborliness is entrenched, blacks and Hispanics often treat one another warily.

It is hard to envision such tension in the ministers’ friendship, particularly as they laugh amid the wooden pews in Mr. Williams’s church. But in many ways, they, too, keep their distance.

Despite more than 10 years’ friendship, the two have never dined in each other’s home. Their wives and children have never met, nor have their congregations.

Mr. Gaona does not know the black families who live near him. And he has never addressed Mr. Williams’s congregation, even though his friend has invited him several times. The minister says he feels uncomfortable preaching in English.

Mr. Williams, who has spoken at his friend’s church twice, says there is more to it. (Mr. Gaona’s English, after all, is quite good.)

DOJ_NMG_0073445

"There's still a barrier there," Mr. Williams said.

He said the worshippers in Mr. Gaona's church seemed reluctant to mingle with him after his guest sermons there several years ago.

"They are like standing on the side, you know, with their heads down as if waiting for me to leave," he recounted. "They're uncomfortable. And that's one reason for not visiting him any more than I do.

"It's one of my goals in life, to break down these nationality walls. But people are pretty divided. I just don't know if that's going to change."

Mr. Williams concedes that he, too, strives to do better. He does not know the name of the Hispanic family that lives near him. For a time, he refused to wave to Hispanic drivers on the road because they often hurt his feelings by ignoring him and the Southern tradition of greeting strangers. He has since decided to wave — no matter what.

His wife, who did not grow up around immigrants, still feels a bit uncomfortable socializing with Hispanics, despite his long friendship with the Hispanic pastor.

A Shoulder to Lean On

Mr. Gaona said he was recently taken aback when his 5-year-old came home from school and described his black classmates as moyos, the aspersion.

" 'Why you need to call them like that?' " Mr. Gaona said he asked his son. "I'm trying to share with him that's not right. But that's what he hears."

Still, on most days the two men put aside such awkwardness and focus on supporting each other.

When Mr. Gaona's computer became infected with a virus, he called Mr. Williams, who stopped by to help repair it. When state officials refused to renew his brother's driving license because his immigration papers were not in order, Mr. Gaona called Mr. Williams in frustration.

Mr. Williams relies on Mr. Gaona to interview Hispanic immigrants who ask to rent his church's social hall for parties. And it was his respect for the Hispanic pastor that helped persuade him to use his newspaper column to chastise Americans who disparaged the newcomers.

"I believe that rather than be angry or envy those who have came to America and found success, we ought to be learning from them," Mr. Williams wrote.

As the ministers meandered through their changing neighborhoods one afternoon, they considered taking their friendship to another level by preaching a joint service for their congregations. Though they knew it might never happen, they envisioned Spanish speakers and English speakers, newcomers and long timers' holding hands and praying beneath the oak trees.

On that sultry summer afternoon, it felt good to dream about the possibility. Somehow, it felt like it just might be the start of something.

"We'll get together one day soon and do one out in the open," Mr. Gaona said.

Mr. Williams replied: "That sounds good. That sounds good. We'll do that."

TAX:

Amherst Man Sentenced For Hiding Funds (BIZBUFF)

Business First of Buffalo, October 3, 2006

Amherst resident John Fortune has been sentenced to 27 months incarceration, following a guilty plea for structuring financial transactions to avoid IRS reporting requirements, according to the U.S. Attorney's office.

Assistant U.S. Attorney Gretchen Wylegala said Fortune, 62, admitted he became aware in 2001 that the banks had a duty to report to the IRS cash transactions in amounts of $10,000 or more. During a six-month-period, he acted purposefully to avoid those reports, orchestrating his cash transactions to be under that limit, typically taking amounts of $9,000 or $9,500. During that 6 month period, Fortune took nearly $150,000 in cash in 40 separate transactions, according to Wylegala.

The conviction in June was the culmination of an investigation on the part of the FBI.

DOJ_NMG_0073446

An Honest Democrat (WSJ)

The Wall Street Journal, October 3, 2006

Democrats are campaigning on "a new direction for America," but they've been deliberately abstemious with any details of what that means. New York Senator Chuck Schumer told the Journal last week that silence is their strategy because laying out an agenda "gives Republicans a target." So much for the courage of one's convictions.

Apparently, however, Mr. Schumer hasn't connected with Charlie Rangel, the 36-year House veteran from New York City who will chair the Ways and Means Committee if Democrats win a majority. Mr. Rangel has been happy to explain his own agenda on taxes and the war in Iraq.

In a recent interview with Bloomberg News, Mr. Rangel was asked specifically if any of the Bush first term tax cuts were worth preserving and he answered that he "cannot think of one." Then last week, Mr. Rangel was asked by Congress Daily whether he'd consider tax increases across the income spectrum. "No question about it," he said. "Everything has to be on the table."

"Everything" would mean repealing the 10% low-income tax bracket, the child tax credit and marriage penalty relief, all of which passed in 2001 and expire in 2010. According to the Treasury Department, repealing those provisions would raise taxes on the average middle income family by about $2,000 a year. Most Democrats say they only want to raise taxes on the rich, so give the would-be-chairman points for honesty.

Mr. Rangel has also been clear in saying he wants to "stop this war" in Iraq, and last week he was asked by The Hill newspaper how he might accomplish that. He responded: "You've got to be able to pay for the war, don't you?" That sounds like a vow to cut off funding for the war, a la 1975 in Vietnam, a point that California Democrat Lynn Woolsey reinforced by telling the same paper, "Personally, I wouldn't spend another dime [on the war]."

Republicans have jumped all over Mr. Rangel's tax comments in particular, but at least in one sense the New Yorker should be congratulated: Unlike his fellow Democrats, he isn't hiding what he believes. He's merely being candid about what he'd like to do at Ways and Means, and as a long-time Member he may feel he'll have a better chance of achieving his tax-hike goals if he talks about them more openly during the campaign. Voters won't be able to say they weren't warned.

Counting Capital Gains (WSJ)

The Wall Street Journal, October 3, 2006

Republicans haven't had any luck making the Bush tax cuts of 2003 permanent, and next year's prospects don't look promising. So now is a good time to consider some alternative tax-cutting strategies that might be more achievable.

One useful idea comes courtesy of House Republicans Mike Pence and Eric Cantor, who recently introduced a bill to index capital gains for inflation. Income tax brackets have been adjusted for the cost of living ever since the Reagan tax cuts of 1981 -- a historic pro-growth victory. But capital gains continue to suffer from an inflation tax, which yields a windfall profit for the government but reduces the value of holding long-term capital assets.

This situation stretches back to 1913, when the Treasury Department decided to define the word "cost" in the tax code as meaning historical dollars, rather than current dollars. Capital gains taxes are due whenever an asset yields a nominal gain, even if the investment is a loser in real terms. So an investor who purchased a stock for $10 in 1956, and sold it for $20 today, would still pay a 15% capital gains tax on the transaction, even though adjusted for 50 years of inflation he'd be a net loser.

From 1979 to 1994, roughly 33% of the increase in shareholder wealth, or some $1.5 trillion, was due to inflation. This means Americans are paying far higher capital gains tax rates than advertised. A 1993 study by then Federal Reserve Board Governor Wayne Angell calculated that the average real tax rate on investments from 1972 to 1992 in Nasdaq stocks was 68%. It was 101% in the S&P 500, 123% in the NYSE, and 233% in the Dow Jones Industrials. On three of the four major indexes, the average taxes were higher than the actual return.

Granted, this problem is less severe now than during the hyper-inflation of the 1970s. The capital gains bite is also less severe because Congress has cut the rate to 15% from as high as 28% as recently as 1996. This capital gains differential from the top income-tax rate of 35% is intended in part to offset the fact that capital losses are deductible against overall income only up to $3,000 a year.

DOJ_NMG_0073447

But inflation remains a hidden thief that transfers gains unfairly to the government from taxpayers. The Pence-Cantor bill would protect against this by allowing any taxpayer holding an asset for more than three years to have a gain or loss determined by a cost basis adjusted for inflation. The proposal would immediately raise the after-tax return on capital investment, thus providing an incentive for more of it.

The Bush Administration should consider getting behind the bill, but it might also be able to achieve the same result without legislation -- that is, via executive order. The tax code says only that taxes must be paid on gains as measured by the increase from the "basis" a taxpayer has in the property. The code then defines that basis as "the cost of such property," but without declaring whether that cost is real (after inflation) or nominal. If Treasury had the authority to define "cost" in one manner in 1913, it surely has the authority to redefine "cost" today.

President George H. W. Bush flinched from making this change in 1992 on the advice of government lawyers who argued that the definition of "cost" had been around so long that only Congress could now change it. But that legal interpretation is open to argument, all the more so given that inflation is once again making a comeback, albeit far more modestly than in the 1970s. Nonetheless, an inflation rate of 3% over a decade devalues the dollar value of a financial asset by about 35%. Academics have also argued that a President could redefine cost to allow, for instance, the indexing of depreciation schedules -- another bow to fairness and a boost for investment.

The Bush tax cuts expire in 2010, so taxes are sure to be a major policy battleground leading up to the 2008 Presidential race. New Treasury Secretary Hank Paulson will also be looking for ways to make his mark in the final two years of this Presidency, and removing inflated capital gains from taxation is one way to do that and help the economy.

CONGRESS-ADMINISTRATION:

Book And E-mails Hit Republican Nerves (FT)

By Caroline Daniel And Guy Dinmore In Washington

Financial Times, October 3, 2006

US Republicans are facing challenges to their credibility this week on two of their strongest themes – family values and national security – with questions on whether the leadership had covered up a scandal involving a congressman sending explicit e-mails to teenage boys, and whether the White House has covered up rising problems in Iraq.

The FBI said it would look into e-mails sent to under-age congressional pages by Mark Foley, a 52-year-old Republican congressman from Florida who resigned on Friday and on Monday said he would enter rehab to deal with his alcoholism.

The real political damage could arise from concern that the Republican leadership, including Dennis Hastert, the House speaker, had been slow to investigate the allegations fully and had failed to remove Mr Foley as chairman of the House caucus on missing and exploited children.

Mr Hastert said on Monday: “Congressman Foley duped a lot of people. I’ve known him for all the years he has worked in this House and he deceived me, too.”

In an effort to contain the fallout, and with Democratic critics asking, “Why did GOP leaders sit on Foley e-mails?” Mr Hastert called for an internal review and a Justice Department inquiry into who had seen the messages that Mr Foley had sent. An initial review by the leadership – which did not include the most explicit e-mails disclosed last week – had concluded that his messages were simply “over-friendly”.

“Initially I just thought that this would cost them a seat and the public would just chalk it up to yet another sleazebag politician,” said Charlie Cook, publisher of the Cook Political Report. “As articles turned toward cover-up/ inaction, it’s just one more nail in the coffin for this majority.”

Republicans had hoped to make national security the dominant election issue and had been poised to exploit last week’s victory on Capitol Hill – approval of new rules on interrogations and military tribunals – to paint Democrats as weak on national security.

DOJ_NMG_0073448

That plan for this week has been thrown off course by the publication of Bob Woodward's book State of Denial, which revealed an administration divided and disorganised over Iraq, and a new biography of Colin Powell, which says the former secretary of state warned the president of the growing insurgency.

One of the most damaging allegations from Mr Woodward is that Condoleezza Rice, the present secretary of state, brushed off warnings of a possible al-Qaeda attack on the US delivered by George Tenet, then chief of the CIA, and Cofer Black, head of counter-terrorism, at an emergency meeting on July 10 2001.

On her way to the Middle East, Ms Rice said that she could not specifically recall a meeting, and flatly denied being warned by Mr Tenet of an attack on the US. "What I am quite certain of, however, is that I would remember if I was told – as this account apparently says – that there was about to be an attack in the United States. The idea that I would somehow have ignored that I find incomprehensible."

Ms Rice said that Philip Zelikow, her senior policy adviser on the region and the former executive director of the 9/11 commission, had stayed in Washington "to help reconstruct from the commission side what happened".

Mr Zelikow was quoted by the New York Times as saying no witness before the 9/11 commission had drawn attention to such a meeting as described by Mr Woodward.

Mr Cook said the events of the last few days marked an inflection point. "The spotlight is shifting away from terrorism, 9/11, national security and falling gasoline prices back on to Iraq, how we got there and mistakes made by the Bush administration on how we have waged the war."

Party's Handling Of Foley Riles Up Voters Frustrated By Immigration, Spending (WSJ)

By Jackie Calmes

The Wall Street Journal, October 3, 2006

WASHINGTON -- As the scandal over former Rep. Mark Foley has expanded to entwine Republican leaders who knew of his emails to underage male House pages but took little action, the party has new reason to worry about two key constituencies: Christian conservatives and suburban soccer moms.

Long before the disclosure of the unduly personal Foley emails and separate, sexually explicit instant messages last week, and the six-term Florida Republican's sudden resignation, his colleagues were fretful that many conservatives would stay home on Election Day, turned off by high federal spending, illegal immigration and inaction on a number of social issues. Moderate suburbanites, meanwhile, complain of a party agenda that is too beholden to the conservatives on issues such as federal funding for medical research using embryonic stem cells, which President Bush vetoed in July.

Speaker of the House Dennis Hastert (R., Ill.) and John Shimkus (R., Ill.) say2 no Republican leaders were aware of inappropriate emails by Mark Foley until ABC News broke the story last Friday.

Greg Valliere, chief political strategist for Stanford Washington Research, says3 that the Foley sex scandal and its cover-up puts Republican chances in upcoming mid-term elections "in real jeopardy."

REPRESENTATIVE RACES

4 • Look at local issues5 facing voters in nine congressional districts nationwide - from southern Connecticut to suburban Seattle to Mark Foley's Florida district.

Now the Foley fallout has united both Republican voter groups in anger, just five weeks before midterm elections that will determine whether the party holds its House and Senate majorities.

"It's one of the worst congressional scandals ever. A top House Republican who denounced sex predators as 'animals' stands accused of acting like one," Cliff Kincaid, editor of the conservative Accuracy in Media Report, wrote in an editorial circulated by the pro-Republican Web site GOPUSA.com. His headline reflected an ire that went beyond Mr. Foley to envelop other House Republicans who acknowledge they had heard complaints about Mr. Foley's questionable contacts with a former page. "Who Protected the Perverted Congressman?" it read.

"I think there's more pain to come" for Republicans, says party pollster Tony Fabrizio. With clients among House, Senate and gubernatorial candidates in places such as suburban Philadelphia and swing-state Minnesota, he adds, "I'm very much watching how these things play out."

DOJ_NMG_0073449

Democrats need a net gain of 15 seats to win a House majority and six seats in the Senate. Many of the Republicans' most vulnerable House districts are in a swath from the moderate Northeast westward through the Ohio River valley, and in suburban districts in Arizona, Florida, Washington state and elsewhere where Republicans already were on the defensive. Democratic pollster Peter Hart, noting that Republicans already have lost the support of most independent voters, says, "Voters in general want change, and this just puts another nail in the Republicans' coffin."

"At the end of the day," the Republican Mr. Fabrizio says, "we need moderate voters to save people like Chris Shays," a Connecticut Republican who is among the most endangered incumbents.

"The Republican Party holds itself out, rightly or wrongly, as the guardian of values, and for something like this to occur does not bode well for the party," said Tony Perkins, head of the conservative Family Research Council and a frequent ally of Republican leaders. As for Christian conservative voters, "there's clearly a lack of enthusiasm as compared to" the 2004 election.

Yesterday, House Speaker Dennis Hastert and Rep. John Shimkus, chairman of the House Page Board, again sought to contain the damage with a statement to reporters reiterating their disgust with Mr. Foley and their determination to help state and federal authorities pursue the matter. The two Illinois Republicans left without answering questions.

Later Mr. Hastert spoke to a smaller group of reporters, providing his most complete account to date. The speaker said a portion of a Foley email to a former page from Louisiana asking for a photo of the teenager was "a red flag." But he said his staff didn't need to "bump it up to me at that time."

Democrats charged that the failure of Republicans to take the initial 2005 complaint, from the parents of a then-16-year-old boy, to the bipartisan six-member board that oversees the page program was evidence of Republicans' desire to shield Mr. Foley -- and the party's House majority. The board's top Democrat, Michigan Rep. Dale Kildee, has said that Mr. Shimkus, the board's Republican chairman, never told him of the issue.

Yet Rep. Tom Reynolds of New York, who heads the House Republicans' campaign committee, was informed of the questionable Foley emails. Mr. Reynolds says he raised the Foley matter with Mr. Hastert last spring, though the Speaker reiterated yesterday that he doesn't recall such a conversation.

The matter further imperils Mr. Reynolds. Though the House and Senate campaign chiefs of both parties typically get those jobs because they are safe at home, Mr. Reynolds already had reason to worry about his hold on his moderate-to-conservative upstate New York district. Wealthy local businessman Jack Davis, his Democratic foe, has vowed to spend $2 million. Tomorrow, first lady Laura Bush will campaign for Mr. Reynolds in his suburban Buffalo district, and then separately participate in a local radio program about youth issues.

House Majority Leader John Boehner, an Ohio Republican, conceded in a television interview late yesterday that he expected Republicans to lose Mr. Foley's seat, a seat that he had been expected to win. His comment came as Florida Republicans tapped state Rep. Joe Negron to run instead, though Mr. Foley's name must remain on the ballot. Democrats have their sights on four other Florida districts as well.

The fallout also could give impetus to Democratic candidates who previously were making an issue of online sexual predators. Among them are Ed Perlmutter, a former state senator favored to seize an open Republican-held seat in Colorado, and Phil Kellam, who is threatening freshman Republican Rep. Thelma Drake in Virginia.

Action against sexual predators on the Internet has been a popular theme for politicians of both parties. Its resonance with the public, especially parents, is reflected in the popularity since 2004 of the Dateline NBC series "To Catch a Predator," which films sting operations against suspected sexual abusers of children. Last August at the Democratic National Committee's summer meeting, Karin Johanson, the executive director of the House Democrats' campaign committee, predicted to members that Republicans would run attack ads in the fall depicting Democrats as soft on sexual predators. In anticipation, Democrats developed an Internet-safety proposal.

With Democrats now the ones on the offensive, they called on Republicans to return funds from Mr. Foley, who had been a prodigious party fund-raiser and donor. In North Carolina, the Democratic Party released a statement asking of the incumbent Republican, "Who does Robin Hayes stand up for? Mark Foley and the Republican House leadership or underage children?"

DOJ_NMG_0073450

In Virginia, Dick Wadhams, the campaign manager for embattled Republican Sen. George Allen, said the campaign would donate its $5,000 from Mr. Foley to the charity Enough is Enough, a nonprofit group based in Great Falls, Va., that works against Internet-based pornography.

Leaders Face Foley Fallout (RC)

By Susan Davis

Roll Call, October 3, 2006

Facing a firestorm of criticism in the unfolding House page scandal surrounding former Rep. Mark Foley (R-Fla.), House Republican leaders held a tense Members-only conference call Monday evening to attempt to assuage lawmakers' anger about a controversy that some Republicans fear has put the majority increasingly in peril.

Sources familiar with the call described Members as "angry" and "furious," and said many lawmakers raised safety concerns about the teenagers currently enrolled in the page program.

"It's big, it's devastating, it's goes back to the idea that Washington, [D.C.,] is an immoral city," said one source familiar with the call.

Rep. Ray LaHood (R-Ill.), the sources said, went so far as to call for scrapping the House page program, which has been in place for more than 150 years. Rep. Phil Gingrey (R-Ga.) also called for the House to hold hearings on the matter, but that suggestion was not widely supported.

Unconfirmed rumors continue to swirl around Foley, who has checked into a rehabilitation facility for alcohol abuse.

House Majority Leader John Boehner (R-Ohio), mindful of press leaks, warned Members on the call not to discuss unconfirmed allegations on the conference call, but rather to contact leadership offices directly with those concerns.

The conference call came as Speaker Dennis Hastert (R-Ill.) and his aides wrestled with pressure that is perhaps unprecedented in his tenure, as divisions revealed themselves in leadership over the weekend.

National Republican Congressional Committee Chairman Tom Reynolds (N.Y.) stated publicly that he discussed the series of non-sexual e-mail exchanges in 2005 between Foley and a 16-year-old male former page from Louisiana with the Speaker earlier this year.

Hastert does not deny the conversation took place but maintains he does not recall it, and the different accounts from the two leaders was widely noted.

"The atmosphere was foul over the weekend," said a GOP strategist close to the leadership. "People were pissed. I think the Speaker heard that and came back pretty quickly to the Capitol. The problem is that the rumor was the leadership was at each other's throats. ... The biggest problem was that they didn't all get their stories straight. Now they're all getting their stories straight, which is important."

Reynolds was not on the conference call Monday with the rest of the leadership team, though he was scheduled to have a press conference Monday night in Buffalo, N.Y., to reiterate the statement he made over the weekend about his knowledge of the Foley affair.

Leaders are furiously working to separate themselves from a series of sexually explicit online communications between Foley and an unknown number of former House pages, which were first publicly revealed last week.

Sources on Monday's conference call said Members supported the leaders' position that there was no prior knowledge of any inappropriate contact between Foley and minors.

Senior members of Hastert's staff, Rep. John Shimkus (R-Ill.), a co-chair of the House Page Board, and then-Clerk of the House Jeff Trandahl led a quiet inquiry into a 2005 e-mail exchange between Foley and the Louisiana page that was dubbed only as "over-friendly" but did result in Foley being advised to end communication with the boy at the request of his parents.

Hastert sought to separate himself from Foley, telling reporters Monday that he recalls little communication between himself and Foley, who was first elected in 1994.

"I've never had a [personal] conversation with him," Hastert said, "Other than his vote on a tariff matter at one time or another, I think."

DOJ_NMG_0073451

Hastert returned to Capitol Hill on Monday to reiterate his commitment to a thorough investigation into Foley's activities and a review of the House page program.

The normally media-averse Speaker spent much of Monday interacting with the press to continue pushing his position that no member of Republican leadership was aware of sexually explicit online communications Foley had with an unknown number of former House pages.

"The instant messages, reportedly between Congressman Foley and a former page sent in 2003, are vile and repulsive to me, and to my colleagues," Hastert said, "No one in the Republican leadership, nor Congressman Shimkus, saw those messages until last Friday when ABC News released them to the public."

Hastert also has committed the House to full cooperation with any and all investigations.

The events of the past week have capped what has been a rocky 109th Congress for Hastert.

While he appears to maintain broad support in the Conference, he and his senior aides increasingly have become the target of behind-the-scenes criticism from rank-and-file Members and aides.

At the kickoff of the 109th Congress, Hastert's staff counsel Ted Van Der Meid was the chief architect of a series of partisan rules changes imposed on the House ethics committee following the admonishments of then-Majority Leader Tom DeLay (R-Texas).

The new rules deadlocked the panel for several months prompting fierce partisan gridlock on the panel until Hastert relented and the House reverted to the old rules.

Hastert was also criticized by DeLay's detractors for not having the foresight to urge DeLay to remove himself from leadership as his ethical troubles worsened and overwhelmed the House majority late last year.

When DeLay stepped down as Majority Leader on Sept. 28, 2005, Hastert was also caught off-guard when his intention to install House Rules Chairman David Dreier (R-Calif.) as temporary Majority Leader was thwarted by the Conference and resulted in a clumsy scenario under which Majority Whip Roy Blunt (R-Mo.) was given the title and Dreier was given a greater role in leadership decisions.

Hastert also was forceful in January 2006 in committing the House to passing a comprehensive lobbying and ethics reform bill in the wake of DeLay's retirement announcement and the expanding scandal surrounding disgraced former lobbyist Jack Abramoff.

The bill never became law despite repeated commitments from leaders, and the House succeeded only in passing smaller rules changes to ban former Members who are lobbyists from the House floor, and to require greater disclosure of earmarks in conference reports.

Hastert also came under fire in May when he and other Congressional leaders took on the Justice Department for what they then described as an unconstitutional raid of Rep. William Jefferson's (D-La.) Congressional office. Jefferson is the target of a federal criminal probe.

While there was bipartisan agreement that the raid raised constitutional issues regarding constitutional Speech or Debate Clause protections provided to Members of Congress, Hastert and his senior aides were criticized for their handling of the matter and for creating the appearance that they sought to protect a Member of Congress from an investigation.

Congressional leaders filed a brief in support of Jefferson's request to have the materials returned to his office on the grounds they were obtained unconstitutionally — the appeal was struck down in court.

While Hastert has said publicly he will stand for re-election for Speaker next year, he has not similarly committed to serving for the full length of the Congress if elected.

In recent weeks, House Republicans have suggested that doubt has increased as to whether Hastert, who has diabetes and has been hospitalized several times for treatment of kidney stones and other health issues, will serve out the full Congress.

If Republicans lose the majority, Hastert is widely expected to leave the House, although he has never said so publicly.

The full repercussions of the Foley scandal have yet to play out, as well as the extent to which it could damage Hastert's standing in the House. While other Congressional leaders are elected only by their party colleagues, the Speaker must be elected by the full chamber.

DOJ_NMG_0073452

If Republicans maintain the majority by similar or smaller margins, it would only take the opposition of a handful of Members against Hastert to potentially threaten his hold on the Speakership.

Leadership elections are scheduled for Nov. 15. The Speaker formally will be elected by the full House on the first day of the new session in January.

Statutory Implications Of E-Mails Are Murky (WP)

By Mary Beth Sheridan

The Washington Post, October 3, 2006

House Speaker J. Dennis Hastert has asked the Justice Department to cast a wide net in its investigation of lewd e-mails sent by a Republican legislator to young pages, even looking into whether other lawmakers learned of them and failed to notify authorities. But legal experts said yesterday that it was unlikely any such third parties would face prosecution.

"As a general proposition, mere knowledge of the fact somebody has committed a crime . . . doesn't expose you to criminal liability," said David Schertler, a former assistant U.S. attorney for the District who is now in private practice.

Hastert's office has acknowledged that his aides learned last year about inappropriate e-mails sent by then-Rep. Mark Foley (R-Fla.) to a 16-year-old page. At the time, Foley was ordered to cut off contact with the boy.

Foley resigned Friday after the revelation of much more sexually explicit messages sent to other pages in 2003.

Stephen Saltzburg, a professor at George Washington University's law school, said it was not clear whether members of Congress or their staffs actually saw any of the e-mails before the current scandal, or had only heard about them.

"That can make a big difference," he said. "But even if they had seen them, they may not have been aware of any criminality associated with that. They may have thought it was improper."

In fact, it is still not certain whether Foley broke the law by sending the messages, Saltzburg noted.

Hastert (R-Ill.) said yesterday that no Republican House leaders had seen the "vile" messages sent in 2003 until Friday. Republican officials have said the 2005 e-mails were "over-friendly" but not sexually explicit.

Legal experts said federal law and some states have an offense called "misprision of a felony," aimed at people who know of a crime and do not report it.

But Schertler said that law is generally interpreted as involving someone who participates in a coverup or has a legal responsibility to report illegal conduct.

"Ethically and morally, it raises a lot of questions" if legislators learned of a possible offense and did not report it, Schertler said. But it probably would not rise to the level of a crime, he said.

E-mails Send House GOP Scrambling (HILL)

By Patrick O'connor

The Hill, October 3, 2006

House Speaker Dennis Hastert (R-Ill.) launched a media offensive yesterday amid mounting criticism of his handling of ex-Rep. Mark Foley's (R-Fla.) e-mail to a 16-year -old page.

The Speaker, who seldom grants interviews to news outlets, held several yesterday with print and television reporters to answer questions about why Republican leaders failed to fully investigate improper e-mail sent by Foley. Hastert's staff acknowledged last weekend that they were told about e-mail between Foley and a former page from Louisiana in the fall of 2005.

Hastert has not disputed that the he was told about the e-mails by Rep. Tom Reynolds (R-N.Y.) earlier this year.

The Speaker's judgment in this case has left some within his own conference questioning his leadership capabilities. At press time, House leadership was holding a conference call with House Republican members.

Hastert publicly maintained yesterday that his staff did everything it could have after Rep. Rodney Alexander (R-La.), whose office sponsored the page, first brought the e-mailto their attention because the page's parents did not want the incident publicized.

"In 2005, we did exactly what we thought the parents wanted us to do," Hastert told a small group of reporters about his staff's review of the e-mail from Foley to the page.

DOJ_NMG_0073453

Hastert said he was not notified of that investigation until his chief of staff, Scott Palmer, and outside counsel, Randy Evans, conducted an internal investigation last weekend to solidify the timeline.

The initial investigation was conducted in coordination with Rep. John Shimkus (R-Ill.), who heads the six-member House Page Board, and former Clerk of the House Jeff Trandahl. The other members of the Page Board were not notified about the investigation.

During an earlier statement in the Capitol yesterday, Hastert tried to make a clear distinction between the language in Foley's email to the Louisiana page and the more salacious instant messages that were released later by news outlets.

"No one in Republican leadership, nor Congressman Shimkus, saw those messages until last Friday when ABC News released them to the public," Hastert said.

Despite that statement, the Speaker later said the e-mail in question did "raise red flags."

Hastert's outreach comes after a prominent member of his own leadership team disputed the his initial account about when he first heard about the e-mail in question.

Reynolds, who chairs the National Republican Congressional Committee (NRCC), released a statement on Saturday saying he first told Hastert about the initial set of e-mail last spring after the Speaker said last week that he first heard about the correspondence when news broke.

In addition to his press outreach, Hastert requested the Clerk of the House to establish a hotline for pages, former pages, their families and anyone else with pertinent information about improper contact between the pages and members or staff.

The FBI confirmed on Sunday that it is investigating Foley's activities.

The news comes just over a month before voters head to the polls to decide the fate of congressional Republicans in the next Congress. Hastert yesterday downplayed the political implications of this episode.

"This is a different issue [than] about whether we have the majority or not," Hastert said.

At press time, two conservative leaders called on Hastert and other GOP leaders to resign.

David Bossie, president of conservative advocacy group Citizens United, said, "This inaction demonstrates a lack of leadership on Speaker Hastert's part, and calls into question both his judgment and character."

Bossie told The Hill, "This is an issue of right and wrong. This is a question of honesty and integrity in government.

Michael Reagan, nationally syndicated radio show host and affiliated with Citizens United, also called for leadership resignations.

Numerous Democratic candidates have criticized Republican leaders for covering up Foley's behavior, and Minority Leader Nancy Pelosi (D-Calif.) called for leaders to be questioned by federal investigators about what they knew and when they knew it.

Many Republicans in the House are upset that they were not notified about the initial investigation and criticized their leaders' handling of the scandal.

A House conservative lawmaker said "he was very disgusted with the leadership," claiming the leaders "should have handed this over to the ethics committee immediately."

The member also questioned Hastert's memory lapse regarding his conversation with Reynolds last spring about Foley.

"I don't think I would have forgotten that conversation," the member said.

"The Speaker should have asked, 'What the hell is going on?'"

Instead of resolving this issue months ago, the matter is playing out weeks before the election, the member said.

Rep. Ray LaHood (R-Ill.), a close Hastert ally and chief of staff to former Minority Leader Bob Michel (R-Ill.), said he emailed Palmer on Sunday telling him to abolish the entire page program until these problems are sorted out.

"This whole thing is going to go a lot deeper than we all realize," LaHood said, falling short of calling for Hastert to dismiss any of his staff.

Foley's lawyer released a statement yesterday announcing that the congressman has checked himself into alcohol rehabilitation facility.

DOJ_NMG_0073454

Meanwhile, the Florida Republican Party named former state Rep. Joe Negron as its candidate to replace Foley. Negron has 35 days to campaign before theelection, and his name will not appear on the ballot. He will receive all the votes cast for Foley. Democrats are now favored to capture that seat.

House Majority Leader John Boehner (R-Ohio) said yesterday on Sean Hannity's radio show that he expects Democrats to win Foley's seat in November.

Leaders over the weekend questioned the exact timeline of events about when members of the leadership knew about the questions involving Foley.

Reynolds statement on Saturday directly contradicted Hastert's initial response to Foley's resignation. NRCC spokesman Carl Forti said the campaign chief released his statement Saturday afternoon "to clarify the timeline."

Foley's office first notified NRCC staff on Wednesday night that ABC had asked them about the initial e-mail, Forti said yesterday.

An ABC News reporter then surprised some Republicans outside a rally at the Capitol Hill Club for GOP-friendly lobbyists, but the questions were about disgraced former lobbyist Jack Abramoff.

Foley's office again contacted the NRCC on Friday morning when they became aware of other instant messages that were more sexually suggestive in nature, Forti said. Upon learning of that second batch of messages, "intermediaries" approached Foley on Reynolds' behalf and told the six-term congressman that he would have to resign, the NRCC spokesman said yesterday.

Hastert yesterday dismissed the suggestion that his staff should have raised the issue with him.

"It was resolved when this thing came out, so I didn't see any reason to bump it up to me," Hastert said yesterday about his staff's review of the e-mail from Foley to a page. "There was no there there."

Boehner and Rep. Marsha Blackburn (R-Tenn.) were scheduled to make media appearances last night to make the case that there is a clear distinction between the initial e-mail and the later instant messages.

Hastert Says He Didn't Know Of Explicit Contact (USAT)

By Kathy Kiely

USA Today, October 3, 2006

WASHINGTON — House Speaker Dennis Hastert defended himself and other Republican leaders Monday against charges they did not move aggressively to investigate Rep. Mark Foley's contacts with teenage boys.

Hastert reiterated that House leaders had no knowledge of sexually explicit instant messages the Florida Republican allegedly sent to several congressional pages until ABC News reported about them Friday.

Foley resigned after ABC questioned him about them.

Speaking to reporters for the first time since the scandal broke, Hastert said House officials had no reason to press further when Foley explained a chatty e-mail to a 16-year-old boy in which the representative requested the former House page's photograph. That e-mail caused the boy's parents to complain, but it contained nothing sexually explicit.

"Would have, could have, should have," Hastert said. "We did what we thought … was prudent at the time."

Hastert's comments came as law enforcement officials in Washington and Florida outlined plans to investigate whether Foley's communications violated state or federal law prohibiting sexual solicitation of minors.

In Florida, Republicans named state Rep. Joe Negron to run in Foley's place Nov. 7. Foley's name will stay on the ballot.

"I'm going to make sure everyone knows that Mark Foley has withdrawn. He's no longer an issue," Negron said.

House Majority Leader John Boehner, R-Ohio, said it would be hard to hold onto the seat.

"In order to vote for this candidate, you have to vote for Mark Foley," Boehner said on The Sean Hannity Show on ABC Radio. "How many people are going to hold their nose to do that?"

Democrats continued to criticize Republicans for not pushing harder when Rep. Rodney Alexander, R-La., told Hastert aides last fall about the e-mail to the 16-year-old. That message was investigated by Hastert's staff and Rep. John Shimkus, R-Ill., head of the three-member House page board.

Republicans "failed to protect the children under their trust," House Minority Leader Nancy Pelosi, D-Calif., said.

Hastert refused to comment directly on the charges.

"This is not an issue of whether we have the majority or not," he said. "This is about how we protect those kids."

John Walsh, host of the television show America's Most Wanted, said he could not believe the double life that Foley led. Walsh's show profiles cases of fugitives, many of whom are accused molesters. "I feel incredibly deceived," Walsh said. "I'm absolutely appalled."

Sen. George Allen, R-Va., and Rep. Clay Shaw, R-Fla., said they will donate campaign contributions from Foley to charities. Allen is giving $5,000 to Enough is Enough, a group that advocates protection of children from Internet pornography. Shaw is giving $2,000 to the Center for Missing and Exploited Children.

On Capitol Hill, Foley's office remained locked. Hastert, who protested the FBI's unannounced raid this year on the office of Rep. William Jefferson, D-La., said he wants federal agents to have free rein. "I expect everybody to cooperate with them," he said.

David Roth, Foley's attorney, said his client entered an alcohol rehabilitation program. Even if he is charged and convicted, Foley will receive an annual congressional pension of about $32,000 once he reaches 62, according to Pete Sepp of the National Taxpayers Union, a watchdog group.

Resign, Mr. Speaker (WT)

The Washington Times, October 3, 2006

The facts of the disgrace of Mark Foley, who was a Republican member of the House from a Florida district until he resigned last week, constitute a disgrace for every Republican member of Congress. Red flags emerged in late 2005, perhaps even earlier, in suggestive and wholly inappropriate e-mail messages to underage congressional pages. His aberrant, predatory -- and possibly criminal -- behavior was an open secret among the pages who were his prey. The evidence was strong enough long enough ago that the speaker should have relieved Mr. Foley of his committee responsibilities contingent on a full investigation to learn what had taken place, whether any laws had been violated and what action, up to and including prosecution, were warranted by the facts. This never happened.

Rep. John Shimkus of Illinois, the Republican chairman of the House Page Board, said he learned about the Foley e-mail messages "in late 2005." Rep. John Boehner of Ohio, the leader of the Republican majority, said he was informed of the e-mail messages earlier this year. On Friday, Mr. Hastert dissembled, to put it charitably, before conceding that he, too, learned about the e-mail messages sometime earlier this year. Late yesterday afternoon, Mr. Hastert insisted that he learned of the most flagrant instant-message exchange from 2003 only last Friday, when it was reported by ABC News. This is irrelevant. The original e-mail messages were warning enough that a predator -- and, incredibly, the co-chairman of the House Caucus on Missing and Exploited Children -- could be prowling the halls of Congress. The matter wasn't pursued aggressively. It was barely pursued at all. Moreover, all available evidence suggests that the Republican leadership did not share anything related to this matter with any Democrat.

Now the scandal must unfold on the front pages of the newspapers and on the television screens, as transcripts of lewd messages emerge and doubts are rightly raised about the forthrightness of the Republican stewards of the 109th Congress. Some Democrats are attempting to make this "a Republican scandal," and they shouldn't; Democrats have contributed more than their share of characters in the tawdry history of congressional sexual scandals. Sexual predators come in all shapes, sizes and partisan hues, in institutions within and without government. When predators are found they must be dealt with, forcefully and swiftly. This time the offender is a Republican, and Republicans can't simply "get ahead" of the scandal by competing to make the most noise in calls for a full investigation. The time for that is long past.

House Speaker Dennis Hastert must do the only right thing, and resign his speakership at once. Either he was grossly negligent for not taking the red flags fully into account and ordering a swift investigation, for not even remembering the order of events leading up to last week's revelations -- or he deliberately looked the other way in hopes that a brewing scandal would simply blow away. He gave phony answers Friday to the old and ever-relevant questions of what did he know and when did he know it? Mr. Hastert has forfeited the confidence of the public and his party, and he cannot preside over the necessary coming investigation, an investigation that must examine his own inept performance.

DOJ_NMG_0073456

A special, one-day congressional session should elect a successor. We nominate Rep. Henry Hyde, also of Illinois, the chairman of the House International Relations Committee whose approaching retirement ensures that he has no dog in this fight. He has a long and principled career, and is respected on both sides of the aisle. Mr. Hyde would preside over the remaining three months of the 109th Congress in a manner best suited for a full and exhaustive investigation until a new speaker for the 110th Congress is elected in January, who can assume responsibility for the investigation.

After Foley, New Fears For The GOP (WP)

By Dan Balz And Jim Vandehei

The Washington Post, October 3, 2006

Republican strategists said yesterday that public revulsion over the sexually graphic online conversations between Rep. Mark Foley (R-Fla.) and former House pages could compound the party's problems enough to tip the House to the Democrats in November -- and could jeopardize the party's hold on the Senate as well.

As House GOP leaders defended their role in handling revelations that forced Foley on Friday to give up his House seat, party strategists said the scandal threatens to depress turnout among Christian conservatives and could hamper efforts to convince undecided and swing voters that Republicans deserve to remain in the majority.

There was intense anger among social conservative activists in Washington yesterday, and some called for House Speaker J. Dennis Hastert (R-Ill.) to resign.

Republican operatives closely following the battle for the House and Senate said that they are virtually ready to concede nearly a third of the 15 seats the Democrats need to recapture control of the House, and that they will spend the next five weeks trying to shelter other vulnerable incumbents from the fallout of the Foley scandal in hopes of salvaging a slender majority.

Districts in which Republicans have effectively walked off the field include Foley's own in South Florida. House Majority Leader John A. Boehner (R-Ohio) said in a radio interview with conservative commentator Sean Hannity that the party's replacement candidate is all but doomed. Because of ballot procedures in Florida, "to vote for this candidate, you have to vote for Mark Foley," Boehner said. "How many people are going to hold their nose to do that?"

Others warned that the impact could be much greater. Tony Perkins, president of the Family Research Council and an important social conservative leader, said "there's a real chance" that the episode could dethrone the Republican majority. "I think the next 48 hours are critical in how this is handled," he said, adding that "when a party holds itself out as the guardian of values, this is not helpful."

Foley's sudden resignation came at the end of a week that had delivered a series of blows to Republican hopes in November. A National Intelligence Estimate asserted that the war in Iraq is fueling new threats from Islamic jihadists faster than the United States and allies can contain them, then a new book by Bob Woodward of The Washington Post said the administration's private assessments of Iraq are far worse than officials are telling the public. Taken together, GOP strategists said, the events of the past 10 days reversed what some Republicans had seen as a modest rebound in September after the worst days of the summer.

By yesterday, a number of GOP strategists reported widespread gloom about the party's prospects, combined with intense anger at the House leadership.

Joe Gaylord, who was the top adviser to Newt Gingrich (Ga.) when Republicans seized control of the House in 1994, was pessimistic about the party's midterm prospects. He said the fallout from Foley's resignation comes "very close" to ensuring a Democratic victory in November.

"The part that causes the greatest fallout is the obvious kind of pall that an incident like this would put on our hardest-core voters, who are evangelical Christians," he said. "The thing I have said almost since this cycle began is the real worry you have is that [Republicans] just won't turn out. This is one more nail in that coffin."

Depressed turnout would not only hurt vulnerable House incumbents but also make it more difficult for Republicans to hold the most competitive Senate seats -- many of those races are now virtually even, according to recent polling.

Hastert faces a spreading revolt among some conservatives over the way he and other GOP leaders handled the matter when first alerted to the contact between Foley and one former House page. Hastert said again yesterday that no House

DOJ_NMG_0073457

Republican leader knew about the most graphic communications until they surfaced on Friday, but that did little to satisfy some conservative activists.

David Bossie, who runs a group called Citizens United, called yesterday for Hastert's resignation and said other conservative leaders are likely to follow suit. Bossie said the initial e-mails alone, which included Foley's request of a minor's picture, should have prompted an immediate inquiry. "That was a cry for an investigation," Bossie said. "Why couldn't the speaker of the House muster the will to stop this?"

Leaders from about six dozen socially conservative groups held a conference call late yesterday afternoon, and participants were described as livid with House GOP leaders.

"They are outraged by how Hastert handled this," said Paul M. Weyrich, a conservative activist who participated in the call. "They feel let down, left aside. How can they allow a guy like [Foley] to remain chairman of the committee on missing and exploited children when there is any question about e-mails?"

Vin Weber, a GOP lobbyist close to the White House and to congressional leaders, said many Republicans outside of Washington are echoing Bossie.

"From what I hear, it is resonating badly and our candidates are on the defensive about this," Weber said. "The maddening thing about this is if they had done the right thing" by informing Democrats early on and investigating it fully, "there would be no political fallout," he said.

Top GOP strategists said party leaders will concentrate on trying to keep the focus of the unfolding story on Foley, rather than on how House leaders responded when informed about his contacts with former pages.

"I don't know of any race ever where the action of one member has impacted the race of another," said Carl Forti, spokesman for the National Republican Congressional Committee.

Republicans are bracing for ads that link previous scandals with the Foley case and ask, "Had enough?" Several strategists said this could be devastating in tight races. The most optimistic scenario offered by GOP strategists is that no new information surfaces and the controversy ends in the next five weeks.

Republicans have designated state Rep. Joe Negron as the substitute candidate in Florida's 16th District, even as Boehner and others denigrate his prospects.

Republicans say they are in grave danger of losing the seat of former House majority leader Tom DeLay (Tex.), as well as those held by Rep. Robert W. Ney (Ohio) -- who agreed to plead guilty to corruption charges in the investigation into the activities of convicted former lobbyist Jack Abramoff -- and Rep. Don Sherwood (Pa.), who has been embroiled in a scandal over an affair.

In addition, Republicans have largely given up on holding the seat of retiring Rep. Jim Kolbe (Ariz.), and strategists are pessimistic about retaining open seats in Colorado and Iowa and the seat now held by Rep. John N. Hostettler (Ind.).

Some Republicans also said Rep. Thomas M. Reynolds (N.Y.), the NRCC's chairman and one of the GOP leaders who knew about a non-graphic communication between Foley and a former page, could face an even tougher challenge for his Buffalo area seat. Reynolds and Hastert sniped at each other over the weekend about who knew what and when.

Hastert Denies GOP Saw Foley's 'Vile' Messages (WT)

By Charles Hurt

The Washington Times, October 3, 2006

House Speaker J. Dennis Hastert said yesterday that Republican leaders had not previously seen the more lurid Internet "instant messages" sent by disgraced ex-Rep. Mark Foley as influential conservatives began calling for party leadership resignations over the handling of the matter.

"The instant messages reportedly between Congressman Foley and a former page, sent in 2003, were vile and repulsive," Mr. Hastert said yesterday. "No one in the Republican leadership ... saw those messages until last Friday when ABC News released them to the public."

Had Mr. Foley not resigned immediately, he added, "I would have demanded his expulsion."

DOJ_NMG_0073458

Still, several well-known conservatives called for Republican resignations because, they said, Mr. Hastert and other leaders did not act aggressively enough when they first learned last year of a separate set of "overly friendly" e-mails that Mr. Foley had sent to another teenage former page.

"Speaker Hastert had knowledge of Congressman Foley's inappropriate behavior and chose to protect a potential pedophile and powerful colleague over a congressional page," David Bossie, president of the conservative group Citizens United, said yesterday.

"This inaction demonstrates a lack of leadership on Speaker Hastert's part and calls into question both his judgment and character," Mr. Bossie said. "If Speaker Hastert was willing to sacrifice a child to protect Representative Foley's seat and his own leadership position, then he surely does not share our American and conservative values."

Richard A. Viguerie, a founder of the conservative movement, called for the "immediate resignation of any House GOP leaders who had knowledge of former Congressman Mark Foley's improper contact with underage pages -- but who took no action."

Mr. Hastert told reporters yesterday that he had been unaware of sexually explicit messages sent by Mr. Foley but had been told about previous, less sordid, messages in which the congressman asked a teen boy what he wanted for his birthday and whether he could provide a photograph of himself.

"There was nothing explicit in this e-mail that I understood," Mr. Hastert told reporters yesterday. "His parents were protective of this thing and what they wanted was Mr. Foley ... to stop contacting their son."

The explanation did not convince Mr. Viguerie.

"When you have a 50-year-old man -- who is a known homosexual -- who wants a picture of a 16-year-old boy, that should send out some alarm bells," he said. "This is almost like a Clinton-type response."

Mr. Foley has refused to answer questions about his sexuality.

Nor did it convince conservative activist Bay Buchanan.

"That e-mail they call an 'overly friendly' e-mail -- that had predator stamped all over it. There's just no one in this country that can suggest otherwise," said Mrs. Buchanan, the president of American Cause.

Such rebukes by conservative supporters yesterday erased any hopes by Republican leaders that they might curtail the political fallout from the scandal, which broke last week just as lawmakers were heading home for November elections that could end their near-continuous 12-year grip on Congress.

"Most Republicans are sticking together," said Hastert spokesman Ron Bonjean. "Most Republicans understand that 30 days before Election Day, we need to stand together and find out what happened and continue fighting the war on terror and cutting taxes."

Conservative outrage echoed that of Democratic leaders.

"Speaker Hastert again failed to answer the question that every mother and father in America is asking: How could Republican leaders choose partisan politics over protecting children?" Minority Leader Nancy Pelosi said after Mr. Hastert held a press conference yesterday with Rep. John Shimkus, Illinois Republican and leader of the Congressional Page Board.

"Republican leaders admitted to knowing about Mr. Foley's abhorrent behavior for six months to a year and failed to protect the children in their trust," she said. "Republican leaders must be investigated by the ethics committee and immediately questioned under oath."

In Florida, meanwhile, Republican leaders tapped state Rep. Joe Negron to run in Mr. Foley's place against Democrat Tim Mahoney, whose campaign had been viewed as a long shot before last week's developments. Though Mr. Foley's name remains on the November ballot, Mr. Negron will be awarded any votes cast for the six-term congressman, according to Florida election law, as well as any write-ins that are cast for him.

"Obviously I'd rather have my name on the ballot, but Mark Foley, that name is a place-holder -- that's it," Mr. Negron told reporters in Orlando yesterday. "He's withdrawn -- not in Congress, not a congressman anymore. This is going to be a race between Joe Negron and Tim Mahoney."

Former Florida Republican Party Chairman Tom Slade said chances are slim that Republicans can hold the seat.

DOJ_NMG_0073459

"I think it's a death sentence ... mission impossible," he said. "The only way you win is [voters] have got to vote for Mark Foley. That doesn't appear to me to be very attractive."

On Sunday night, two days after his resignation, Mr. Foley checked himself into a clinic for treatment of alcoholism, for at least 30 days. He also has issued a statement assuming responsibility for his actions.

Last night, his attorney David Roth told CNN that Mr. Foley is "absolutely, positively not a pedophile" and "has never ever had an inappropriate sexual contact with a minor in his life."

Republicans on Capitol Hill say they feel betrayed by their longtime colleague and offered no words of comfort for him.

"Congressman Foley duped a lot of people," Mr. Hastert said. "He lied to Mr. Shimkus, and he deceived his in-state paper when they each questioned him. He deceived the good men and women in organizations around the country with whom he worked to strengthen our child-predator law. I have known him for all the years he served in this House, and he deceived me, too."

Whatever the cause, Mr. Viguerie said, it's more evidence that Republicans have lost their way.

"This isn't an isolated situation," he said. "It is only the most recent example of Republican House leaders doing whatever it takes to hold onto power. If it means spending billions of taxpayers' dollars on questionable projects, they'll do it. If it means covering up the most despicable actions of a colleague, they'll do it. They've lost their moral rudder."

•This article is based in part on wire service reports.

Analysis: Foley Shadows GOP Election (SFC/AP)

San Francisco Chronicle, October 2, 2006

(10-02) 16:44 PDT WASHINGTON, (AP) --

In a twist on the old Watergate question, the Republican Party is struggling to answer: What did GOP leaders know of a congressman's salacious exchanges with underage male pages and when did they know it?

The truth could determine not only their own political futures but also whether the party can recover from the scandal surrounding former Republican Rep. Mark Foley — and manage to remain in power after Nov. 7.

"I don't think this is so much about Foley as it is about the handling of this," Rick Davis, a Republican strategist, said Monday as the drama rocked the House GOP five weeks before midterm elections, much to Democrats' delight.

"The question becomes who's getting thrown overboard besides Foley to get this to go away," said Tony Fabrizio, another GOP consultant.

The six-term Florida congressman resigned abruptly on Friday after the disclosure that he sent suggestive electronic messages to teenage boys working as House pages. The tawdry turn of events set off finger-pointing among House Republicans and overshadowed what the GOP had hoped would be a triumphant final work week highlighting the party's national security credentials before the campaign's homestretch.

Now, the Republican Party — already facing an unfriendly political environment and the fallout from a new book critical of President Bush's handling of the Iraq war — finds itself knocked even further off message and working to contain the political damage.

Punting on Monday, White House spokesman Tony Snow told reporters: "The House has to clean up the mess, to the extent there is a mess."

On Capitol Hill, House Speaker Dennis Hastert, R-Ill., denounced sexually explicit instant messages Foley sent in 2003 to pages as "vile and repulsive" and denied that House leaders had access to them.

However, Hastert's staff and Republicans in leadership, including Majority Leader John Boehner, R-Ohio, and Rep. Tom Reynolds, R-N.Y., the chairman of the House campaign effort, for months had been aware of a questionable 2005 e-mail exchange between Foley and a Louisiana teen. Reynolds said he also told Hastert, but the speaker said he doesn't recall the conversation.

GOP leaders are facing questions of a cover-up while Democrats across the country seize on the scandal, demanding an independent investigation and calling for some Republicans to resign their leadership posts.

Republican candidates, meanwhile, are distancing themselves from Foley and seeking inquiries. Some Republicans also are calling for accountability from GOP leaders who knew about some of Foley's behavior and failed to take action.

DOJ_NMG_0073460

"If they knew or should have known the extent of this problem, they should not serve in leadership," said Rep. Christopher Shays, a Republican in a competitive re-election fight in Connecticut.

Like other Democrats, his opponent Diane Farrell called the scandal indicative of House Republicans run amok, saying: "This leadership, which has been so terribly wrong on so many policies, now seems willing to cover up events to protect its members."

Privately, some Republicans concede that the party now is in even more danger of losing control of the House and a few fear the scandal could spill over to the Senate as well. Democrats need to win 15 GOP-held House seats and six in the Senate for control after a dozen years of Republican rule.

The fear is that voters already angry with Congress and inclined to favor Democrats will view the scandal as an indictment against the GOP in general and buy into the Democratic argument that change is needed.

In light of the scandal, at least one Republican-held House seat considered safe for Republicans now may be in jeopardy — Foley's seat in Florida. His name must remain on the ballot even though Republicans chose a replacement candidate, state Rep. Joe Negron.

Seeing an opportunity, Democrats rushed to the aid of challenger Tim Mahoney, and the candidate himself wasted no time, launching a fresh round of television ads featuring former Democratic Sen. Bob Graham calling Mahoney someone who "believes in faith, family and personal responsibility."

Carl Forti, a spokesman for the House Republican campaign effort, said that's the only seat that could be affected. "I don't know of any member of Congress who's ever lost because of something a member did or didn't do," he said.

"If Democrats want to play politics with this, they're going to be bitten too," Forti said.

Still, the fallout from Foley's behavior also could complicate Reynolds' re-election bid.

The New York Republican's race against Jack Davis, a millionaire maverick Democrat, has been close for months, and Reynolds' disclosure that he had been told months ago of Foley's inappropriate e-mails plays into one of Davis' central arguments — that Reynolds, as a GOP leadership member, cares more about political dealmaking than his district.

Other Republicans in close re-election fights also are feeling heat.

In Ohio, Rep. Deborah Pryce, a House leadership member, is facing questions about what she knew, and she joined other Republicans — including Reps. Nancy Johnson of Connecticut, Clay Shaw of Florida and Heather Wilson of New Mexico — in saying they plan to donate to charities or return the contributions they received from Foley. Sen. George Allen of Virginia says he'll do the same.

For Hastert, Boehner and others in leadership but not in close races, the ramifications could spread beyond November and into House leadership elections should Republicans hold the House — now a big "if" some Republicans say.

Three decades ago, Republican Richard M. Nixon was dogged by the question of what did the president know about the break-in of Democratic headquarters at the Watergate and when did he know it.

In November 1974, Democrats capitalized on the scandal, seizing scores of congressional seats as the Watergate class swept to office.

Ripple Effect May Shake Reynolds (HILL)

By Jonathan Allen And Aaron Blake

The Hill, October 3, 2006

The political fallout from former Rep. Mark Foley's (R-Fla.) inappropriate electronic communications with underage congressional pages could spread to Rep. Thomas Reynolds' (R-N.Y.) district, according to some political experts.

As Republican leaders scramble to limit the damage to their party, Democrats are drawing a bead on the National Republican Congressional Committee (NRCC) chairman, who has admitted to knowing for months about e-mail contact Foley had with a page.

Sean Kelly, a political science professor at Niagara University in Lewiston, N.Y., said there is reason for Republicans to be worried about Reynolds' seat.

DOJ_NMG_0073461

"The story seems to have some legs, and the current explanation doesn't seem to be cutting it to a lot of people — that he knew and that he passed on the information and the parents didn't want to pursue it," Kelly said. "My perception is that a lot of people are looking at that and saying, 'So what if the parents didn't want to pursue it? It should be pursued.'"

Last week a Survey USA poll found that Reynolds is only leading his opponent by two points. Reynolds and other Republican leaders insist they knew nothing about the most salacious Internet chats, the contents of which have been posted on ABC's website.

"His insistence that he told the Speaker about this some time ago highlights … his own political vulnerability," said Thomas E. Mann, a senior fellow at the Brookings Institution.

Reynolds won a fourth term in 2004 by his slimmest margin to date, 56 percent to 44 percent. Democrat Jack Davis is making a second bid for the seat and said he will pump $2 million of his own money into the campaign.

But Republicans say the Foley story has not made them more concerned about Reynolds's prospects for reelection.

"Not at all," NRCC spokesman Carl Forti said.

Two past NRCC chairmen, Rep. John Linder (R-Ga.) and former Rep. Bill Paxon (R-N.Y.), said Reynolds will be unaffected.

"I don't think last week will have any impact at all," Linder said.

Republican leaders have been working to distinguish between less-suggestive e-mails that they say they were aware of and extremely explicit Instant Messenger conversations that they say they knew nothing about until they were reported by ABC last week.

Paxon suggested that the distinction is important in explaining why Reynolds did not pressure Foley to resign months ago.

"If you're Tom Reynolds and if you thought for a nanosecond that there was a potential scandal there, you would have taken immediate action to get Foley out of the race," Paxon said.

But Democrats say Reynolds kept the e-mail quiet for political purposes.

"When Washington and Republicans in Congress needed a moral compass, Tom Reynolds, as a member of the leadership, swept the facts under the rug and put politics ahead of protecting children," said Jen Psaki, spokeswoman for the Democratic Congressional Campaign Committee (DCCC).

Jim Campbell, a political science professor at the University at Buffalo, said the Foley scandal does not help Reynolds but it probably will not cost him his seat.

"My sense is that this is probably going to be a two-day story. As long as Congressman Reynolds indicates he followed the reasonable procedure in sending along the information about this up through the channels, I wouldn't think it would hurt him much," Campbell said.

Campbell and Kelly said Davis has focused almost entirely on economic issues and they do not anticipate a message shift in the five weeks before the election.

"I'd be surprised if Davis changes tact," Campbell said.

Local Democrats are upset that Davis has been reluctant to attack Reynolds on issues other than the economy, Kelly said.

"I think there are a lot of people in Erie County who are probably pulling their hair out," he said.

But the Davis camp launched a salvo at Reynolds late Monday afternoon.

"Like all of us, Tom Reynolds has a moral obligation to protect our children. He did not care, period," said Davis campaign spokesman Curtis Ellis. "Reynolds should have been demanding accountability from Mark Foley. Instead, he was demanding a $100,000 campaign contribution and took it."

DCCC Chairman Rahm Emanuel (D-Ill.) has targeted Reynolds's seat throughout the 2005-2006 cycle.

Kerry: Foley Scandal Part Of GOP 'culture Of Corruption' (DMR)

By Lisa Ros

Des Moines Register, October 3, 2006

Massachusetts Sen. John Kerry denounced former Rep. Mark Foley during an appearance in Ames today, shaming him for his explicit communications with a teenage congressional page that emerged last week.

DOJ_NMG_0073462

He said he and his wife, Teresa Heinz Kerry, “are just appalled and astonished and angered by the double standard of values.”

“I’m really angry those in a position of responsibility care more about power and politics than protection of children,” he added.

ABC News has printed excerpts of an explicit instant message exchange between Foley and a male page, where the Florida Republican asks the teen about his masturbation habits and the size of his genitalia. Foley, a Florida Republican, resigned Friday.

Kerry, the Democrats' 2004 presidential nominee and a potential candidate for the nomination in 2008, spoke today before participating in a kickoff event for Political Action Week at Iowa State University.

Kerry wouldn’t predict whether the scandal regarding Foley would directly affect mid-term elections in November, but said it adds to the “Republican culture of corruption,” linking it to what he said were failures responding to Katrina, the war in Iraq and the Sept. 11 terrorist attacks.

The Redder They Are, The Harder They Fall (WP)

By Paul Farhi

The Washington Post, October 3, 2006

Sex scandals involving politicians are as old as Thomas Jefferson, but the outcome seems to depend on which party you represent. In recent years, for the most part, Democrats have been able to survive their sordid escapades while Republicans have paid with their political lives.

The latest example: Mark Foley, a Republican congressman from Florida, who abruptly became an ex-congressman from Florida last week amid revelations that he had sent sexually explicit e-mails to teenage boys who were serving as House pages.

Foley's creepy behavior might have done him in even if he'd been the most liberal of Democrats. But that's not assured. With a Republican at the center of the seamy scandal, however, it was almost a slam-dunk that Foley would have to quit.

That's how it usually turns out for members of the conservative, traditional-family-values party. Just ask Bob Livingston, Jack Ryan, Bob Packwood, Dan Crane or others in the GOP who've watched their careers go pffft! with salacious disclosures. Or ask Bill Clinton, Gerry Studds, Barney Frank and other Democrats who've withstood embarrassing revelations to govern another day. Consider, for example:

Â· Packwood, from Oregon, resigned his Senate seat in 1995 amid repeated allegations that he had sexually harassed women. A few years earlier, Rep. Jim Bates, a Democrat from the San Diego area, faced similar allegations by two female staffers. Bates refused to resign and won reelection (he eventually lost his seat to Randy "Duke" Cunningham, who ran into his own ethics problems last year, and resigned after being convicted of bribery).

Â· In 1998, Livingston won the Republican Party's blessing to succeed Newt Gingrich as speaker of the House. But Livingston, of Louisiana, never served a day in the job. He was sunk by revelations that he'd had an extramarital affair, a disclosure that carried the additional baggage of hypocrisy since, at the time, Livingston was leading the Republican impeachment of President Clinton for his affair with Monica Lewinsky. Clinton, of course, ultimately survived impeachment.

Â· Rep. Thomas Evans (R-Del.) was voted out of office in 1982 after he publicly regretted his "association" with a lobbyist named Paula Parkinson, who later posed for Playboy; Evans and two other Republican House members (including one named Dan Quayle) had shared a Florida cottage with Parkinson on a junket. Contrast this to the reaction to allegations of an affair between Sen. Chuck Robb (D-Va.) and Tai Collins, a former Miss Virginia. Robb claimed that Collins had only given him a back rub in a hotel room. Robb won reelection three years later.

Â· The clearest illustration may be in the divergent outcomes of the cases against Crane (R) and Studds (D) in 1983. Both men were censured by the House for having sex with underage congressional pages -- Crane with a 17-year-old girl in 1980, Studds with a 17-year-old boy in 1973. Crane, of Illinois, apologized for his actions, while Studds, who declared he was gay, refused. Crane lost his reelection bid the next year; Studds, of Massachusetts, kept winning his seat until he retired in 1996.

A double standard? And if so, by whom?

DOJ_NMG_0073463

"The reality is that Democrats seem to get away with more," says Chuck Todd, editor in chief of the Hotline, a daily political journal. "They can have an affair and bail [themselves] out. There's a lower threshold for Republicans. I guess it's more of a hypocrisy thing," he adds, because such scandals put Republicans at odds with the party's socially conservative image.

Todd thinks he knows who's to blame for this: "It's the media, to be honest. What is the standard 'gotcha' story in the media? It's hypocrisy. If we can prove hypocrisy, we have a story. . . . So in a sex scandal, the bar for Republicans is lower."

He cites the case of Jack Ryan, the Illinois Republican whose bid for the Senate was derailed in 2004 when his wife, actress Jeri Ryan, alleged in divorce papers that he had taken her to sex clubs and had asked her to engage in sexual activity in front of other patrons. "What's amazing is that his candidacy hit the wall not because he had sex, but because he was thinking about having sex," says Todd.

But it's tough to blame the media when it's the electorate that determines who stays and who goes.

In Studds's case, he happened to represent a liberal (and apparently quite forgiving) district, while Crane came from a conservative rural district. Ditto with Barney Frank, who was reelected in his liberal Massachusetts district after it was revealed that he hired a male prostitute in 1985 to work in his District apartment, and the young man used the apartment to run a prostitution service. Clinton, meanwhile, was elected president twice, which may have had something to do with his ability to survive the storm over alleged extramarital affairs.

"A scandal's a scandal and the media will jump on it, no matter what party," notes Michael Farquhar, author of "A Treasury of Great American Scandals." On the other hand, notes Farquhar, a reporter who is on leave from The Post, "there's probably that extra twinge of delight [in the media] when, say, a gay-bashing Republican gets caught soliciting sex in a men's room, or a pious espouser of family values sleeps with his secretary."

There are exceptions, of course. A few Democrats have lost their jobs as a result of scandals. Wayne Hays, a Democrat from Ohio, resigned his House seat in 1976 after the disclosure of his affair with Elizabeth Ray, the curvaceous blonde who "worked" in Hays's office despite no evident secretarial skills. Gary Hart, who famously dared reporters to follow him around to prove he was squeaky clean, blew up as a Democratic presidential candidate in 1984 after reporters found him leaving a Capitol Hill townhouse after spending the night with a woman not his wife. And Gary Condit, a conservative Democrat from Modesto, Calif., lost his seat in 2002 following saturation coverage of his relationship with murdered intern Chandra Levy.

It's also true that Wilbur Mills, the powerful Democratic chairman of the House Ways and Means Committee in the 1970s, lost his chairmanship after cavorting in the Tidal Basin with Fanne Foxe, "the Argentine Firecracker."

What's forgotten, however, is that Mills won reelection after his Tidal Basin romp; he was stripped of his chairmanship only after he appeared on a stage in Boston with Foxe, apparently drunk. House Democrats demanded his resignation, and got it.

Paging Mr. Hastert (WSJ)

The Wall Street Journal, October 3, 2006

Florida Republican Mark Foley's sexually explicit emails to a Congressional page certainly warranted his resignation from the House, and they may well merit prosecution. But this being five weeks from an election, the GOP House leadership is also being assailed for not having come down more strongly on a gay Congressman for showing a more than friendly interest in underage boys. That's a different issue altogether.

At least this seems to be the essence of the Democratic and media charge against Speaker Dennis Hastert, who admits his office was told months ago about a friendly, non-explicit 2005 email exchange between Mr. Foley and another page. In that exchange, Mr. Foley had asked the teenager "how old are you now" and requested "an email pic."

In our admittedly traditional view, this was odd and suspect behavior, especially because Mr. Foley was well known as a homosexual even if he declined to publicly acknowledge it. And Mr. Hastert was informed that fellow Illinois Republican John Shimkus -- who oversees the page program as part of a six-member board -- spoke privately with Mr. Foley, who explained that the email was innocent.

What next was Mr. Hastert supposed to do with an elected Congressman? Assume that Mr. Foley was a potential sexual predator and bar him from having any private communication with pages? Refer him to the Ethics Committee? In retrospect, barring contact with pages would have been wise.

DOJ_NMG_0073464

But in today's politically correct culture, it's easy to understand how senior Republicans might well have decided they had no grounds to doubt Mr. Foley merely because he was gay and a little too friendly in emails. Some of those liberals now shouting the loudest for Mr. Hastert's head are the same voices who tell us that the larger society must be tolerant of private lifestyle choices, and certainly must never leap to conclusions about gay men and young boys. Are these Democratic critics of Mr. Hastert saying that they now have more sympathy for the Boy Scouts' decision to ban gay scoutmasters? Where's Minority Leader Nancy Pelosi on that one?

Mr. Foley's explicit emails -- which were sent to a former page who had returned home -- clearly crossed the line into "vile and repulsive," as Mr. Hastert put it yesterday. And the Floridian has now resigned in disgrace and is being criminally investigated. This is harsher treatment than was meted out in the past to some Members of Congress who crossed another line and actually had sexual relations with underage pages. Democrat Gerry Studds of Massachusetts was censured in 1983 for seducing a male teenage page, but remained in the House for another 13 years and retired, according to the Boston Globe, with a rich pension.

Mr. Foley lied to many people over the years, most notably to himself. It's one of those human mysteries that someone so prominent, and so active as a spokesman against sexual predators, would send emails that he knew would destroy his career if they became public. That kind of psychoanalysis is above our pay grade.

Yes, Mr. Hastert and his staff should have done more to quarantine Mr. Foley from male pages after the first email came to light. But if that's the standard, we should all admit we are returning to a rule of conduct that our cultural elite long ago abandoned as intolerant.

The Foley Matter (NYT)

The New York Times, October 3, 2006

History suggests that once a political party achieves sweeping power, it will only be a matter of time before the power becomes the entire point. Policy, ideology, ethics all gradually fall away, replaced by a political machine that exists to win elections and dispense the goodies that come as a result. The only surprise in Washington now is that the Congressional Republicans managed to reach that point of decayed purpose so thoroughly, so fast.

That House leaders knew Representative Mark Foley had been sending inappropriate e-mail to Capitol pages and did little about it is terrible. It is also the latest in a long, depressing pattern: When there is a choice between the right thing to do and the easiest route to perpetuation of power, top Republicans always pick wrong.

The news about Mr. Foley should have set off alarm bells instantly, even if the messages the leaders saw were of the "inappropriate" variety rather than the flat-out salacious versions that surfaced last week. But there was certainly no sense of urgency in their response, which seemed directed at sweeping the matter under the rug rather than finding out precisely what was going on.

The obvious first step — notifying the bipartisan committee that oversees the page program — was never taken, presumably because that would have meant bringing a Democrat into the discussions. After Mr. Foley assured everyone that he was simply engaged in mentoring, whatever leadership inquiry there was ended with telling him to stop e-mailing the youth who got the inappropriate letter.

It's astonishing behavior for a party that sold itself as the champion of conservative social values. But then so was the fact that a party that prides itself on fiscal conservatism managed to roll up record-breaking deficits, featuring large amounts of wasteful pork earmarked to the districts of powerful legislators or the profit sheets of generous campaign contributors. So was the speed with which the party that billed itself as the voice of grass-roots exurban and suburban America turned itself into the partner of every special-interest lobbyist with a checkbook.

The good news is that American democracy, so flawed in many ways, is often fairly efficient at punishing parties that become addicted to self-perpetuation. This November may not force Congress to come up with a plan for Iraq, or even immigration. But if it reminds elected officials that there's a punishment waiting for those who fall in love with their own sense of entitlement, it will have done its job.

Adult Supervision (RC)

DOJ_NMG_0073465

Roll Call, October 3, 2006

The burgeoning scandal surrounding resigned Rep. Mark Foley's (R-Fla.) interaction with pages raises a raft of difficult issues. But for GOP leaders, the most troubling must be the question of why they reacted so feebly after first being informed of at least some of Foley's behavior more than 10 months ago.

With the midterm elections now roughly a month away, the public's perception of Congress is in the cellar. And while a variety of foreign and domestic issues have contributed to that unpopularity, the preponderance of scandals over the past two years — the Jack Abramoff affair, the bribery case against jailed ex-Rep. Duke Cunningham (R-Calif.), the fall of Rep. Bob Ney (R-Ohio) and the mounting evidence of impropriety by Rep. William Jefferson (D-La.) among them — has played a large role in fueling the public's disdain. In the opinion of many voters, Members of Congress write laws but view themselves as subject to none.

In each of those previously mentioned instances, offending actions by lawmakers and aides were brought to light by journalists, Justice Department investigations or both, not by the House's self-appointed watchdog — the Committee on Standards of Official Conduct, known as the ethics committee — or by lawmakers scrutinizing each other's behavior.

In the Foley case, Congress once again has shown itself completely incapable of policing its own Members. And in this instance, unlike in other recent scandals, the victims weren't bamboozled taxpayers or defrauded lobbying clients. They were teenagers whose parents entrusted them to the House page program.

Now the FBI is assessing whether Foley broke any laws, as well it should. But the FBI won't reach any conclusions about which Republican leaders, lawmakers and aides knew about Foley's behavior. The agency won't determine how or why the decision was made by the GOP leadership not to launch a wider investigation, refer the matter to the ethics committee or inform any of the chamber's Democrats of the situation. Nor is federal law enforcement empowered to determine whether any of those Members and aides brought discredit to the House as an institution.

That will be the job of the ethics committee, or at least it should be. But in this case, we do not believe the ethics panel can do the job on its own. The potential for conflicts of interest is simply too great, as all five Republican members of the ethics panel were appointed to it by Speaker Dennis Hastert (R-Ill.). And one of the staffers who likely is to come under particular scrutiny, Hastert counsel Ted Van Der Meid, is a former ethics committee counsel who serves as the Speaker's point man on ethics as well as on issues related to the House Clerk's office.

The last time a Speaker of the House was under investigation, a deadlocked ethics panel named an outside counsel in 1995 to probe the use of charities and fundraising groups by then-Speaker Newt Gingrich (R-Ga.). That is the controlling precedent as the ethics panel tries to move forward on the Foley case, and we encourage the committee to name an outside investigator as soon as possible. It may be too late to fix the damage wrought by Foley, but it is not too late for Congress, for once in this sorry affair, to do the right thing.

Foley's Red Lights (LAT)

The Los Angeles Times, October 3, 2006

THE SCANDAL SURROUNDING disgraced Rep. Mark Foley (R-Fla.) is following the familiar Washington pattern, with one side (Democrats, in this case) alleging a coverup and the other (Republicans) railing about a setup. Even the affair itself has a familiar ring: It isn't the first sex scandal involving a congressman and teenage subordinates. What should not be missed amid the partisan sniping is the failure of those involved to see the red flags. The episode should serve as a cautionary tale for all employers, particularly ones who bring youths into the workplace.

Foley resigned Friday after the ABC News website reported salacious instant messages that Foley had sent in 2003 to a male teenager who had been a House page. ABC's revelation, however, came about a year after members of the House leadership were made aware of the allegations about Foley, a deputy Republican whip and chairman — it would be impossible to make this stuff up — of the House Caucus on Missing and Exploited Children.

That's when the office of Rep. Rodney Alexander (D-La.) received copies of four e-mails that Foley had sent to a 16-year-old from Louisiana who had recently completed his term as a House page. The teenager had sent the e-mails to several congressional staffers, telling one that he was "freaked out" by them.

DOJ_NMG_0073466

He was right to be. Anyone trained to recognize the techniques of sexual predators would be disturbed by them.

For starters, Foley used a personal e-mail account instead of the House-issued one, suggesting that he wanted an extra layer of concealment. Out of the blue, Foley asked for a picture and offered a birthday gift. He praised another page's physique and said he "acts much older than his age."

According to House Speaker J. Dennis Hastert (R-Ill.), Alexander's office consulted with Hastert's aides; the clerk of the House; Rep. John Shimkus (R-Ill.), the chairman of the committee that supervised the page program; and, some time later, Rep. Thomas M. Reynolds (R-N.Y.), chairman of the House GOP campaign committee. All of them violated one of the prime rules for protecting against sexual predators: When confronted with something unsettling, don't judge the matter yourself, consult an expert.

Nor did anyone ask other pages about their contacts with Foley. Only after ABC News publicized the e-mails did other former pages come out of the woodwork with more alarming information.

Foley's lawyer announced that the congressman had checked himself into a rehab program for alcoholics, as if drinking too much could somehow explain his attempt to seduce boys one-third his age. A different kind of rehab may be in order for the inattentive lawmakers and staff who oversee the pages.

To paraphrase a former Republican president, when it comes to allegations like these, don't trust — verify.

GOP Leaders Deserve Nothing Less Than To Lose Their Jobs (RC)

By Donna Brazile

Roll Call, October 3, 2006

When the Bush administration fabricated and exploited pre-war intelligence that led us to invade Iraq, there was no outrage. When administration officials deceived us about secret detention facilities operating in foreign countries, there was no outrage. We accepted it when they lied about outing a CIA operative to get back at her whistle-blowing husband, and we accepted it when they lied about receiving potentially illegal contributions and gifts from disgraced lobbyist Jack Abramoff.

And now, we have the Mark Foley scandal.

I don't know about the rest of America, but I have had enough of lies, deceit and distortions of the truth by a majority party seeking to retain political advantage and hold on to power.

The news that Foley, a former Republican House Member from Florida who preyed upon minors, was somehow allowed to remain in office and hold a key leadership position while the House Republican leadership knew about it is both reprehensible and appalling. Sir Edmund Burke once said, "The only thing necessary for the triumph of evil is for good men to do nothing." But what "good men" would turn a blind eye to child exploitation for fear of compromising their majority status?

Never could we have imagined that the culture of corruption would extend to child abuse. It is beyond disgraceful that Speaker Dennis Hastert (R-Ill.), Majority Leader John Boehner (R-Ohio), Rep. John Shimkus (R-Ill.) or National Republican Congressional Committee Chairman Tom Reynolds (N.Y.) would allow electoral concerns to take precedence over protecting the most vulnerable in our society. Good men (and women, too) never should play politics with the safety of our children. For this reason, I would hope the investigation of this matter leads not only to some institutional reforms, but also to the resignation of the leaders who sought to keep this matter under wraps and not expose a sexual predator in their midst.

Let's start with the facts. Soon after Rep. Rodney Alexander (R-La.), a father of three and grandfather of four, learned of the sexually explicit instant messages from Foley to an underage male, he chose to inform Reynolds, who heads House Republicans' campaign arm and is a father of four. Reynolds told Hastert, a father of two, about Foley's indecency months ago, and the Speaker referred the matter to Shimkus, a father of three. None of them reported it to the police. None of them opened an official investigation. None acted like the fathers they are. What if it had been their sons? What would they have done then?

Unflinchingly, my father once faced down a man wielding a knife when he thought I was in danger. I'm sure those Congressmen would have reacted similarly, without fear or hesitation, if it had been their sons, because that is what parents do. But the pages are their sons too, because they are the leaders of the institution to which these children are entrusted. And because we as civilized human beings should have — must have — a collective responsibility for our children.

If these elected leaders can't be entrusted with this most fundamental responsibility, with what can we entrust them?

DOJ_NMG_0073467

Hastert should immediately step down as Speaker and take full responsibility for condoning, by his inaction, child exploitation.

With regard to Shimkus and others who are saying they didn't know about the extent of the vile and reprehensible electronic messages, the truth is that they didn't know because they chose not to ask.

We cannot expect our leaders to be perfect. They are human and they are flawed, but they don't need to be perfect to respond with the requisite moral outrage when a grown man in a position of power preys upon minors. And now, they should all ask themselves: What family value is more important than protecting our children?

We should never allow politics to trump principles, elections to trump ethics or the pursuit of power to trump common decency.

With the media on full alert to this growing scandal, the Republicans are doing what has come normal in their pursuit of power at any cost: They are trying to spin outrage from the public, the media and others as being orchestrated as a Democratic witch hunt.

Sorry, guys, this is the majority party's mess, and if Republicans didn't run Congress as if it belonged to only them and those who stand by them, they probably would have made the right decision about what to do with Foley months (if not years) ago.

If any of us is silent about this horror, we are just as culpable as the individuals responsible for this act and its subsequent cover-up. This is not about partisanship. This is about the total failure of the Republican House leadership to protect children from a predator because they were more interested in protecting themselves.

If you aren't outraged, you aren't paying attention.

Donna Brazile, the campaign manager for Democratic presidential nominee Al Gore in 2000, runs her own grass-roots political consulting firm.

No Spinning Past This Scandal (WP)

By Eugene Robinson

The Washington Post, October 3, 2006

Even when damage control seems a lost cause, I suppose you have to follow the playbook. So Mark Foley resigns his House seat in a nanosecond, then explains those creepy electronic messages to young congressional pages by declaring himself an alcoholic, effectively blaming it all on demon rum. House Speaker Dennis Hastert promptly calls for a really thorough -- meaning really slow -- investigation. The rest of the Republican leadership declares itself shocked and/or saddened, but agrees that the time has come to move on, folks, nothing to see here.

These practiced responses have long served politicians, but you don't get the sense that anyone thinks they'll work this time. There's really no effective spin you can put on the Foley scandal, no way that even the Republican Party's image-making geniuses can make people feel good about a 52-year-old man discussing masturbatory techniques with a male teenager via instant message.

About all the party leadership can do is hope the whole affair is so unsavory that some voters will be too grossed out to pay much attention. Then maybe it wouldn't sink in that House leaders were told in November 2005 -- that's almost a year ago, for anyone who's counting -- about an inappropriate e-mail that Foley had sent to a House page. The situation was handled with nothing more than a quiet warning.

The leadership didn't launch an investigation, which probably would have unearthed the much more explicit instant-message exchange between the Florida Republican and another young male page that surfaced last week. House leaders even let Foley continue to serve as co-chair of the Congressional Missing and Exploited Children's Caucus, an irony too sad and unforgivable to properly enjoy.

Hastert doesn't remember ever being told of any problem with Foley, but others remember telling him about the e-mail incident. That's one of the questions -- What did I know, and when did I know it? -- that Hastert wants investigators to get to the bottom of. Eventually. Certainly after the November elections.

Former speaker Newt Gingrich suggested over the weekend that House leaders may have worried last year that if they pursued the Foley matter, they'd be "accused of gay-bashing." Clearly, in terms of his spinning skills, Gingrich has lost a step.

DOJ_NMG_0073468

The issue was whether a congressman was having improper communications with a child, not whether the congressman was gay; it would have been just as troubling if the e-mail had been sent to a female page. And anyway, it's a little late for the Republicans to denounce gay-bashing after raising it to an art form.

I don't know whether the Republicans will lose control of the House this fall, but I know that they deserve to. That judgment has nothing to do with party politics; there have been times when the Democrats were in control and allowed Congress to sink to a similar level of corruption. But that's surely where we are now, and since the Republicans are the ones in charge, they're the ones who deserve the blame.

We've had the Jack Abramoff scandal. We've had the Randy "Duke" Cunningham scandal. Congress -- especially the House -- has made immigrants into scapegoats. House Republicans didn't even clear their throats in objection when the White House demanded, and eventually won, the right to decide what is and isn't torture. For years now the House has legislated primarily to shovel pork, pork and more pork to the folks back home.

And now, however it happened -- either because of a deliberate political decision or because the institution is so degraded that it couldn't stir itself to action, like an overstuffed aristocrat crippled by gout -- we learn that the House has countenanced a congressman's sick advances toward teenagers.

Congressional pages tend to be idealistic, patriotic young people who wholeheartedly believe in America. Many are contemplating a career in politics, and they are thrilled to have the chance to come to the U.S. Capitol and witness the workings of our great democracy.

Those who came in contact with Mark Foley certainly got a lesson, didn't they?

Famous quotations are the last refuge of newspaper columnists and other scoundrels, so I try to avoid them, but at the moment I can't help thinking of what Oliver Cromwell said to the so-called Rump Parliament in 1653. Voters would do well to send the same message to the House of Representatives next month:

"You have sat too long here for any good you have been doing. Depart, I say, and let us have done with you. In the name of God, go!"

DHS Loses Court Battle Over Collective Bargaining (FEDTIMES)

By Tim Kauffman

Federal Times, October 3, 2006

The Bush administration's decision not to appeal a June court decision striking down key parts of the Homeland Security Department's new personnel system gives unions a clear advantage in negotiating new changes, observers say.

Collective bargaining had been severely curtailed under proposed reforms, which were struck down by federal judges. Managers, for instance, no longer would need to bargain with unions before changing an employee's work assignment, detailing an employee to another location or introducing new technologies.

Now those matters are back on the table, along with changes to the pay and performance appraisal system for union employees that have been on hold pending the court case. Unions now appear likely to have significant say in what reforms are made and how they're carried out.

"It certainly appears that the unions have a whole lot more leverage in the final outcome of this than you would have thought three years ago," said Washington attorney William Bransford, who represents senior executives and other employees and previously handled labor disputes for the IRS.

Meanwhile, the department has proceeded with changes to the pay and performance management systems for nonbargaining unit employees. About 4,000 supervisors and nonbargaining unit employees currently are covered under the new personnel system, and another 6,700 managers and supervisors were scheduled to convert on Oct. 1, department spokesman Larry Orluskie said.

The department's lost court battle also may bode ill for the Pentagon, which is fending off its own court challenge by unions of its planned labor-management and employee appeals rules.

DOJ_NMG_0073469

Those Defense Department rule changes — which are similar to those struck down at Homeland Security — were ruled illegal in February by a judge with the U.S. District Court for the District of Columbia. Defense has appealed that court ruling, and court arguments are scheduled for later this fall.

Joyce Frank, spokeswoman for the National Security Personnel System, said department officials remain hopeful for a favorable ruling. In the meantime, the department is continuing to roll out personnel changes that are not affected by the court ruling to nonbargaining unit employees.

In the case of Homeland Security, the government had until midnight Sept. 25 to appeal the June 27 decision by the U.S. Court of Appeals for the District of Columbia Circuit that invalidated the department's proposed changes to Title 5 rules. Those rules govern collective bargaining, labor management procedures, and employee appeals of disciplinary actions. On Sept. 26, Homeland Security announced that the Justice Department would not pursue an appeal before the Supreme Court, ending the court battle.

Now Homeland Security officials are weighing their options: Either propose a new set of labor-management rules that would survive a court challenge, or resort to existing rules, embodied in Title 5, that govern labor-management relations at most agencies.

Colleen Kelley, national president of the National Treasury Employees Union, which led the union coalition that won the court case, sent a letter to Homeland Security Secretary Michael Chertoff on Sept. 28 asking him to abide by existing contracts and work with the unions on any changes the department would like to make.

"I hope they will be more realistic about addressing valid issues that they need to address and rules they need to change, rather than this far-reaching approach," she said in an interview. "They were trying to make change just because they could, not because it was anything that would improve the department."

Administration officials could still push for substantial changes to existing labor-management rules, but there's a danger of drawing yet another lawsuit from the unions if it doesn't allow for collective bargaining. The judicial rulings held that the initial changes did not meet Congress' requirement that collective bargaining rights be preserved.

Another lawsuit would eat into the short time that's left to make changes; officials have until January 2009 to make any reforms under the 2002 law authorizing the changes.

"They're running out of time," said Mark Roth, general counsel for the American Federation of Government Employees, which was a member of the union coalition that brought the lawsuit. "Certainly anything other than going into this with an open mind and sincere good faith really makes no sense for them."

Roth said AFGE has a number of ideas for improving the existing collective bargaining process, such as imposing time limits on bargaining, allowing managers to make workplace changes in some instances before bargaining occurs, and allowing for more discussion of what's open to negotiation.

Still, he surmises that between 70 percent and 80 percent of the changes Homeland Security wanted to make under the initial reforms would be subject to collective bargaining under existing Title 5 rules.

"How you do pay pools, [compensation] surveys, how you move through a pay band and appealing decisions are going to be subject to negotiations ultimately," Roth said. "I don't believe the issue of whether we're going to have pay bands is bargainable. But so many of the details are bargainable."

For now, existing collective bargaining agreements remain in effect until the department proposes any new rules and discusses them with union leaders.

The department's willingness to sit down and negotiate with the unions remains uncertain. Managers have not been abiding by the terms of existing union contracts, NTEU's Kelley said. Violations range from making unilateral changes to work shifts and assignments without employee input to not including the union in award decisions, she said.

"We see an across-the-board intent to not abide by negotiated agreements and force the union into enforcement mode rather than a problem-solving mode," Kelley said.

As Term Begins, Justices Reject 1,900 Appeals (WP)

The Washington Post, October 3, 2006

DOJ_NMG_0073470

As the Supreme Court began a new term yesterday in which it will rule on landmark social issues, it rejected about 1,900 appeals that piled up during the summer recess.

Among the cases the justices declined to hear were a challenge to a Texas law that bans the sale of sex toys, objections by parents in California to a mandatory class on Islam, and an appeal of lower-court rulings that the managers of Detroit newspapers acted improperly when they fired striking workers.

The nation's highest court reconvened, as required, on the first Monday in October. But because this year that day fell on Yom Kippur, the holiest day of the Jewish calendar, the session was brief -- about 10 minutes -- and the justices did not hear oral arguments. The court's two Jewish members, Justices Ruth Bader Ginsburg and Stephen G. Breyer, were absent.

During its new term, the Supreme Court has agreed to rule on potential landmark cases on abortion rights, the environment and racial diversity in schools -- some of the country's most contentious social issues. It will be the second full term for Chief Justice John G. Roberts Jr., who succeeded the late William H. Rehnquist, and the first full term for Justice Samuel A. Alito Jr., who replaced the more moderate Sandra Day O'Connor. President Bush appointed the two conservative justices.

In the Texas case, an employee of an adult bookstore in El Paso was arrested in 2003 for selling a sex toy to undercover police officers. He was charged under the Texas law that bans the sale of an "obscene device" designed primarily "for the stimulation of human genital organs."

His attorney said the law was unconstitutional because it violated the right to sexual privacy without government interference. The court, which last year rejected a challenge to a similar Alabama law, denied the appeal without any comment.

The justices rejected an appeal brought by Jonas and Tiffany Eklund, who contended that the Byron Union School District, east of San Francisco, violated constitutional guarantees separating church and state when it required students in a world history class to read pages from the opening chapter of the Koran and study Islam's Five Pillars of Faith in a unit on Muslim culture.

"Parents entrust public schools with educating their children, not indoctrinating them in religion," the Eklunds' attorneys stated in a brief asking the Supreme Court to take the case. "The public school here had children become Muslims for three weeks."

The U.S. Court of Appeals for the 9th Circuit ruled that the activities were not overt religious exercises and therefore did not raise constitutional concerns.

The justices also declined to hear an appeal of a National Labor Relations Board ruling ordering the partnership that prints, distributes and sells advertising for the Detroit News and Detroit Free Press to reinstate employees who were fired during an 18-month newspaper strike in the mid-1990s.

The workers lost their jobs after the newspapers said they blocked entrances at a distribution facility and the Detroit News building, in violation of court orders, during the strike. It ran from July 1995 to February 1997.

The NLRB determined that the employees had not engaged in misconduct but were rather exercising their right to strike. It ordered the employees reinstated with back pay.

High Court Rejects Appeal Of Trade-Case Decision (WSJ)

By Mark Anderson

The Wall Street Journal, October 3, 2006

WASHINGTON -- The Supreme Court declined to take up a U.S.-China trade issue, rejecting an appeal on whether courts can review presidential decisions on import-restriction recommendations by the U.S. International Trade Commission.

The denial came as the high court cleared the decks for its new session with rejection of more than 1,900 appeals that piled up over the summer. The justices met in an abbreviated session yesterday because of the Yom Kippur holiday and will begin hearing oral arguments today.

The legal challenge to President Bush was brought by Motion Systems Corp., an Eatontown, N.J., maker of pedestal parts for motorized wheelchairs. The company filed a complaint with the ITC in 2002 arguing Chinese imports of similar products threatened its business.

DOJ_NMG_0073471

Motion Systems cited a trade provision that was added to U.S. legislation in 2000 approving China's membership in the World Trade Organization, designed to police the effect of Chinese imports on U.S. businesses. A handful of companies have used the law to seek quotas against Chinese products, but met resistance from the Bush administration.

The ITC recommended the U.S. impose quotas on the Chinese imports for three years. The U.S. Trade Representative reviewed the ITC decision and submitted a recommendation to the White House. President Bush in January 2003 rejected restricted trade in the electric-scooter devices, saying "the import relief would have an adverse impact on the U.S. economy clearly greater than the benefits of such action."

The company appealed the decision to the Federal U.S. Circuit Court of Appeals in Washington, which handles patent and certain trade appeals. In February 2006, the Federal Circuit ruled Congress didn't give it authority to review the president's decision.

(Motion Systems v. Bush)

In other business cases, the justices declined to block legal efforts by California to seek as much as $5 billion in financial restitution from PG&E Corp. for consumers harmed by the state's 2000 energy crisis; declined to consider whether national bank laws prevent bank officers from using state age-discrimination laws to fight their termination; and declined to intervene in whether former shareholders in Peregrine Systems Inc. can use California insider-trading laws to sue former board members of the company, which went bankrupt in 2003 after an accounting scandal.

(PG&E Corp. v. California, U.S. National Bank Association v. Kroske and Moores v. Friese)

When Ideologies Clash, Justice May Tip Supreme Court's Balance (WSJ)

By Jess Bravin

The Wall Street Journal, October 3, 2006

WASHINGTON -- Ever since Justice Sandra Day O'Connor retired in January, the High Court has been dubbed the Kennedy Court. Between a bloc of four conservatives facing off against four liberal-leaning members, Justice Anthony Kennedy, with his own occasionally idiosyncratic jurisprudence, may tip the balance on hot-button cases.

Seeing Justice Kennedy as the new swing vote, attorneys readying for the Supreme Court's annual term that begins this week have been plumbing nearly two decades of Kennedy opinions, searching for arguments that could persuade the justice that they have the law right.

The trick for advocates is finding how to do that.

"It is hard to think of a surefire way to reach Kennedy, because his jurisprudence does not have a coherent and consistent methodology, like Scalia's originalism or Breyer's pragmatic consequentialism," says Northwestern University law professor John McGinnis. Justice Antonin Scalia says his legal thinking is yoked to the original meaning of legal text; Justice Stephen Breyer asks how a particular outcome will affect what he regards as the broader constitutional or statutory goal.

Prof. McGinnis suggests that "the best way to appeal to Kennedy is to quote his own opinions back to him." That isn't just an appeal to the justice's "vanity, but also to their sense of continuity," he says. "The second-best is to show through amicus [friend-of-the-court] briefs or otherwise that the great and good favor the position, because Kennedy seems influenced by the establishment's views."

Mark Levy, director of appellate advocacy for Kilpatrick Stockton LLP in Washington, agrees. Justice Kennedy "is a person of broad sweep. He has an interest in the court as an institution, he has an interest in history, he's a justice who looks to foreign law when it's helpful to him," Mr. Levy says. "You'd bring in history not so much the way you would with Justice Scalia and saying, 'It's settled,' but rather, 'This is how it's developed and this is how the court will be viewed 10 or 50 or 100 years from now.' "

Several cases on the court's docket may touch conflicting strains in Justice Kennedy's jurisprudence, lawyers say. On Nov. 8, for instance, the justices are slated to hear arguments over the federal Partial-Birth Abortion Ban Act, which Congress passed in 2003 after a 5-4 Supreme Court struck down a similar state law in Nebraska. Lower federal courts have invalidated the 2003 law as contrary to the court's earlier opinion.

"Both sides have to be cognizant of the fact that [Justice Kennedy] wrote a strong dissent" from the 2000 decision invalidating the Nebraska law, says Duke University law professor Erwin Chemerinsky. "On the other hand, this is a federal statute to overturn a Supreme Court decision, and he has been very hostile to that" practice, Mr. Chemerinsky says. The government would be wise to raise the Kennedy dissent from the 2000 case, he suggests, while abortion-rights advocates should appeal to stare decisis, the principle of adhering to settled precedent, by citing Justice Kennedy's 1997 majority opinion striking down a federal law adopted to overturn one of the court's religion rulings.

DOJ_NMG_0073472

In another test of Justice Kennedy's views, the court will decide whether public-school systems can consider a pupil's race in making school assignments, to promote classroom diversity.

In 2003, Justice Kennedy voted to strike down undergraduate- and law-school admissions systems at the University of Michigan for giving improper advantages to minority applicants. (Justice O'Connor cast the deciding vote then, joining different blocs to uphold the law school's system, but invalidating the undergraduate-admissions system.)

But in his dissent, Justice Kennedy wrote that under different circumstances, it could be acceptable to consider race to promote an ethnically diverse student body.

The Bush administration, opposing the diversity plans, cited Justice Kennedy by name 13 times in its friend-of-the-court briefs, zeroing in on his Michigan dissent. The briefs cite only one other sitting justice by name: Clarence Thomas, twice.

On the other side, Tom Goldstein, who represents the National Association of School Boards in defending the admissions systems, says he will aim to show they fit within the narrow opening Justice Kennedy left for racial classification.

Mr. Goldstein, who heads the Supreme Court practice at Akin Gump Straus Hauer & Feld LLP in Washington, points to a lower-court concurrence by conservative U.S. Circuit Judge Alex Kozinski that upheld one of the challenged plans.

"We have his protégé on the Ninth Circuit with a concurring opinion that was almost directed at Justice Kennedy," Mr. Goldstein says. Judge Kozinski wrote that the challenged program was unlike affirmative-action systems previously considered by the Supreme Court, and rather was "a plan that gives the American melting pot a healthy stir without benefiting or burdening any particular group."

Justice Kennedy, appointed in 1988, was President Reagan's third choice to succeed Justice Lewis Powell. The first, Judge Robert Bork, was rejected by the Democratic-controlled Senate as too ideologically extreme, while a second nominee, also a strict conservative, withdrew after damaging personal revelations. Justice Kennedy, then a federal appeals judge in California, was selected as a less-controversial conservative who could win confirmation in an election year.

Since then, Justice Kennedy has lived up to expectations, usually conservative on law-and-order cases but occasionally disappointing the right, particularly in social issues such as gay rights and abortion. More broadly, he has seen a bigger role for courts in applying the law than many conservatives would prefer and looked to international law and opinion in making ethical judgments.

"He's a judicial supremacist," says Prof. Michael Dorf of Columbia Law School, a former Kennedy clerk. According to a study of court decisions from 1994 to 2005 by University of Kentucky law professor Lori Ringhand, Justice Kennedy voted to invalidate more state and federal laws than any other justice.

In the most recent term, Justice Kennedy voted more often with the conservative bloc of Chief Justice John Roberts and Justices Scalia, Thomas and Samuel Alito than the liberal wing of Justices Breyer, John Paul Stevens, David Souter and Ruth Bader Ginsburg. But he also frustrated conservatives, for instance joining a majority that struck down President Bush's plan to create military tribunals for suspected terrorists without congressional approval.

Of course, focusing exclusively on trying to sway Justice Kennedy has its risks. "If you rely on international law and make a fairly blatant play to get Kennedy, you might have taken Justices Scalia or Thomas out of the loop," says Carter Phillips, a Sidley Austin partner with two cases on this year's high-court docket. "It's hard to write a brief to pick up a single vote, because at the end of the day, that might be all you get."

Justice For Immigrants (NYT)

The New York Times, October 3, 2006

The Supreme Court starts off its term today with arguments in a pair of immigration cases that turn on a technical issue but could have a considerable impact on the real world. If the court gives the words “illicit trafficking” the wrong interpretation, as some lower courts have, a significant number of legal immigrants could be unjustly uprooted and deported, or given unduly harsh criminal sentences.

DOJ_NMG_0073473

Federal immigration law, quite reasonably, imposes special conditions on legal immigrants who are convicted of "aggravated felonies." The law says that "illicit trafficking" in drugs is an aggravated felony, and today's cases pose the question of what that means. The plain meaning of "trafficking" in drugs is engaging in commercial activity. But some courts have ignored this plain meaning and held that simple possession of drugs can count, and therefore can be an aggravated felony.

That is the situation of the defendants in today's cases. Reymundo Toledo-Flores was convicted of possession of cocaine, and Jose Antonio Lopez was convicted of aiding and abetting possession of cocaine. The courts that heard their cases ruled that their convictions qualified as trafficking, and therefore as aggravated felonies. This legal exaggeration has serious consequences. Noncitizens convicted of aggravated felonies can more easily be deported and can be barred from becoming American citizens. They can also receive substantially longer prison sentences if they commit future crimes.

The legal climate is not particularly hospitable to immigrants right now, and Mr. Toledo-Flores and Mr. Lopez have the additional disadvantage of coming to court having been convicted of crimes. But their crimes were minor ones that cannot properly be described as aggravated felonies. As the American Bar Association notes in a friend-of-the-court brief, treating the two men as if they had committed worse crimes than they did "leads not only to individual injustices" but also harms "the integrity and fair and regular operation of the criminal justice system."

Senate Confirms Director Of National Parks (NYT/AP)

By The Associated Press

The New York Times, October 3, 2006

A British native and career Interior Department employee has been confirmed by the Senate as director of the National Park Service. The new director, Mary A. Bomar, left, was one of four Interior Department officials confirmed by the Senate at 2 a.m. on Saturday as lawmakers rushed to finish work before recessing. Ms. Bomar succeeds Fran P. Mainella, who announced her resignation in July.

Pentagon Gets New Office (HILL)

By Roxana Tiron

The Hill, October 3, 2006

After weeks of intense discussions, congressional defense authorizers approved the Pentagon's request for a 10th assistant secretary of defense — a pivotal position in a big reorganization planned to take place over the next year.

But the nod for an assistant secretary for global security affairs comes with strings attached. And as the Pentagon planned to start implementing its preliminary phase of reorganization yesterday, it also had to start preparing a report to answer several congressional concerns by February 1.

Conferees on the 2007 defense authorization bill said they agree with adjusting roles and responsibilities within the office of the undersecretary of defense for policy, headed by Eric Edelman, but that they had serious concerns about the plan as it stands.

The details have been very closely held within the Pentagon, according to a House source familiar with the discussions during the bill's conference.

But defense authorizers are "trying to keep an open mind and giving them [the policy shop] a chance to explain," the source said.

The policy shop shake-up required legislation to add a 10th assistant secretary. The new secretary will have to be confirmed by the Senate, but that is not expected until January.

The reorganization is meant to bring a key Pentagon office into line with the U.S. military's need to respond to a widening array of transnational threats, to manage international military coalitions, and to equip partner nations to fight terrorists.

But among other concerns, the current overhaul plan touches on one of Congress's soft spots: the U.S. military's counter-narcotics mission.

House Speaker Dennis Hastert (R-Ill.) has cast doubt on the reorganization because he fears it will hurt congressional oversight and the military's counter-drug mission.

DOJ_NMG_0073474

Staff from the House Government Reform panel, the International Relations panel, the Armed Services committee, and several Senate staff members have also grilled Pentagon officials about the plan.

The Pentagon wants the deputy assistant secretary of defense for counter-narcotics to report to the new assistant secretary of defense for global security affairs.

At present, counter-drug missions are overseen by the civilian Special Operations and Low Intensity Conflict Office (SO/LIC), which is also part of the policy shop.

Under the new arrangement, SO/LIC would lose counter-narcotics and be renamed as SO/LIC and Interdependent Capabilities.

This sparks congressional fear that the counter-narcotics office would lose direct access to money slated for counter-drug operations in a central transfer account.

This allows the office to move quickly and avoid a lengthy approval process if money is needed urgently. It also allows Congress to know exactly what the money is spent on.

Under the Pentagon's plan, the counter-narcotics office would also oversee counter-proliferation missions and other global threats, including avian flu.

Initially the Pentagon intended to move money from the central transfer account for counter-drug operations to a subordinate agency, raising fears that counter-narcotics would lose financial flexibility, with money trapped in bureaucracy.

But according to a Senate source, the Pentagon gave way to congressional pressure and agreed during conference talks to keep the money within the policy shop.

The expanded counter-narcotics office will have oversight of the money and call the shots on program execution, according to the House source.

Conferees expressed concern that the counter-drug office's enlarged portfolio and reorganization would dissipate its focus.

"The large number of significant issues that would reside in this organization could mean that insufficient personnel and resources are devoted to the critical and diverse issues assigned to this assistant secretary of defense," including critical missions of counter-proliferation and combating weapons of mass destruction, according to the conference report.

Lawmakers also warned that management of counter-narcotics policy must remain consistent with congressional intent and the effective use of the central transfer account. "Separating [counter-narcotics] oversight from the administration of the central transfer account would likely reduce the effectiveness and responsiveness" of the office, conferees wrote.

The Pentagon will probably face pressure from Sen. Richard Lugar (R-Ind.), chairman of the Foreign Relations Committee and one of the brains behind the Nunn-Lugar program designed to eliminate the proliferation of nuclear, chemical and biological weapons.

In a letter to Edelman last month, Lugar called the merger of counter-narcotics and counter-proliferation missions "a mistake," adding, "these jobs are too big and too important for any one person."

It will be the deputy assistant secretary who will have to split the attention for the two large missions, he said.

The Pentagon planned to start its major reorganization yesterday, mostly reshuffling regional policy offices.

Abramoff Report Reveals Ties To GOP, Democratic Members (HILL)

By Elana Schor

The Hill, October 3, 2006

The House Government Reform Committee report released late last week on the 400-plus communications between Bush administration officials and disgraced lobbyist Jack Abramoff and his colleagues also provides new evidence of the extensive reach "Team Abramoff" maintained among lawmakers and aides from both parties.

Abramoff and lobbyists formerly working under him at Greenberg Traurig claimed meeting with 24 senators, 19 House members and more than 100 aides — at least 20 of them Democratic — on behalf of the Saginaw Chippewa tribe of Michigan, according to a summary released as part of supplementary evidence to the Government Reform report. Lawmakers' names were all redacted by committee staff, but aides' names were released and represent Democratic as well as Republican members.

DOJ_NMG_0073475

The Government Reform panel conducted its inquiry as part of its executive-branch oversight duties, and the bulk of its 93-page report focuses on attempts by Abramoff and his lobbying team to leverage their White House contacts, including Deputy Chief of Staff Karl Rove and now-GOP national chairman Ken Mehlman, for a variety of favors.

But in the Saginaw Chippewa work summary, provided to the committee by the lobbying firm, Abramoff and his colleagues touted their skills at securing federal appropriations for roads, a school and a crime-prevention center for the Chippewas, who took in a significant income from their Soaring Eagle casino.

The lobbyists also played up their thwarting of neighboring tribes' efforts to open casinos that "not only threaten the Tribe's market share, but challenge the long-respected procedures for putting land into trust and establishing a casino operation on tribal lands."

Among the victories Abramoff's team claimed was securing an objection by now-Senate Minority Leader Harry Reid (D-Nev.) to a bill by Sen. Debbie Stabenow (D-Mich.) that would have allowed another Michigan tribe to open a casino potentially harmful to the Chippewas' gambling operation. When Stabenow moved to pass her bill by unanimous consent, the summary states, "we were successful in obtaining an objection … and thereby were able to defeat the proposal for the year."

Reid has consistently opposed expansion of casinos off existing Indian reservations, and he registered his objection on Nov. 19, 2002, on those grounds. "The land claim is simply – and everyone knows this – an excuse to take land into trust for off-reservation gaming," Reid said then on the floor.

"[Reid's] opposition to the Bay Mills casino was based on this longstanding policy position [against off-reservation casinos], not on the views of lobbyists," spokesman Jim Manley said in an e-mail. "It is now well-known that Abramoff and his associates exaggerated their influence."

Stabenow spokeswoman Angela Benander said that any actions taken on behalf of the Bay Mills tribe or Chippewas were done to support the senator's constituents and with the support of other Michigan lawmakers.

The majority of the aides with whom Abramoff and his colleagues met were Republican, including several from the GOP's two campaign committees. Abramoff achieved "Pioneer" status in 2004 for raising at least $100,000 to aid President Bush's reelection.

The Democratic aides taking meetings with Abramoff's team, according to the work summary, represented Reid, Stabenow, Sen. Carl Levin (D-Mich.), retired Sen. Ben Nighthorse Campbell (D-Colo.), former Senate Minority Leader Tom Daschle (D-S.D.) and Rep. John Dingell (D-Mich.), among others.

The lobbyists also reported meeting with Debbie Dingell, wife of the House Energy and Commerce Committee ranking member and an influential lobbyist in her own right, as well as representatives for the centrist New Democratic Network and the Democratic Senatorial Campaign Committee.

Both Government Reform Chairman Tom Davis (R-Va.) and Waxman, in their public comments following the report's release, noted that they based their inquiry on potentially exaggerated information the Abramoff lobbyists provided to their employer.

"The documents we are releasing are authentic, but that does not mean that Mr. Abramoff or his associates are telling the truth," Waxman said Thursday, calling for further investigation into the executive-branch lobbying in the report.

Some on Capitol Hill have speculated that the Government Reform report, though overshadowed during the weekend by reports of the unfolding scandal surrounding former Rep. Mark Foley (R-Fla.), could add new potency to Democratic charges that the GOP has fallen victim to a "culture of corruption" that has its roots in the Bush White House.

But since Abramoff registered his guilty plea in January, incumbent Republican ties to his crimes have become a central campaign issue for only a handful of Democratic challengers, including Montana state Sen. Jon Tester (D), who opened a seven-point lead over Sen. Conrad Burns (R-Mont.) in a poll released this week. Burns had come under fire for helping the Chippewas win some appropriations.

Abramoff's largesse to Democrats, underscored by the work summary, remains a potent counterargument for Republicans. When Rep. Sherrod Brown (D-Ohio), running a close race against incumbent Sen. Mike DeWine (R-Ohio), sought to link DeWine to Abramoff and other ethically challenged Republicans during their debate on "Meet the Press" on Sunday, host Tim Russert pointed out that about one-third of Abramoff clients' political donations went to Democrats.

DOJ_NMG_0073476

“Maybe it did, but it didn’t go to me,” Brown replied, pivoting to criticism of DeWine’s vote in favor of the Medicare prescription drug benefit.

Congress Sets Military Pay Raise, Punts On Civil Service (WP)

By Stephen Barr

The Washington Post, October 3, 2006

Hours before wrapping up for its campaign break, Congress nailed down a 2.2 percent pay raise for the armed forces but left resolution of the federal employee raise to a lame-duck session next month.

The pay raise was approved late last week by the House and Senate as part of the fiscal 2007 defense authorization bill, which sets out policy and personnel goals for the Defense Department. The across-the-board raise will take effect in January, and additional raises for senior enlisted personnel and warrant officers will begin in April.

The House version of the bill had called for a 2.7 percent across-the-board military raise, but House and Senate negotiators chose to go with the Senate's proposed 2.2 percent increase, which matched the adjustment approved by Congress in an appropriations bill.

Veterans and employee groups decried the pay decision as meager.

"We're extremely disappointed, to put it mildly, that Congress couldn't see its way clear to provide more than a 2.2 percent pay raise for the troops who are putting their lives on the line every day for the rest of America," said Steve Strobridge , director of government relations for the Military Officers Association of America.

"That's the smallest military raise in 13 years," he noted.

Colleen M. Kelley , president of the National Treasury Employees Union, called the 2.2 percent raise "a shameful decision during a time of war."

In his 2007 budget request, President Bush recommended a 2.2 percent raise for the military and the civil service.

The House, however, approved a 2.7 percent raise for federal employees, and a Senate bill, which did not reach the floor, also has proposed a 2.7 percent civil service raise.

Congress, in most recent years, has followed a "pay parity" approach to raises, ensuring equal average salary increases for the military and the civil service. Given that history, Congress may scale back the federal employee raise when it returns in mid-November to take up unfinished spending bills. Congress also may be reluctant to give government civilians a larger raise than the troops because of their sacrifices in Iraq and Afghanistan.

In a statement, Sen. John W. Warner (R-Va.), chairman of the Senate Armed Services Committee, said that the defense authorization bill had won bipartisan support and predicted that it would improve the quality of life for members of the armed forces and their families.

The legislation provides for more than 20 types of bonuses and special payments aimed at encouraging enlistment and re-enlistment, the committee said.

It also expanded eligibility for Tricare, the military health insurance program, to allow members of the Selected Reserve -- those who train regularly -- to buy into the program when they are not on active duty. The legislation also prohibits any increase in Tricare enrollment premiums and in pharmacy co-payments in fiscal 2007.

As part of the legislation, Congress ordered the Pentagon to prepare a strategic plan to improve Defense's senior management and technical workforce, including scientists and engineers "in light of recent trends and projected changes in the mission."

Congressional aides are interested in learning how the department makes use of its senior-level civilians. Like other departments, Defense has a graying workforce, with substantial numbers of retirements expected in the next few years, and could have difficulty offsetting the loss of experienced hands, especially in science and engineering.

House-Senate negotiators dropped a provision that would have expanded protections to federal employees who blow the whistle on waste, fraud and abuse. The White House opposed the provision, which was in the Senate's version of the bill.Keeping Track of Homeland Security

DOJ_NMG_0073477

Congress has asked the Department of Homeland Security to submit a spending plan for the troubled overhaul of its personnel system. In an unusual move, Congress directed the department to include a list of its contract obligations for the new system.

House-Senate negotiators on the fiscal 2007 appropriations bill for Homeland Security provided $25 million for the new system, MaxHR. The president's budget had sought about $42 million, but congressional aides said delays caused by court litigation mean the department can get along with less funding for the short term.

The spending bill will add 1,500 new Border Patrol officers, bringing that workforce to 14,800.

Congress Leaves Big Question Mark On Pay Raises (WT)

By Mike Causey

The Washington Times, October 3, 2006

There is good news and bad news on the federal employee and military pay front.

The good news is that Congress finally has passed legislation that would guarantee a pay raise effective in January.

The not-so-good news: The raise, part of the defense authorization bill, is only for uniformed military personnel -- not federal workers -- and is only 2.2 percent.

Confused? Welcome to the club. Here is what's happening in the annual pay battle between Congress and the White House.

President Bush originally proposed a 2.2 percent raise, effective in January, for both federal and military personnel.

Congress followed the same script it has used for the past dozen years and said that's not enough. Instead, it included funds for a 2.7 percent raise, for both civilian and military personnel, in the Treasury appropriations bill. That's the typical vehicle Congress uses to boost raises and ensure that civilian and military groups get the same percentage raise.

The problem is that Congress has been slow to approve appropriations bills. The money package with the higher 2.7 percent raise was left unfinished as Congress recessed for the pre-election period.

When lawmakers return Nov. 13, it will be to a lame duck Congress. Some of the incumbents will have lost their elections on Nov. 7. Control of the House, Senate or both may have shifted from the Republicans to the Democrats. In any case, Congress may or may not get around to approving the appropriations bill that includes the 2.7 percent raise.

Insiders expect President Bush to go along with a higher figure if Congress approves it, but he may not.

Bottom line: Nobody, including members of the House and Senate, know what will happen on the federal/military pay raise.

When the final figure is announced, it will be up to the president to designate, or not, how much of that total increase will be used to fund locality pay raises. The White House typically earmarks about one percentage point of the raise for city-by-city adjustments. In the past, the Baltimore-Washington area has qualified for raises slightly higher than the amount approved for the general increase.

But so much is up in the air that it is hard to explain and digest the possibilities -- much less predict the final figure.

Don't let money slip away

If your agency offered you a tax-deferred 4 percent pay raise, would you take it? That's a no-brainer, correct?

The vast majority of feds hired since the mid-1980s have taken such an offer by signing up for the Thrift Savings Plan (TSP), the government's in-house 401(k) program for civilian and military personnel.

Workers under the newer Federal Employees Retirement System get an automatic 1 percent contribution to their TSP accounts. But in order to qualify for an additional 4 percent tax-deferred match from their agency, they must sign up for the TSP.

More than 265,000 feds qualify, but many thousands haven't signed up. In effect, they are leaving a tax-deferred pay raise on the table. The solution: If you are in the FERS system, sign up now.

Mike Causey, senior editor at Federal News Radio AM 1050, can be reached at 202/895-5132 or mcausey@federalnewsradio.com.

Top Civil Servants Honored (WP)

By Laura Blumenfeld

The Washington Post, October 3, 2006

DOJ_NMG_0073478

The winners -- shimmering in silk and tuxedos -- thanked their mothers, blinked back tears and posed for the cameras, just as they do at the Oscars. But the awards were called the Sammies, or the Service to America Medals, and the stars of the program were civil servants who typically perform backstage.

"Your good work reflects the best of our country," President Bush said in a letter read aloud at the fifth annual gala, held Wednesday at the Andrew W. Mellon Auditorium.

The Sammies were created by the Partnership for Public Service and the Atlantic Media Company. A committee selected nine winners from more than 500 nominees and 30 finalists. Nancy Cox, a scientist at the Centers for Disease Control and Prevention, won the top award, Federal Employee of the Year, for "leading the world's efforts to prepare for a catastrophic flu pandemic."

The event's emcee, Gwen Ifill, host of PBS's "Washington Week," joked in her opening: "Before I begin my remarks, are there any Transportation Department officials in the room? I just drove into D.C. from Northern Virginia, and there are some things I'd like to discuss during the first break."

At the end of the evening, after hearing tributes to the honorees, Ifill expressed admiration for the federal bureaucrats who filled the ballroom:

The next time our government does something that frustrates you . . .

Think about Nancy Cox and Nancy Powell protecting us from the threat of an avian flu pandemic.

Think about Tom Casadevall and Mark Ward helping thousands of people survive some of the worst natural disasters in history.

Think about Martin Harrell standing up to injustice and fighting threats to our environment.

Think about Norden Huang and Bill Phillips conducting cutting-edge research to improve the quality of our lives.

Think about Ron McNeal supporting the troops who support us all.

Think about Christina Sanford putting her safety at risk so that others may enjoy the taste of freedom and democracy.

And think about the nearly 2 million other Americans like them, who go to work every day to serve a cause larger than themselves.

Calif. Man Charged With Threatening Bush, Cheney (AP)

AP, October 2, 2006

(AP) SACRAMENTO An engineer at a nuclear power plant near Sacramento has been charged with sending threatening letters containing a powdery substance to the same Sierra foothills country club where President Bush will appear Tuesday for a Republican campaign event.

Michael Lee Braun, 51, appeared Monday in U.S. District Court in Sacramento on two federal charges of sending threats through the mail. The FBI said he also is a suspect in mailing dozens of similar threats since shortly after the 2001 terrorist attacks.

The charges relate to two letters prosecutors said Braun mailed on Thursday to the Serrano Country Club and Serrano Visitors Center in El Dorado Hills, a tony community in the foothills east of Sacramento. The letters contained threats to President Bush, Vice President Dick Cheney and U.S. Rep. John Doolittle, R-Rocklin, according to a statement from the FBI.

Bush is scheduled to appear at the country club Tuesday afternoon in a campaign event for Doolittle, who represents a heavily Republican district near Sacramento.

A federal affidavit filed with the case further alleges that Braun had sent 51 such letters, including the two most recent ones, since 2001. The letters threatened the lives of the president, Cheney, First Lady Laura Bush and Defense Secretary Donald Rumsfeld.

"Each of the letters contained a written threat, usually death by some kind of WMD agent (anthrax, toxic chemical poison, radioactive dust or improvised explosives) and some unknown, white, powdery substance, or items simulating a possible letter/package improvised explosive device," according to the affidavit by Special Agent Timothy Lester.

The white substance usually turned out to be baking soda, the affidavit said.

DOJ_NMG_0073479

The two charges against Braun carry maximum penalties of five years in prison and $250,000 fines, but U.S. Magistrate Judge Kimberly Mueller told Braun he could face additional charges once prosecutors review the FBI's investigation.

Braun appeared disheveled in federal court, his hair in disarray as he sat in chains through a brief court appearance Monday afternoon. Monday's initial court appearance was postponed until Thursday, and Braun will be detained until then.

His attorney, Philip Cozens, said he had just taken the case and could not comment.

FBI spokeswoman Karen Ernst said the Braun case was "not believed to be related to the ongoing investigation where the real anthrax was sent."

The first letters from the Sacramento area were sent in November 2001, about the same time real anthrax was sent to East Coast government and media officials, killing five people.

Braun, who works at the now-closed Rancho Seco nuclear power plant south of Sacramento, was a suspect since the first letters were mailed from Sacramento to the U.S. Drug Enforcement Agency and a Sacramento dental office, the affidavit said.

Letters also were mailed to members of Congress, a U.S. senator, Sacramento-area radio stations and newspapers, local government officials and churches affiliated with the Church of Jesus Christ of Latter-day Saints, according to the affidavit.

The letters to the White House were sent in May 2005 but were intercepted by the Secret Service before delivery.

"Anytime somebody's out there threatening offices and public servants, it's unnerving to say the least," Doolittle spokeswoman Laura Blackann said.

Spokesmen for the Secret Service declined comment.

FBI agents had Braun under surveillance last Thursday and watched as he dropped two letters into a mailbox at an Elk Grove strip mall, said Drew Parenti, special agent in charge of the FBI office in Sacramento. They sealed off the mailbox and found the letters to the Serrano visitors center and country club.

That gave investigators enough evidence to obtain a search warrant for Braun's home in Elk Grove, a suburb south of Sacramento, and at the decommissioned power plant, which is owned by the Sacramento Municipal Utility District. He was arrested at his home about 9:30 p.m. Friday after agents found more evidence there, Parenti said.

Employees at the Serrano visitors center and country club said they were unaware of any threat.

The FBI's affidavit states that Braun has a master's degree in radiological physics and a law degree. He has worked as a nuclear engineer at Rancho Seco since 1984 while practicing law part-time.

President To Be On Hand For Christening Of Carrier Named After His Father (VAPILOT)

The Virginian-pilot

Hampton Roads Virginian-Pilot, October 3, 2006

President Bush will join his parents at Saturday's christening of the nation's newest aircraft carrier, named for his father, at shipbuilder Northrop Grumman Newport News.

The carrier, CVN-77, is called the George H.W. Bush, after the country's 41st president.

President Bush will participate in the ceremony, said Blair Jones, a White House spokesman.

"This is a tremendous honor for the president's father, and he's looking forward to the christening," Jones said Monday.

The elder Bush's daughter, Doro Bush Koch, the ship's sponsor, will break the traditional bottle of sparkling wine on the flattop's bow.

Northrop Grumman's Newport News sector began construction of the approximately $6 billion nuclear-powered ship in 2001 and plans to deliver it to the Navy in late 2008.

It is the last of 10 Nimitz-class carriers and includes technology and improved features that will serve as a bridge to the Navy's next-generation carrier, the CVN-21, now under design and planning at Newport News.

OTHER NEWS:

Manufacturing Decelerates While Commercial Construction Soars (USAT/AP)

By Madlen Read

DOJ_NMG_0073480

USA Today, October 3, 2006

NEW YORK — A pair of economic reports offered a mixed picture of the economy Monday as growth slowed among U.S. manufacturers while commercial construction showed surprising resilience.

Hurt by weaker auto sales and a slumping housing market, the manufacturing sector grew in September at the slowest pace in more than a year, a trade group said.

A big gain in commercial construction spending, however, was enough to offset a decline in home building in August, the Commerce Department said. Construction spending edged up 0.3% to a seasonally adjusted annual rate of $1.2 trillion, the best showing in five months.

The Institute for Supply Management, based in Tempe, Ariz., said its manufacturing index registered 52.9 in September, below August's reading of 54.5 and the lowest reading since May 2005, when the index hit 51.4. Analysts had predicted a reading of 53.5. A reading of 50 or more indicates expansion, while below 50 shows contraction.

The September figure represented the 40th-consecutive month of growth.

But Mark Zandi, chief economist at Moody's Economy.com, says it's only a matter of months before manufacturers start reporting a contraction.

"The good news is there is still growth, and pricing pressures are easing," Zandi says. "The bad news is growth is slowing, it will slow more and it's leading to cuts in jobs."

The reason is threefold, he says: decreasing home construction, slashed auto production and less need to build up inventories.

The ISM's employment index dropped to 49.4 in September from 54.0 in August. The prices paid index fell to 61.0 in September from 73.0 as commodity prices took a tumble. The new orders index stayed the same at 54.2, but the backlog of orders index fell to 46.5 in September from 51.5.

Meanwhile, the housing market has been leveling off.

The Commerce Department's report Monday said spending on private home construction dropped 1.5% in August to a seasonally adjusted rate of $617 billion. The August decline followed an even bigger 2.1% July decrease and marked the fifth-consecutive month that home building has fallen.

Data On Factories Indicate Economy Is Losing Speed (WSJ)

By Christopher Conkey

The Wall Street Journal, October 3, 2006

Manufacturing activity expanded in September, but the nation's factories appear to be losing some steam as economic growth moderates.

The Institute for Supply Management, a private group of corporate purchasing managers, said its manufacturing index fell to 52.9 last month from 54.5 in August. Readings over 50 indicate expansion, but the September measure suggests that factories experienced slightly weaker growth as the third quarter progressed. Recent data on industrial production and factory orders have also pointed to slower growth.

"It's apparent that manufacturing is losing momentum and feeling the effects of higher interest rates and a weaker housing market," said Norbert Ore, who oversees the ISM survey and also serves as Georgia-Pacific Corp.'s procurement director.

Slower economic growth is likely to damp inflationary pressures, and makes it more probable that the Federal Reserve will leave interest rates unchanged, or eventually begin to lower them.

ISM said one wood-products company that participated in its survey of procurement managers at 400 medium-size to large companies reported seeing a "serious downturn in customer orders related to the housing-market" slump.

Other data released Monday offered signs that the residential real-estate market may be stabilizing after a slowdown in sales over the past year. The National Association of Realtors said its index of pending home sales rose 4.3% in August from July but remains 14% below the year-earlier pace. A recent Commerce Department report showed that the rate of new-home sales picked up in August.

DOJ_NMG_0073481

David Lereah, NAR's chief economist, said the August figures suggest that the housing market has hit bottom. Others disagreed.

John Lonski, chief economist at Moody's Investors Service, said it was "premature" to view the unexpected rise in sales in August as "indicating the nearness of a bottom for home sales." Daniel Oppenheim, an analyst with Bank of America Securities, said a high inventory of unsold homes would depress prices and that surveys of real-estate agents point to slower sales in coming months.

The ISM's readings on employment, tracking hiring in the manufacturing sector, and on prices, reflecting what manufacturers pay for materials, both declined last month. The group's reading on new orders for goods was unchanged.

Despite the slower growth rate, September was the 40th consecutive month of expansion in the manufacturing sector. That marked the longest uninterrupted growth streak since the 1970s.

Overall, economists said they expect slow to moderate growth for the rest of the year. "We see the economy continuing its forward momentum, but at a below-trend pace over the next six months," said John Silvia, chief economist at Wachovia Corp., in a research note. He predicted that the economy would expand at an inflation-adjusted annual rate of 2.5% in the second half of the year. Mr. Silvia said that will keep the Federal Reserve from raising or lowering interest rates for the rest of the year.

Separately, the Commerce Department said construction spending rose 0.3% in August from July as residential construction declined but commercial building picked up.

Another Session Leaves The Dow Chasing Record (WSJ)

By E.s. Browning

The Wall Street Journal, October 3, 2006

The Dow Jones Industrial Average took another run at a record but came up short once again.

Pushing several times past the January 2000 record close of 11722.98, the Dow industrials got as high as 11726.94 yesterday before sagging at midday. The blue chips finished little changed, down 8.72 points, or 0.07%, at 11670.35, still up 8.9% this year.

It was the third consecutive session in which the Dow industrials briefly surpassed the record but couldn't hold on.

Stocks often have trouble breaking through milestone numbers, as investors take profits and stand back to consider the future.

"I am kind of disappointed that we didn't respond more favorably to the $2 drop in crude oil," said Todd Clark, director of stock trading at Nollenberger Capital Partners in San Francisco. "That probably means that we are going to spend some time consolidating below that elusive Dow record."

Crude-oil futures for November delivery fell $1.88, or 3%, to $61.03 a barrel, amid signs of strong inventories and expectations that slower economic growth would limit oil demand.

Historically, September has been the Dow's weakest month on average, and October normally is better. But this September saw the Dow industrials spurt ahead 2.6%, and some investors said the industrial average now is overdue for a pullback.

The day's economic news wasn't startling and didn't appear to drive markets. A monthly gauge of manufacturing activity came in a bit weaker than expected for September. August construction spending and an index of pending home sales both were stronger than expected, but stocks made their moves well after that news was announced.

The volatile Nasdaq Composite Index fell 0.92%, or 20.83 points, to 2237.60, still up 1.5% in 2006. The Standard & Poor's 500-stock index declined 0.34%, or 4.53 points, to 1331.32, ahead 6.7% this year.

In major U.S. market action:

Stocks retreated. Total trading volume for stocks listed on the New York Stock Exchange was 2.13 billion shares, as 1,486 stocks rose and 1,802 fell.

Bond prices gained.1 The 10-year Treasury note rose 6/32, or $1.88 for each $1,000 invested, pushing the yield down to 4.614%. The 30-year bond was up 6/32 to yield 4.756%.

The dollar weakened.2 Late in New York, it traded at 117.67 yen, down from 118.12, while the euro rose against the dollar to $1.2741 from $1.2681.

DOJ_NMG_0073482

Write to E.S. Browning at jim.browning@wsj.com3

Dow On Verge Of Closing At An All-time High (WT)

By Patrice Hill

The Washington Times, October 3, 2006

The Dow Jones Industrial Average is flirting with an all-time high after spending 6 1/2 years in the wilderness recovering from a bubble in technology stocks, a recession, terrorist attacks, a wave of corporate scandals, sharply higher energy costs and interest rates, and recently, worries about a housing bust.

The Dow has struggled to top the 11,723 level it reached in January 2000, with its recent treadmill action of advance and retreat typical of the solid but unglamorous gains it has been eking out for investors since the bubble burst in early 2000.

Yesterday's market action was in line with the trend. The Dow briefly topped its high, then pulled back to end 9 points lower at 11,670 on worries about a steep slowdown in manufacturing. The blue-chip Standard & Poor's 500 index also has soared to 5½-year highs, but the technology-driven Nasdaq Composite Index stands at less than half the record high it hit in March 2000.

The last time the Dow visited these heights, few analysts questioned that the market would continue its swift upward march. But the long, tortuous path it has followed since then has fed chronic questions about the sustainability of market gains and produced a plethora of opinions about where the Dow is headed from here.

"The best is yet to come," said Jeffrey N. Kleintop, chief investment strategist at PNC Financial Services Group, predicting that the S&P 500 index will gain at least 14 percent in the next year as energy prices continue to recede, uncertainty about corporate earnings and control of Congress is resolved, and the Federal Reserve reverses its anti-inflation campaign and cuts interest rates.

Last month, the market got a "head start" on the "fourth-quarter fireworks" that Mr. Kleintop said he is expecting, in line with the usually robust market performance in the second year of a president's term.

"The stock market is entering what has historically been the best 12-month period for its performance during the four-year presidential election cycle," he said, citing many similarities to the midcycle years 1966 and 1986, during which the market experienced explosive gains.

Mike Ryan, head of UBS Wealth Management Research, said the dramatic drop in oil and gas prices since Labor Day -- which should boost economic growth and help tame inflation -- is largely responsible for the turnaround in the market and investor sentiment.

"Investors seem to believe the U.S. economy is headed towards a so-called soft landing," he said.

But Alexander P. Paris, stock strategist at Barrington Research Associates Inc., said the market is due for a "rest" because investors have exaggerated the benefits of a "surprise collapse in oil prices" while overlooking pitfalls.

Among other things, Mr. Paris questioned whether investors have braced themselves for the fallout from a possible Republican loss of Congress in next month's elections.

"Despite considerable confusion, worry and uncertainty about the Fed, inflation, a housing bust and the economy, the market has put together a lengthy rally from the July lows," he said. "Despite the recent celebration, the market may have a difficult time extending its rally in the months ahead."

Mutual fund managers helped lift the market by engaging in some "window dressing" at the end of last month, buying winning stocks so they can include them in their annual reports to investors. But now they are likely to "sit on their hands" for a while and wait to see whether earnings hold up and the economy rebounds from a soft third quarter, he said.

Daniel C. Chung, chief investment officer at Fred Alger Management Inc., said the market should continue to expand, if not "take off," not so much because the economy is doing well but because corporate profits are at extraordinarily high levels and are likely to remain so.

Earnings growth for the S&P 500 companies averaged 18 percent in the first quarter, much better than Wall Street analysts had expected, and even managed 15 percent excluding record energy profits, he said.

DOJ_NMG_0073483

"For nearly four years, the S&P 500 has registered more than 10 percent earnings growth, and we believe that the run is not over," Mr. Chung said, because corporations continue to benefit from cost-cutting due to the globalization of production at the same time their workers have little leverage to push for a greater share of corporate income that would cut into profits.

"This is a recipe for all sorts of social discontent," he said, and may explain why voters are so disenchanted with an otherwise healthy economy, but it should be welcome news for the stock market, where price gains have been trailing earnings growth.

Lawrence Kudlow of Kudlow & Co. LLC said the Dow's plodding rise toward record highs has important political implications.

"This powerful combination of rising stocks, falling gasoline prices and the Goldilocks economy are powerful pluses for election-year Republicans," he said. "The Dems aren't even talking about the economy anymore."

Strike 4: Dow Fails To Set Record High (USAT)

By Matt Krantz

USA Today, October 3, 2006

Stocks kicked the fourth quarter off with a small loss and disappointed investors further when the Dow missed setting a new high, the fourth-consecutive failed run.

The Dow Jones industrial average briefly rose above its closing high of 11,722.98 but retreated to close down 8.72 points to 11,670.35 Monday. That doesn't take away from what's been a powerful 8.9% rally this year, though.

Hurt by losses of stocks in the Internet retail, home entertainment software and oil and gas industries, the Standard & Poor's 500 index fell 4.53 points to 1331.32. That's leaves the S&P up 6.7% for the year. And the Nasdaq composite shed 20.83 points to 2237.60, whittling its 2006 gain to 1.5%.

Traders, such as Todd Leone of SG Cowen, said investors shouldn't overreact to the fact the Dow missed setting a new closing high again. “The headlines make more out of it,” he says. “I don't think it's that big of a deal.”

After the big move the market made last week and last quarter, investors should not be surprised to see stocks do “a little breath catching,” says Michael Farr, president of Farr Miller & Washington. Farr thinks the market is waiting for a new reason to move higher, which could likely be what he expects to be a healthy third-quarter earnings reporting season. If interest rates remain steady, investors will focus on corporate earnings. “The expectations are for a fairly stable environment,” he says.

Highlights:

Harrah's Entertainment, operator of large casinos, jumped $9.25 to $75.68 after receiving a $15.1 billion, or $81 a share, offer from several private equity firms. (Story 1B.)

•First Republic Bank tumbled $3.95. The commercial bank, based in San Francisco, warned it would earn 56 cents to 58 cents a share, missing forecasts by 4 cents a share.

•Myogen, a biotech firm, gained $16.36 to $51.44 after rival Gilead Sciences said it was buying the company for $52.50 a share. Gilead shares lost $4.49 to $64.28. (Story, 3B.)

•Optimal Group, a provider of payment services to the online gaming industry, fell $2.95 to $8.81. The stock was hurt by a regulation passed by Congress on Saturday that places restrictions on online gambling. (Story 1B.)

•Apple Computer fell $2.12 to $74.86. Citigroup lowered the stock to a “hold” from “buy” because it says the company is unlikely to release an upgraded video iPod by the holidays.

Most Blacks, Hispanics In Area Own Homes (WP)

By Lyndsey Layton And Dan Keating

The Washington Post, October 3, 2006

A majority of black and Hispanic households in metropolitan Washington now own their houses instead of renting, according to new data released today by the U.S. Census Bureau.

The new numbers, reflecting changes from 2000 to 2005, underscore the Washington region's affluence and strong economy. During the half-decade of soaring housing prices, whites, blacks, Asians and Hispanics were all more likely to own their homes in the region than nationally.

DOJ_NMG_0073484

Some of the most dramatic shifts are taking place in the District, where African Americans are no longer a majority among homeowners.

In 2000, 54 percent of D.C. homeowners were black, and 41 percent were white. But a decline of 6,000 black homeowners since then, and a surge of 7,000 additional white homeowners, brought the two groups to virtual parity in the 2005 survey. The decline in black homeowners in the District was offset by growth in the suburbs.

The continuing loss of black, middle-class homeowners in the city is bound to have reverberations, said Peter A. Tatian, a housing expert at the Urban Institute.

"It's a real issue in those [heavily African American neighborhoods]; there's not a solid base of people who have ownership in the community, an investment that they want to fight to protect. It tends to be harder to bring about positive changes," said Tatian, who directs NeighborhoodInfo DC, a grass-roots group working to improve quality of life.

The data mark "a symbolic passing," he said. "In this city, those kinds of issues always seem to have political ramifications."

Regionwide, more than 260,000 African Americans owned homes in 2005. The growth was much more rapid in the 1990s but continued this decade, increasing from 49 percent of black households to 51 percent. Prince George's County, where more than three in five African Americans own their homes, gained 15,000 black homeowners this decade and now has 45 percent of the black homeowners in the region.

Homeownership among immigrants also shows significant growth. About 63 percent of local immigrants own their homes, higher than the national rate of 55 percent, census figures show.

The immigrant housing data reflect the highly mobile, growing local market. A homeowner in Montgomery County is as likely to have been born abroad as to be a Maryland native. Same thing in Arlington and Fairfax counties. Overall, the number of immigrants and state native homeowners is dwarfed by the number of homeowners who moved from other states.

Particularly striking was the growing number of Hispanics who bought homes in the Washington area from 2000 to 2005, many of them settling in expensive suburbs such as Fairfax and Montgomery. Across the region, Hispanics surpassed blacks in homeownership rates last year.

"It says a lot about the upward mobility of Hispanics," said William H. Frey, a demographer at the Brookings Institution. "Washington is not only an example of a metropolitan area with melting pot suburbs, but it has melting pot suburbs where immigrants are achieving the American dream."

More than 80,000 Hispanics owned their home in the region last year, the census says, the first time a majority of Hispanics have owned rather than rented. Fairfax and Montgomery each gained about 5,000 Hispanic homeowners, and the number grew by more than 7,000 each in Prince William and Prince George's counties.

"This is not an accident," said Tom Perez (D-Silver Spring), a Montgomery County Council member and former head of CASA of Maryland, which helps Hispanics with housing, employment training and other services. "Government and nonprofits and the banking community as well have spent a lot of time and effort to prepare and assist people in saving money, building credit, paying bills on time, getting themselves in a position to qualify for a loan.

"In Latino communities, a lot of effort has been made to stress homeownership as one of the keys to self-sufficiency," Perez said. "The most common way to accumulate wealth in America is to own a home. That is a basic fact of American life, and Latinos have clearly gotten the message."

For many Hispanics, homeownership is security, said Carlos Devis, a Colombian immigrant who bought a house with his wife in Potomac in 2003. "For Latinos, we don't have 401(k)s," he said, referring to the employer-sponsored retirement fund. "The house is the 401(k)."

Evelyn Andrade, a Salvadoran American hairdresser, bought a three-bedroom house in Rockville in 2001 after years of renting an apartment. "The rents are so high, it doesn't make sense," said Andrade, 29, who is married and has three children. "I always thought it was better to own."

Almost 100,000 Asians own houses, condominiums and townhouses locally, triple the number in 1990. Homeownership among Asians increased about 71 percent regionwide between 2000 and 2005. Asians posted particularly high rates in Loudoun County, where about 96 percent owned their homes last year. That's far above Asians' national rate of 59 percent.

DOJ_NMG_0073485

Farhan Syed, a real estate broker in Loudoun, knows this phenomenon well. "Most Asians happen to be dual-income families, well-educated, able to afford a home," he said. "Everyone wants the American dream."

When the real estate market began to heat up in the Washington region in 2000, buying a home seemed like a financially savvy move, Syed said. "There was the perception that real estate could be a money-making scheme, and a lot of people got in the market."

Tannaz Haddadi and her husband, Darius Powerz, are typical. They were both born in Iran and immigrated as children with their families to Fairfax. Haddadi, 29, and Powerz, 34, first bought a townhouse in Loudoun and traded up for a single-family home in Fairfax two years ago. "There are a lot of working professionals like us, first- or second-generation citizens who want to get in early and work our way up," said Haddadi, who, like her husband, works for the federal government.

The population figures released by the U.S. Census Bureau today are based on the American Community Survey, which gathered demographic data from those living in the United States last year.

The figures for the Washington region do not reflect changes to the population numbers for the District that the Census Bureau approved in July, after the city challenged earlier data and said the census had undercounted the city's population by more than 31,000 people.

Some embassy officials and advocacy groups say the population figures for minority groups could be even higher because the census undercounts those groups.

Across Nation, Housing Costs Rise As Burden (NYT)

By Janny Scott And Randal C. Archibold

The New York Times, October 3, 2006

The burden of housing costs in nearly every part of the country grew sharply from 2000 to 2005, according to new Census Bureau data being made public today. The numbers vividly illustrate the impact, often distributed unevenly, of the crushing combination of escalating real estate prices and largely stagnant incomes.

While many of the highest home values were on the coasts, in places like Southern California and Manhattan, many of the biggest jumps in the percentage of people paying a burdensome amount of their income for housing occurred in the Midwest and in suburbs nationwide, making it clear that the housing squeeze has reached deep into the middle class.

In New York City, more than half of all renters now spend at least 30 percent of their gross income on housing, a percentage figure commonly seen as a limit of affordability. In Staten Island, the percentage paying at least 30 percent of income rose to nearly 60 percent, up from 40.

Among suburban homeowners, there were big increases in the percentage of people with mortgages spending at least 30 percent in places like Loudon County, Va.; Morgan County, Ind.; Nassau County, on Long Island; and Bastrop County, Tex.

“Housing prices have gone up much more than incomes have,” said Christopher Jones, vice president for research at the Regional Plan Association in New York City. “Clearly, you can’t sustain that sort of imbalance over the long run. There’s only so long that housing prices can go up without sustained increases in income to support them.”

The data, from the American Community Survey, was collected throughout 2005, some of it before the real estate market began softening over the past year.

While the escalation in house prices that began in the mid-1990’s has slowed down in most places, and while prices are even dropping in some markets, rents are currently rising.

Historically, it is not unprecedented for housing prices to rise faster than household incomes, since housing prices fluctuate more than median incomes. In recent decades, median incomes have not risen at the rate that they did in the booming 1950’s and 1960’s, yet real estate prices in many parts of the country have escalated sharply in recent years.

“People want to hang on and stay in the market,” said William H. Frey, a demographer at the Brookings Institution in Washington, “and they are willing to stretch themselves to find or to rent a house that is suitable.”

The places with the highest overall percentages of people carrying a heavy housing burden were in fast-growing areas of California, Colorado and Texas.

DOJ_NMG_0073486

In Southern California, Temecula and Hemet had the highest percentages of renters paying at least 30 percent, with 74 and 73 percent of renters at that level.

Boulder, Colo., and College Station, Tex., held the record for renters spending at least 50 percent, with 47 and 46 percent.

The biggest jump in the percentages of people paying at least 30 percent of their income on rent, as well as those spending at least 50 percent, occurred in Olathe, Kan., a booming suburb of 114,000 southwest of Kansas City.

S. Lawrence Yun, an economist with the National Association of Realtors, said renters in desirable cities might be spending more of their income on housing in hopes of getting a toehold in places with good schools, better homes and a good quality of life. He said, "There is certainly a concern that people are devoting a large portion of their income to housing, and one of the reasons is due to the more limited housing supply."

In the New York region, a very high percentage of renters in urban counties spent a big share of income on housing. In the Bronx, Brooklyn and Queens, close to a third of all renters pay at least 30 percent.

But many of the biggest increases in housing burdens occurred outside the city.

Among homeowners, there were big increases in the percentage of people spending at least 30 percent on housing in counties like Nassau, Dutchess, Orange and Putnam. The percentage of households spending at least 50 percent of income also rose in those counties.

In Clifton, N.J., the percentage of mortgage holders spending at least 50 percent of their income on housing rose to 27 percent in 2005 from 12 percent in 2000, a 134 percent rise. In New Britain, Conn., the group paying at least 30 percent more than doubled, rising to 57 percent of people with mortgages, up from 27 percent.

Nationally, the biggest increase in homeowners spending more than 30 percent of their income on housing occurred in an unincorporated area southeast of Los Angeles called Florence-Graham, where more than a third of residents live in poverty. There, the figure climbed to 43 percent from 17 percent. Other places with big jumps included Wyoming, Mich.; Round Rock, Tex.; and Plymouth, Minn.

In general, the places with the highest overall percentages of homeowners spending that level of income were poorer cities. El Monte, Calif., a Los Angeles suburb, had the highest percentage of mortgage holders, 73 percent, spending more than 30 percent of their income on housing. In Newark, the figure was 72 percent; in El Cajon, Calif., east of San Diego, 69 percent; and in South Gate, Calif., 69 percent.

Jack Kyser, senior economist with the Los Angeles County Economic Development Corporation, said such cities are often the only places that people on the lowest rungs of the economic ladder can afford and they tend to stretch their resources to get in. He said El Monte and South Gate both are growing, largely because Latinos have been moving in.

"These communities are well located to employment opportunities and they can drive and it is not a horrendous drive," he said. "They are also close to public transportation and use it."

The numbers, which were analyzed for The New York Times by Andrew A. Beveridge, a demographer at Queens College, provided a glimpse of how hot — and how unhot — some areas had become.

Two Southern California coastal cities, Santa Barbara and Newport Beach, had the highest median house values, at $1 million.

Youngstown, Ohio, a city long hurting economically, had the lowest, at $48,000.

In New York State, the median value of owner-occupied homes actually declined slightly in a few upstate counties, including Oswego, Steuben and Madison. The median house value dropped 9 percent in Buffalo, to $60,800.

Housing values rose only barely in some upstate counties, including Cattaraugus, Cayuga, Chautauqua and Chemung.

Because of a change in census procedures, it was not possible yesterday to reliably gauge the increase in cost burden among homeowners in places with large numbers of condominium or cooperative apartments.

In 2000, the bureau did not count owner-occupied apartments in multifamily buildings; in 2005, it did. So the 2000 and 2005 figures could not be satisfactorily compared for places like Manhattan and San Diego.

In Manhattan, where the median value of all owner-occupied homes hit $718,000, the increase in median gross rents from 2000 to 2005 was 14 percent, well below the 20 percent jump in Suffolk County on Long Island, the 23 percent rise in the city of Passaic, N.J., and the 24 percent jump in Ulster County, N.Y.

DOJ_NMG_0073487

The increase in the percentage of Manhattan renters paying at least 50 percent of their income on housing was 13 percent — well below the 50 percent rise in Rockland County.

The data also showed that, among couples living together in Manhattan, about 17 percent were unmarried in 2005, compared with 10 percent nationwide.

Manhattan appeared to have the second highest number of male couples living together, following Los Angeles.

A Backlash Against Bickering (WP)

By E. J. Dionne Jr.

The Washington Post, October 3, 2006

CONCORD, N.H. -- Republicans have been scratching their heads in frustration. Why has a relatively good economy not been helping either President Bush's approval ratings or their party's electoral cause?

One answer is that economic growth is helping people at the top far more than anyone else. Another explanation can be discovered here and in other well-functioning states around the country: To the extent that voters are expressing gratitude this year, they are saying thanks to their governors. That does not stop them from yelling irately at Washington, D.C.

Consider the latest WMUR Granite State Poll by the University of New Hampshire's Survey Center. Asked the classic question about whether "things in New Hampshire" were going in "the right direction" or were "seriously off on the wrong track," an astonishing 79 percent saw their state moving the right way; only 14 percent saw it on the wrong track.

But when asked exactly the same question about how their country was doing, according to findings released yesterday, only 34 percent of New Hampshire residents said "the right direction"; 56 percent said "the wrong track."

That is good news for Gov. John Lynch, a Democrat who leads his Republican opponent, Jim Coburn, by a margin of 69 to 14 percent in the latest survey. It is bad news for Bush, whose approval rating in New Hampshire is 36 percent.

Lynch is among a cadre of moderate Democratic governors around the country who find themselves in commanding positions -- even outside Democratic-trending New England. Among them: Kathleen Sebelius in Kansas, Dave Freudenthal in Wyoming, Janet Napolitano in Arizona and Brad Henry in Oklahoma.

For his part, Lynch can hardly utter a sentence without including the word "bipartisan." He prides himself on having worked well with a Republican legislature and speaks with amazement at how Washington has become a place of "ongoing partisan bickering."

It may be no accident that Lynch's ratings are high while Bush's are low. Nick Clemons, the executive director of the New Hampshire Democratic Party, sees voters here consciously contrasting the peaceable political kingdom their state has become with what's happening several hundred miles to the south. "Washington," he says, "is the foil for New Hampshire."

The success of Democratic governors such as Lynch (and, for that matter, of that rescripted and now-moderate Republican Arnold Schwarzenegger in California) also reflects a default by national Republicans on domestic issues.

The president's relentless focus on terrorism, combined with growing disenchantment with his Iraq policies, pushes voters to seek leadership from state and local politicians on issues such as education and health care.

Tom Rath, one of the state's most experienced Republican power brokers, loyally insists that Bush is still "personally" liked here. But Rath sees Iraq taking a huge toll on the president, partly because so many in New Hampshire's National Guard have served there and "the repetitious call-ups are disruptive to people's lives."

Rath recently announced his support for Gov. Mitt Romney of Massachusetts for the 2008 Republican presidential nomination. His rationale is surprisingly similar to the explanations that Democrats give for the popularity of governors such as Lynch or Sebelius: Voters are in a mood for less "doctrinaire" politicians who can fix things.

Of the federal government, Rath said: "There's a feeling that this great big thing doesn't work very well." He said Republicans need to win back voters who feel they gave "the keys to the car" to their party only to have it driven "into the back of the garage." Rath sees Romney as the GOP's repairman.

If New Hampshire offers a model for a new wave of moderate Democrats, it is also a test case for how badly Bush -- and, now, the scandal surrounding former representative Mark Foley -- will wound incumbent Republican House members.

DOJ_NMG_0073488

Politicians in both parties here see Rep. Jeb Bradley as having a substantial advantage over Carol Shea-Porter, an underfunded antiwar Democrat, and Rep. Charles Bass, to whom the words "nice guy" cling like a second title, leading his Democratic foe, Paul Hodes.

But Hodes, an indefatigable campaigner, has advertised heavily in an effort to demonstrate Bass's support for Bush's Iraq policies. The fact that Bass is stressing his "independence" and responded immediately with advertising of his own attacking Hodes on Iraq suggests that Republicans know how vulnerable the incumbent could become if Hodes succeeds in yoking Bass to Bush. In principle, Bradley could face the same problem.

The irony is that Bush has fostered a backlash against himself, against ideology and against partisanship that, as a former governor, he should have seen coming.

postchat@aol.com

Those Attacked Online Are Filing Libel Lawsuits (USAT)

By Laura Parker

USA Today, October 3, 2006

Rafe Banks, a lawyer in Georgia, got involved in a nasty dispute with a client over how to defend him on a drunken-driving charge. The client, David Milum, fired Banks and demanded that the lawyer refund a $3,000 fee. Banks refused.

Milum eventually was acquitted. Ordinarily, that might have been the last Banks ever heard about his former client. But then Milum started a blog.

In May 2004, Banks was stunned to learn that Milum's blog was accusing the lawyer of bribing judges on behalf of drug dealers. At the end of one posting, Milum wrote, “Rafe, don't you wish you had given back my $3,000 retainer?”

Banks, saying the postings were false, sued Milum. And last January, Milum became the first blogger in the USA to lose a libel suit, according to the Media Law Resource Center in New York, which tracks litigation involving bloggers. Milum was ordered to pay Banks $50,000.

The case reflected how blogs — short for Web logs, the burgeoning, freewheeling Internet forums that give people the power to instantly disseminate messages worldwide — increasingly are being targeted by those who feel harmed by blog attacks. In the past two years, more than 50 lawsuits stemming from postings on blogs and website message boards have been filed across the nation. The suits have spawned a debate over how the “blogosphere” and its revolutionary impact on speech and publishing might change libel law.

Legal analysts say the lawsuits are challenging a mind-set that has long surrounded blogging: that most bloggers essentially are “judgment-proof” because they — unlike traditional media such as newspapers, magazines and television outlets — often are ordinary citizens who don't have a lot of money. Recent lawsuits by Banks and others who say they have had their reputations harmed or their privacy violated have been aimed not just at cash awards but also at silencing their critics.

“Bloggers didn't think they could be subject to libel,” says Eric Robinson, a Media Law Resource Center attorney. “You take what is on your mind, type it and post it.”

The legal battles over blogging and message board postings are unfolding on several fronts:

•In Washington, D.C., former U.S. Senate aide Jessica Cutler was sued for invasion of privacy by Robert Steinbuch, also a former Senate aide, after Cutler posted a blog in 2004 describing their sexual escapades. The blog, titled Washingtonienne, was viewed widely after it was cited by a Washington gossip website called Wonkette. In July, Steinbuch added Wonkette to the lawsuit.

•Todd Hollis, a criminal defense lawyer in Pittsburgh, has filed a libel suit against a website called DontDateHimGirl.com, which includes message boards in which women gossip about men they supposedly dated. One posting on the site accused Hollis of having herpes. Another said he had infected a woman he once dated with a sexually transmitted disease. Yet another said he was gay. Hollis, 38, who says the accusations are false, is suing the site's operator, Tasha Joseph, and the posters of the messages.

DOJ_NMG_0073489

•Anna Draker, a high school assistant principal in San Antonio, filed a defamation and negligence lawsuit against two students and their parents after a hoax page bearing her name, photo and several lewd comments and graphics appeared on MySpace.com, the popular social networking website.

The suit alleges that the students — one of whom had been disciplined by Draker — created the page to get revenge, and that it was designed to "injure Ms. Draker's reputation, expose her to public hatred … and cause her harm." The suit also alleges that the youths' parents were grossly negligent in supervising them.

•Ligonier Ministries, a religious broadcaster and publisher in Lake Mary, Fla., has taken the unusual step of asking a judge to pre-emptively silence a blogger to try to prevent him from criticizing the ministries. Judges historically have refused to place such limits on traditional publishers.

The lawsuit cites postings on a blog by Frank Vance that described Ligonier president Timothy Dick as "a shark" and as coming from a "family of nincompoops." The suit says the entries are false and have damaged Dick's reputation.

Robert Cox, founder and president of the Media Bloggers Association, which has 1,000 members, says the recent wave of lawsuits means that bloggers should bone up on libel law. "It hasn't happened yet, but soon, there will be a blogger who is successfully sued and who loses his home," he says. "That will be the shot heard round the blogosphere."

At its best, the blogosphere represents the ultimate in free speech by giving voice to millions. It is the Internet's version of Speaker's Corner in London's Hyde Park, a global coffeehouse where ideas are debated and exchanged.

The blogosphere also is the Internet's Wild West, a rapidly expanding frontier town with no sheriff. It's a place where both truth and "truthiness" thrive, to use the satirical word coined by comedian Stephen Colbert as a jab at politicians for whom facts don't matter.

Nearly two blogs are created every second, according to Technorati, a San Francisco firm that tracks more than 53 million blogs. Besides forming online communities in which people share ideas, news and gossip and debate issues of the day, blogs empower character assassins and mischief makers.

Small disputes now can lead to huge embarrassment, thanks to websites such as bitterwaitress.com, which purports to identify restaurant patrons who leave miserly tips. DontDateHimGirl.com includes postings that have identified men as pedophiles, rapists and diseased, without verification the postings are true.

"People take advantage of the anonymity to say things in public they would never say to anyone face-to-face," Cox says. "That's where you get these horrible comments. This is standard operating procedure."

Even so, Cox thinks the chief danger in legal disputes over what's said on the Internet is the potential chilling effect it could have on free speech. Many lawsuits against bloggers, he says, are filed merely to silence critics. In those cases, he encourages bloggers to fight back.

Last April, Cox orchestrated an effective counterattack on behalf of a blogger in Maine who was sued by a New York ad agency for $1 million. Lance Dutson, a website designer, had been blogging for two years when he posted several essays accusing Maine's Department of Tourism of wasting taxpayers' money. Among other things, he posted a draft of a tourism ad that mistakenly had contained a toll-free number to a phone-sex line.

Warren Kremer Paino Advertising, which produced the tourism campaign, said in its suit that Dutson made defamatory statements "designed to blacken WKPA's reputation (and) expose WKPA to public contempt and ridicule."

Dutson's criticisms paled to those directed at WKPA after word of the lawsuit spread through the blogosphere. Bloggers rushed to defend Dutson, and several lawyers volunteered to represent him. The media picked up the story and cast it as David vs. Goliath. Eight days after filing the suit, WKPA dropped it without comment.

"We're not here to play nice with somebody who is trying to suppress the speech of one of my members," Cox says.

A key principle that courts use in determining whether someone has been libeled is what damage the offending article did to that person's reputation in his or her community.

Susan Crawford, a professor at Cardozo Law School in New York who specializes in media and Internet issues, says the ease with which false postings can be corrected instantly, among other things, will force judges to reconsider how to measure the damage that is done to a plaintiff's reputation.

DOJ_NMG_0073490

"Libel law depends on having a reputation in a particular town that's damaged," she says. "Do you have an online reputation? What's your community that hears about the damage to your online reputation? Who should be sued? The original poster? Or someone like the Wonkette, for making something really famous? The causes of action won't go away. But judges will be skeptical that a single, four-line (posting in a) blog has actually damaged anyone."

Greg Herbert, an Orlando lawyer who represented Dutson, disagrees. The principles of libel law aren't going to change, he says. However, some judges "might not think a blogger is entitled to the same sort of free speech protection others are. A lot of judges still don't know what a blog is, and they think the Internet is a dark and nefarious place where all kinds of evil deeds occur."

Judges have indicated that they will give wide latitude to the type of speech being posted on the Internet. They usually have cited the 1996 Communications Decency Act, which protects website owners from being held liable for postings by others. On the other hand, under that statute, individuals who post messages are responsible for their content and can be sued for libel. That applies whether they are posting on their own website or on others' message boards.

In May, a federal judge in Philadelphia cited the act in dismissing a lawsuit stemming from a series of postings on a website operated by Tucker Max, a Duke Law School graduate whose site features tales of his boozing and womanizing.

Posters on a message board on tucker max.com had ridiculed Anthony DiMeo III, the heir to a New Jersey blueberry farm fortune, accusing him of inflating his credentials as a publicist, event planner and actor. DiMeo sued Max last March, claiming in court papers that his manhood had been questioned, his professional skills lampooned and his social connections mocked. DiMeo said Max, through the website, had libeled and threatened him, noting that one poster had written: "I can't believe no one has killed (DiMeo) yet."

In dismissing the suit, U.S. District Judge Steward Dalzell noted that Max "could be a poster child for the vulgarity" on the Internet, but that he nevertheless was entitled to protection under the Communications Decency Act. After the decision, DiMeo ridiculers on tuckermax.com piled on. Max says more than 200,000 people have viewed various threads on his message board about DiMeo.

DiMeo has asked an appeals court to consider not only the original messages about him but also those posted since his suit was filed.

Alan Nochumson, DiMeo's attorney, says the criticism has amounted to an Internet gang attack, led by Max, that has significantly damaged DiMeo's business. Nochumson says when Internet users use Google to search for DiMeo's name, many of the first Web links that pop up direct readers to postings on Max's website that criticize DiMeo.

Max says the claim is absurd. "The Internet isn't some giant ant colony," he says. "Different people from all over the country do things. I don't control them."

Hollis' lawsuit against DontDateHimGirl .com could reveal how far courts are willing to go to protect website owners from third-party comments. His suit claims the site is not the equivalent of an Internet provider such as AOL or Yahoo, and that because Joseph edits the site, she should be liable for its contents.

Hollis has sued Joseph, a Miami publicist and former Miami Herald columnist, as well as seven women who posted the messages about him. Three are named in the suit; four are anonymous.

Joseph's attorney, Lida Rodriguez-Taseff, says Joseph does not edit postings, except to remove information such as Social Security numbers and addresses.

"If a court were to find that the Communications Decency Act doesn't apply to Tasha, no website would be safe," Rodriguez-Taseff says, adding that if courts start to hold website owners liable for the content of third-party postings, "the only people who would be able to provide forums (would be) wealthy people. … It would be like making the coffee shop owner responsible for what people say in his coffee shop. What this case would say is that providers of forums in the Internet would have an obligation to determine truth or falsity of posts."

A hearing is scheduled Oct. 19.

"The Internet has a great number of valuable tools with which people can do great things," Hollis says.

But he says he's disturbed by how such false personal information can spread so freely across the Web. "Even if I had herpes, which I don't, even if I was gay, which I'm not, would I want to have a conversation about those things with an anonymous individual over a global platform? It's utterly ridiculous."

DOJ_NMG_0073491

Even if he wins in court, Hollis says, he loses.

"Those postings are going to be out there forever," he says. "Whenever anybody Googles my name, up comes a billion sites. I will forever have to explain to someone that I do not have herpes."

In Cumming, Ga., about 40 miles northeast of Atlanta, David Milum, 58, is still blogging. He is appealing the $50,000 judgment against him.

Milum says he considers himself a muckraker and exposer of corruption in local officials. In the recent libel trial, his attorney, Jeff Butler, described his client as a "rabble-rouser" whose inspiration was "public service."

Milum lost in court because he could not meet the basic defense for libel claims: He could not prove that his allegations that Banks was involved in bribery and corruption were true.

Now Milum is facing another libel suit — this one seeking $2 million — over his claims about the alleged misdeeds of a local government employee.

"I have a very wonderful wife," Milum says. "And you can imagine how wonderful she has to be to put up with this."

PodestaMattoon Sues Client For Unpaid Fees (RC)

By Kate Ackley

Roll Call, October 3, 2006

The lobbying firm PodestaMattoon has taken the unusual step of suing a former client for breach of contract and unpaid fees, including bonuses, totaling more than $300,000.

The case, filed in D.C. Superior Court, offers a glimpse into the often mysterious client-lobbyist arrangements involving contracts and performance fees for securing money from the Defense Department's budget.

PodestaMattoon and its attorneys from Dickstein Shapiro allege Falex Corp. of Sugar Grove, Ill., and its nonprofit entity, the Center for Tribology and Coatings, owe the firm $307,460.83, plus interest, for unpaid fees and out-of-pocket expenses.

PodestaMattoon, which is owned by Republican Daniel Mattoon and Democrat Tony Podesta, publicly reported income of $520,000 from Falex between January 2004 and March 10, 2006, when the client was terminated.

In the court filings, PodestaMattoon claims that in January 2004, Falex agreed to pay "a $150,000 performance fee if PodestaMattoon reached certain strategic and legislative goals."

While the lawsuit does not specify those legislative goals, lobbying disclosure reports filed with the Secretary of the Senate show that the firm was working for Falex on Defense appropriations matters. Steve Ellis, vice president of Taxpayers for Common Sense, and Keith Ashdown, research director of Citizens for Responsibility and Ethics in Washington, said their data showed that for fiscal 2005, the tribology center received a $1.5 million Defense earmark that was requested by a Member of the House. (Tribology is the study of effects of friction on moving parts and methods of lubricating them.)

The CTC and Falex are located in Speaker Dennis Hastert's (R-Ill.) district, but a spokeswoman in his office did not confirm whether he had made the request.

PodestaMattoon's court filing states that "during the remainder of 2004 PodestaMattoon performed its obligation under the 2004 Agreement" and, as a result, "Falex became obligated to pay" the $150,000 performance fee. According to the filing, Falex paid only $50,000 of that sum and did not pay expenses worth more than $27,000.

The contract between Falex and PodestaMattoon gets murkier later in 2004, when, the court filings claim, Falex asked the firm to enter into an arrangement directly with the CTC, which is a 501(c)(3) nonprofit.

The lawsuit alleges that Falex agreed to pay the lobbying bills for the nonprofit center, which operates as a partnership between Falex and Northern Illinois University's college of engineering and engineering technology.

Lobbying ethics lawyer Kenneth Gross, a partner at Skadden, Arps, Slate, Meagher & Flom, said such an arrangement, while not routine, does not raise any legal concerns, especially since the CTC and Falex are part of a joint venture.

"There are limitations on the amount that (c)(3) [organizations] can spend on lobbying, but this arrangement doesn't necessarily set off any bells," Gross said.

The court documents state that PodestaMattoon sent a letter to the CTC confirming its work and that Falex agreed to pay the firm a $200,000 performance fee. Once again, PodestaMattoon maintains that it was successful in its work for Falex/CTC.

DOJ_NMG_0073492

Missi Tessier, a spokeswoman for PodestaMattoon, said she could not discuss the firm's work for the client or the status of the lawsuit.

"The only thing that I can say is that it is a simple fee-collection issue," said Tessier, who added that she did not know of any similar suits brought by the firm against other clients. "We're working with our attorney."

Ashdown and Ellis, both of whom track earmarks, said the center received a Defense earmark for $1.8 million in the fiscal 2006 bill.

"As a result of PodestaMattoon's performance of its obligations under 2005 Agreement, CTC became obligated to pay PodestaMattoon $200,000 in a performance fee, which PodestaMattoon later discounted to $175,000," the court documents state.

Gross said such performance or success fees typically are permitted in lobbying contracts.

Current laws, he said, "make it impermissible for a government contractor to hire a lobbyist or firm to secure a government contract" on a contingency basis, but "that same prohibition does not apply when you are securing a benefit with the legislative branch."

Gross added that the current law prohibits lobbying firms from receiving payment directly from appropriated funds.

PodestaMattoon's attorneys of record, Peter Kadzik and Andres Colon, did not return calls for comment. Andrew Faville, CEO of Falex, did not respond to several messages seeking comment. And lawyers Seth Goldberg and Eduardo Crosa of Steptoe & Johnson, which represents the defendants, also did not respond to inquires.

Mean Seniors Face Fresh Round Of Decisions As 2007 Sign-Up Nears (WSJ)

By Vanessa Fuhrmans, Jane Zhang

The Wall Street Journal, October 3, 2006

Here we go again.

After spending months sorting through a multitude of Medicare drug-benefit options for 2006, seniors have the chance to undergo the dizzying experience all over again. That is because this week insurers begin marketing their 2007 drug plans before the six-week enrollment season kicks off Nov. 15.

The good news is that most seniors who are satisfied with the plan they are enrolled in don't have to do anything. Some analysts had predicted a shakeout after dozens of providers rushed into the new drug-benefit market last year, but few companies are actually canceling plans.

Still, the drug-benefit landscape is changing enough that even enrollees who are content may want to review how their plan stacks up against new offerings. Beneficiaries in most states will have 50 to 60 offerings to choose from, at least 10 more than in 2006. Some plans are adding benefits -- including eliminating co-payments for generic drugs. But at least one, Humana Inc., is rolling back one of the richest benefits on the market: coverage for brand-name drugs during a phase known as the "doughnut hole" that requires many beneficiaries to pay the full cost of drugs after reaching a certain cost threshold.

For the most basic plans, prices are converging, though there are still some big differences. Last year companies announced drug-benefit premiums without knowing how the competitive landscape would shape up. Consequently, prices ranged widely, from as little as $1.87 a month to more than $35 for a basic plan. Now for 2007, Humana still sells the cheapest plan in 38 states, but premiums for its basic option have climbed to between $10.20 and $18.20. Meanwhile, Cigna Corp. and Aetna Inc., whose prices were some of the highest, have lowered theirs by as much as 30%. (Cigna's basic option ranges from $17 to $31; Aetna's costs $24.80 to $30.80.)

To compare the 2007 plan offering, seniors can also tap a number of new or enhanced online tools. Later this month, Medicare's Plan Finder at www.medicare.gov1 and www.mymedicare.gov2 will let beneficiaries compare out-of-pocket costs and benefits for the 2007 plans in their area. Seniors can see what plans are available in each state at www.medicare.gov/medicarereform/local-plans-2007.asp3. A new Web site, www.partdoptimizer.com4, is run by DestinationRx, which provided software for Medicare's comparison tools. It provides tips on avoiding the doughnut hole and compares how much seniors would save by switching to alternative medicines within their current plan. The site currently has data for 2006 plans but will be able to crunch 2007 information after the enrollment period has ended Dec. 31.

DOJ_NMG_0073493

Who should consider switching? Prime candidates are those who picked plans for this year that provided coverage of the so-called doughnut hole, or who fell into that gap and now want coverage for it. The doughnut hole refers to a portion of drug spending that the government-subsidized plans don't have to cover. Seniors get coverage for up to $2,400 in spending in 2007. The federal subsidies then stop until the patient reaches $3,850 in out-of-pocket expenses. After that, the coverage kicks in again and covers 95% of drug purchases for the rest of the year. For a higher premium, some plans offer to cover drug expenses through the gap.

Filling the Gap

It is these higher-end plans that are seeing some of the biggest changes in 2007. For starters, there are many more available. Just 15% of plans this year provided coverage of the doughnut hole, according to Avalere Health LLC, a health-care consulting firm in Washington, D.C. Next year 29% of them will.

This year in New Jersey, for instance, Humana sold one of these more-comprehensive plans for a $48.50 monthly premium, while Cigna's cost a bit more -- $51.36. In 2007, the Humana premium will jump 46% to $71.20. Cigna, though, which signed up fewer beneficiaries than it had hoped for 2006, has dropped its price, to $38.20.

What's more, Humana is joining the majority of its rivals in providing coverage for only generics during the doughnut hole. This year, it was the only major insurer to provide coverage of many brand-name drugs through the gap. But as a result, it says it attracted more than its share of sicker enrollees with higher-than-average medication costs -- and lost money on the higher-end plan. "We'd assumed that other national plans would offer brand coverage through the gap, but none did," says Scott Latimer, Humana's market president for central and northern Florida.

Of Humana's 3.5 million drug-plan enrollees, about 12%, or 420,000 people, are currently in its most-comprehensive plan and will no longer have their brand-name drugs covered through the doughnut hole, Humana says.

On the whole, though, 5% of all plans will offer both brand-name and generic drug coverage through the gap, an increase from this year, according to Avalere. In Michigan, Coventry Health Care Inc. is one of just a few companies that is raising the price of its most comprehensive plan, from $42.40 to $48. In doing so, it is adding generics and brand-name drugs to its gap coverage. But seniors should check if such benefit improvements apply to their drugs. Coventry says only some preferred brand drugs in its first tier of coverage are included alongside the generics.

"You have to read the fine print," says John Gorman, president and chief executive of Gorman Health Group, a Washington health-care consulting company.

In another shift, many plans are making changes that will reduce the chances that consumers will even reach the $2,400 level where the coverage gap starts. By eliminating co-pays for generic drugs in some plans, for instance, insurers are making such treatments essentially free to patients (at least until they reach the coverage gap). Aetna is dropping co-pays for generics in many of its plans, while Cigna says it is eliminating generic co-pays in all of its most basic drug plans.

Peter Ashkenaz, a spokesman for the federal Centers for Medicare and Medicaid Services, says every beneficiary will be notified if there is any change in their plan.

Even if beneficiaries want to stay in their current plan, they should still check that the drugs they take are remaining on their plan's formulary and on the same co-pay "tier" as before. A move from the lowest to a higher tier of co-payments for a drug can translate into a rise in co-pay to $40 a month from $5.

New Shoppers

There may be a huge market of potential shoppers. Only 20% of 3,400 beneficiaries surveyed last month by J.D. Power & Associates said they would definitely stay with the plan they had. About two million Americans will turn 65 in 2007 and also will be eligible. At least another four million, including three million low-income beneficiaries not subject to penalties for missing the deadline earlier this year, have yet to enroll.

Still, unless another plan has the potential to save a beneficiary substantial money each month, some Medicare watchers say that many may decide to stay put. Few predict that any player will break the lock that the country's three biggest plans -- UnitedHealth Group Inc., Humana and WellPoint Inc. -- have on the majority of the market.

"People went through so much trauma picking a plan the first year," says Robert Laszewski, a Washington-based health-care consultant. "They're not going to open this up all over again just to save a few bucks."

DOJ_NMG_0073494

Many Obstacles Face Negron In Fla. 16, Especially Foley's Name (CQ)

By Rachel Kapochunas

CQPolitics, October 2, 2006

The Florida Republican Party announced Monday that its executive committee has chosen Republican state Rep. Joe Negron to face Democratic businessman Tim Mahoney this fall for the 16th District seat suddenly vacated Friday by scandal-plagued Republican Rep. Mark Foley.

The GOP was forced to name a replacement candidate for Foley after the six-term incumbent resigned, following revelations about inappropriate e-mails and other Internet communications — some of which were sexually explicit — from Foley to underage, male congressional pages. Foley has since announced he is seeking in-patient treatment for alcoholism.

Although the state Republicans wasted no time in rallying around Negron as a stand-in for an election that will be held just five weeks from Tuesday, it will be very hard for them to put the Foley scandal behind them. A quirk in the Florida election law requires that Foley's name remain on the Republican line on the Nov. 7 ballot, as he had already been certified as the winner of the Sept. 5 primary.

Any votes cast for Foley will be credited to Negron as the replacement candidate. But it will be Foley's name, not Negron's, that residents of the south-central Florida district will see when they cast their votes. And it is possible, if not likely, that many will be uncomfortable punching Foley's name, given the circumstances surrounding his hasty departure from the race and his House seat.

So Negron — a lawyer who currently represents a state House constituency that overlaps the 16th District in parts of Martin, St. Lucie and Palm Beach counties —has just five weeks to raise money, inform voters of the strange ballot situation and introduce himself to the many district voters who are not familiar with him.

Local Democrats continue to portray the race as a matchup not between Negron and Mahoney, but between Foley and Mahoney.

"It's still a race against the 'Foley' name," Martin County Democratic Chairman David Dew told CQPolitics.com shortly after Negron was chosen. "If I'm a Republican, I'm having a real hard time punching that name that says 'Foley' knowing that he's an accused predator."

Negron, in a phone interview with CQPolitics.com after the party announcement, concedes he faces a problem, but can overcome it. "I think it's an education effort, but I believe that voters are very smart and sophisticated," said Negron, who added that he just needs to "get the word out that the name 'Mark Foley' is only a placeholder," in order to be successful.

"I'm very grateful for this opportunity to keep District 16 a Republican seat," Negron. "It's a seat that went for President Bush [in 2004 with] 55 percent and voted for Gov. [Jeb] Bush [with] 60 percent."

But Negron and the Republican party bear the burden of explaining the ballot process to voters in the face of a rapidly strengthening bid by Democratic businessman Mahoney, who had appeared a distinct underdog to the long-popular Foley but raised an eye-opening $1.1 million as of Aug. 16.

Mahoney showed no hesitation about weighing in on the Foley scandal. Mahoney, at a press conference Saturday in West Palm Beach, echoed Democratic charges that Republican officials had failed to address earlier allegations that Foley had made inappropriate remarks to pages and had put election concerns ahead of their obligation to protect the youngsters.

"They had to make a choice," said Mahoney. "They had to do what is right for the children . . . or they could try to hold onto a seat. And they decided to try to hold onto a seat."

Negron's truncated congressional campaign is actually his second bid for higher office this year. He launched a Republican primary campaign for Florida attorney general, but yielded to the strong advantage held by former U.S. Rep. Bill McCollum and withdrew from that race this summer.

Negron, though, has had his eye on the 16th District seat for several years. He expressed his interest in replacing Foley when the congressman weighed a bid for the Senate in 2004. But Foley announced in September 2003 that he would no longer campaign for the seat, left open by retiring Democratic Sen. Bob Graham, that eventually went to Republican Mel Martinez.

DOJ_NMG_0073495

Sen. Martinez was one of the first GOP officials to endorse Negron after he was chosen as the new nominee. “I am pleased with the party’s choice of Representative Negron to run in the 16th District,” Martinez said in a statement released by the party. “I fully endorse his campaign. Representative Negron is a man of integrity and he will represent Floridians with honor.”

Negron said he has $1 million carried over from his campaign for attorney general. Federal election law does not permit Negron to transfer those funds directly to a congressional campaign committee. Negron said Monday he is already preparing to “turn over” $600,000 of his funds by returning the checks to individual donors and asking them to donate to his federal account.

Negron now has until 5 p.m. Oct. 11 to submit the $9,726 filing fee and a “Federal Office Loyalty Oath” form to the Division of Elections, small requirements to appear on the November ballot which pale in comparison to Negron’s challenges ahead.

CQ rates the race as No Clear Favorite. Please visit CQPolitics.com’s Election Forecaster for ratings on all races.

Fla. GOP Picks Foley Replacement (AP-Y)

By Brendan Farrington, Associated Press Writer

AP, October 3, 2006

Disgraced former Rep. Mark Foley sought treatment for alcoholism and "other behavioral problems" as Republicans on Monday picked a new candidate to salvage the seat that Foley abandoned after exchanging lurid online messages with teenage boys.

State party leaders chose state Rep. Joe Negron to replace Foley in next month's election. Negron will receive votes cast for Foley, although Foley's name will remain on the ballot in the West Palm Beach district, which is largely Republican.

"My job beginning immediately is to get word out to all these absentee voters and to everyone else in this race that you are not voting for Mark Foley, you are voting for the Republican nominee, and I'm not Mark Foley," Negron said. "I think it's something that can be done."

Foley resigned Friday after reports surfaced that he sent sexually explicit e-mails and instant messages to male teenage pages. He quickly went into seclusion and released a statement that he was seeking treatment.

"Painfully, the events that led to my resignation have crystalized recognition of my long-standing significant alcohol and emotional difficulties," he said. "I strongly believe that I am an alcoholic and have accepted the need for immediate treatment for alcoholism and other behavioral problems."

He added: "I deeply regret and accept full responsibility for the harm I have caused."

Foley's attorney, David Roth, acknowledged Monday that his client checked into a treatment center over the weekend, but would not identify the facility.

The FBI is investigating Foley's e-mails, as is the Florida Department of Law Enforcement. Foley, who is 52 and single, could be found to have violated a law that he helped write as co-chairman of the Congressional Missing and Exploited Children's Caucus.

House Speaker Dennis Hastert said Monday that GOP leaders did not see Foley's Internet exchanges and that he would have demanded Foley's expulsion if he had known about them. "As a parent and speaker of the House, I am disgusted," Hastert, R-Ill., told reporters in Washington.

The scandal suddenly put Foley's seat up for grabs as Democrats seek a net gain of 15 Republican seats to retake power in the House. Foley, who had represented the district for 12 years, was regarded as a shoo-in for re-election before his resignation. His name was to remain on the Nov. 7 ballot because the deadline had passed for changing ballots.

At least one prominent Florida Republican expressed pessimism about holding onto the seat.

"It's a death sentence ... mission impossible," said former state Republican Party Chairman Tom Slade. "The only way you win is they (voters) have got to vote for Mark Foley. That doesn't appear to me to be very attractive."

But state party spokesman Jeff Sadosky said the seat is too important to surrender. "It's not going to be about yesterday's news no matter how tragic and horrifying," he said.

Negron, standing beside a 10th grade son and 8th grade daughter, became choked up when talking about what Foley did.

DOJ_NMG_0073496

"I've had pages work in my office for years, I've seen pages go to Washington, I've seen the incredible opportunity that is," Negron said, his voice trailing off. He then put his hand over his face and struggled to continue talking. "It was very disturbing because I work with these young people."

The Democratic nominee is Tim Mahoney, a former Republican and financial adviser. He said Monday that his campaign would largely remain unchanged.

"When people meet me and people know me, whether they're Democrats or Republicans, they get on board," he said. "They know that when I'm in Washington D.C., I'll be no nonsense and it's all going to be about results."

Negron, an attorney who turns 45 next week, joined in the call to investigate who knew about the e-mails and when. Democrats have suggested House leaders tried to cover them up for political reasons.

"We ought to investigate if people knew about inappropriate, criminal e-mails and didn't take appropriate action," he said. "If that happened, they need to be punished."

___

Associated Press writers Brent Kallestad in Tallahassee and Brian Skoloff in West Palm Beach contributed to this report.

Foley Debacle Tests District Loyalties (LAT)

By Jenny Jarvie And Miguel Bustillo

The Los Angeles Times, October 3, 2006

JUPITER, Fla. — Mark Child voted for Rep Mark Foley two years ago, and expected to vote for him again in November. But after the disclosure that the politician had been sending sexually suggestive Internet messages to teenage boys working as congressional pages, Child is not sure what he will do.

"I'm a Republican, but I don't always vote Republican," the 48-year-old carpenter said as he dined at the Tabica Grill here. "I feel betrayed."

His wife, Sandra, shuddered at the idea of seeing Foley's name on the ballot.

"We have children," said the 47-year-old nurse. "You put a person in Congress and you expect them to do their job. He did a good job, but he was overcome by his demons."

Foley's sexually charged Internet exchanges with minors prompted widespread reactions of disbelief and disgust in his home district, suggesting that the party may face an uphill challenge in convincing voters that the seat, once considered a Republican lock, should remain in the party's hands.

"I'm very disappointed, particularly that Republican leaders in Washington knew about it," said Paul Levine, a 64-year-old retiree. "It's absolutely inexcusable, it's criminal they didn't expose that. They covered it up."

Florida Republican officials, meanwhile, tried to recover from the shock of Foley's resignation and began working to elect another candidate to the seat. That will require Florida Republicans to persuade voters to cast ballots for the disgraced incumbent, even though he has resigned.

Under Florida law, Foley's name will remain on the ballot, which has already been printed. But the replacement candidate Republicans selected Monday, state Rep. Joe Negron, will receive any votes cast for Foley.

"I don't know that it's going to be possible, but our job is to get voters to look beyond the name," said Bill Lents, chairman of the St. Lucie County Republican Party. "One idea being kicked around is 'wrong name, right party.' That's a message we have to get across, and it's not going to be easy, but that's our job."

Not everyone in Jupiter, a small coastal town of 46,000 at the mouth of the Loxahatchee River in Palm Beach County, had heard of the scandal — and some who had said they remained loyal to the GOP.

"I'm a Republican — this isn't going to change that," said Richard Engstrom, a 58-year-old accountant, as he crossed the parking lot of a Wal-Mart here. "Some people are easily swayed. But I don't think this means the Democrats will get in."

The precedent for the decision to keep Foley's name on the ballot but count his votes toward someone else happened in 2004, when Florida Democrat Jim Stork withdrew from a race against incumbent Republican Rep. E. Clay Shaw Jr., citing health reasons.

DOJ_NMG_0073497

After state elections officials ruled that it was too late to remove Stork's name from the ballot, Florida Democrats won an injunction allowing them to name congressional aide Robin Rorapaugh as the party's candidate, and have votes for Stork count for him.

Barring a legal challenge, the same outcome is expected in the Nov. 7 election for Foley's old seat, requiring Republicans to remind voters of Foley at the same time the party seeks to distance itself from him.

"That's going to cause confusion with voters who will have assumed we had got rid of this guy," said Darryl Paulson, a political science professor at the University of South Florida in St. Petersburg. The district "was widely seen as a safe Republican seat — until three days ago," he added.

The jigsaw piece of a political district Foley represented stretches across the heart of south central Florida, and includes urban and rural, as well as rich and poor, areas. It goes from Port Charlotte on the Gulf of Mexico, up and over the west and north shore of Lake Okeechobee, east through Port St. Lucie and Stuart on the Atlantic Coast, then south and slightly inland to Royal Palm Beach and Wellington.

The district, which had 202,500 registered Republicans and 170,369 registered Democrats as of Aug. 7, according to Florida's election division, once had more GOP voters. But some were sheared off in 2002 and added to a neighboring district held by Shaw, who had nearly lost a close reelection battle.

Some Republican officials admitted they were still reeling from the news about Foley, a popular moderate who had won reelection two years ago with 68% of the vote. But they said it was time to press on.

"This is someone I was a close political friend of, and it was a punch right to the gut," said Sid Dinerstein, chairman of the Palm Beach County Republican Party.

Before learning Monday that Foley had checked himself into an alcoholism treatment center, Dinerstein said, "We worried whether he was alive, frankly. No one had heard from him.

"But this is politics. We have to go forward. It helps that the Democrat was out here with John Kerry last week. That gets the Republican base fired up."

The Democratic challenger, Tim Mahoney, continued to remind voters of Foley's messages to congressional pages, while at the same time pledging to run an issues-oriented campaign that focused on such topics as the war in Iraq, energy prices and the cost of hurricane insurance in Florida.

"I hope my opponent will join me in calling for a full investigation of the tragic events that led to the resignation of congressman Foley so that the mothers and fathers who entrust their children to the United States Congress' page program can be assured that their children are not put at risk," Mahoney said in a statement.

As a light rain swept across the sprawling town of highways, strip malls and gated communities, which is home to a large number of affluent retirees from the North, the shockwaves continued to spread Monday evening.

"Oh my God, that's awful," said Mary Russell, 48, an assistant manager at a Payless Shoe Source, who had just closed up for the day. "I had no idea."

"Wow," said Denise Vogel, a computer consultant who had voted for Foley in previous elections, when she head about the scandal as she browsed a video store. "I'm going Democrat."

Bush Heads West To Stump For Republicans (WP)

By Peter Baker

The Washington Post, October 3, 2006

RENO, Nev., Oct. 2 -- President Bush on Monday kicked off a three-day Western campaign fundraising trip that will take him to Nevada, California, Arizona and Colorado as he steps up his efforts to preserve Republican control of Congress five weeks before too-close-to-call midterm elections.

Bush plans to use the campaign swing to launch an aggressive attack on Democrats for voting last week against bills that limited the courtroom rights of terrorism suspects and authorized the president's warrantless wiretapping program.

"It sounds like they think the best way to protect the American people is to wait until we're attacked again," Bush said at his first stop, a fundraiser here for House candidate Dean Heller. "That's not the way it's going to be under my administration."

DOJ_NMG_0073498

The fact that Bush had to go to the aid of Heller, the secretary of state, was another indication of Republican trouble. The 2nd Congressional District, which covers all of Nevada but Las Vegas and its suburbs, has not elected a Democrat since being created in 1982.

But in the bruising August primary to replace Rep. Jim Gibbons, who is running for governor, Heller emerged financially tapped out. He won by just 421 votes, a victory that the runner-up briefly sought to overturn in court.

The latest public poll, commissioned by the Las Vegas Review-Journal, found Heller leading Democrat Jill Derby by just 45 percent to 42 percent in a district where Republicans outnumber Democrats by a margin of nearly 3 to 2.

Bush's approval rating in the state stands at 41 percent, roughly comparable to his national standing, but he has the ability to bring in the big dollars Heller needs. His visit to a hangar at the Reno airport raised $360,000 from a few hundred people.

Few Will See Bush's Quick Visit Today (SACBEE)

By Tony Bizjak

The Sacramento Bee, October 3, 2006

When President Bush drops in today for a visit to El Dorado County, locals may be lucky to catch even a glimpse.

The good news: no highways clogged by presidential motorcades.

Instead, the president is expected to arrive via helicopter, "helo-ing in" as the White House calls it, for lunch on a hilltop overlooking Folsom Lake, then "helo-ing" out two-plus hours later.

The lunch is a $2,000-per-person fundraiser for Rep. John Doolittle with about 300 in attendance at Serrano Country Club.

Bush will be arriving from a fundraiser breakfast in Stockton and is expected to land at Rolling Hills Middle School, sheriff's officials said, then proceed a short distance to the clubhouse.

Officials are closing about a half-mile of Serrano Parkway to traffic between Terracina Drive and Torino Way at the request of the Secret Service.

El Dorado Sheriff's Lt. Kevin House warned, however, that presidential travel itineraries are subject to last-minute changes.

While no one without a lunch ticket is sure to see the president, the excitement of the Bush visit is palpable on the hillside.

That starts with Doolittle, the veteran Republican congressman from Roseville who finds himself in what may be his toughest re-election campaign. He is being challenged by Democrat Charlie Brown.

"For the first time in his career, (Doolittle) is going to have the opportunity to introduce the president to his constituents, and he is tremendously excited about that," Doolittle spokesman Richard Robinson said.

Among those constituents will be a contingent of Sweeneys. El Dorado County Board of Supervisors Chairman Jack Sweeney is coming with a friend, all four of his children, three of his children's spouses and a grandson.

"A big day for the Sweeney family," the patriarch said. "I've always wanted to be at a function with the president of the United States. I'm 68 and I decided I didn't want my kids to have to wait until they are my age to be able to do that."

Debbie Manning, president of the El Dorado Hills Chamber of Commerce, said people have been calling her office asking about where to get a view of the president. Unfortunately, she said, she doesn't know.

"The good news is, with El Dorado Hills, there aren't many ways in and out," Manning said.

Serrano Parkway will remain open to pedestrians, sheriff's officials said, although people will not be allowed to stand on the north side of the road near the gated country club entrance.

A group opposing Doolittle and protesting the president's policies, especially regarding Iraq, will be roadside, a spokesman said. El Dorado Hills may be conservative, "but we still have people concerned about the mess in Iraq," said Don Nicodemus of the Sierra Foothills Democratic Club.

Bush, Fund-Raiser In Chief, Hits The Trail In Earnest (NYT)

By Jim Rutenberg And Adam Nagourney

The New York Times, October 3, 2006

STOCKTON, Calif., Oct. 2 — President Bush's job approval ratings are sagging, nervous members of his own party are running advertisements highlighting their differences with him, and the White House is besieged with new questions about the war in Iraq.

DOJ_NMG_0073499

But Mr. Bush is hardly going to be sitting out the final stage of this year's campaign. Even if many Republicans in tough races across the country do not want to be seen with him, Mr. Bush and his aides have developed a comprehensive plan to get him on the road for much of the next 40 days and put the power of the presidency into a midterm election that could shape his final two years in the White House.

Mr. Bush intends to concentrate first and foremost on raising money. His strength on that front is undiminished by his political problems and is vital to giving his party an advantage in outspending the Democrats on advertising down the homestretch.

To date, at a series of mostly private events, Mr. Bush has raised $180 million for his party and individual candidates, according to the Republican National Committee, outpacing the record Mr. Bush set in 2002, when it was easier to raise money because of less restrictive campaign finance laws. Together with Laura Bush, the first lady, and Vice President Dick Cheney, the White House has raised nearly $250 million for the election cycle.

But after a period in which most of his political appearances have been behind closed doors — he did five fund-raisers in the past week that were closed to the press — he will also step out more publicly.

While not yet conducting full-scale campaign rallies, Mr. Bush will be appearing more frequently with candidates, often in heavily Republican areas where Democrats are nonetheless competitive this year. And he will give speeches driving home the twin themes of national security and tax cuts while trying to rally a dispirited Republican base.

White House and party officials said there was never any internal debate about putting Mr. Bush out into the public eye, for all the risks that might entail. With a new burst of bad news for the party — including repercussions from the forced resignation of Representative Mark Foley of Florida over sexually explicit e-mail and instant messages sent to teenage pages — the officials said that employing Mr. Bush's power to use the White House platform to emphasize the Republican campaign message was more necessary than ever.

Mr. Bush will avoid districts and states where party officials determine his appearance may be particularly damaging for Republicans. But his aides, discussing the White House strategy for the president, said they had concluded for the most part that putting Mr. Bush out in public would do his party and its candidates more good than harm, a position that is clearly a big gamble for Republicans and a test of how much political clout he has left after two years of setbacks and missteps.

In the first three days of this week alone, he will make five public fund-raising appearances with Republican candidates, and his schedule suggests that the White House strategy is to try to close off the possibility of Democratic gains not in the most hotly contested and visible races, but in a second tier that could decide whether the House remains in Republican hands.

Two of those appearances will be on behalf of Republican House members in California, John T. Doolittle and Richard W. Pombo, who is to join Mr. Bush for an open fund-raiser here in central California on Tuesday. Both Mr. Pombo and Mr. Doolittle are viewed as potentially vulnerable because they have been touched by the fallout from the corruption scandals in Washington. In both cases, the White House believes Mr. Bush's ability to turn out Republican base voters will help to keep the seats safe.

Similarly, he went to Reno, Nev., on Monday to raise money for Dean Heller, the Republican candidate for a House seat in a district that should be safely Republican but that analysts say could be in play.

"You'll be seeing more public speeches in the weeks ahead," said Karl Rove, Mr. Bush's senior political strategist. "The president is enormously important with a significant part of the electorate that they need to win."

Mr. Bush alluded to this in an interview with conservative columnists in the Oval Office last month, saying he could set the stage for the Republican message. "There are a lot of people out there that hopefully I'll be able to inspire to turn out," he said.

But some of what Mr. Bush is doing will largely remain out of public sight. He plans to record messages for automated calls to voters in crucial districts, taking advantage of the sophisticated Republican operation to identify likely supporters and the issues that motivate them.

Mr. Bush, who has always relished campaigning, was described by associates as hungry to return to the road and is enjoying spending time with candidates and offering them advice.

The advice, it seems, goes to matters large and small. Michele Bachmann, a Republican running for an open House seat in Minnesota, said Mr. Bush needled her for wearing scalloped pink gloves for a recent presidential visit to her state. "What are those for?" Mr. Bush said, pointing to the gloves, according to Ms. Bachmann. "When you campaign, take off the gloves."

DOJ_NMG_0073500

The White House sought, sometimes in awkward ways, to balance Mr. Bush's strengths and liabilities. He was the star attraction last week at an event that raised money for Republicans in three states, including Iowa — a closed-door fund-raiser in an Embassy Row mansion 10 minutes from the White House and 1,000 miles from Iowa, where it escaped mention the next day in the influential Des Moines Register.

And last Thursday, he was at a closed-door fund-raiser for Representative Deborah Pryce, an embattled Republican in Ohio — who used the money to finance a campaign that has included advertisements disputing Mr. Bush's position on stem-cell research.

Senator Charles E. Schumer of New York, leading the Democrats' effort to win the Senate, said his main concern as he surveyed an otherwise favorable political environment was that Mr. Bush's fund-raising power would overcome any drag he might have on his party. "That's the No. 1 question that will determine the election," Mr. Schumer said. "And I don't know the answer."

Democrats said Mr. Bush's presence on the campaign trail would only help them as they tried to turn the election into a referendum on the president. And their professed delight was echoed by signs of apprehension in states where Republicans are facing their toughest battles.

In Rhode Island, Ian Lang, the campaign manager for Senator Lincoln Chafee, a Republican who is in a tough re-election battle, said a visit by Mr. Bush "is not something we're looking for or asking for."

John Brabender, a strategist for Senator Rick Santorum of Pennsylvania, who is facing a stiff Democratic challenge, said of Mr. Bush: "He would be a distraction right now. It's very important that we turn this race into Bob Casey versus Rick Santorum."

Sara Taylor, the White House political director, said Mr. Bush could prove pivotal with party faithful who have been less than enthused this year.

"He is loved by his base," she said, "and they support him."

Cheney Slams Dems In Wyo. Stump Speech (USAT)

USA Today, October 3, 2006

Vice President Cheney returned Monday to the Wyoming congressional district he once served, campaigning for the re-election of GOP Rep. Barbara Cubin.

Cheney said Republicans must keep their majority in Congress to maintain the fight against terrorism. "What the Democrats are pushing now is the very kind of retreat that has been tried and failed in the past," Cheney, who held the state's lone seat from 1978 to 1989, said at the Casper Events Center. He said he didn't have to remind the crowd what sort of legislation would come forward in Congress if Democrats gained the majority, invoking the idea of Sen. Edward Kennedy and Rep. Barney Frank, both Massachusetts Democrats, becoming committee chairs. Cubin faces what the Casper Star-Tribune called a "strong challenge" from businessman Gary Trauner.

Kean should quit race, anti-war group says

A group of anti-war activists with relatives serving in Iraq called on New Jersey Republican Tom Kean Jr. to quit the U.S. Senate race, saying he lacks a strategy for withdrawing troops or ensuring soldiers get needed aid once they return. The flap started in August when Kean and his Democratic opponent, Sen. Robert Menendez, met with the group Military Families Speak Out and were given a series of war-related questions. Menendez answered them; Kean answered some and promised written responses to the rest, said Paula Rogovin, the group's spokeswoman. Rogovin says Kean reneged. A spokeswoman for Kean, Jill Hazelbaker, said Kean has answered the group and "has stated repeatedly the egregious mistakes he feels have been made, and he's asked the president to level with the American people and acknowledge those mistakes."

Voter-registration group accused of fraud

A group that registered more than a million voters two years ago is facing allegations of voter fraud and sloppy work just weeks before midterm elections. ACORN — the Association of Community Organizations for Reform Now — is running voter-registration drives in 17 states this year. The group dispatches workers and volunteers to poor neighborhoods, gas stations, courthouses and other places to sign up new voters. Among the problems:

•Philadelphia's municipal voter-registration office has rejected about 3,000 cards submitted by ACORN because of missing information or invalid addresses.

DOJ_NMG_0073501

• Denver County election officials forwarded about 200 cards to the secretary of State's office after finding similar handwriting on signatures.

• In Ohio, ACORN is accused of submitting cards with non-existent addresses, forged signatures and, in one case, for someone who died seven years ago.

"ACORN does not commit voter fraud," national president Maude Hurd said. We work hard to bring new people into the democratic process and work to maintain good quality control."

Nevada family 'like the Kennedys, but …'

A Nevada family would be a political dynasty except only one of them has ever won a statewide election. For three generations, members of the Hansen family have run for political offices ranging from governor and U.S. senator to Elko County sheriff. Only David Hansen has ever won a statewide or major county race, being elected twice to the state school board more than 20 years ago. Said Joshua Hansen, 26, an Independent American Party candidate in the 3rd Congressional District: "We're like the Kennedys, but without the money."

Poll Shows Allen Leading Webb By Six Points (WT)

By Christina Bellantoni

The Washington Times, October 3, 2006

Virginia Sen. George Allen holds a six-point lead over his Democratic challenger, James H. Webb Jr., a new statewide poll released yesterday shows.

If the election were held today, Mr. Allen, a Republican, would capture 49 percent of the vote, while Mr. Webb would receive 43 percent, according to a telephone survey of 750 likely voters conducted by Rasmussen Reports from Thursday through Sunday.

The data also show 5 percent are undecided and 3 percent would choose some other candidate in the contest.

Election Day is Nov. 7.

The race could hold national implications as well -- Democrats need to win six seats to recapture a Senate majority.

Mr. Allen has held a steady lead in the Rasmussen poll for more than a year, but his once double-digit advantage over any challenger was eroded after a summer of campaign blunders.

In an attempt to regain the momentum from Mr. Webb, who is catching up in the fundraising race, Mr. Allen last night spoke to voters in a two-minute statewide televised address.

He also has been battling recent assertions that he used racial epithets to describe blacks when he was in college.

The Rasmussen poll showed Mr. Webb leading Mr. Allen by 39 points among black voters.

Mr. Webb is facing criticism, too, with Mr. Allen running an attack ad using the Democrat's 1979 article "Women Can't Fight" in which he criticizes female midshipmen at the U.S. Naval Academy.

Still, 47 percent of women surveyed in the poll said they prefer Mr. Webb to Mr. Allen. Meanwhile, 57 percent of men said they prefer Mr. Allen.

The poll showed that 49 percent of those surveyed were not familiar with Mr. Webb's article, saying they had followed news reports on the article either "not very closely" or "not at all."

By contrast, 81 percent of potential voters said they were following the racial accusations against Mr. Allen either "very closely" or "somewhat closely."

The poll also showed 11 percent of Republicans would choose Mr. Webb if the election were held today, while 13 percent of Democrats said they would pick Mr. Allen.

Mr. Allen has a 54 percent favorable rating and a 43 percent unfavorable rating, while Mr. Webb had a 48 percent popularity rating.

Most voters told Rasmussen that national security would be the most important issue when deciding the Senate race, followed by the Iraq war and the economy.

The poll also showed President Bush, who has held a fundraiser for Mr. Allen, has a 48 percent approval rating and a 50 percent disapproval rating.

DOJ_NMG_0073502

Mr. Webb is running a television ad linking Mr. Allen with Mr. Bush, saying their "stay the course" idea for the Iraq war is not right for Virginia or the nation.

The Rasmussen Senate results matched a SurveyUSA poll, released over the weekend, showing Mr. Allen with a six-point lead. A Mason-Dixon Polling and Research poll conducted last week for MSNBC/McClatchy showed the race tied at 43 percent for each candidate.

Allen Banks On 2-minute Statewide Ad To Reverse Tailspin (AP)

By Bob Lewis

AP, October 2, 2006

Desperate to rescue his re-election campaign from a six-week tailspin, Sen. George Allen aired a two-minute ad across Virginia just before prime time Monday — a valedictory aimed at saving his political career.

The embattled Republican bought air time in every television market hoping to shift attention from a string of damaging developments beginning Aug. 11, when he called a man of Indian descent "macaca," a type of monkey, through claims last week that he used a common racial slur against black people.

The ad was expected to summarize the high points of a tenure in elected office dating from his term as governor in the mid-90s and, more importantly, try to refocus the race on subjects more favorable to him.

Strategists for the former governor decided to take the dramatic step Saturday, a day after a statewide poll showed Allen and Democrat Jim Webb deadlocked at 43 percent each. As late as July, Webb trailed Allen by 16 percentage points.

"The Allen campaign knows that the direction this campaign has been going the last month has been very damaging for them," said Robert D. Holsworth, a political science professor at Virginia Commonwealth University. "They're very anxious about the direction of his numbers."

Also on Monday, Webb began his biggest ad purchase yet, a 30-second spot that features two retired military women rebutting claims in an Allen ad aired last week.

"Jim Webb is committed to creating opportunities for women," Clara Adams-Ender, a retired U.S. Army brigadier general, says in the ad.

The ad will match ads Allen began airing statewide last week at a total cost of about $650,000 weekly, said Webb spokeswoman Kristian Denny Todd. Allen's ads featured female U.S. Naval Academy graduates who said they suffered hostility and humiliation at Annapolis because of a 1979 magazine article Webb wrote that said women could not lead men in combat and decried their admission to the academy.

Allen's newest ad, however, is unique in Virginia political history. The only comparable use of one-time, statewide advertising was in 1987 when Republican Sen. Paul Trible announced he would not seek re-election.

Allen will pay about $43,000 to simulcast the ad once, from 7:58 p.m. to 8 p.m., on one television station each in the Norfolk, Richmond, Roanoke and Washington, D.C., markets. About $30,000 of that is for the time on WRC in Washington, which broadcasts to the populous northern Virginia suburbs both candidates are targeting.

Allen wanted to do the ad live, but the costs and logistical arrangements would have been prohibitive, campaign advisers said. It was taped over the weekend.

Merle Black, a political scientist at Emory University in Atlanta, said Allen's tourniquet strategy makes sense considering the unfavorable coverage of unflattering and bizarre developments in the campaign.

"This would be an opportunity for him to redefine the issues of the campaign and give voters his side of the story unfiltered by the media," Black said.

Black said Allen's unusual address-to-the-people ad is comparable to Richard Nixon's famed "Checkers" speech in 1952 in which Nixon denied allegations of improper campaign financing and kept his spot as Dwight Eisenhower's running mate on the GOP presidential ticket that year.

"This is an example of political damage control, but it's also a candidate trying to revive his career — his political life — by framing the issues in a way as favorable to him as possible," Black said.

Outside Groups Shoveling Cash Into Tight Races (WP)

DOJ_NMG_0073503

By Jeffrey H. Birnbaum And Zachary A. Goldfarb

The Washington Post, October 3, 2006

As the race for control of Congress turns toward its final sprint to Election Day, independent organizations with ideological or commercial stakes in the outcome are pouring record amounts of money into the closest contests -- in some cases eclipsing the spending of the candidates themselves.

In Ohio, Rep. Deborah Pryce, the fourth-ranking Republican in the House, was attacked by nearly $1 million in negative commercials this summer. But her Democratic opponent, Franklin County Commissioner Mary Jo Kilroy, did not pay for any of them.

They were bankrolled instead by trial lawyers, labor unions and the liberal group MoveOn.org. In fact, outside groups appear to have spent more in that period than Pryce and Kilroy combined, a pattern that is being duplicated in some of the most competitive campaigns across the country.

Politically active groups on both the left and the right are shelling out dollars faster than in any previous midterm election and focusing them intensely on the races that are up for grabs. Even with five weeks to go in the campaign, the $34 million in "independent expenditures" so far is nearly double the amount spent in the entire 2002 midterm election, according to PoliticalMoneyLine.com.

This year's figure includes spending by the parties' House and Senate campaign committees, which unlike in 2002 are no longer allowed to coordinate directly with candidates for major ad buys, and by the "527" groups that emerged after an overhaul of funding laws that year.

Independent spending by political organizations -- such as the George Soros-funded liberal group America Coming Together and the group Swift Boat Veterans for Truth, which took aim at Democratic nominee John F. Kerry's Vietnam War record -- was a defining force in the 2004 presidential campaign. What's notable this time, with control of Congress and many governorships at stake, is how such spending has migrated to elections for lesser offices.

During the 2004 election, Democrats seemed to benefit most from independent spending. Now the balance appears to be tilting rightward: America Coming Together and its companion group, the Media Fund, are largely shuttered. Meanwhile, a leading backer of the Swift Boat group, Texas developer Bob J. Perry, has donated $5 million focusing on top GOP target races.

But in Maryland, as in some other places, Democrats are still benefiting. The Maryland Fund, a 527 led by several national Democratic operatives with ties to the state, started airing television and radio ads last week critical of Gov. Robert L. Ehrlich Jr. (R), who is being challenged by Baltimore Mayor Martin O'Malley (D). The ads seek to link Ehrlich to President Bush, whose approval ratings lag behind the governor's in the state.

Stephen R. Weissman, associate director for policy at the nonpartisan Campaign Finance Institute, predicted that "in some key races, this outsider spending will be decisive."

Expenditures by outside interest groups have ballooned largely in reaction to the 2002 law banning "soft money," the uncapped contributions that previously filled the coffers of both political parties. Once those unlimited donations were outlawed for the parties, lobby groups started handing out the big money.

In Hawaii, for example, the National Association of Realtors spent more than $600,000 in support of Rep. Ed Case, who lost the recent Democratic primary for the Senate to the incumbent, Daniel K. Akaka. The Realtors' eye-popping gift -- the group's largest ever in a primary -- nearly matched the entire amount raised by Case. "Mr. Case has a really strong record supporting issues important to Realtors," a spokeswoman for the group explained. "We decided to go all out."

MoveOn.org has also spared little expense. The liberal group's political action committee has laid out $3.5 million on commercials attacking GOP candidates in six congressional districts. It spent $465,000 against veteran Rep. Nancy L. Johnson (R-Conn.) in late spring and summer, while her Democratic opponent, Chris Murphy, doled out $181,000. MoveOn.org also expended $245,000 against Rep. Chris Chocola (R-Ind.) during the same period, while Joe Donnelly, his opponent, spent roughly half that amount.

Organizations, sometimes with mysterious origins, are cropping up everywhere and spending massively in the toughest races. A group called Softer Voices is boosting Sen. Rick Santorum (R-Pa.) with an expenditure of nearly $700,000. A group called Campaign Money Watch is attacking Pryce and Sen. Conrad Burns (R-Mont.) with $200,000.

Labor unions are betting especially big. The AFL-CIO alone is helping Democratic candidates with a $40 million get-out-the-vote effort, its largest ever during an off-year election. Labor's nemesis, the U.S. Chamber of Commerce, is devoting an equal sum to elections this autumn and is concentrating on efforts to bring voters to the polls.

One of the Democrats' leading architects of the independent-spending movement, former White House aide Harold Ickes, recently started what he calls the September Fund. Erik Smith, the fund's president, said, "There was a belief by those of us who organized this that one side of the argument -- the Bush administration and its allies -- would have a lot more resources than the other." But he added: "We're not going to make up the shortfall."

To help Democratic candidates, the September Fund intends to raise at least $10 million and buy ads that criticize Bush. But several Republican-leaning groups have already purchased millions of dollars of airtime supporting Bush's policies and, by inference, GOP candidates. They also have money available to buy even more commercials, and they plan to do so.

These groups include Progress for America, a major player in 2004 that has been on the air this year in Ohio and Missouri, states in which incumbent Republican senators Mike DeWine and James M. Talent, respectively, are in tough fights to keep their jobs. Another, the California-based Economic Freedom Fund, has spent more than $700,000 opposing Democratic Reps. Leonard L. Boswell (Iowa), Alan B. Mollohan (W.Va.) and Jim Marshall (Ga.), three members of a small circle of Democrats at any risk of losing their seats this fall. The fund was boosted by a $5 million gift from Perry.

The intervention of outside groups, especially at high levels, can be a mixed blessing. Maureen O'Brien Donovan, spokeswoman for Rep. John E. Sweeney (R-N.Y.), asserted that MoveOn.org's commercials against her boss have backfired. "Its intervention and its volunteers aren't from here, and that's well known to the general public," she said. "People who have lived here all their lives find those types of things suspect."

At the same time, candidates cannot control the groups' messages or their delivery, which sometimes causes voter confusion. "Nobody knows who these guys are, and voters have no way of judging their interests or their donors," said George Rasley, Pryce's spokesman.

In addition, the independent efforts are sometimes heavy-handed and irritate the voters they are supposed to attract. The Chocola campaign, for instance, received complaints from voters who were annoyed by automated phone calls they had received from an outside group that was supporting his reelection.

The number of independent organizations, some of them anonymous, has multiplied. On the left, a patchwork of innocuous-sounding organizations has sprouted, including Majority Action, which wants to unseat 10 to 15 Republican congressmen, and America Votes, which is trying to prevent Democratic-leaning groups from duplicating one another's work. Large sums are flowing from these and more established groups. Emily's List, which helps female, pro-abortion-rights Democrats, expects to spend about $10 million this year, and the American Federation of State, County and Municipal Employees, a labor union, anticipates spending $22 million.

On the right, the U.S. Chamber of Commerce plans to allocate $20 million to help federal candidates and another $20 million for state and local races. The American Medical Association is also a serious player. It recently reported $307,125 spent in support of GOP Rep. Johnson in Connecticut.

The generally pro-Republican Business Industry Political Action Committee has a more elaborate scheme. By using companies' electronic communications systems, it has delivered 40 million messages to employees urging them to cast their ballots for pro-business candidates. It has also helped a million citizens register to vote and another million apply for early voting forms.

All of these efforts are sure to make a difference. "When you have the ability to spend one to three million dollars down the stretch in a particular House or Senate race, that kind of spending can really drive the election," said Michael E. Toner, chairman of the Federal Election Commission. "That can decide who wins or loses on Election Day."

New Suburbs Could Be New Political Battlegrounds (USAT)

By Jill Lawrence

USA Today, October 3, 2006

DOJ_NMG_0073505

New suburbs spreading across once-rural counties are among the hottest battlegrounds in fall elections that will determine whether Democrats or Republicans control Congress for the rest of the Bush administration.

The new "it" counties, as sociologist Robert Lang calls them, are in play in top races for governor, Senate and House in at least a dozen states: Florida, Kentucky, Illinois, Indiana, Maryland, Minnesota, Missouri, New Jersey, Ohio, Pennsylvania, Virginia and Washington.

In recent elections, Democrats have dominated cities and close-in "mature" suburbs, while Republicans sweep newer, outer suburbs and rural America. "The further out you go, the redder things are," says William Frey, a sociologist at the University of Michigan and the Brookings Institution.

Frey and others say future elections will be won and lost in fast-growing suburbs that didn't exist 10 or 20 years ago. "The emerging suburbs are in transition. They're contested," says Lang, director of the Metropolitan Institute at Virginia Tech.

Some of these areas are increasingly ethnic and Democratic, while others are growing more Republican. Some give big margins to GOP presidential candidates but split more evenly in other races. Their housing runs the gamut from mini-mansions to trailer parks. All have enough voters to make them worth fighting for.

Among the counties that could determine whether Republicans keep their House majority:

•Clark County, Indiana. Former representative Baron Hill, a Democrat, is in a rematch with Republican Rep. Mike Sodrel.

•Pasco County, Florida, north of Tampa. Republican state Rep. Gus Bilirakis and former Hillsborough County commissioner Phyllis Busansky, a Democrat, are vying to succeed his father, Rep. Michael Bilirakis, also a Republican.

•Sherburne and Wright counties, Minnesota, northwest of Minneapolis-St. Paul. Democrat Patty Wetterling is competing with state Sen. Michele Bachmann for the seat now held by Senate candidate Mark Kennedy, a Republican.

Democrats lost growing suburbs badly in the 2004 presidential election. Last year Virginia Gov. Tim Kaine broke tradition by carrying Loudoun and Prince William counties, outer suburbs of Washington, D.C. His campaign centered on transportation and education.

Joel Kotkin, an urban historian associated with centrist Democrats, says outer suburbia is terra incognita to many Democrats "yet there's no reason they can't be competitive. These people care about schools and infrastructure. They want economic growth. They have some of the same concerns on foreign policy."

Ruy Teixera, a Democratic analyst, calls the counties "an important part of a winning strategy" even if Democrats can't win them outright. That's because shrinking GOP victory margins in the new suburbs would improve Democrats' chances to carry statewide races for president and state offices.

Matthew Dowd, who was President Bush's pollster, says some rapidly growing outer suburbs are heavily GOP. However, he says Republicans were wrong to assume after 2004 that they have a grip on them. His research shows most voters in such areas are not ideological; rather, they look for candidates who share their concerns about practical matters such as schools. "They're a force that you can't take for granted," he says.

Lieberman Says He Has Been Promised Seniority (HILL)

By Alexander Bolton

The Hill, October 3, 2006

Sen. Joe Lieberman, the longtime Democratic senator from Connecticut running for re-election as an independent, says the party leadership has assured him he would keep his seniority if he returns to Congress.

Local Democrats are responding with irritation, political opponents voice disbelief, and Senate Minority Leader Harry Reid (D-Nev.) denies making a decision.

But the strongest response is likely to come from Sen. Frank Lautenberg (D-N.J.) who views Lieberman's independent status as an opportunity to press Democratic leaders to restore seniority he lost four years ago.

If Lautenberg retrieves seniority accrued during 18 years of Senate service before retiring in 2000, he could leapfrog Lieberman to lead the Homeland Security and Governmental Affairs Committee or the Environment and Public Works Committee.

DOJ_NMG_0073506

Lieberman has served 18 years in the upper chamber. Lautenberg has served a total of 22 years, but he has only four years of recognized seniority because he retired from Congress for two years in 2000.

While even Lautenberg's allies admit the chances of jumping over as many as five lawmakers on either committee are small, the senator thinks he has a strong case.

Reid, the Senate Democratic leader, does not want to wrestle with these questions in public before the Nov. 7 election.

"The caucus won't make any decisions until after the elections in November," said Reid's spokesman, Jim Manley.

While that response implies that Lieberman's status is to be decided by the entire caucus, senior Democratic aides say questions of seniority are largely decided by Reid.

Lieberman said he would keep his senior position in the caucus, even though he lost Connecticut's Democratic primary, and is running against Democratic nominee Ned Lamont, whom the Senate Democratic leadership has endorsed.

"That's what I've been told," said Lieberman in an interview Friday, before Congress recessed for the election. "Caucuses like to keep as many members as they can, not discourage membership," implying that leaders risk his defection to the GOP if they strip him of seniority.

Lieberman said he assumed that would mean he would continue to serve as the top Democrat on the governmental affairs panel. It would also allow him to become the most senior Democrat on the Environment and Public Works Committee. But Lieberman said his desire is to stay atop Homeland Security and Governmental Affairs.

It looks more and more likely that Lieberman will win reelection. A poll released last week by Quinnipiac University showed Lieberman holding a 49-39 percent lead over Lamont among likely voters.

That could create big problems with Democrats in Congress and around the country if their party takes over the Senate. The governmental affairs panel is primarily responsible for oversight and investigations of the executive branch.

If Democrats take over either the Senate or the House, it is expected they will pour much time and effort into investigating the Bush administration. And many Democrats think Lieberman, who lost the primary race because of his perceived closeness to the Bush administration, is not the right person for that job.

Tom Matzzie, the Washington director of MoveOn.org, a liberal advocacy group that supports Lamont, said Lieberman may be spreading false information to make himself a more attractive candidate.

"This is a Lieberman campaign tactic," he said. "Democratic leaders are supporting Ned Lamont."

Bill Grad, who sits on the Democratic Town Council of Greenwich, Conn., Lamont's home town, said Lieberman has very actively distanced himself from the Democratic Party, and that it was wrong of leaders to promise anything.

"Why should Reid tell the guy in advance that he'll have his seniority. If it comes to that, that's fine. But it's disappointing, it's greatly disappointing that he would be given assurances."

"He's not running as a Democrat," said Grad, who is also a volunteer for Democratic candidate Diane Farrell. "He couldn't be more clear about that. He's not supporting any Democrats running for Congress."

Lamont's campaign did not respond to a request for comment.

Lautenberg does not have anything critical to say about Lieberman, but he calls himself a "dyed-in-the-wool" Democrat and says he wants to see Lamont win.

He also said that as the election approaches, now is the time for him to make the case to colleagues and leaders that he should regain his seniority.

"I will make the case, I will make the case," said Lautenberg emphatically. "The closer to the election, the better the reminder has to be."

"I saved a Democratic seat," he said of his 2002 election. "I financed the race myself at the beginning."

Lautenberg declared his 2002 candidacy about a month before Election Day after former Sen. Bob Torricelli (D-N.J.) suddenly resigned his seat soon after the Senate Ethics Committee rebuked him for accepting improper gifts. Lautenberg won the seat, which Republicans had a good chance of capturing because of Torricelli's ethical troubles.

Lautenberg also spent nearly $1.5 million of his own money on the race.

Sen. Paul Sarbanes (D-Md.), a thirty-year Senate veteran who is retiring at the end of this Congress, said he is sympathetic to Lautenberg.

DOJ_NMG_0073507

"It looks like he has a case to make but I don't know what rule he's working off," he said.

But Senate history is not reassuring for Lautenberg. When Minnesota Sen. Hubert Humphrey (D) returned to the Senate after serving as vice-president under President Lyndon Johnson, he lost all the seniority he accrued before leaving for the White House, said Senate Historian Richard Baker.

Poor New Hampshire? Don't Bet Against The Granite State (RC)

By Stuart Rothenberg

Roll Call, October 3, 2006

Seeking to add states with large minority populations into the Democratic presidential primary mix, the Democratic National Committee has added Nevada and South Carolina to the party's early calendar.

Does this mean the demise of the New Hampshire primary and the dilution of the state's influence in the nomination process — especially if the state defies the DNC and moves its primary to an earlier date?

Don't bet on it.

Democratic presidential candidates, as well as political operatives and journalists I've talked with, leave little doubt that New Hampshire once again will be a battleground for the party's nomination, whenever the primary is held.

The DNC has added Nevada between Iowa and the Granite State and scheduled South Carolina for the Tuesday after New Hampshire. Both of the new contests are caucuses, so New Hampshire's status as the first primary state isn't compromised. Still, the Granite State's secretary of state may take action to ensure that the state isn't leapfrogged by Nevada.

If New Hampshire moves up its date, the DNC has promised to punish it by refusing to recognize the state's delegates. In theory, that should encourage Democratic presidential hopefuls to bypass the state rather than expend time and resources in a state with no delegates at the national convention. It won't. All the early potential candidates have indicated they will campaign in New Hampshire, whenever the primary is held.

"There will be an election. People will vote. Reporters will cover it. And the results will influence results in subsequent states. There's nothing meaningful the DNC can do about it," said one veteran Democratic strategist with presidential campaign experience.

New Hampshire really isn't about delegates, although campaigns obviously hope to win some in the primary. Rather, the primary is all about momentum. That means candidates and journalists will show up even if delegates are not at stake.

"It's preposterous to think that we wouldn't cover New Hampshire in the same way we always have," a network political director said to me recently.

Journalists have spent more than 30 years learning how to cover the New Hampshire primary, and that's a strong incentive for them to continue to cover the primary as if it is a premier political event. Reporters have sources in the state and loads of history in the back of their minds, enabling them to compare what's happening in 2007 and 2008 with what happened in 1976 and 1992.

But what if New Hampshire keeps the same date? Won't Nevada eclipse it? Again, don't bet on it.

While the South Carolina primary is likely to get plenty of attention from candidates and the national media in 2008, it's unlikely that Nevada caucuses will get anything close to Iowa and New Hampshire in terms of attention.

First, like the well-established Iowa event, Nevada is another caucus, not a primary. Journalists are likely to flock to one event where campaign organization and base voters are important, but are they really going to do it a second time, after all of the hullabaloo around Iowa? Probably not.

And for the campaigns of presidential hopefuls, Iowa's caucuses are a known commodity. Political operatives know who is going to participate and how the caucuses will work. They don't have a clue about how Nevada's caucuses will work, and that means they'll invest far less time and effort in that state, even if it is early in the process.

True, Nevada is a state with a considerable Hispanic population, and that guarantees candidates and some media will be there. But New Hampshire, not Nevada, is likely to be seen as the second big test of the presidential nominating process.

DOJ_NMG_0073508

Cost certainly will be an issue for the TV networks. They will devote considerable resources to the first caucuses and the first primary, but they are less likely to treat Nevada like a major league happening, especially since it is likely to be a Democrats-only event.

"Nevada will be semi-big," insisted a veteran Democratic operative who has played in the Democratic presidential sandbox. "It won't be as big as New Hampshire, even if New Hampshire comes after it. It may not even be as important as South Carolina."

South Carolina is likely to get more coverage than Nevada because it is on the East Coast, because both parties will have primaries the same day and, once again, because reporters and candidates already have come to regard the Palmetto State as an early test. Moreover, the state's considerable African-American population makes it both an interesting story for journalists and a test of candidates' appeal.

I don't know if New Hampshire will challenge the DNC by moving its primary earlier than the DNC allows, but it might. A number of smart people I talked to firmly believe it will. Some even think the Granite State will have no choice but to move up to December or even November.

And if that happens, the irony is that the DNC will have succeeded in forcing Democrats to choose a nominee earlier, rather than changing the states that have the most impact in selecting the party's standard-bearer.

Seeking to add states with large minority populations into the Democratic presidential primary mix, the Democratic National Committee has added Nevada and South Carolina to the party's early calendar.

Does this mean the demise of the New Hampshire primary and the dilution of the state's influence in the nomination process — especially if the state defies the DNC and moves its primary to an earlier date?

Don't bet on it.

Democratic presidential candidates, as well as political operatives and journalists I've talked with, leave little doubt that New Hampshire once again will be a battleground for the party's nomination, whenever the primary is held.

The DNC has added Nevada between Iowa and the Granite State and scheduled South Carolina for the Tuesday after New Hampshire. Both of the new contests are caucuses, so New Hampshire's status as the first primary state isn't compromised. Still, the Granite State's secretary of state may take action to ensure that the state isn't leapfrogged by Nevada.

If New Hampshire moves up its date, the DNC has promised to punish it by refusing to recognize the state's delegates. In theory, that should encourage Democratic presidential hopefuls to bypass the state rather than expend time and resources in a state with no delegates at the national convention. It won't. All the early potential candidates have indicated they will campaign in New Hampshire, whenever the primary is held.

"There will be an election. People will vote. Reporters will cover it. And the results will influence results in subsequent states. There's nothing meaningful the DNC can do about it," said one veteran Democratic strategist with presidential campaign experience.

New Hampshire really isn't about delegates, although campaigns obviously hope to win some in the primary. Rather, the primary is all about momentum. That means candidates and journalists will show up even if delegates are not at stake.

"It's preposterous to think that we wouldn't cover New Hampshire in the same way we always have," a network political director said to me recently.

Journalists have spent more than 30 years learning how to cover the New Hampshire primary, and that's a strong incentive for them to continue to cover the primary as if it is a premier political event. Reporters have sources in the state and loads of history in the back of their minds, enabling them to compare what's happening in 2007 and 2008 with what happened in 1976 and 1992.

But what if New Hampshire keeps the same date? Won't Nevada eclipse it? Again, don't bet on it.

While the South Carolina primary is likely to get plenty of attention from candidates and the national media in 2008, it's unlikely that Nevada caucuses will get anything close to Iowa and New Hampshire in terms of attention.

First, like the well-established Iowa event, Nevada is another caucus, not a primary. Journalists are likely to flock to one event where campaign organization and base voters are important, but are they really going to do it a second time, after all of the hullabaloo around Iowa? Probably not.

DOJ_NMG_0073509

And for the campaigns of presidential hopefuls, Iowa's caucuses are a known commodity. Political operatives know who is going to participate and how the caucuses will work. They don't have a clue about how Nevada's caucuses will work, and that means they'll invest far less time and effort in that state, even if it is early in the process.

True, Nevada is a state with a considerable Hispanic population, and that guarantees candidates and some media will be there. But New Hampshire, not Nevada, is likely to be seen as the second big test of the presidential nominating process.

Cost certainly will be an issue for the TV networks. They will devote considerable resources to the first caucuses and the first primary, but they are less likely to treat Nevada like a major league happening, especially since it is likely to be a Democrats-only event.

"Nevada will be semi-big," insisted a veteran Democratic operative who has played in the Democratic presidential sandbox. "It won't be as big as New Hampshire, even if New Hampshire comes after it. It may not even be as important as South Carolina."

South Carolina is likely to get more coverage than Nevada because it is on the East Coast, because both parties will have primaries the same day and, once again, because reporters and candidates already have come to regard the Palmetto State as an early test. Moreover, the state's considerable African-American population makes it both an interesting story for journalists and a test of candidates' appeal.

I don't know if New Hampshire will challenge the DNC by moving its primary earlier than the DNC allows, but it might. A number of smart people I talked to firmly believe it will. Some even think the Granite State will have no choice but to move up to December or even November.

And if that happens, the irony is that the DNC will have succeeded in forcing Democrats to choose a nominee earlier, rather than changing the states that have the most impact in selecting the party's standard-bearer.

Stuart Rothenberg is editor of the Rothenberg Political Report.

Veto In California On Electoral College (NYT)

By The New York Times

The New York Times, October 3, 2006

By The New York Times

SACRAMENTO, Oct. 2 — In the end, only one vote mattered.

Saying it ran "counter to the tradition of our great nation," Gov. Arnold Schwarzenegger vetoed a bill on Saturday that would have automatically allocated all the state's 55 electoral votes to whichever presidential candidate received the national popular vote.

The bill, which passed the state's Legislature this summer, was devised by John R. Koza, a computer scientist who envisioned a system in which a series of states holding the number of electoral votes needed to elect a president — 270 — would commit their electors to casting ballots for the winner of the popular vote, regardless of how their individual electorates voted.

Mr. Koza said the goal was to force presidential candidates to campaign nationwide, rather than concentrating on a small number of battleground states — like Ohio or Florida — that have a lot of electors. California, while having more electors and voters than any other state, is considered reliably Democratic, and thus not often a part of the presidential campaign.

Thomas J. Umberg, the bill's sponsor in the California Assembly, said that he was disappointed by the governor's decision "to maintain the status quo" and that he would consider taking the proposition to a ballot measure.

After Riding High With Fox News, Murdoch Aide Has Harder Slog (WSJ)

By Julia Angwin

The Wall Street Journal, October 3, 2006

Over the past 10 years, Roger Ailes transformed the cable-news business using glitzy graphics, brash marketing and a take-no-prisoners approach. His playbook vaulted News Corp.'s Fox News Channel into the industry's No. 1 spot.

Using a similar approach, he has since taken on a more prominent role at News Corp. -- including running the company's local television stations -- but the results aren't as impressive. Accustomed to operating his own fiefdom, Mr. Ailes has ruffled feathers among other executives. He has started a new TV network, called MyNetworkTV, but it hasn't shown much sign of life amid a broader slump in the local-TV business. Meanwhile, ratings at Fox News are declining faster than those of its competitors and its advertising-sales growth is slowing.

DOJ_NMG_0073510

Mr. Ailes's independent streak contributed to the decision last year of Rupert Murdoch's son and heir apparent, Lachlan Murdoch, to quit the company. The younger Murdoch felt Mr. Ailes was undercutting his position, according to people close to the situation.

His style has even affected News Corp.'s relations with other media companies. Executives at CBS Corp., frustrated with the slow pace of negotiations between the two, didn't tell Mr. Ailes they planned to shutter CBS's UPN network, which ran on 10 News Corp. stations, until 10 minutes before the January news conference.

Mr. Ailes's adventures mark a change of pace for one of the world's largest media companies, which owns, in addition to the Fox television business, the 20th Century Fox film studio as well as newspapers and satellite-TV operations. In the past, the company was largely free of the infighting typical of the media business because of the single-minded control wielded by Chief Executive Mr. Murdoch.

But in recent years, Mr. Murdoch, 75 years old, has allowed Mr. Ailes to carve out a larger power base. In the process, that's sparked tensions within the executive suite.

Mr. Murdoch has long been a big supporter of Mr. Ailes, 66, whom he hired a decade ago. Last year, Mr. Murdoch renewed Mr. Ailes's employment contract for another five years. In a written statement, Mr. Murdoch says, "Roger has done a truly amazing job growing Fox News into the number-one news channel." He adds: "Roger has my full support and complete admiration."

Mr. Ailes says any intimation that he has sharp elbows is overblown. "There are lots of things that can be said about me -- but not playing for the full team is not one of them," he says. If the only way to win is to damage someone else, he adds, "you're no damn good."

He says Fox's stations have performed better than expected and that the new network will pick up. On the ratings declines at Fox News, "we're not unaware of a little bit of deterioration," he says, adding that "if you look at all the pressure on cable news, it's amazing that it's held up as well as it has."

A former Republican political consultant who began his career working for President Nixon, Mr. Ailes approaches business with a campaign-like competitiveness. In his political career, Mr. Ailes can claim credit for crafting the television ad that helped sink Michael Dukakis's presidential bid. The ad questioned the candidate's national-security credentials while picturing him riding a tank.

At News Corp., Mr. Ailes insisted on a lot of autonomy. Upon his hiring, he reported directly to Mr. Murdoch, unlike the heads of News Corp.'s other cable channels, who report to a News Corp. executive in Los Angeles. Mr. Ailes also oversees Fox News's ad sales and negotiations with cable operators. The other cable heads handed off those functions to a centralized group. Mr. Ailes says he insisted on those conditions to prevent "second-guessing" about programming.

Go-It-Alone Style

For 10 years, Mr. Ailes's go-it-alone style was successful. In 2002, Fox News toppled Time Warner Inc.'s CNN as the cable-news leader by recasting the medium with snappy on-air personalities, a graphics-heavy presentation and an evening line-up bristling with conservative commentary. CNN never regained the lead, and Mr. Ailes won't let them forget it: Last week, he held a Fox News 10-year anniversary party across the street from CNN's Atlanta headquarters.

News Corp. doesn't report financial results for the Fox News Channel, but says it is one of the biggest parts of the fast-growing cable-networks division. The division reported operating income of $864 million for the year ended June 30. News Corp. has been slow to launch a business-news cable channel that would be under Mr. Ailes's auspices. Mr. Ailes says he wants to wait until the channel has sealed distribution deals.

Mr. Ailes has chafed at interference from other divisions. Last year, when Mr. Murdoch decided to invest heavily in Internet businesses, FoxNews.com was folded into a centralized ad-sales unit. Almost immediately, Mr. Ailes battled to get his division back. He complained that the unit's profits were falling as the centralized division spent to hire more salespeople, even as ad sales rose.

DOJ_NMG_0073511

"We had some disagreements," Mr. Ailes says of his relations with the Internet division. Mr. Ailes says he and the head of the Internet division agreed to part ways during a meeting in December. Despite being associated with the leading cable-news network, FoxNews.com ranks as the 11th largest Internet news site, according to August figures from comScore Media Metrix.

Mr. Ailes had long been interested in the Fox local TV stations. But that was the province of Lachlan Murdoch, Rupert Murdoch's son, who was appointed News Corp.'s deputy chief operating officer in 2000. In 2004, Lachlan Murdoch appointed longtime Ailes lieutenant Jack Abernethy to head the stations. The close relationship between Messrs. Ailes and Abernethy sometimes left Lachlan Murdoch out of the loop, according to people close to the situation.

Lachlan Murdoch, for instance, wanted to postpone airing a new show by Fox News Channel correspondent Geraldo Rivera on local TV stations, according to people close to the situation. He wanted first to cancel "A Current Affair," a failing news program. Mr. Ailes went directly to Rupert Murdoch and won permission to ignore Lachlan's preference, these people say.

Mr. Ailes says he doesn't recall circumventing Lachlan Murdoch. "If that's what happened, I don't know it," he says. "I don't think that's what happened because Lachlan and I get along great." Lachlan Murdoch, who was upset with other decisions made by his father -- such as moving News Corp. headquarters to New York from Australia -- quit the company last summer.

Mr. Murdoch immediately tapped Mr. Ailes to take on the TV station portfolio. The Fox television station group is the largest in the U.S. and an important part of the News Corp. empire. The stations contributed about $1 billion of the company's $3.9 billion operating income in the year ended June 30, 2006.

After he added the station group to his portfolio, Mr. Ailes started introducing more news programming and a greater reliance on Fox News content. Such offerings can be more profitable for local stations, which can sell all the resulting ad time themselves. With many syndicated and network programming deals, local stations have to share the ad time with program makers.

The news operations of local TV stations have started to look like Fox News. Many have imported Fox News's flashy blue and red graphics and its spinning 3-D logo, and have trained local news anchors in Fox News's chatty on-air style. Some markets have also started using a variant of the Fox News tagline, "The most powerful name in news."

Mr. Ailes insists that the stations will remain editorially independent. "Fox News Channel will act as a support mechanism but those are real local stations," he says. "Editorially every news director has got to make his own decisions."

When the new logo rolled out in Los Angeles in April, morning-show host Jillian Barberie jokingly complained on air about the size of the logo, which covered up her shoes. Former New York Fox station anchor Chris Gailus says he wonders whether a cable image is right for local news. "My gut instinct is that people who watch local news may be a bit more traditional about the look," he says.

Mr. Ailes says the feedback from the station managers about the new look has been "ecstatic."

More recently, Mr. Ailes told CNN that News Corp.'s stations will no longer buy its news feeds, something for which he had long agitated. Some station heads had resisted the move, worried, among other issues, about the relatively scanty nature of Fox News's overseas coverage.

Mr. Ailes, who refers to CNN's international channel as the "Anti-American channel," says stations can rely on Fox News and its partners. "We don't think we need to be in the business of paying CNN," he adds.

Overall, Mr. Ailes's changes haven't translated into more viewers. The local stations' latest national ratings -- from May -- were mostly flat to down, according to Nielsen Media Research, which tracks the numbers. The entire industry is in a slump as TV stations across the U.S. struggle with increased competition from Internet and cable television.

In September, Geraldo Rivera's show, the one that Lachlan Murdoch wanted to postpone, drew about the same ratings as the weak program it replaced. "He's doing extremely well in some markets and we need to get a little better in some of the larger markets," Mr. Ailes says. "But he's doing better shows every day, I think."

Station revenues were also flat in the year ended June 30, 2006. Mr. Ailes says the stations did better than the shortfall the company had projected.

Unexpected Project

DOJ_NMG_0073512

One of Mr. Ailes's bigger projects came about unexpectedly. Ten of News Corp.'s 35 television stations used to carry the UPN network, which was owned by CBS. During the fall of 2005, CBS felt that Messrs. Ailes and Abernethy were dragging their feet about renewing the contract, which was set to expire in 2006, according to people familiar with the situation.

"We weren't in a hurry, but we weren't turning it down," Mr. Ailes recalls. Eventually, CBS decided to ditch the network. Mr. Ailes says he got a call from CBS Chief Executive Leslie Moonves 10 minutes before the announcement was made. "Les called me on his way into the press conference," Mr. Ailes says. "Had they signaled any kind of urgency or intensity we would certainly have met with them." He says he met with CBS executives once.

At the news conference, on Jan. 24, CBS announced it would merge the UPN network with Time Warner's WB network to make a new network called CW. CBS said the CW network would air on stations owned by Tribune Co., leaving Fox without a network for its 10 UPN stations.

The announcement left News Corp. scrambling to come up with programming before its annual presentations to advertisers in May. Messrs. Ailes and Abernethy decided to revive an idea that had been kicking around News Corp: translating Spanish-language telenovelas into English. News Corp. produces the episodes on a shoestring budget of $200,000 to $500,000 for each hour-long segment. Traditional network dramas can cost $2 million to $3 million an episode.

MyNetworkTV launched as a new broadcast network in the fall with two debut telenovelas "Desire" and "Fashion House" running back-to-back hour-long episodes every night of the week during prime time. It signed up stations reaching 96% of U.S. households.

In the weeks prior to the launch, News Corp.'s Fox-affiliated television stations promoted MyNetworkTV heavily, even when it competed with the stations' own programming. Some at the Fox broadcast network thought the Fox promotions were suffering as a result, according to people familiar with the situation.

Peter Chernin, News Corp.'s president, expressed concern to executives that there was a "lack of communication" between the stations and the network, says a person familiar with his thinking. Finally, Messrs. Chernin and Abernethy agreed to cut back on MyNetworkTV promotions for the two weeks leading up to Labor Day and then to promote the MyNetworkTV shows within the Fox premieres.

Still, viewers and advertisers have not flocked to the new network. Ratings for the shows have been low. A person close to the situation says the network is losing a million dollars a week.

Mr. Ailes says test audiences liked the shows and that the network's success is a matter of getting the word out. "I probably undermarketed it," he says.

In His New Role, Roger Ailes Has Rankled Colleagues; Slow Start At MyNetworkTV (WSJ)

By William Spain

The Wall Street Journal, October 3, 2006

SAUGET, Ill. -- When construction and waste-management firm Fred Weber Inc. sought to build a trash-transfer station in the St. Louis area, it was shooed away by activists and residents opposed to having thousands of tons of other people's garbage being trundled through their communities.

But across the border in Illinois, the village of Sauget rolled out the welcome mat. "This kind of industry has to go someplace," says the village's president, Richard A. Sauget Jr. "We are very comfortable with it here."

That "Yes, in my backyard" ethic has made Sauget, population 250, a peculiar island of prosperity in the sea of urban economic blight across the Mississippi River from St. Louis. While the little towns around it are marked by crime, shuttered factories, burned-out buildings and trash-strewn streets, Sauget boasts clean parks, neat homes and beautifully maintained roads.

Sauget, named for its most prominent family, might offer some lessons for other Midwestern towns desperately seeking economic rejuvenation. Sauget has no downtown to dress up, no chamber of commerce. It has done nothing to try to attract new housing or a Wal-Mart.

DOJ_NMG_0073513

Instead, Sauget has embraced some of the less-popular remnants of the industrial Midwest as well as the seamier side of the U.S. service economy. Along with companies that smelt zinc, treat sewage and incinerate toxic waste are a brace of strip clubs, two nightclubs and a 24-hour liquor store that doubles as an off-track betting parlor and the largest lottery outlet in Illinois.

"The town allows us to operate as a business, not making moral judgments, but expecting us to obey the law," says Michael Ocello, president of VCG Holdings of Denver, owner of the strip clubs that locals have nicknamed "Ballet du Sauget."

What the village lacks are schools, churches and supermarkets. There is now a village maintenance shed where a school once stood. While Mr. Sauget's three children attend Catholic school, the village pays into the district in nearby Cahokia for kids who go to public schools.

Many of the residents are police officers, firefighters and other village employees. Given the population's relatively static nature, housing turnover is rare. "I have never sold a house in Sauget," says Linda Frierdich, owner of Advantage Real Estate in nearby Columbia, Ill. "I don't think anyone has. Nobody wants to move there."

Yvonne McDaniel, 58, has lived in Sauget for 55 years and raised four children here with her husband, a retired Sauget police officer. "It might not be the most beautiful place in the world but there are more important things than beauty," she says.

Sauget's per capita income of about $19,000 is just $1,000 less than Chicago's. And with annual property and other tax revenues of $7 million -- which works out to a remarkable $28,000 per person -- residents of Sauget (pronounced so-ZHAY) enjoy free sewer service and trash pickup, and a force of 16 police officers and 16 firefighters -- one of each for every 15 locals.

Sauget's location -- just a five-minute drive from downtown St. Louis -- makes it easy for thousands of weekend visitors to sample its nightlife.

But perhaps nothing is more vital to Sauget's success than the unabashedly pro-business leanings of its leading family, the Saugets.

Mr. Sauget, 33 years old, is a former minor-league ballplayer who has been attending village meetings since he was 13 and is known around town as "mayor." He is the third Sauget to be elected village president since the town's founding as "Monsanto," after the chemical giant, in 1926. Members of his family control the Gateway Grizzlies, a local minor-league baseball team, several nightclubs, and a portion of its four square miles, including about 20 of its roughly 100 homes. His father, Richard Sauget Sr., lives in a mansion in Sauget complete with a tennis court and meticulously trimmed lawn and hedges.

Tooling around town in his black GMC Yukon Denali SUV, the younger Mr. Sauget proudly points out the many industrial landmarks. "There's Stellar Manufacturing," he says, adding, "They make the 'hockey pucks,' " the deodorizing cakes used in many public toilets.

Kathy Andria, president of the American Bottom Conservancy, a local environmental group, occasionally gives "toxic tours" of East St. Louis and other poor industrial towns just east of St. Louis. She says Sauget is a must-see because it's a "magnet" for industries that deal with pollutants. "They think of the companies as their constituents."

The village was created to offer Monsanto a tax- and regulation-free dumping location at a time when environmental rules existed mainly at the local level.

"We were basically incorporated to be a sewer," Mr. Sauget says.

The town thrived under the oversight of its first president, Leo Sauget, Richard's great-grandfather, who was once described by the St. Louis Post-Dispatch as "a gentleman farmer who ... would shock blue bloods by showing up at board meetings in overalls." The town also got a reputation for its smell, memorialized in the 1992 song "Sauget Wind" by rock band Uncle Tupelo, which includes the verse, "They're poisoning the air / For personal wealth..."

In the late 1960s, polychlorinated biphenyl (PCB) contamination of land, ground water, rivers and the food chain began to cause concern -- and the Monsanto plant in Sauget was the nation's largest producer of PCBs. Production of PCBs was banned in 1977, but they remain part of a noxious chemical stew at an Environmental Protection Agency Superfund site along Dead Creek in Sauget.

"Sauget is one of the most polluted communities in the region," says Richard Karl, director of the EPA's Superfund Division, Region 5. "It's basically a soup of different chemicals," including PCBs, benzene, toluene, and dioxin and organic solvents. Heavy-metal pollutants include cadmium, silver, selenium and zinc. So far, the agency has spent tens of millions of dollars to clean up the area. "We have eliminated a lot of the direct contact threats but we won't be leaving anytime soon," says Mr. Karl.

DOJ_NMG_0073514

Around the time of the PCB imbroglio, the town changed its name from Monsanto to Sauget, after Leo Sauget, who had just stepped down as village president. Today, the plant is owned by Solutia Inc., which was spun off from Monsanto Co. in 1997, and makes products including oil additives and agricultural chemicals.

Over the years, the town has occasionally sided with local companies in court against regulators and groups worried about pollution. Paul Sauget, Leo's son and successor as village president, once handed a complaining EPA official a gas mask at a public meeting.

A trucking company recently built a terminal and a new dialysis clinic opened next to the ballpark. In August, a new $100 million ethanol plant broke ground. "The heavy industry is not as strong as it used to be, but all the infrastructure is still [here]," Mr. Sauget says. "We have the access, we have the roads. And we will talk to anybody."

All In The Family (WSJ)

By ARTHUR C. BROOKS

The Wall Street Journal, October 3, 2006

Parents have just sent their kids off to college, full of hope that the knowledge and enlightenment they acquire will prepare them for the rigors of the modern economy. But a worrying possibility is keeping some of these parents -- especially the conservative ones -- up at night: the prospect that their children will be hopelessly corrupted by the faculty.

In one popular book about campus politics, the author writes, "We all know that left-wing radicals from the 1960s have hung around academia and hired people like themselves. . . . [T]hey spew violent anti-Americanism, preach anti-Semitism, and cheer on the killing of American soldiers and civilians -- all the while collecting tax dollars and tuition fees to indoctrinate our children." If the author is right, then the fears about the minds of our children might seem like a lot more than just right-wing paranoia.

Most studies of the subject have indicated that, indeed, upward of 90% of college professors at many universities hold liberal political views. In some schools and departments, faculties are virtually 100% left-wing. It is one thing to lament this ideological lopsidedness in the academy. But it is quite another to assume that professors actually bend the little minds in their care toward a liberal point of view, or even a radical one. Imagine a student with God-fearing Republican parents exposed to the depredations of an English professor aiming to use his class as a Bolshevik training camp. Will the professor succeed in turning the kid into a Red? The evidence says, probably not: When it comes to politics, people from conservative families follow their parents, not their professors.

The most recent evidence on this subject comes from the mid-1990s, in the University of Michigan's National Election Studies. These survey data uncover two facts. First, people who go to college are more likely to vote Republican than those who don't go to college. Adults 25 and under from Republican homes are, for example, 11 percentage points more likely to vote Republican if they attended college than if they didn't. And young adults from Democratic households are 11 percentage points less likely to vote Democrat if they've gone to college than if not.

Second, nearly everybody grows more likely to vote Republican as they age -- but especially college graduates. It is no shock that the vast majority of people of all educational backgrounds from Republican homes vote Republican by age 40. It may come as more of a surprise that 40-year-olds with Democrat parents are far less likely to vote Democrat if they've gone to college than if they haven't. In fact, while three-quarters of the uneducated group still vote Democrat, the odds are only about 50-50 that the college graduates vote this way. And they've not all become skeptical political independents: Fully a third are registered Republicans.

Obviously, some kids turn left in college -- but this appears to be the exception, not the rule. Does all this mean that our colleges and universities are actually breeding grounds for conservatism? Hardly. What the statistics really show is that higher education by itself doesn't affect political views very much. Rather, in addition to the strong influence of parents, it is higher incomes -- which typically reward a college education in America -- that push people to the right politically. In Republican families, the income effect reinforces parents' influence on their kids. In Democratic families, the two effects work against each other.

To fearful Republican parents, then: Sleep tight. When it comes to politics, your kids are in good hands -- yours.

DOJ_NMG_0073515

Mr. Brooks, a professor at Syracuse University's Maxwell School of Public Affairs, is the author of "Who Really Cares: The Surprising Truth About Compassionate Conservatism," forthcoming in November from Basic Books.

The Chair Out From Under Them (NYT)

The New York Times, October 3, 2006

Wal-Mart is famous for trimming, squeezing, and slashing costs relentlessly. While the company would like the world to focus on the benefits derived from its low prices, we cannot ignore how the nation's largest private employer often grinds up its hourly workers in the same machine.

There are distressing signs that Wal-Mart may be acting on many of the ideas outlined in an internal document — leaked last year — to rid its payroll of full-time and less-healthy employees who are more expensive for the company to retain. For instance, Steven Greenhouse and Michael Barbaro reported yesterday in The Times that employees at several Florida stores say that managers are barring older employees with back and leg problems from using stools they had sat on for years.

Other employees are complaining of sudden scheduling changes they say are skewed to chase out long-term employees, and wage caps that act as a disincentive for those longer-tenured workers. In a stunning deployment of corporate doublespeak, a memo to store managers describes the wage caps as a way to maintain "internally equitable pay levels." It is true that if everyone is making the same everyday low wages, a perverse form of equality is established among them.

The company says it is not trying to encourage long-term employees to leave, and that the caps encourage them to move up if they want higher pay. Other retailers impose wage caps, the company argues. It is true that Wal-Mart falls under particular scrutiny, but it is in no small measure because it the largest private employer in the country. And, as that internal document last year noted, poorly compensated part-time workers lacking benefits will turn to government programs for the needy instead, a form of backdoor taxpayer subsidy.

But Costco has shown that better wages for workers don't preclude low prices for customers. If Wal-Mart wants to avoid increasingly onerous legislation, regulation and scrutiny, company executives are going to have to learn that human beings are not machines that can be turned on and off, that parents can't always reshuffle their lives on short notice.

As a business, Wal-Mart minimizes costs and maximizes profits. Society says what is fair, sets the rules of the game through government, and imposes minimum standards. Congress must act to raise the minimum wage, which has sat at a paltry $5.15 an hour since 1997, and reform the teetering health-insurance system. Right now, it's sending the wrong message to companies like Wal-Mart.

Richmond's Obstructionists (WP)

The Washington Post, October 3, 2006

LAST WEEK'S stunning failure by Virginia lawmakers to address the state's urgent transportation needs will have lasting consequences. Led by a band of Republican obstructionists in Richmond -- ideologues and anti-tax fundamentalists -- the General Assembly has decided to let Northern Virginia commuters stew in their own juices for a couple of years. Make no mistake about the result: There will be no serious, sustainable funding for new roads, intersections and other improvements for at least the next two years -- after which today's stop-and-go trips may seem like a happy memory. Northern Virginia, the state's economic engine, is to be starved of any progress on basic infrastructure.

Step back and consider the events of this year that led to the impasse. Gov. Timothy M. Kaine (D) took office in January promising a major push on transportation funding -- $1 billion a year in new revenue. That number itself seemed an absolute minimum given that the state has produced no new transportation funding source in 20 years, even as population and congestion boomed. Mr. Kaine, along with the Republican-led Senate, made headway in devising a proposal based largely on a palatable menu of higher taxes and fees. But after a months-long standoff they were blocked by Republicans in the House of Delegates, led by Speaker William J. Howell (Stafford).

The assembly reconvened last week in Richmond, ostensibly to try again. But rather than deal with Virginia's most critical problem, Mr. Howell and his acolytes promptly squashed the only serious plan on the table -- one backed by moderate Republicans that would have yielded more than $400 million annually for Northern Virginia. Instead, the speaker and his allies offered up a slapped-together scheme wrapped in a news release claiming that it would produce $2.4 billion for transportation.

DOJ_NMG_0073516

In fact, the $2.4 billion plan combined a large dose of smoke and mirrors with a hefty dollop of fiscal irresponsibility. More than half of it -- $1.5 billion -- would be borrowed and spent, starting in 2008, over just five years. And after that? Zilch. Moreover, Virginia taxpayers would be paying the loan back for 20 years, to the tune of something like $75 million a year in interest. And where would that money come from? Education, public safety, and health and human services. The House GOP leaders weren't talking about that.

They also weren't talking very specifically about how much money their plan would produce for the regions that need it most. And no wonder. Because excluding Metro, which would get $50 million a year, the rest of Northern Virginia's roads, rails and transit would receive just $54 million a year on average over the next decade. That's scarcely enough to build an intersection or a few miles of highway. Compare that with the $700 million annually that the Northern Virginia Transportation Authority says is needed between now and 2030 if the region's tangled roads are to be improved.

No new initiatives for transportation are likely next year, when state lawmakers are up for reelection. But the elections themselves provide an opportunity for fed-up commuters to throw out the Republican hard-liners who are undermining and threatening the future of the state's most dynamic region.

Bush Backs Turkey's Entry To E.U. (WP)

By Michael A. Fletcher

The Washington Post, October 3, 2006

President Bush voiced support for Turkey's entry to the European Union yesterday after meeting with Turkish Prime Minister Recep Tayyip Erdogan in a long session that also focused on ways to counter extremism, instability in the Middle East and the continued violence in Iraq.

The meeting between the two leaders lasted nearly two hours -- almost an hour longer than scheduled -- and White House aides called this a reflection of Turkey's critical relationship with the United States.

"Our desire is . . . to help people who care about a peaceful future to reject radicalism and extremism," Bush said after the Oval Office meeting. "I made it very clear to the prime minister I think it's in the United States' interests that Turkey join the European Union."

Speaking through an interpreter, Erdogan thanked Bush for the endorsement, adding that "the United States is a strategic partner, a very important strategic partner for Turkey."

Last fall, the E.U. began talks with Turkey with the aim of having the country join the 25-member bloc. But those talks have gotten off to a rocky start, as the E.U. has pressured Turkey to cooperate in reaching a comprehensive settlement for the reunification of Cyprus and on rights for Turkey's Kurdish minority as conditions of membership.

Many European countries are experiencing a surge of anti-immigration sentiment, causing some anxiety around the prospect of admitting a 99 percent Muslim nation that has more than 70 million citizens, many of whom are poor by European standards. Membership in the E.U. can come with relaxed immigration rules.

Meanwhile, support for E.U. membership is beginning to wane among Turkish citizens, although a sizable majority still favor joining.

In an interview, Erdogan said the majority of Turks still view E.U. membership as something that would produce economic benefits and improve their quality of life. At the same time, he said, the European position on the Cyprus issue is causing a backlash against the idea of joining.

"At times, the statements made by the E.U. have a negative impact on Turkish public opinion," Erdogan said.

Cyprus, divided into ethnic Greek and Turkish zones since a 1974 invasion by Turkish troops, was admitted to the E.U. in 2004. Turkey refuses to deal with the Greek zone, which is administered by the island's internationally recognized government. Meanwhile, the Turkish zone, recognized only by Turkey, has been subjected to a widespread diplomatic and economic boycott.

When it came to terrorism, Bush and Erdogan did not explicitly mention the simmering tension caused by a paramilitary group that has been battling to establish an autonomous Kurdish region near the intersection of Turkey, Iraq and Iran for more than two decades. Fighters for the Kurdistan Workers' Party often cross into Turkey from northern Iraq to launch terrorist attacks, causing Turkey to complain that the United States should do more to clamp down on the group.

DOJ_NMG_0073517

The United States has pledged its support in cracking down on the rebel group, but officials worry that a military offensive would alienate Iraqi Kurds, the group most supportive of the U.S. presence in Iraq. The United States and Turkey have designated envoys to work on a plan to resolve the situation, and in the interview, Erdogan said he is willing to let that process play itself out.

In his statements after his meeting with Bush and in the interview, Erdogan said he is committed to battling terrorism. But he scolded those who link the Muslim religion to the terrorism of al-Qaeda and other extremists who perpetrate violence in the name of Islam.

"The coinage of such terms as 'Islamic terrorism' or 'Islamo-fascism,' these have injured the Muslim people in the world, and it is best to avoid such characterizations," Erdogan said.

Asked whether he planned to communicate that to Bush, who frequently invokes such phrases in speeches, he said he has in the past. "In the same way as we consider anti-Semitism a crime against humanity," he said, "Islamo-phobia is also a crime against humanity."

Bush Backs Turkey's Bid To Join EU (AP-Y)

By Foster Klug, Associated Press Writer

AP, October 3, 2006

President Bush on Monday endorsed Turkey's drive to join the European Union, commending the nation's leader for overseeing economic reforms.

Bush and Turkey's Prime Minister Recep Tayyip Erdogan said their countries share an agenda of stability in the Middle East.

"Our desire is to help people who care about a peaceful future to reject radicalism and extremism," Bush said with Erdogan at his side in the Oval Office, after their private meeting. The two discussed Iraq, Iran and a series of issues related to combatting terrorism.

Erdogan, speaking through an interpreter, said: "It was important to hear the president say that support for Turkey's membership in the European Union will continue."

A day earlier, in remarks at Georgetown University, Erdogan made a pitch for Turkey's membership, saying that "despite all the uncertainty surrounding us, we have become a country ... that is exporting security and stability to the region."

Including Turkey in the EU, he said, would add "strategic depth" to the organization, moving it from a regional actor to a global power.

In the speech, he also said a deep cultural misunderstanding between Western and Muslim societies is fueling radical groups around the world. Erdogan said overcoming differences between the West and Muslims "requires global cooperation."

"We will either all win, or we will all lose," he said.

Turkey's battle with the autonomy-seeking Kurdistan Workers Party, or PKK, was expected to be a focus of Erdogan's meeting with Bush. Turkish news media quoted Erdogan as saying he would ask Bush to fight the Kurdish rebels based in northern Iraq.

Bush and Erdogan made no mention of the issue after their meeting and took no questions.

Some in Turkey complain about what they see as a lack of U.S. cooperation in the fight against the militants, who frequently launch deadly attacks on Turkish targets.

The United States has pledged its support in cracking down on the rebel group. But Washington has also warned Turkey against pursuing the rebels into northern Iraq, fearing an incursion would alienate Iraqi Kurds.

After Erdogan's meeting with Bush, the prime minister planned to fly to London for talks Tuesday with British Prime Minister Tony Blair.

Kurdish Rebels Said To Fuel Anti-U.S. Views (WT)

By David R. Sands

The Washington Times, October 3, 2006

DOJ_NMG_0073518

Turkish Prime Minister Recep Tayyip Erdogan, emerging from a lengthy Oval Office meeting with President Bush, warned yesterday that a surge of attacks by separatist Kurdish guerrillas based in neighboring Iraq have fueled anti-American sentiment in his country.

Mr. Erdogan, briefing reporters after the meeting, said he was reassured by Mr. Bush's pledge to work with Turkish and Iraqi leaders to curb attacks by the Kurdistan Workers Party, known by the Turkish acronym PKK, the militant Kurdish separatist group that the United States has designated a terrorist organization.

Attacks inside Turkey blamed on the PKK have surged again after a long lull, with nearly 100 Turkish security officers killed in clashes with rebels in the first nine months of this year. The revelation that many of the PKK guerrillas use American-made arms has heightened anti-U.S. feeling in Turkey, Mr. Erdogan said.

"Terrorist organizations based in Iraq have been infiltrating into Turkey, as well as their arms," Mr. Erdogan said, speaking through an interpreter. "When the Turkish people learned that some of these arms were American-made, sentiment against America has been created."

Mr. Erdogan said Mr. Bush in their meeting "underlined he would do what he could to attack this problem." He added, "I came out of the meeting more hopeful."

The meeting between the two leaders went nearly twice as long as scheduled, but Mr. Bush did not mention the PKK and discussed terrorism only in general terms when the two leaders met later with reporters at the White House.

Ankara has pressed for the closing of PKK offices in Iraq and for tighter border controls. The U.S. government has warned Turkey against retaliatory attacks across the border in Iraq, fearing it could worsen the already tenuous security situation in Iraq.

Mr. Bush praised Turkey's economic reforms under Mr. Erdogan's moderate Islamist party's leadership, and repeated the long-standing U.S. support for Turkey's membership in the European Union.

Relations between the two NATO allies were badly strained by Turkey's 2003 refusal to allow U.S. and coalition forces to use its territory as part of the staging area for the war that ousted Iraqi dictator Saddam Hussein. Iraq's Kurds, who dominate the northern area of the country on Turkey's borders, have forged close ties with the United States while winning a large degree of autonomy from the central government in Baghdad.

Mr. Erdogan, who faces parliamentary elections within the year, said before his trip to Washington that he would push for "concrete steps" by the United States to curb Kurdish guerrilla activity in northern Iraq. Under U.S. pressure, an Iraqi-based PKK leader declared a "cease-fire" Saturday.

Mr. Erdogan said he also raised the question of the status of Kirkuk, an oil-rich city in Kurdish Iraq that also includes large numbers of Arabs and ethnic Turkmen, who have close ties to Turkey. He said he pressed Mr. Bush to consider a "special status" for Kirkuk, which Iraqi Kurds see as a potential capital, if Iraq should break up politically.

•Joseph Curl contributed to this report.

Bush Says U.N. Force Should Go To Darfur (USAT)

USA Today, October 3, 2006

President Bush said Monday that the United Nations should send a peacekeeping force to the Darfur region of Sudan without further delay. The Sudanese government has resisted international pressure to accept a U.N. peacekeeping force, but Bush said the U.N. should deploy such a force anyway.

He dispatched special envoy Andrew Natsios to the region. Natsios said he has been visiting Sudan for 17 years. “I know leaders in all regions of the country, and I'm going to use those contacts and that history to move this process along,” he said. More than 200,000 people have been killed and more than 2.5 million have fled since 2003, when ethnic tribes revolted against the government. A U.N. commission accused the government and its militia allies last year of human rights violations in suppressing the uprising.

Georgia frees Russians accused of spying

Georgia released four Russian officers whose arrest on spying charges prompted Moscow to announce sweeping travel and communications sanctions. Hoping to defuse tension, Georgian President Mikhail Saakashvili said he had decided to hand over the Russians to visiting Belgian Foreign Minister Karel De Gucht, chairman of the Organization for Security and Cooperation in Europe. “It's a very solid case of espionage, subversion and trying to destabilize my country,” Saakashvili said. The arrests last week infuriated Russia, which has put its troops in Georgia on high alert, recalled its ambassador and evacuated its diplomats.

DOJ_NMG_0073519

Prime minister: Calm returning to Gaza

Hamas militiamen pulled back from Gaza's streets, and Palestinian Prime Minister Ismail Haniyeh said calm was returning to the area after a deadly explosion of violence between his Hamas group and its Fatah rivals. Fatah militants enforced a general strike in many West Bank towns Monday as a show of strength against Hamas, while the Hamas-led government ordered all ministries closed to protest Fatah attacks on government buildings. The fighting in Gaza erupted Sunday when the government's 3,500-man militia confronted members of the Fatah-dominated security forces who were protesting the government's inability to pay their wages. Fatah militants responded by torching the Cabinet building.

South Korean favored to be U.N. chief

South Korea's foreign minister cemented his position as the front-runner to succeed U.N. Secretary-General Kofi Annan, the only one of six candidates to escape a veto in an informal U.N. Security Council ballot. The Security Council scheduled a formal vote for Oct. 9, making Ban Ki Moon's appointment likely. “It is quite clear that from (Monday's) straw poll that Minister Ban Ki Moon is the candidate that the Security Council will recommend to the General Assembly,” China's U.N. Ambassador Wang Guangya said.

Bush Says U.N. Should Not Wait On Darfur (AP-Y)

AP, October 3, 2006

President Bush said Monday the United Nations should send a peacekeeping force to the troubled Darfur region of Sudan as soon as possible without further delay.

"The United Nations can play an important role in helping us achieve our objective, which is to end human suffering and deprivation," Bush said as he dispatched special envoy Andrew Natsios to the region. "In my view, the United Nations should not wait any longer ... ."

The Sudanese government has thus far resisted mounting international pressure to accept a U.N. peacekeeping force in Darfur. Bush contends the U.N. should deploy such a force anyway.

Natsios said he had been going to Sudan for 17 years and "I know leaders in all regions of the country and I'm going to use those contacts and that history to move this process along."

"I think what our objective is, is not just to have a temporary fix for two months, but to try to deal with the root causes of this so we don't have another fourth war in five years, should we end this one successfully," Natsios said in an Oval Office session with Bush and reporters.

Bush Waiver Restores Military Training (AP-Y)

By George Gedda, Associated Press Writer

AP, October 3, 2006

Twenty-one countries that had been denied participation in U.S. military training programs are now eligible to take part again under a presidential waiver announced Monday by the White House.

All 21 had run afoul of the Bush administration and U.S. law by refusing to sign an agreement with the United States that would exempt Americans from prosecution by the International Criminal Court.

The administration has taken a tough line against the ICC since its creation in 2002 out of concern that Americans overseas, including military personnel, diplomats and ordinary citizens, could be subject to politically motivated ICC prosecutions.

The following countries are affected by the waiver: Barbados, Bolivia, Brazil, Costa Rica, Croatia, Ecuador, Kenya, Mali, Malta, Mexico, Namibia, Niger, Paraguay, Peru, Samoa, Serbia, South Africa, St. Vincent and the Grenadines, Tanzania, Trinidad and Uruguay.

There was no waiver for programs that finance the purchase of U.S. military equipment by these countries or for their eligibility to purchase excess U.S. defense items.

DOJ_NMG_0073520

The ICC, a United Nations creation, was set up in an attempt to ensure that perpetrators of genocide or crimes against humanity are brought to justice.

Scores of countries have gone along with U.S. requests to exempt Americans from ICC prosecutions. Others, however, refused to bend to U.S. pressure, and the result in many countries has been a sharp decline in their military ties with the United States.

Pentagon officials have told Congress that China has been filling the vacuum created by the suspension of training programs in 12 Latin American and Caribbean countries.

Gen. Bantz Craddock, who oversees U.S. military operations in Latin America, said in Senate testimony last March that military members of all ranks in the region are receiving training in China. In addition, he said, more and more Chinese non-lethal military equipment is showing up in the region.

Craddock testified that in 2003, a year before the law took effect, the United States trained 771 military personnel from countries that are now sanctioned.

U.S. Wins A United Front On Iran (WT)

By Nicholas Kralev

The Washington Times, October 3, 2006

The United States is confident that Russia and China will join it in pushing for U.N. sanctions against Iran if it does not agree to suspend enriching uranium this week, a senior U.S. official said yesterday.

R. Nicholas Burns, undersecretary of state for political affairs, also said the U.N. Security Council will insist on a clear answer to its demand that Iran suspend its enrichment activity. A "maybe" will be considered a "no," he said.

"For four months now, we've been waiting for an answer," Mr. Burns told editors and reporters at a luncheon at The Washington Times. "We've said, if they don't suspend enrichment, we'll take them to the Security Council and sanction them. We do believe we have Russian and Chinese support for that."

The five permanent council members -- the United States, Britain, France, Russia and China -- along with Germany on June 1 offered Iran a package of economic and political incentives if it suspends enrichment and asked for an answer by the end of July.

When there was no answer, the council passed a resolution threatening sanctions under Article 41 of Chapter 7 of the U.N. Charter and gave Tehran another deadline, Aug. 31. But Iran began negotiating "seriously" with the Europeans only in mid-September, Mr. Burns said, and the Bush administration decided to wait a little longer.

At a dinner in New York on Sept. 18, Secretary of State Condoleezza Rice and her five counterparts agreed that the first week of October would be the absolute deadline for Iran "to say yes or no," Mr. Burns said.

"She agreed with the Russians, Chinese and Europeans," he said of Miss Rice, "that, if Iran said no, we would all go to sanctions together at the Security Council."

He said a scheduled meeting this week between Javier Solana, the European Union's foreign policy chief, and Ali Larijani, Iran's top nuclear negotiator, should bring "clarity."

"If [Iran's answer] is maybe, it's a no," Mr. Burns said. "If it's 'We'd like to negotiate this further,' it has been negotiated for four months. At some point, you have to draw the line. So I think you'll have the answer by the end of the week."

Iranian President Mahmoud Ahmadinejad repeatedly has rejected the calls for suspending enrichment but denies that his country is pursuing a nuclear weapon.

Mr. Burns rejected a suggestion by Kazakh President Nursultan Nazarbayev, made in an interview with The Times last week, that Iran be offered a deal similar to the one Kazakhstan made when it gave up its nuclear arsenal in the 1990s. The country received a U.S. promise at that time that it would not be invaded.

But Mr. Burns said the Bush administration has refused to offer security guarantees to Iran because of other concerns, most recently its support for the terrorist group Hezbollah during its war with Israel in southern Lebanon.

"We saw the war this summer not to be just a border war," he said. "We saw this as a new element in the Middle East -- the Iranian and Syrian involvement.

DOJ_NMG_0073521

"We are also very concerned about this nexus of terrorism -- Iran, Syria, Hezbollah, Hamas, [Palestinian Islamic Jihad, the Popular Front for the Liberation of Palestine.] We think they are coordinating their actions, and we are trying to push back on that."

Mr. Burns said the Iranian issue would be Miss Rice's primary concern when she meets today in Cairo with the foreign ministers of Egypt, Jordan and the six members of the Gulf Cooperation Council.

He also said the Bush administration was waiting to see the results of a cease-fire agreement between Pakistan's government and tribal leaders in North and South Waziristan, an area of Pakistan that many intelligence analysts think is being used as a base for Taliban and al Qaeda attacks on Afghanistan.

"We've told the Pakistanis that, while we understand what they are trying to do in dealing with an extraordinarily difficult situation, we have some questions and concerns about it, and we are going to watch and see how it works," Mr. Burns said.

"Our view is -- and it has been amply and clearly expressed to the Pakistani government -- that they have an obligation to go after the foreign terrorist groups that are our enemies and theirs, and a big problem in Afghanistan."

'Good Progress' In Drawing Up Iran Sanctions: US Official (AFP)

AFP, October 3, 2006

US diplomats have made "good progress" in gaining allies' approval for a list of sanctions to be imposed on Iran if it fails to freeze its uranium enrichment activities, a senior US official said.

US Under Secretary of State Nicholas Burns has been negotiating with his counterparts from the five permanent UN Security Council members plus Germany on what sanctions to include in a UN resolution if Iran pursues its nuclear program.

Those talks have run in parallel with negotiations led by European Union foreign policy chief Javier Solana aimed at convincing Iran to freeze uranium enrichment in return for a package of economic and diplomatic rewards.

Burns "has made pretty good progress in terms of lining up the elements of a resolution with his political director counterparts," said the senior State Department official on condition of anonymity.

"I don't think it would be particularly difficult, given the progress they've made, to pull all this together" into a resolution, he said.

A timetable for pushing ahead with a sanctions resolution could come out of a possible meeting later this week in Europe of foreign ministers from the six nations dealing with the issue -- Britain, China, France, Russia, the US and Germany, he said.

Iran ignored an August 31 deadline set by the UN Security Council for halting enrichment, which can be used to make fuel for nuclear power stations or to provide the core of atomic weapons.

The United States has pressed its Security Council allies to use sanctions to increase the pressure on Tehran, but has met stiff resistance, notably from Russia and China.

At a meeting last month in New York, US Secretary of State Condoleezza Rice agreed to give Solana until this week to negotiate a resolution of the standoff with Iran's top nuclear envoy, Ali Larijani, but so far those talks have yielded no results.

Rice, who began a trip to the Middle East on Monday to discuss the Iranian issue among other things, said she could meet with her counterparts from the so-called P5-plus-1 countries later this week to take stock of the negotiations.

The senior State Department official said that meeting could take place in Europe on Friday.

US President George W. Bush and Russian President Vladimir Putin also discussed the Iranian nuclear issue by telephone on Monday and agreed to stick to "a united position" on the matter, the White House said.

The United States is backing the use of progressive sanctions to force Iran's hand, beginning with restrictions on sales of dual-use equipment and technology which could help Tehran's nuclear program, according to US and European officials.

Other possible punitive measures include assets freezes and travel bans targeting Iranians involved in the nuclear sector.

The senior US official said that while "very good progress" had been made in lining up "the basics" of a first round of sanctions, it could take time to agree on the exact wording of a new UN resolution actually imposing the measures.

"As we know from past practice on this, getting 90 percent there is great, getting the last ten percent sometimes takes longer than you wish," he said.

While Washington has no specific timetable for trying to get a sanctions resolution adopted by the Security Council, he said, time is running out.

DOJ_NMG_0073522

"The last few grains of sand in this hour glass seem to be running through," he said.

EU Official Pushes Iran On Nuclear Plans (AP)

By Paul Ames, Associated Press Writer

AP, October 3, 2006

The EU foreign policy chief said he was resuming talks with Iran's top nuclear negotiator and warned Monday that the time for continuing negotiations on Tehran's atomic program was limited.

But Javier Solana denied he was running out of patience.

"We don't have an infinite length of time in front of us," he told reporters. "I'm not tired and I'm patient because I think that what we have at stake is very important."

Speaking to reporters on the sidelines of a EU defense ministers meeting, he said he would talk by telephone with Iranian negotiator Ali Larijani later Monday.

Solana has been leading negotiations with Larijani on behalf of Britain, France, Germany, China, the United States and Russia, which are seeking to persuade Iran to suspend work on processing uranium in return for a package of incentives.

"We have made progress on some elements but still what is fundamental for us, which is the matter of suspension, has not been finally agreed," Solana said.

Iran's hardline president said Sunday his country was determined to expand its uranium enrichment program, announcing a plan to produce more nuclear fuel. He denied Iran was seeking to build nuclear weapons and said the program was for generating electricity.

On Friday, the Bush administration repeated threats to seek U.N. sanctions unless the negotiations end successfully. However, Russia and China, which have veto rights at the Security Council, are wary of sanctions.

Igor Ivanov, the secretary of Russia's presidential Security Council, was scheduled to travel to Iran for talks with Larijani on Tuesday, Russian news agencies said Monday.

The process of uranium enrichment can be used to produce electricity or build nuclear weapons depending on the level of enrichment. The U.S. alleges Iran is seeking to build nuclear weapons, but Iran contends that its program is for peaceful purposes.

Iran defied a U.N. Security Council deadline calling on it to suspend enrichment by Aug. 31 or face possible international sanctions.

Rice Meets With Saudi King On Trip To Rally Arab Allies (WP)

By Robin Wright, Washington Post Staff Writer

The Washington Post, October 3, 2006

In Wake of Lebanon War, Secretary of State Looks to Stabilize Middle East, Counter Momentum of Militant Movements

JIDDAH, Saudi Arabia, Oct. 2 -- Secretary of State Condoleezza Rice held midnight talks with Saudi Arabia's King Abdullah on Monday on the first leg of a five-day swing through the Middle East to rally Arab allies against the growing momentum of militant movements in the region.

The Bush administration is trying to line up support among an informal new bloc -- including the six Persian Gulf states, Egypt and Jordan -- to help stabilize the region after the 33-day war in Lebanon between Hezbollah and Israel.

America's top diplomat described that conflict as a clarifying moment in defining the political forces in the world's most volatile region. Many analysts believe the sixth Middle East war at least temporarily boosted the standing of Hezbollah as well as its patron Iran and allies such as the radical Palestinian group Hamas.

Rice is hoping to explore ways of reviving the moribund peace process between Israel and the Palestinians as well as bolster support for the fragile governments in Iraq and Lebanon. U.S. officials privately concede that their expectations for any major movement are low.

To emphasize the growing gap between moderates and militants, Rice may hold talks on Iran on Friday with the foreign ministers of the five permanent members of the U.N. Security Council plus Germany. The subject will be what actions to take against Tehran for failing to comply with a U.N. resolution to stop uranium enrichment for an energy program that could be used to develop nuclear weapons.

DOJ_NMG_0073523

Rice held a conference call with her counterparts over the weekend to discuss Iran, which missed a formal Aug. 31 deadline. A second, informal deadline passes this week.

"I think it's fair to say that we have not yet heard anything that suggests that the Iranians are going to suspend," Rice told reporters traveling with her, pointing out that Iranian President Mahmoud Ahmadinejad has repeatedly rejected suspending enrichment.

The Bush administration is pressing for punitive sanctions against Iran if it does not agree to suspend enrichment and come to the negotiating table.

Rice said European Union foreign policy chief Javier Solana is likely to "check his sources one more time to see if there is anything more there." Solana has been heading up talks with Iran's top nuclear negotiator, Ali Larijani.

"We did have a discussion of the importance of remaining firm on Resolution 1696, which means that if the Iranians don't suspend, then we will go to the Security Council for sanctions," Rice said.

The U.S. effort to generate new momentum in the Middle East comes at an all-time low in the region for the Bush presidency, with Iraq's insurgency intensifying, the Palestinians enmeshed in a political and economic quagmire, Hezbollah still armed in Lebanon, Iran's new president increasingly defiant, and three Israeli soldiers captured by Palestinian and Lebanese fighters over the summer yet to be released.

An attempt last month between Palestinian President Mahmoud Abbas and Hamas to form a national unity government collapsed, particularly over the issue of recognizing Israel. New clashes in Gaza among Palestinians on Sunday killed six and injured more than 100.

In Jiddah, Rice said she is also hoping to win Saudi political and financial help in Iraq. Guardian of Islam's holy places and ruled by a staunchly Sunni government, the kingdom has particular leverage with Iraq's Sunni tribes.

"Saudi Arabia has a lot of standing with a number of the forces in Iraq" and was "very helpful in trying to get Sunnis involved in the election," Rice told reporters traveling with her. "So I think it would be very helpful if they were supportive of, and working toward," helping Iraqi Prime Minister Nouri al-Maliki's national reconciliation plan.

Rice's trip is a follow-up to President Bush's pledge at the United Nations last month to galvanize moderate voices in the region. Rice is also scheduled to visit Egypt for a meeting with eight foreign ministers and then Israel and the West Bank to discuss peace efforts.

Rice Faces Calls For Progress In Mideast (FT)

By Roula Khalaf, Guy Dinmore And William Wallis

Financial Times, October 3, 2006

Condoleezza Rice, US secretary of state, faces urgent calls for a comprehensive peace between Israel and the Palestinians when she meets eight Arab foreign ministers in Cairo today.

Her first trip to the region since the end of Israel's Lebanon offensive comes as Middle East leaders consider seeking a collective summit with US President George W. Bush after the US mid-term elections, according to senior officials in the region.

Ms Rice's regional tour, which started in Saudi Arabia on Monday, is partly intended to shore up moderate Arab allies while dealing with the shared perception of the extremist threat from Iran, Lebanon's Hizbollah and Iraq's sectarian chaos.

But because of severe ideological differences within the Bush administration, Ms Rice is not expected to unveil big initiatives.

Pro-western Arab states have emerged weakened from the 34 days of fighting between Israel and Lebanon's Shia Hizbollah guerrillas, their Sunni leaderships all the more alarmed by the growing influence of Shia Iran, backer of Hizbollah, in the Middle East.

The unusual criticism from Saudi Arabia, Jordan and Egypt of the Tehran- and Damascus-backed Hizbollah, whose capture of two Israeli soldiers on July 12 sparked the war, has exposed them to mounting attacks at home. Arab public opinion was outraged by Israel's massive offensive and the US's refusal to call for an early ceasefire.

DOJ_NMG_0073524

Governments are telling the US that it should now seek an "endgame" to the Palestinian-Israeli conflict, not another long, drawn-out peace process based on small, incremental steps. They argue that addressing the region's most emotive issue would help undermine more radical forces that claim to be better champions of Palestinian rights.

"This is not an anti-Iran gathering, but the Gulf states are worried about security issues. Part of it is Iran and the spillover from Iraq. Part of it is the increase of radicalism throughout the region," said a senior Arab diplomat. "To many of these threats the answer is to have a programme to move forward the Middle East peace process."

Ms Rice has apparently scored some success by persuading hardliners in the Bush administration that the US has to engage on the Palestinian-Israeli front. But Arab diplomats say the administration has indicated a peace initiative would only be unveiled after the US midterm elections in November.

Philip Zelikow, special counsellor to Ms Rice, laid out the State Department's thinking about the region in a keynote speech last month, stressing the importance of a coalition of the US, Europe, Israel and "moderate" Arab states in dealing with the multiple threats to stability in the Middle East, namely Sunni and Shia extremism. What would bind this "coalition of the builders", he said, was a "sense that the Arab-Israeli issues are being addressed".

Clayton Swisher, analyst with the Middle East Institute in Washington, however, said the administration was divided on how to proceed. Arab officials, meanwhile, acknowledge that the political landscape is not conducive to progress.

Nouri al-Maliki, Iraqi prime minister, on Monday announced an initiative aimed at calming sectarian violence which would establish neighbourhood commissions to oversee the work of the security forces, AP adds from Baghdad.

Mr Maliki announced his plan after meeting Sunni and Shia leaders in his national unity government, which is coming under increasing criticism for failure to rein in militias and insurgents. The plan would set up local committees with representatives from political parties in each district of Baghdad, which would report to a central body.

Rice Revisiting Mideast Peace Issue (WT/AP)

By Salah Nasrawi

The Washington Times, October 3, 2006

AIRO -- Eight U.S.-allied Arab countries are banding together to meet with Secretary of State Condoleezza Rice on her trip here, with the hope of reviving the deadlocked Arab-Israeli peace process and making headway on other regional issues.

During their meeting today with Miss Rice, the foreign ministers of the six-nation Gulf Cooperation Council and Egypt and Jordan are expected to coordinate efforts to buttress the stature of a moderate Palestinian leader and stem Iran's growing influence.

Miss Rice's visit comes as Arab countries have in recent weeks halted dealings with the Palestinian militant group Hamas. They want it to join a unity government that supports a 2002 Arab League plan that would offer peace to Israel in exchange for land, and they have even started funneling aid through Palestinian Authority President Mahmoud Abbas, Arab diplomats said.

The goal of Miss Rice's tour is to promote democracy and discuss threats to stability, such as Iran, Hamas and Hezbollah, Miss Rice's spokesman said. But the Arab ministers' priority is restarting peace talks.

On Sunday, Egypt's President Hosni Mubarak and Jordan's King Abdullah II called for Palestinian-Israeli talks to be resumed "as soon as possible." Their meeting came as the worst internal Palestinian violence since Hamas took power in March shook the Gaza Strip.

Egypt, a longtime mediator among Palestinian factions and between Israel and the Palestinians, appears to be losing patience with Hamas.

Last week, Egypt's chief of intelligence, Omar Suleiman, demanded the immediate release of Israeli Cpl. Gilad Shalit. Militants close to Hamas captured the soldier in June, triggering Israeli military retaliation. Mr. Suleiman has been working on a prisoner swap.

Mr. Suleiman also told the Syrian-based Hamas leader Khaled Mashaal that the militant group should cooperate fully with Mr. Abbas to form a unity government, a step that has been stalled by Hamas' refusal to join a Cabinet that recognizes Israel.

Jordan, Saudi Arabia and some Gulf states expressed similar concerns. The Gulf Cooperation Council comprises Saudi Arabia, Kuwait, Bahrain, Oman, Qatar and the United Arab Emirates.

DOJ_NMG_0073525

On Saturday, the Arab press reported that the intelligence chiefs of Egypt, Jordan and some Gulf nations met last week in Aqaba, Jordan, with their Israeli counterpart. Israeli newspapers reported the meeting was held "to discuss the confrontation with the extreme Middle Eastern states and how to handle the threat of terror."

Meanwhile, Hamas' isolation from the Arab fold deepens.

"They are virtually boycotting them. No Arab government talks to them, not even the Arab League," an official from the regional organization said on the condition of anonymity because of the sensitivity of the issue.

Israelis Reach Out To Arab Nations That Share Fear Of Ascendant Iran (WSJ)

By Karby Leggett and Marcus Brauchli

The Wall Street Journal, October 3, 2006

JERUSALEM -- Israel's summer war against Iranian-backed Hezbollah militants has redoubled its concerns about the threat from Iran, leading Israeli officials to reach out to Arab governments that share their concern about Tehran's growing influence in the region.

Leaders across the political spectrum here now agree that Israel must find ways to work with other Middle Eastern states, even if that means dealing with governments that have been hostile to Israel in the past. Asked in an interview last week if Saudi Arabia, a longtime backer of groups that have fought Israel, would be considered a moderate Arab nation Israel could potentially work with, Foreign Minister Tzipi Livni replied bluntly: "Yes."

More keenly debated is how far Israel should go to broaden such ties -- particularly because its territorial dispute with the Palestinians is likely to come into diplomatic play. This week, U.S. Secretary of State Condoleezza Rice is visiting the region, and she will focus on both Iran, which the U.S. worries is trying to develop a nuclear weapon, and the Palestinian question.

The increased alarm here about Iran has arisen in large measure because of Israel's critical self-assessment of a war that ended indecisively in August, with Hezbollah -- and others in the region -- calling it a defeat for Israel's vaunted military. That left many Israeli leaders worried about an emboldened Iran.

"The main threat in this region is fundamentalism, radicalism and unconventional weapons -- everything under the title of Iran," said Ami Ayalon, a leader of Israel's Labor party.

The ascent of violent Islamism is another area where Israel's interests are converging with those of its Arab neighbors. An array of Sunni Muslim networks such as al Qaeda, though ideologically at odds with Shiite Muslim Iran, consider Israel a mortal enemy while deriding many Arab governments as corrupt and illegitimate -- and have targeted both.

The Nuclear Question

The concern about Iran comes as the international community tries to persuade Tehran to suspend a nuclear program the U.S. believes is aimed at building a weapon. Iran says the program is purely peaceful. Tehran defied one United Nations resolution that had called on it to suspend by the end of August any activities that could produce a nuclear weapon, and the U.S. and Europe are weighing further steps. Israel's worries about Iran are compounded by comments from Iranian leaders, including President Mahmoud Ahmadinejad, suggesting a desire to see Israel eliminated as a state. "History has taught us to listen to this kind of talk," said the foreign minister, Ms. Livni, alluding to the Holocaust.

The more immediate lesson Israeli leaders are taking from the 34-day war in Lebanon is that Iran is building an organized military threat capable of taking on Israel and extending its influence in the region. The Lebanon war began July 12, when Hezbollah militants attacked inside Israel, killing three soldiers and kidnapping two others. Israel responded with a devastating air and ground campaign that killed more than 1,000 Lebanese -- almost all civilians -- and devastated the nation's infrastructure. Hundreds of Hezbollah fighters were killed, according to Israel, along with more than 150 Israelis, mostly soldiers.

Israeli officials and politicians across the political spectrum are convinced Iran represents an existential threat. Withdrawing from territory in the absence of a negotiated deal, as Israel did in Gaza last year and Lebanon in 2000 -- and was contemplating doing in the West Bank before the war -- is increasingly seen as futile. "We had withdrawn from every inch of their territory" in Lebanon, said Benjamin Netanyahu, former Israeli prime minister and current leader of the opposition Likud party, referring to Israel's 2000 pullout from Lebanon. Hezbollah and the Lebanese government contend the withdrawal was incomplete because Israel retained control of a parcel of land called Shebaa Farms, and complain of regular violations of Lebanese territory.

DOJ_NMG_0073526

Mr. Netanyahu and other leaders believe Iran is a regional threat, pointing out that its influence is growing in Iraq following the model Tehran used to establish Hezbollah in Lebanon. One senior security official said Tehran is funneling increasing sums of money and arms to organizations it supports in Lebanon and now Iraq. "Iran is building an enormous force in Iraq," he said, adding that the goal is to exert influence in the run-up to and aftermath of American and other troops' inevitable exit.

The assessment that Iran is a regional threat and could one day be a nuclear rival unnerves other countries in the region, Israeli officials and politicians say. That has led them to decide they should attempt a new embrace not only of Egypt and Jordan -- which already have formal relations with Israel -- but also Arab countries with which it has had few to no dealings.

"We have to do everything to lead Iran to collapse from internal reasons... the way to do that is to isolate them even in the Arab world," said Ran Cohen, a member of the Knesset, or Parliament, from the liberal Mertz-Yahad Party.

Israel's outreach to moderate Arab states gained some momentum last month when, during a United Nations meeting in New York, Israeli officials held some private meetings with officials from Persian Gulf countries regarding Iran, officials here said. Israeli officials declined to name which countries' representatives they met with, saying the matter is too politically sensitive. Beyond Egypt, Jordan and Mauritania, Israel has no official relations with any Arab League countries.

This process could gain further momentum this week, when Ms. Rice arrives in the Middle East for a new round of diplomacy. In Egypt, where she is scheduled to arrive today, Ms. Rice plans to meet with foreign ministers from the six-nation Gulf Cooperation Council, which includes Saudi Arabia, Kuwait, Bahrain, Oman, Qatar and the United Arab Emirates. Discussions are expected to focus on the Israeli-Palestinian issue and how to possibly restart talks for a political settlement, though the question of Iran and its nuclear program also is likely to be addressed. Like Israel, the U.S. is interested in building a broad regional coalition against Iran.

Palestinian Pressures

Still, Israel could have difficulty winning cooperation from Arab countries if it isn't willing to address their longstanding complaints about its occupation of Palestinian and Syrian territory. Officials in Egypt and Jordan, as well as Gulf states such as Saudi Arabia -- all majority Sunni Muslim states -- do little to hide their anger over Israel's often-harsh treatment of the Palestinians. They are particularly concerned with Israel's bid to unilaterally set its border with the West Bank, a plan that would leave Jerusalem inside Israel.

Radical Islamist groups in the region, including Hamas, cite Israel's control of Jerusalem as justification for its attacks. Al Qaeda, meanwhile, says the U.S. is a legitimate target because of its support for Israel. Saudi Arabia, in what was considered a dramatic move several years ago, offered to get much of the Arab world to recognize Israel in exchange for a withdrawal from all territory Israel occupied during the 1967 war. Israel rejected the idea. Saudi Arabia's peace proposal also reflected its own concern that Islamic radicals are using the Palestinian conflict to build support for their movements.

While there has been some discussion in Israeli circles of whether to open talks with Syria, an Iranian ally but also a key player in any effort to secure peace in the region, few Israeli officials said their country is contemplating the idea in earnest. U.S. officials remain adamantly against it, saying Damascus must be isolated for its role in abetting terrorism in the region.

Specter of an Arms Race

Despite these territorial issues, many Arab states make little effort to hide their concern of a militarily powerful and potentially nuclear-armed Iran. At the start of the Lebanon war, for example, Sunni leaders in the region were openly critical of Hezbollah, a Shiite Muslim organization that has deep ideological ties to Iran. Perhaps the biggest concern, within the U.S. and Israel but also among weaker states such as Kuwait and Jordan, is that a nuclear Iran could spark a regional arms race. Egypt has fed those fears with a recent announcement that it is restarting its own nuclear-power program.

Another major complication is the growing political tension among Palestinian factions, particularly between Hamas, which now runs the Palestinian Authority government, and Fatah, the former ruling Palestinian party. These strains have been worsened by a months-long financial blockade of the Hamas-run government by Western countries, including the U.S.

In recent weeks, Palestinian President Mahmoud Abbas has held discussions with Hamas leaders on the formation of a national unity government that could allow Western countries to end the financial boycott, but the effort has stumbled on Hamas's refusal to recognize Israel's right to exist. Officials in Egypt, Jordan and Saudi Arabia also have begun applying political and financial pressure on Hamas to recognize the Jewish state, which Israeli officials say is the bare minimum needed to formally restart peace talks.

DOJ_NMG_0073527

Without a breakthrough on this front, progress on the Israeli-Palestinian dialogue is virtually impossible. Meanwhile, violence in Gaza is ticking higher daily, fueling anger and making any solution to the conflict even less likely.

Analysts Warm To Lebanon Results (WT)

By Joshua Mitnick

The Washington Times, October 3, 2006

TEL AVIV -- After weeks of handwringing over the inconclusive result of Israel's border war with Hezbollah, some Israelis are coming around to the idea that Hezbollah has indeed been weakened and that Israel's deterrent power is still intact.

When Hezbollah guerrillas succeeded in capturing two Israeli soldiers in northern Israel just three weeks after Hamas took an Israeli corporal captive in the Gaza Strip, Israelis lamented that their country had lost its ability to intimidate enemies.

And when Israel agreed to a cease-fire with Hezbollah in August without having scored a knockout blow in the monthlong war, it was widely predicted that a new round of fighting with the Iranian-backed Shi'ite militia was inevitable.

But many analysts have since concluded that Hezbollah -- despite its bombastic rhetoric -- has suffered serious damage and will not be anxious for a return engagement.

The war destroyed the group's positions in southern Lebanon, wiped out a good deal of its rocket arsenal, left hundreds of Lebanese civilians dead and wrecked the country's infrastructure, angering the general public.

"We really must shake ourselves out of this mood of pessimism and negative thinking," wrote Daniel Gavron on the English language Web site of the Ha'aretz newspaper.

"There is no reason to assume that a new round of hostilities is about to break out. We are planning to rehabilitate the north; Lebanese are reconstructing their country; the international force is being established.

"Neither side wants to renew the conflict that cost us both so much. The latest reports suggest that even [Hezbollah leader] Hassan Nasrallah, for all his posturing, is behaving himself, and reining in Hezbollah in southern Lebanon."

After the Sunday pullout of the Israel Defense Forces, both Israeli and Hezbollah officials were quoted warning of a new outbreak.

An anonymous Israeli military officer was quoted on the Web site of the Israeli newspaper Yediot Ahronot as saying that the army expects that within two months Hezbollah could begin testing the reaction of Israeli troops along the border with small provocations.

A Hezbollah spokesman reportedly threatened to renew attacks on Israel if its military encroached on Lebanon's land, sea and airspace.

But analysts counter that the Shi'ite militia has suffered too much damage for a quick renewal of the war. Military historian Michael Oren said that although he is pessimistic that the cease-fire brokered by the United Nations will hold, Israel has succeeded in re-establishing a measure of deterrence against Hezbollah.

"There are levels of deterrence. We destroyed Hezbollah's ministate, and Nasrallah is still in hiding," he said. "On the other hand, Hezbollah fired 4,000 missiles into our territory and survived the war. So it's not black and white."

A spokeswoman for Prime Minister Ehud Olmert was cautiously upbeat when asked about the pullout.

"We hope that this new force will bring about a new era of stability along the Israel-Lebanese border," Miri Eisen said, referring to a U.N. force deploying there. "There's always a difference between what you plan for and what happens in the real world. We'll see what happens."

When the Israel-Hezbollah cease-fire first went into effect Aug. 14, analysts and officials described the truce as rickety and delicate. But with the fighting ending, many think Hezbollah is too immersed in rebuilding the south and fending off accusations from rival politicians about the damage of the war.

"I don't think there's going to be a confrontation between Israel and Hezbollah for a while," said Hirsch Goodman, a fellow at Tel Aviv University's Institute for National Security Studies.

DOJ_NMG_0073528

"Hezbollah is going to be focused on its relations with the Lebanese government and the international force -- that is where the real dynamic has developed. The main interaction right now is a dynamic between Lebanon and Hezbollah, and whether it will remain an independent militia in a democratic country."

2 Killed As Palestinian Factions Clash For 2nd Day (NYT)

By Greg Myre

The New York Times, October 3, 2006

JERUSALEM, Oct. 2 — Hamas and Fatah, the two main Palestinian factions, on Monday traded gunfire and recriminations for a second day in the West Bank and the Gaza Strip, leaving 2 people dead and about 20 wounded.

The Palestinian Authority president, Mahmoud Abbas, of Fatah, and Prime Minister Ismail Haniya, of Hamas, appealed for calm, and the clashes were not as intense or as widespread as on Sunday. Still, several shootouts erupted as Palestinian officials struggled to end the internal fighting.

"We reiterate to our people to be responsible, not to spread the circle of disagreements and conflict," Mr. Haniya told his cabinet.

However, in the southern Gaza town of Rafah, Fatah supporters held a large demonstration on Monday evening and clashed with members of the Executive Force, a security body established earlier this year by the Hamas government. A policeman and a demonstrator were killed, and more than a dozen people were wounded. In an effort to reduce tensions, the Executive Force pulled back from the main streets in Gaza City, where on Sunday it battled other security units and gunmen aligned with Fatah. In both Gaza and the West Bank, many shops, schools and government offices were closed.

Sunday's fighting, which left seven people dead and dozens wounded in Gaza, came at a time when Hamas, a militant Islamic group, and Fatah, a secular nationalist movement, were struggling to form a national unity government. After the clashes, the effort appears to have become even more complicated.

The Palestinians have a history of fierce but brief internal battles, often followed by relative calm. While Mr. Abbas and Mr. Haniya called for a halt to the bloodshed, officials on each side blamed the other for starting the violence.

The Hamas government "moves from failure to failure and from crisis to crisis," Ahmed Abdel Rahman, a senior Fatah official, said Monday in the West Bank city of Ramallah. "The Hamas government is now endangering the Palestinian people."

Ahmed Yousef, a top adviser to Mr. Haniya, said that recent Fatah-led street protests were part of a broader effort to undermine the government. "We realized there was a plan by Fatah to occupy all government institutions, and we had to send a message," he said, but added that Hamas was prepared to restart talks on the unity government.

In other fighting Monday, Fatah and Hamas gunmen briefly traded fire at Gaza City's main hospital, Shifa, when a family came to retrieve the body of one of those killed Sunday. The shooting caused panic inside the hospital, but no serious injuries were reported.

Also in Gaza, militants set fire to the Agricultural Ministry, causing damage, although no one was hurt. In the West Bank city of Nablus, Fatah gunmen shot and wounded two bodyguards of Nasser al-Shaer, the deputy prime minister, who was not present. In Jericho, a shopkeeper who refused to take part in a general strike called by Fatah militants was shot and seriously wounded, Palestinians said.

In a speech Sunday night on Palestinian television, Mr. Abbas said, "These confrontations have crossed the red line, which we have avoided crossing for four decades."

Mr. Abbas also called for renewed negotiations on a unity government, though there was no immediate sign that more talks were planned. The discussions have been going on for months, and Mr. Abbas and Mr. Haniya announced an agreement in principle on Sept. 11. But since then, the talks have stalled.

A Palestinian fisherman was killed Monday just off Gaza's Mediterranean coast, in what Palestinian officials said was a shooting by an Israeli gunboat. The Israeli military said that naval vessels fired in the air several times to drive fishing boats back toward the shore, but that it was not aware that anyone had been hit.

Israel has imposed tight restrictions on Palestinian boats in recent months, accusing Palestinians of smuggling in weapons by sea.

DOJ_NMG_0073529

The internal Palestinian fighting erupted Sunday when the Executive Force clashed with Fatah supporters in Gaza City and Khan Yunis, a town in southern Gaza.

Tensions have been building in recent weeks, as many government workers staged demonstrations to protest unpaid salaries. Many protesters are linked to Fatah, which controlled the Palestinian Authority government for more than a decade, until Hamas won parliamentary elections in January.

The Hamas government has been unable to pay salaries or govern effectively because the United States and the European Union, regarding Hamas as a terrorist group, have taken steps to cut off aid funds, and Israel has refused to turn over customs and other fees that it collects for the Palestinians.

Secretary of State Condoleezza Rice, on a Middle Eastern trip, plans to meet with Palestinian and Israeli leaders on Wednesday and Thursday, though her agenda appears relatively modest, diplomats in the region said.

Ms. Rice, who will visit Saudi Arabia and Egypt first, will seek to find ways to ease the travel restrictions Israel has imposed on Palestinians and their goods, particularly in Gaza, the diplomats said. She brokered an agreement on Palestinian movements last November, but it quickly broke down.

Russians Raise The Stakes In Georgia Row (FT)

By Neil Buckley

Financial Times, October 3, 2006

Russia sharply escalated its dispute with Georgia on Monday, saying it would suspend transport and postal links with its southern neighbour – even as Georgia returned four soldiers arrested last week on spying charges.

Moscow's transport ministry ordered air, road, rail and sea links to be closed from midnight Monday night. The communications ministry said mail services would be suspended.

Neither ministry made reference to the detained officers. Instead, they alleged violations of transport agreements by Georgia and declined to say how long the suspensions would last.

The quarrel sparked by last Wednesday's detention of the men, whom Moscow insists are innocent, has caused the biggest rift in years between the two former Soviet republics and threatens to erupt into conflict.

Vladimir Putin, the Russian president, discussed the situation in a phone call with George W. Bush at the US president's request, the Kremlin said. Mr Putin was said to have told him that any action by a third country that could be interpreted by Georgia as encouraging its "destructive" policy was "dangerous and unacceptable".

Russia recalled its ambassador from Tbilisi, the Georgian capital, last week and evacuated dozens of its diplomats.

At the weekend Mr Putin described the detentions as "state terrorism with hostage taking", likening them to the actions of Lavrenty Beria, the Georgian who was chief of Stalin's secret police.

Russia's moves drew a swift international response, with the Organisation for Security and Co-operation in Europe, which was attempting to act as mediator, calling on Russia to restore transport links immediately.

Erkki Tuomioja – the foreign minister of Finland, current holder of the EU presidency – urged both sides to "hold back from steps that could be seen as provocation". Georgia's gesture of returning the men came after Mikheil Saakashvili, the Georgian president met Karel De Gucht, Belgium's foreign minister and OSCE chairman in office, and appeared to be aimed at defusing the dispute.

The men were handed over in Tbilisi to OSCE representatives and a Russian embassy official at about 5.30pm Moscow time and flew back to Moscow last night.

However, Moscow announced its transport blockade, agreed earlier by Mr Putin and senior security staff, soon after Tbilisi said it would return the officers.

The blockade could hit the Caucasus republic hard. More than 300,000 Georgians work in Russia, many of them sending money home to relatives.

Boris Gryzlov, the speaker of Russia's lower house of parliament, said it was planning to pass legislative amendments that would allow the government to ban banking transactions with certain countries. Relations between Moscow and Tbilisi have soured since Mr Saakashvili came to power in the Rose Revolution of November 2003 and moved Georgia out of Moscow's orbit, pursuing EU and Nato membership.

DOJ_NMG_0073530

Moscow has called last week's arrests a deliberate provocation.

Russian political analysts said they were a stunt designed to bolster the Georgian president's flagging image as his party faces nationwide municipal electionson Thursday.

Georgia Frees Russian Officers, But Moscow Moves To Retaliate (WSJ)

By Marc Champion

The Wall Street Journal, October 3, 2006

Georgia released four Russian military officers it had arrested on charges of spying, in an effort to defuse an escalating crisis between the two countries. But Moscow retaliated for the arrests by cutting off transport and postal links, suggesting a tense period ahead.

Georgian officials handed the four Russians to representatives of the Organization for Security and Cooperation in Europe, or OSCE, to be flown back to Russia. Another two officers Georgian police had sought on the same spying charges joined the four on the plane home, according to Russian officials.

The decision to release the men was a recognition by Georgia's government of the high risk attached to its arrest of the officers last week, made partly in a bid to draw international attention to the country's dispute with Moscow over two separatist territories.

OSCE Chairman Karel De Gucht, who flew to Tbilisi to mediate the dispute, said in a news conference with Georgian President Mikhail Saakashvili that the OSCE was committed to preserving Georgia's territorial integrity, a reference to the two territories, Abkhazia and South Ossetia. The territories are under protection of troops led by Russia, which has suggested that it may support their independence.

Over the weekend, Russian President Vladimir Putin accused Georgia of "state terrorism." Reflecting the significance of the dispute to Russia, Mr. Putin yesterday told President Bush, in a phone call in which he also discussed Iran, that any action by a third country seen as encouraging Georgia's actions would be "unacceptable," according to a Kremlin statement. The U.S. has been a strong backer of Georgia's government.

Earlier yesterday, Russia said it was cutting off all transport and postal links to Georgia. Those measures would further cut curtailed trade between the two countries. More than a million Georgians live and work in Russia, and many flights out of Georgia route through Moscow.

Russian parliamentary speaker Boris Gryzlov said the legislature planned to pass amendments enabling the government to ban banking operations with certain countries, according to the Interfax news agency. If applied to Georgia, that could be a devastating move that Georgian officials have long said they feared. Many Georgians rely heavily on the money their family members send home from Russia.

Relations between the two countries have been tense for more than a decade, partly because of the role Russian troops and volunteer fighters played in helping ethnic Abkhaz and South Ossetians to split Abkhazia and South Ossetia from Georgia in the early 1990s. The construction of a U.S.-backed oil pipeline running from the Caspian Sea to the Turkish Mediterranean coast via Georgia, which began operation this year, and the election of the Westward-looking Mr. Saakashvili in 2004 have sharpened the dispute.

This year, Mr. Saakashvili accused Russia of responsibility for bombings just across the Russian border that interrupted the Russian gas pipeline to Georgia during a midwinter dispute over natural-gas prices between Moscow and several increasingly independent former Soviet republics. Russia denied involvement and later banned imports of Georgian wine and mineral water, saying they were unsafe to drink.

Russia Severs Transport Links With Georgia (NYT)

By Steven Lee Myers

The New York Times, October 3, 2006

DOJ_NMG_0073531

MOSCOW, Oct. 2 — Russia announced Monday that it was suspending air, rail, sea and road links to its small southern neighbor, Georgia, taking its first significant retaliatory steps after last week's arrests by Georgia of four Russian military officers on accusations of espionage.

Several hours after Russia suspended travel, as well as postal service, between the countries, Georgia released the four officers into the custody of the Organization for Security and Cooperation in Europe, an international body to which both countries belong that had helped negotiate the release.

The officers and two others in Georgia who were accused, but not arrested, returned to Russia on a flight from Georgia on Monday night.

Their release, however, did not lead Russia to reconsider its actions. A Kremlin spokesman, Dmitri S. Peskov, said the moves were intended to punish the Georgian authorities for what he called a pattern of hostile and provocative acts toward Russia that extended beyond the latest arrests.

"It's a matter of changing their attitude totally," he said in a telephone interview.

"Instead of making steps toward improving relations with Russia," he added, "they are taking steps toward conflict."

Georgia's president, Mikheil Saakashvili, called the release a gesture of good will. But speaking to reporters in the country's capital, Tbilisi, he reiterated his government's accusations that the officers had been spying and vowed to counter Russian efforts to undermine a neighboring country seeking an independent foreign policy. "We cannot be treated as a second-rate backyard of some kind of emerging empire," he said.

Relations between Russia and Georgia — both former republics of the Soviet Union, though hardly equal ones — have been turbulent since the Soviet collapse in 1991. The latest tensions, though, have been among the worst since Russian fighters joined two separatist conflicts in Abkhazia and South Ossetia, both in Georgian territory, during the early 1990's.

Those conflicts remain at the heart of the country's many clashes with Russia, which maintains peacekeeping forces in both separatist regions, as well as other bases in Georgia that it is moving to close — slowly, according to the Georgians.

Russia's view of Georgia has also deteriorated sharply since the 2004 election of Mr. Saakashvili, who has tried to steer the country on a more westerly course. Last month, Georgia agreed on a plan for negotiations that could lead to membership in NATO, an anathema to Russia.

Georgian officials accused the Russian officers of recruiting agents and plotting attacks inside Georgia, showing what they asserted was videotaped evidence. The reaction in Russia has at times sounded warlike, with some lawmakers and commentators saying Russia should retaliate by force, if necessary, or halt the withdrawal of Russian forces there.

International mediators intervened over the weekend in an effort to calm the situation. The chairman of the O.S.C.E., Foreign Minister Karel De Gucht of Belgium, flew to Georgia's capital on Monday to preside over the release of the officers.

He said their release came after negotiations over the weekend involving Georgian, Russian, European and American officials, including Secretary of State Condoleezza Rice.

The Kremlin also reported that President Vladimir V. Putin and President Bush discussed Georgia in a telephone conversation on Monday. Mr. Peskov, the spokesman, said Mr. Putin stressed that "no third country should make steps" that encouraged Georgia's intransigence, though he said that did not mean the United States.

On Sunday, the Kremlin denounced the arrests as "state terrorism" in a statement, though Mr. Putin's published remarks were more tempered. He accused the Georgians of "creating ever new crisis situations" to divert attention from the country's problems.

The impact of a suspension in travel between the countries — and how long it might last — remained unclear. A spokeswoman for Aeroflot, the Russian state-controlled airline, said that Monday night's flight to Tbilisi had been canceled. The chief of Russia's railroads said it would cancel an order for spare parts from Georgia.

Russia has already severely dented Georgia's economy by imposing a ban, ostensibly for health concerns, on wine and mineral water — two of Georgia's most significant exports.

In his appearance with reporters on Monday, Mr. Saakashvili repeatedly referred to what he called "freedom wine," vowing that Georgia would be undeterred by Russian economic or diplomatic pressure.

DOJ_NMG_0073532

Russian 'Spies' Freed, But Moscow Vengeful Georgia Faces Sanctions For Arrests (WT/AP)

By Misha Dzhindzhikhashvili

The Washington Times, October 3, 2006

TBILISI, Georgia -- Georgia released four Russian officers whose arrest on spying charges angered its giant northern neighbor, but a vengeful Russia pushed ahead yesterday with punitive sanctions aimed at dealing a painful blow to the economically struggling Caucasus nation.

Georgia's agreement to release the men -- even as it reaffirmed the spying accusations against them -- appeared to be a capitulation that underscored its vulnerability.

The tension reflected Moscow's difficult relations with Georgia, which has defied President Vladimir Putin with a pro-Western stance, hosts unwanted Russian troops on its soil and is facing two Russian-backed separatist movements that could flare up in renewed violence.

Infuriated by Wednesday's arrests, Russia put its troops in Georgia on high alert, recalled its ambassador and evacuated its citizens. And even though Georgian officials announced early yesterday that the officers would be handed over to the Organization for Security and Cooperation in Europe and sent home, Russia's transport and communications ministries declared that all air, road, rail, sea and postal links with Georgia would be suspended starting today.

In a potentially even more crippling blow, Russian lawmakers scheduled debate this week on a bill that could bar Georgians living in Russia from cabling money home. Russian officials say about 300,000 Georgians live in Russia; some estimates put the number far higher -- at about 1 million. Georgia's population is 4.7 million.

Russia's lower house speaker, Boris Gryzlov, said yesterday that Georgians living in Russia send home an estimated $1 billion a year. In June, Mr. Putin put the amount at $1.5 billion to $2 billion annually -- an amount comparable to Georgia's state budget.

Yesterday's sanctions follow a government session at which Mr. Putin denounced the arrests as "state terrorism involving hostage-taking" and ordered top Cabinet members to draw up retaliatory measures. "These people think that under the roof of their foreign sponsors they can feel comfortable and secure. Is it really so?" Mr. Putin questioned ominously.

Russia's chilly relations with Georgia have worsened steadily since President Mikhail Saakashvili came to power after Georgia's 2003 "Rose Revolution," vowing to take the country out of Russia's orbit, bring breakaway provinces back into fold and join NATO in 2008.

The Kremlin said Mr. Putin discussed the situations in both Georgia and Iran with President Bush in a phone conversation yesterday.

Mr. Putin underlined "the unacceptability and danger of any actions by third nations that could be interpreted by the Georgian leadership as an encouragement of its destructive policy," the Kremlin said in an apparent reference to U.S. support for Mr. Saakashvili's government.

Russia last week tried to exert international pressure on Georgia by proposing a U.N. Security Council statement expressing grave concern at Tbilisi's actions. But the United States balked -- adding to Russian suspicions that it was behind the latest tensions.

Enough Bullying (WP)

The Washington Post, October 3, 2006

RUSSIAN PRESIDENT Vladimir Putin has never fully accepted the breakup of the Soviet Union, which he once called "the greatest catastrophe of the 20th century." Having consolidated power in Moscow by dismantling his country's nascent democracy, he has devoted himself in recent years to reestablishing the Kremlin's political and economic dominion over former Soviet republics that became independent in 1991. One particular target is the small Caucasian state of Georgia, which has infuriated Mr. Putin by embracing liberal democracy and turning toward the West.

A Russian attempt to strangle Georgia has been slowly escalating. Moscow banned Georgia's principal exports in March and has been encouraging two separatist regions, protecting their rebel regimes with troops and granting Russian citizenship to many of their residents. Last winter Georgia's natural gas supplies, which come from Russia, were disrupted for weeks by sabotage of pipelines.

DOJ_NMG_0073533

Now comes a new escalation: Last week the Georgian government announced that it caught a number of Russian army officers based in Georgia engaging in blatant espionage activities. When it arrested four of them, Mr. Putin seized the occasion to withdraw his ambassador and many other diplomats. He also closed air, sea and land links between the two countries and suspended the issuance of visas. His rubber-stamp parliament is taking steps to block remittances by the hundreds of thousands of Georgian workers in Russia.

Yesterday, pressed by the Bush administration, Georgia allowed the Russian officers to return home. But Russia continued its bellicose acts, while improbably claiming that it -- and not the poor nation of 5 million it is besieging -- is the victim of aggression. In a telephone conversation, Mr. Putin told President Bush that "it was unacceptable for other countries to take steps that Georgia could interpret as support," according to the Russian news agency RIA Novosti.

Mr. Bush ought to reject that imperious warning. U.S. diplomats in fact have spent the past several days urging compromise and caution on the part of Georgia's sometimes impulsive president, Mikheil Saakashvili. But the United States has not only the right but also the duty to support Georgia's independence and Mr. Saakashvili's aspirations to consolidate liberal democracy and steer his country toward membership in NATO. As the Georgian president rightly said yesterday, "The message to Russia is: 'Enough is enough.' "

S. Korean Strongly Backed To Lead U.N. (WP)

By Colum Lynch

The Washington Post, October 3, 2006

UNITED NATIONS, Oct. 2 -- The U.N. Security Council's five permanent members on Monday unanimously backed South Korean Foreign Minister Ban Ki Moon's bid to become the United Nations' next secretary general, making it likely he will be endorsed next week by the 15-nation council as the world's top diplomat.

The Korean diplomat secured 14 votes in favor of his candidacy, including from all of the council's five veto-wielding powers -- the United States, China, Russia, France and Britain. Only one non-permanent council member, voting anonymously, expressed no opinion.

Key senior council members said it is all but certain that Ban will become the eighth secretary general, replacing Kofi Annan of Ghana when he steps down at the end of December.

But the council decided to wait until Oct. 9 to formally recommend Ban's candidacy to the 192-member General Assembly so that his competitors can withdraw from the race. The General Assembly has never rejected the council's nominee.

"It is quite clear from today's vote that Minister Ban Ki Moon is the candidate the Security Council will recommend" to the General Assembly, China's U.N. ambassador, Wang Guangya, told reporters.

Ban would take charge of an organization with a budget of more than $5 billion a year and operations in virtually every corner of the world, including a peacekeeping army of more than 70,000 "Blue Helmets."

Ban's selection would place a seasoned, cautious diplomat in the job of restoring public confidence in an organization that has been buffeted by political divisions over the U.S.-led war in Iraq, U.N. mismanagement of the oil-for-food program and a series of sexual-misconduct scandals in U.N. peacekeeping operations.

During his campaign, the Korean diplomat has pledged to play a role in smoothing differences between the developing world and the United States and other Western powers, which have clashed over U.N. reform priorities.

He vowed to pursue some key objectives of the United States, a close military and political ally of South Korea, saying reform of the United Nations' management and financial practices would be his "job number one." He also intends to play a more active role than Annan in urging North Korea to scrap its nuclear weapons program.

"We are very pleased with the outcome here, very pleased," said John R. Bolton, the U.S. ambassador to the United Nations, after the vote. Bolton said he could not "rule out the possibility" that a new candidate might enter the race to mount a final challenge to Ban. But, he added: "I don't think there's much doubt what the outcome is at this point."

DOJ_NMG_0073534

Some of Ban's rivals had privately complained that the South Korean government ran a costly political campaign, involving trade deals and pledges of aid for Security Council members, to secure Ban's victory.

But some of Ban's competitors rallied behind the Korean diplomat.

Shashi Tharoor of India, who placed second in today's ballot, conceded defeat after the vote, saying that he had written Ban to congratulate him on his victory. "It is clear that he will be our next secretary general."

"It is a great honor and a huge responsibility to be secretary general, and I wish Mr. Ban every success in that task," Tharoor said. "The U.N., and the world, has a stake in his success."

The emergence of Ban as the likely new U.N. leader ended a rare public campaign for a post that has been traditionally selected in secrecy by the world's major powers. But the campaign followed past practices of limiting the field of viable candidates to a single region, in this case Asia.

Although one candidate hailed from outside the region, Latvian President Vaira Vike-Freiberga, China made it clear that it would block any non-Asian candidate from reaching the top job.

China's U.N. envoy said his government is confident in Ban. "I think that he is experienced. He's low-key but very firm, and he's decisive," Wang said.

Council Backs South Korean For U.N. Secretary General (NYT)

By Warren Hoge

The New York Times, October 3, 2006

UNITED NATIONS, Oct. 2 — Ban Ki-moon, the foreign minister of South Korea, on Monday virtually assured his selection as the next secretary general of the United Nations, winning overwhelming support in a final informal poll of the Security Council.

The Council scheduled a formal vote for next Monday to make its verdict official, which should lead to Mr. Ban's being elevated to the position of the world's most important international civil servant on Jan. 1.

Secretary General Kofi Annan is to step down Dec. 31 after two five-year terms, and under United Nations procedures, the 15-member Council selects one name and sends it to the 192-member General Assembly for appointment.

Mr. Ban nailed down his selection by winning his fourth straight informal poll, this one with a different colored ballot for the five veto-bearing members — Britain, China, France, Russia and the United States — to show whether any of them were opposed.

In a contest in which the ambassadors had the options of voting "encourage," "discourage" or "no opinion," Mr. Ban won 14 positive votes, no negatives and one "no opinion," from one of the 10 rotating members.

There were objections from permanent members — signaling potential vetoes — against all five of the other active candidates. (One had withdrawn.)

Mr. Ban will inherit the leadership of a global organization with 9,000 workers, a $5 billion annual budget and tasks ranging from education, health care and emergency assistance to areas hit by natural disaster, to peacekeeping in nations emerging from conflicts.

He will also take over at a moment when the United Nations has been shaken by management lapses and scandals, and faces continuing demands to overhaul its procedures. At the same time, it is a moment when the United Nations finds itself back at the center of many of the world's most intractable problems in places like Lebanon, Sudan, Iran, Kosovo and North Korea.

Mr. Ban has said he will devote particular attention to efforts to broker a settlement in the Middle East.

Mr. Ban, 62, is a soft-spoken man who in six months of campaigning around the world has had to learn the Western art of self-promotion after early audiences complained they found his laid-back presentation underwhelming. He still frequently cites his own "humility" in exercising responsibility, but argues that it is an asset that should not be confused with indecisiveness.

In response to concerns about whether he has the strength and presence to be secretary general, he has pointed to his leadership in the weighty and delicate talks aimed at ending the nuclear standoff with North Korea.

Mr. Ban is familiar with the United Nations, where he served as first secretary at the South Korean mission from 1974 to 1978 and was chief assistant to Han Seung-soo, president of the General Assembly in 2001. He has also served as director of the United Nations division at the South Korean Foreign Ministry.

DOJ_NMG_0073535

His selection will carry great resonance in South Korea, a country created by the United Nations in 1948 and defended by United Nations-authorized troops in the Korean War.

In his lifetime, South Korea has been a model for development, transformed from a war-torn impoverished country into one of the world's wealthiest.

As a foreign service officer for three decades, Mr. Ban has been a top official in the Korean Embassy in New Delhi and ambassador to Austria. He became foreign minister in January 2004.

He says he first dreamed of becoming a diplomat when, as an 18-year-old student visiting Washington in 1962, he met President Kennedy at the White House.

Mr. Ban has had extensive contact with the United States and is considered politically close to Washington. John R. Bolton, the American ambassador, said after the vote, "The United States is very pleased with the outcome."

Six of the seven candidates were Asian in a year seen as Asia's turn at the top job. The last Asian secretary general was U Thant of Burma, who left office in 1971.

As in the previous three votes, the second finisher on Monday was an Indian, Shashi Tharoor, 50, the under secretary general for public information. He received 10 positives, 3 negatives and 2 "no opinion" votes.

The next four, who trailed far behind, were Vaira Vike-Freiberga, 68, the president of Latvia, the only woman and non-Asian in the race; Ashraf Ghani, 57, a former finance minister of Afghanistan and current chancellor of Kabul University; Surakiart Sathirathai, 47, the deputy to Thaksin Shinawatra, the prime minister of Thailand who was deposed in a military coup last month; and Prince Zeid al-Hussein, 42, Jordan's ambassador to the United Nations.

Jayantha Dhanapala, 67, of Sri Lanka, a former under secretary general for disarmament, withdrew Friday after drawing only three positive votes in the third balloting.

South Korea's Ban Wins Support From Major Powers To Head U.N. (WSJ)

By Evan Ramstad, South Korea And Neil King Jr.

The Wall Street Journal, October 3, 2006

South Korean Foreign Minister Ban Ki Moon won the decisive support of the U.S. and other major powers to head the United Nations during a time of mounting challenges and upheaval within the world body.

The straw-poll vote yesterday effectively seals Mr. Ban's bid to succeed the departing Kofi Annan, of Ghana, who became U.N. secretary-general in 1997. The five veto-wielding Security Council members -- the U.S., France, Britain, China and Russia -- all voted to support Mr. Ban's candidacy, which the South Korean government actively promoted, over rivals from India, Jordan, Thailand, Latvia and Afghanistan. An official vote, followed by General Assembly approval, is expected later this month.

Mr. Ban, 62 years old, will face an array of challenges, from the need to gut and remodel the U.N.'s 38-story New York headquarters to efforts to get a U.N. peacekeeping force into the Darfur region of Sudan. The U.N. has become a forum for tackling many of the world's most-pressing crises, including efforts to mediate in Lebanon and to corral the nuclear ambitions of North Korea and Iran.

The U.N. also has drawn criticism: The developing world is seeking more influence within the Security Council, while many lawmakers in Washington see the organization as toothless and indecisive.

U.S. officials said they hope the soft-spoken Mr. Ban will push a range of internal U.N. reforms begun by Mr. Annan while eschewing the high-profile role of world diplomat that he pursued. South Korea is traditionally an ally of the U.S., though Seoul has recently leaned toward China amid booming economic ties and shared views on some issues. Having Mr. Ban at the U.N. could improve Washington's ties with Seoul while helping the U.S. in at least some of its overhaul goals for the U.N.

After the balloting, the U.S. ambassador to the U.N., John Bolton, said "the United States is very pleased with the outcome of the vote."

Mr. Ban's views on North Korea may be at odds with the U.S. government's desire for a tough response to Pyongyang's nuclear-weapons ambitions. Mr. Ban, who became foreign minister in 2004, supports Seoul's view that talking to North Korean leaders and offering economic incentives to encourage change is preferable to threats and sanctions.

DOJ_NMG_0073536

Last year, he often represented South Korea in the six-nation discussions over North Korea's nuclear-weapons program. Those talks produced a tentative agreement for North Korea to suspend further development in return for economic aid. But Pyongyang later balked at the deal. North Korea's decision to test-fire seven missiles in July prompted the U.N. Security Council to adopt a resolution sanctioning Pyongyang.

Mr. Ban hasn't detailed publicly his thoughts about how to run the U.N., but he has expressed support for change at the international body. In a May speech, he described the U.N. as "overstretched and fatigued" and argued that it should focus more on "delivering results in the hundreds of pressing items already on its agenda" and not "identifying new frontiers to conquer."

ISSUE BRIEFING

• South Korea's Ban leads1 the pack for U.N. secretary-general, but the race isn't over.

Mr. Ban has said he believes the U.N. is facing a critical test to keep multilateralism relevant. A sluggish bureaucracy and scandals over contracting have hurt the organization's reputation. Mr. Ban said he may apply lessons learned while heading South Korea's foreign ministry, where he implemented performance-based criteria for jobs and promotions to replace a tenure-based system.

Mr. Ban is a longtime diplomat whose background reflects a deep belief in the U.N.'s mission. In the early 1950s, dozens of countries, led by the U.S., fought under the U.N. umbrella alongside South Korea against the communist North in the Korean War. After the war, the U.N. and U.S. coordinated the rebuilding of the country.

South Korean President Roh Moo Hyun urged Mr. Ban to run for the post, and many prominent South Koreans threw their support behind his bid.

South Korean Set To Succeed Annan At UN (FT)

By Mark Turner In New York

Financial Times, October 3, 2006

Ban Ki-moon, the South Korean foreign minister, emerged as almost certain to become the United Nations' next secretary general after winning close to unanimous support in the Security Council.

In what is now expected to be the Council's last straw poll, which for the first time differentiated between the five veto-wielding powers and the 10 elected members, Mr Ban won 14 'encouragements', and one 'no opinion', with all permanent members in favour.

His closest competitor, India's Shashi Tharoor, won 10 votes of encouragement and three votes against, including one veto, and on Monday evening conceded his race was over. The remaining candidates trailed far behind.

"It is clear he [Mr Ban] will be our next secretary general," said Mr Tharoor after the vote. "The United Nations and the world has a stake in his success."

He said he would return to his post as the UN's information chief, although adding that he considered "all options" open for his future.

Security Council ambassadors said they expected to hold a formal vote on Monday, and while it was theoretically conceivable that another candidate could still step forward, they said that was highly unlikely at this late stage.

John Bolton, the US ambassador to the UN, declared he was "very pleased with the outcome", and thought there was not "much doubt" as to the final result. Kenzo Oshima, the Japanese ambassador, said there was a sense that "on the basis of today's [Monday's] ballot, the council is now ready."

"On Monday we will be in a position to make a recommendation," said Emyr Jones Parry, the British ambassador, referring to the formal process whereby the UN General Assembly is asked to rubber-stamp the outcome.

Some countries not on the Security Council, including Canada, had championed greater input from the assembly, including the possibility that it be given more than one candidate to choose from, but their proposals were rejected.

Mr Ban's campaign, which began eight months ago, is likely to be studied closely by future aspirants for the post. His speeches focused on the need for UN reform, but studiously avoided any controversy – winning him few admirers in the media, or even amongst diplomats.

DOJ_NMG_0073537

Until around a month ago, there had been a sense that another candidate would emerge and win, but Mr Ban surprised everyone by garnering widespread support in two undifferentiated straw polls.

When asked if the Korean represented a lowest common denominator outcome, Wang Guangya, China's ambassador to the UN, called him "low key but very firm. He's decisive. Sometimes Asians show their quality in a different way."

Ban Ki-Moon Cements Hold On U.N. Post (AP)

By Nick Wadhams, Associated Press Writer

AP, October 3, 2006

South Korea's foreign minister cemented his position as the near-certain successor to U.N. Secretary-General Kofi Annan on Monday, the only one of six candidates to escape a veto in an informal Security Council ballot.

The Security Council was expected to hold a formal vote to pick the eighth secretary-general in the United Nations' 60-year history on Oct. 9, making Ban Ki-Moon's appointment almost assured. The 192-nation General Assembly must approve the council's recommendation, and traditionally does so without protest.

"It is quite clear that from today's straw poll that Minister Ban Ki-Moon is the candidate that the Security Council will recommend to the General Assembly," China's U.N. Ambassador Wang Guangya said.

While the informal poll is nonbinding and the results could change, diplomats and candidates left little doubt that Ban would win. Soon after the results became known, India's Shashi Tharoor, the U.N. undersecretary-general for public information, announced he was leaving the race even though he placed second to Ban in all four of the informal polls.

"It is clear that he will be our next secretary-general," Tharoor said.

If Ban does indeed win the race, his selection will have been marked by unprecedented speed, consensus and calm. In the past, U.N. chiefs have often been elected as time runs out, after heated negotiations and numerous rounds of voting.

Annan himself was a compromise candidate in 1996 who emerged late and only after the United States blocked Boutros Boutros-Ghali's bid for a second term. Annan's example also shows how unpredictable the process can be: during informal polling at the time, France consistently vetoed him before changing its vote at the last minute.

In Monday's poll, the 15 council nations checked one of three boxes for each candidate in the secret ballot: "Encourage," "discourage," and "no opinion." For the first time, the five permanent members of the council — Britain, China, France, Russia and the United States — were given blue ballots to show the candidates if they could escape a veto.

According to the results, Ban received 14 votes in favor and a white "no opinion" ballot cast by one of the 10 rotating members of the council. Every other candidate received at least one no vote from a veto-wielding member.

Tharoor received 10 favorable votes and three against. One of those negative votes was a veto. Latvia's President Vaira Vike-Freiberga was next with five in favor, six against — including two vetoes — and four undecided votes.

Thailand's Deputy Prime Minister Surakiart Sathirathai, who was the first to announce his candidacy last year, and former Afghan Finance Minister Ashraf Ghani each received four votes in favor. But Ghani had 11 votes against him including three vetoes, and Surakiart had seven no-votes, among them two vetoes.

The last candidate, Jordan's U.N. Ambassador Prince Zeid al Hussein, had only two votes in favor and eight against, with one veto.

Bolton said the council would meet on Oct. 9 to hold its formal vote, while Japan's U.N. Ambassador Kenzo Oshima, president of the Security Council for October, said that was the likely date.

Bolton said he'd wanted the vote by the end of the week, but agreed to delay so candidates could decide to drop out and new ones could come forward.

But the council wants the process finished by the end of October, and Bolton suggested there wasn't enough time.

"New candidates still have the option of coming forward, but we've been waiting for new candidates and I don't know of any, there's no speculation of any," Bolton said. "I'd be surprised if new candidates came forward."

Associated Press reporter Paul Burkhardt contributed to this story.

Korean Wins A Final Poll For U.N. Chief (WT)

By Betsy Pisik

DOJ_NMG_0073538

The Washington Times, October 3, 2006

NEW YORK -- The Security Council is poised to select South Korean Foreign Minister Ban Ki-moon as the next U.N. secretary-general as soon as Monday, after his fourth consecutive strong showing in a straw poll yesterday.

Fourteen council members yesterday endorsed his candidacy in principle, while one unnamed nation offered "no opinion."

The vote is likely to take place Monday, council diplomats said yesterday.

"We have a lot of respect for Foreign Minister Ban," said U.S. Ambassador John R. Bolton after yesterday afternoon's poll. "We know him well from his service in Washington and think very highly of him professionally and personally."

"I can say the United States is very pleased with the outcome of the vote," Mr. Bolton added.

The poll yesterday was the fifth in the council and the first to reveal which of the five permanent members cast "discourage" votes -- a situation that could turn into a veto.

After the poll, U.N. communications chief Shashi Tharoor, who placed second, dropped out of the race.

"It is clear that he will be our next secretary-general," Mr. Tharoor told reporters. "It is a great honor, and I wish Mr. Ban every success in that task."

Mr. Tharoor received 10 "encourage" votes yesterday, but one of the three negative votes was cast by a permanent member.

Latvian President Vaira Vike-Freiberga placed third with five encouragements, but two of the six negative votes were cast by permanent members -- most probably China and Russia.

Former Thai Deputy Foreign Minister Surakiart Sathirathai and former Afghan Finance Minister Ashraf Ghani won four "encourage" votes each.

The first and last candidates to declare their intentions were opposed by permanent members. Jordanian newcomer Prince Zeid Ra'ad Zeid al Hussein won two favorable votes yesterday. Sri Lankan diplomat Jayantha Dhanapala withdrew over the weekend.

While ambassadors were inside with their paper ballots -- white for elected members, blue for permanent -- reporters and envoys gathered in the corridor outside, talking and making informal wagers.

When diplomats emerged from the chambers, they were gently besieged as the news of the tally filtered out.

"I believe among the five-six Asian candidates, each had advantages," said Chinese Ambassador Wang Guangya. But Mr. Ban, he said, has experience.

"He is low-key but firm, and he is decisive," Mr. Wang told reporters. "Sometimes the Asians show their qualities in a different way. I do hope he will be a good candidate for the job of the secretary-general."

Mr. Ban, who is in Seoul this week, was informed of the results by Japanese Ambassador Kenzo Oshima, president of the council for October.

South Korea's minister of foreign affairs and trade since 2004, Mr. Ban, 62, appears to be more of a consensus candidate than a passionate first choice. He speaks French and English as well as Korean, and is well-known to most of the key foreign ministries on the council and in the United Nations.

In a recent interview with reporters and editors of The Washington Times, Mr. Ban vowed that reforming the almost 61-year-old organization would be one of his priorities.

"The U.N. needs to be changed, to be more effective in taking on these challenges and agendas," he said.

"The U.N. Secretariat must be changed and reformed. It needs to be reborn, so that it is more effective, more efficient and more relevant. It must regain the trust of the major stakeholders," he added.

"Unfortunately, the U.N. has been somewhat discredited by scandals and the nonprofessional performance of its peacekeepers and other employees. The highest priority is to change the culture under which the Secretariat staff has been operating. The staff must be made more professional and more accountable," Mr. Ban said.

•David Sands contributed to this report from Washington

S. Korean Poised To Succeed Annan (LAT)

By Maggie Farley

The Los Angeles Times, October 3, 2006

UNITED NATIONS — South Korean Foreign Minister Ban Ki-moon is one step away from being named the U.N.'s next secretary-general, after winning the support of all five permanent Security Council members in an informal poll Monday.

Ban, 62, won the support of 14 of the Security Council's 15 members in a closed-door poll, with one nonpermanent member expressing "no opinion." The balloting was secret, but permanent members marked blue ballots to distinguish their votes. A rejection by a veto-holding nation — Britain, China, France, Russia or the United States — can be enough to end a candidacy.

"To the U.S. government, he is well known and highly respected," U.S. Ambassador John R. Bolton said after the Ban poll. "He has had extensive experience in bilateral and multilateral diplomacy and as foreign minister and an ally of the U.S."

The council will hold a formal ballot next Monday, and then the General Assembly must vote.

Secretary-General Kofi Annan, from Ghana, steps down Dec. 31 after two five-year terms. Annan has called the post "the world's most difficult job" and joked that "S.G." stands not just for secretary-general, but also for "scapegoat."

Ban would inherit a sprawling bureaucracy of 9,000 workers and a $5-billion budget, with aid agencies and 18 peacekeeping operations spanning the globe.

He said in an interview last week that he wanted "to make the U.N. relevant again," aware that its image had been damaged by scandals and management failures. He argued that the Security Council's role at the center of peace talks in the Middle East and negotiations in Iran, North Korea and Sudan demonstrated the U.N.'s crucial role in world affairs.

Ban, a career diplomat, has been posted to India, Washington and Austria. In 2001, he served as chief of staff to the U.N. General Assembly president. As South Korea's foreign minister, he has been involved in six-nation talks about North Korea's nuclear program, an issue he says he would like to be personally involved in if he becomes secretary-general.

A low-key, steady civil servant, he is a self-described "consensus-builder" and is aware that some people say he lacks charisma. But he believes that working quietly behind the scenes is the best way to craft an agreement.

Chinese Ambassador Wang Guangya agrees.

"I think that he is an experienced one — he is low-key but very firm. He is decisive," Wang said Monday.

Ban, who has been careful not to alienate Security Council members, has taken up the call for reform of the United Nations, a popular stance.

"The organization suffers from a chronic weakness: its inability to set priorities and make choices," he said last week at a forum in New York. "The U.N. needs to promise less and deliver more."

The selection of the secretary-general has been criticized as secretive and unfair, with the Security Council's five permanent members largely responsible for selecting the world's top diplomat. The ideal candidate, said Brian Urquhart, a former undersecretary-general, is someone strong enough to clean up the organization but not challenge the permanent members.

This year's process was more public than usual, with candidates scattering across the globe in informal campaigning. But it also invited more scrutiny than most candidates are comfortable with. Ban, with clear discomfort, had to justify generous aid grants he dispensed to a few Security Council member countries that he visited as Seoul's minister of foreign affairs and trade.

Ban was the only candidate who did not receive any "discouragements," the equivalent of a veto in the informal poll.

Undersecretary-General Shashi Tharoor, 50, of India finished second and withdrew from the race.

"It is clear he will be the next secretary-general," Tharoor said in his concession speech, referring to Ban.

The rest of the candidates received support from less than half of the Security Council. They were Latvian President Vaira Vike-Freiberga; Thai Deputy Prime Minister Surakiart Sathirathai; Prince Zeid Raad Hussein, Jordan's ambassador to the U.N.; and Afghanistan's former Finance Minister Ashraf Ghani.

Jayantha Dhanapala, a U.N. expert on nonproliferation from Sri Lanka, withdrew from the race Friday.

The Quiet Diplomat Who May Lead The UN (CSM)

By Donald Kirk

The Christian Science Monitor, October 3, 2006

DOJ_NMG_0073540

SEOUL

The diplomat in the lead to head the UN for the next decade is skilled in compromise - exhibiting a deliberately bland style that was expected to stand him in good stead during a UN Security Council poll Monday over a successor to Secretary-General Kofi Annan.

The candidacy of South Korean Foreign Minister Ban Ki-Moon hinges on the five permanent members: the US, Britain, France, China, and Russia. While the outcome is still uncertain, the soft-spoken career diplomat is the only one of the current candidates who has the minimum of nine positive votes.

Mr. Ban has the support of the US, which wants the process wrapped up this month, and China is expected to give Ban the nod. Indeed, Ban's most saleable quality is his ability to get along with all sides, building consensus in the process. Ban's evenhanded approach, analysts say, may be what's needed to bring a semblance of harmony and cohesion among UN members.

"He's extremely nonpolitical," says Moon Jong In, professor of international relations at Yonsei University in Seoul. "He's willing to listen to anybody. He doesn't have charismatic leadership - he has consensual leadership."

Conservatives, while highly critical of the left-leaning government of President Roh Moo Hyun, agree. "At least he hasn't done any harm as foreign minister," says a retired business consultant here. "Conservatives like him. It would be a great thing if he became secretary-general."

In his 36-year career, Ban has proven the ultimate diplomat while treading gingerly as foreign minister for the past 32 months through the minefield of US-South Korean relations and North Korea's refusal to return to nuclear talks for nearly a year.

In fact, Han Song Ryol, North Korea's deputy permanent representative to the UN, told the leftist newspaper Hangyoreh that acceptance of Ban as Mr. Annan's successor would be "good for the Korean people" and that "nonaligned nations have a good feeling about him."

In a poll last week, Ban got 13 votes of "encouragement" against only one of "discouragement" and one giving "no opinion." Since the five permanent members have the power of veto, the "no opinion" vote," if cast by one of them, would knock him out of the race even before the General Assembly of all 192 members casts a binding vote on the Security Council's choice.

Ban has said with characteristic sangfroid that he's "reasonably confident" the five permanent members are on his side. That coolly stated view masks the intensity of a carefully modulated campaign in which he has often appeared to be emulating Annan's style.

Hosting Annan last May, Ban took turns with the secretary-general in pressing for North Korea to give up its nuclear weapons. But they quietly made plain that they did not agree with the US emphasis on the North's human rights or counterfeiting efforts, saying that nuclear weapons took top "priority."

The real issue may be whether Ban will be able to take a strong stand when countries and causes are at severe odds, as in the Middle East, and whether he will have the stamina to promote long-overdue reforms in the UN's bureaucracy. "I'm worried he might be too willing to compromise, says Park Nei Hei, a consultant to the Boston Consulting Group here. "His character may not be very effective."

Nonetheless, Ban endorsed the UN Security Council Resolution, adopted after North Korea test-fired seven missiles in early July, banning member nations from any trade or financial dealings that might support North Korea's missile program. But he opposed US pressure for widening existing sanctions.

Still, he then persuaded South Korea's President Roh to sublimate his distaste for the "tough" US policy and join President Bush last month in Washington in a call for a "broad comprehensive" approach to bring North Korea back to talks.

Ban avoids the North's human rights record, saying that severe criticism would only make matters worse. Still, in an address before the UN General Assembly on Sept. 24, he stated that his government supported "global action to strength the values of human rights and democracy."

Given his career path, Ban probably knows more about dealing with the UN than most of his competitors.

After graduating from top-ranked Seoul National University in 1970, he joined the foreign ministry's UN division, followed by a tour in the ministry's UN mission, and then the post of director of the UN mission. He also served in the Korean Embassy in Washington and, in 1985, picked up a master's degree from Harvard's Kennedy School of Government.

DOJ_NMG_0073541

Ban rose to ambassador when he was posted to Vienna, where he served in 1999 as chairman of the preparatory commission for the Comprehensive Nuclear Test Ban Treaty Organization. His experience broadened when he was named Korea's chief envoy to the UN in September 2001.

Ban rests his candidacy in part on his response in that challenging period. The ministry credits him with a "facilitating role in the prompt adoption by the membership of the first resolution of the session condemning the terrorist attacks," all "pivotal in turning a year that started out in crisis and confusion into one of the most productive and reform-oriented for the General Assembly."

For Koreans, the post of UN secretary-general is the ultimate status symbol. With the image factor clearly in mind, Ban has pulled out all the stops, courting Security Council members far and wide. And while Ban is sensitive to the need to get along with the US, he is striving, diplomatically, not to appear too close to Washington.

The US positions on peaceful resolution of the North's nuclear issue and denuclearization of the Korean peninsula were "very good ones, leaving room for future negotiations," he said, in the language of gentle diplomacy that's been his hallmark.

'If The U.N. Cannot Be Trusted With Money . . .' (WSJ)

By Bret Stephens

The Wall Street Journal, October 3, 2006

Few people are better qualified to run the United Nations than Ashraf Ghani. So it goes without saying that the former Afghan finance minister and current chancellor of Kabul University stands almost no chance of getting the job.

Instead, Kofi Annan's successor as secretary-general is likely to be South Korea's colorless foreign minister Ban Ki-Moon, who has the backing of the Bush administration and continues to run well ahead of other candidates in several Security Council straw polls. An Asian peer of Mr. Ban recently quipped that he'll be "more secretary than general"; his one recommendation is that he's probably less bad than runner-up Shashi Tharoor of India, a self-promoting U.N. bureaucrat who was among the most outspoken apologists of the Oil for Food program.

Still, it's worth considering Mr. Ghani's candidacy, partly because of what its probable failure says about the U.N., and partly because his prescriptions for the organization are worth heeding whoever wins the job. "The U.N. has not been managed," he says in a recent interview in New York. "If the U.N. cannot be trusted with money, it cannot be trusted with mandates."

Mr. Ghani -- 57, slight, balding, fluent in English, Dari and Pashtun and conversant in Urdu, Arabic and French -- knows whereof he speaks: He spent a decade at the World Bank helping old industrial behemoths in Russia become transparent, efficient and competitive, and another 30 months in Afghanistan building a finance ministry nearly from scratch. On his watch, Afghanistan enjoyed double-digit rates of economic growth; in 2003, Emerging Markets named him Asia's best finance minister. He's a believer in the power of audits and thinks the first priority of a secretary-general is to read and act on them. "Once the management issues are resolved you are free to focus on issues of peace and security. But the first task of diplomacy is to create trust."

Now there's an idea. Mr. Annan often speaks of the U.N.'s "unique legitimacy" as if it were the organization's birthright, which it enjoys by virtue of its nature as a global institution. Mr. Ghani seems to think the U.N.'s legitimacy is ultimately a function of its credibility -- of whether it can competently perform the tasks expected of it. But U.N. competence has not been much in evidence in recent years, or decades, which leads him to a second thought: "The U.N. is doing too many things," he says. "Its limits need to be clearly recognized."

What, for instance, is the point of UNCTAD -- the U.N. Conference on Trade and Development -- when there is already a World Trade Organization? What's the point of UNDESA -- the Department of Economic and Social Affairs -- when there are already the World Bank and International Monetary Fund? And just what value-added is being provided by the U.N.'s various development agencies? "Technical assistance has become the scandal of our times," says Mr. Ghani. "It has not resulted in the creation of local capabilities."

The argument here isn't exactly original (see William Easterly's "The White Man's Burden"), but it would be revolutionary coming from a U.N. secretary-general. For years, Mr. Annan and his deputies have scolded the Bush administration for not devoting enough of the U.S. budget to foreign aid. Along comes Mr. Ghani to say: Don't bother, the additional money would probably be squandered. Instead, his focus is on what developing countries can and should do for themselves, using the example of one of his Afghan employees who created a single treasury account for the entire government. "She did a job that hundreds of consultants wouldn't have been able to do," he says. "We created a reporting system that consistently allowed us to track income and expenditure." (By way of comparison, he points out that the Indonesian government maintains 60,000 separate accounts.)

DOJ_NMG_0073542

Mr. Ghani also dwells on two other causes rarely championed by Mr. Annan: prosperity and the rule of law. "Where the rule of law is weak," the Afghan says, "investors don't trust their money." Why should this matter to a U.N. secretary-general? "Participation in the global economy is an important avenue to solving conflicts," he answers. "The majority of people in the Middle East are under 20. How do we make them stakeholders in a globalizing world?"

Now compare this to something Mr. Annan said in 2002: "Economic growth, by itself, is not enough to respond to the problems of a world plagued by hunger, pollution and other ills." This is a cliché, of course, as, in its way, is Mr. Ghani's emphasis on better management, broader prosperity, and so on.

Yet not all clichés are created equal, and in a largely symbolic job it makes no small difference which ones are uttered. Is the U.N.'s meta-message charity or self-help? Diversity or merit? Stability or freedom? The catchphrases needn't be mutually exclusive, but they connote vastly different attitudes and priorities. A secretary-general who made self-help, merit and freedom the bywords of his decade would, even if he accomplished nothing else, change the image of the U.N. for the better.

Needless to say, that isn't going to happen. In yesterday's Security Council straw poll, Mr. Ghani took only four "encouragement" votes, almost certainly knocking him out of contention, while Mr. Ban got 14. The Times of London reports that this year Mr. Ban has pledged $18 million in aid to Tanzania -- currently a member of the Security Council -- and led a business delegation to Greece -- another current member -- and donated a grand piano to an Inca cultural center in Peru -- a third member -- and opened a Korean cultural center in Buenos Aires. Argentina, in case you hadn't guessed, is also on the Council.

The Korean government denies that it is trying to buy votes, which is possible. Then again, maybe Mr. Ban understands only too well what it takes to get ahead at the U.N. In that sense, and that sense alone, he demonstrates why he, and not Mr. Ghani, is Kofi Annan's fitting heir.

U.S. General Says Chávez Worries Region (NYT)

By Robert Pear

The New York Times, October 3, 2006

MANAGUA, Nicaragua, Oct. 2 — The commander of United States military activities in Latin America said Monday that Venezuela under President Hugo Chávez had become a destabilizing force, and that other countries in the Western hemisphere shared that concern.

The commander, Gen. Bantz J. Craddock of the Army, said, “What I have heard in the last few months is more concern by more countries” about an increase in Venezuela’s purchase of weapons, especially small arms.

United States officials said Venezuela had used its oil wealth to undermine democratic forces in other Latin American countries. “There’s a factor here that is destabilizing,” General Craddock said.

Defense Secretary Donald H. Rumsfeld and General Craddock were in Managua for a meeting of defense ministers from more than 30 countries in the hemisphere.

In recent months, Venezuela has bought AK-47 assault rifles and military helicopters from Russia and patrol boats from Spain.

General Craddock said he did not know the reason for the purchases. “I don’t have much military-to-military contact with Venezuela,” he said.

Asked about Venezuela’s recent call to form a military coalition in opposition to the United States, General Craddock said, “I don’t see any traction” for the proposal.

Delegates from Brazil and other countries said they “did not see a rationale or need” for such a coalition, General Craddock said.

DOJ_NMG_0073543

On Sunday, President Chávez said he had received warnings that the United States might be plotting to assassinate him. General Craddock responded: "That's mindless. That's far out. It's way over the top."

One reason for United States concern about Mr. Chávez is that he is supporting Washington's old cold war nemesis, Daniel Ortega, who is running for president of Nicaragua. Public opinion polls suggest that Mr. Ortega could return to power after the election on Nov. 5.

The commander in chief of the Nicaraguan Army, Gen. Omar Halleslevens, said Monday that the army would remain apolitical, regardless of who won the election.

General Halleslevens told American officials and journalists that the Nicaraguan Army was determined to stay out of politics. "We have a professional army that follows the Constitution and the law and will not be used for political or partisan purposes," he said.

General Craddock said he believed the assurances from the Nicaraguan commander.

In 1989, Nicaragua's army had more than 73,000 men. "That was an army that was created for war," General Halleslevens said, noting that the army now has 11,000 men.

The president of Nicaragua, Enrique Bolaños, said that his nation has had extensive experience removing land mines left from its civil war and that it was eager to share its expertise with other countries, like Afghanistan and Iraq.

General Craddock welcomed the offer, saying, "That's a distinct possibility."

Early Results Of Bosnia Vote Reinforce Ethnic Split (NYT)

By Nicholas Wood

The New York Times, October 3, 2006

SARAJEVO, Bosnia and Herzegovina, Oct. 2 — Bosnia's ethnic divisions seem most likely to become even more firmly entrenched, as partial results of national elections on Monday showed two parties with diametrically opposing views in the lead. The results could delay a move by the international authorities to end their oversight of the country.

After a campaign dominated by nationalist grandstanding, parties led by Haris Silajdzic, the Bosnian Muslim who was prime minister during the war fought from 1992 to 1995, and Milorad Dodik, the most prominent Bosnian Serb politician, were expected to dominate the country's main institutions. Complete results in the voting for the country's complex governing system were not expected until the end of the week.

During the election campaign, both men were criticized for increasing ethnic tensions as they outlined conflicting views of Bosnia's future.

Each man advocates a tough version of the policies generally supported by his ethnic group. Bosnian Muslims, the country's largest group, with some support from their Roman Catholic Croat allies, seek a more unified country. They want to carry out political and economic changes that will enable Bosnia to join the European Union.

But many Serbs still want the half of the country that they dominate to become independent.

Voters on Sunday were selecting members of Bosnia's three-member presidency, which includes one member from each of the three main ethnic groups, as well as members of a national Parliament and those of two substates — the Muslim-Croat federation and the Bosnian Serb Republic.

Representatives were also being selected for the federation's 10 cantons, which provide local health, education and police services. The complex layers of government were devised under the Dayton peace agreement, which helped bring an end to the war.

Mr. Silajdzic, of the Party for Bosnia and Herzegovina, won the Muslim presidency. Nebojsa Radmanovic, a member of Mr. Dodik's Alliance of Independent Social Democrats, won the Bosnian Serb seat. The competition between the main Bosnian Croat candidates was too close to call, with just 50 percent of votes counted by Monday afternoon. Mr. Silajdzic's and Mr. Dodik's parties were likely to hold the largest number of seats in the national Parliament.

International officials here worry that the strongly differing stances will set back progress on political changes to ease a transfer of power from foreign officials to local politicians.

DOJ_NMG_0073544

During the campaign, Mr. Silajdzic advocated the replacement of Bosnia's ethnically divided structures with a single centralized state. Mr. Dodik countered by saying any attempt to carry out such a plan would lead the Bosnian Serbs to hold a referendum on independence. Diplomats fear that such a development would ignite violence.

More than a decade after the end of the war that claimed about 100,000 lives from all sides, international officials still have a significant influence over the country's government.

Bosnia's most senior international official, the high representative — currently Christian Schwarz-Schilling of Germany — has the right to dismiss politicians and impose laws. In February, the mainly Western governments that oversee the high representative's office will review whether it should be closed by mid-2007 or extended. The European Union still has 6,000 peacekeepers in the country.

Mr. Silajdzic said Monday that he was determined to start work on creating a new Bosnia, in which institutions and politics were no longer based on ethnicity. "We have to transfer ourselves from a country based on ethnic rights to citizens' rights," he said in an interview. "What we have now is the result of genocide and a war of aggression, and it should be changed."

Mr. Dodik said the support for his party confirmed that Bosnian Serbs favor the federal structure, and he repeated warnings that "in the case that demands for abolishing the Serb Republic are repeated, demands for referendum will be raised again."

The European Union has told Bosnia that, in order to move toward possible membership, it must reform its Constitution to simplify its political structures and create a single national police force. Talks among Bosnia's political parties on both topics became deadlocked earlier this year.

Party's Scandals Catch Up To Brazil's President (WSJ)

By Matt Moffett And Geraldo Samor

The Wall Street Journal, October 3, 2006

RIO DE JANEIRO -- The last straw for Brazilian voters may have been the photos in Saturday's newspapers showing stacks of cash.

The police seizure of the money from operatives of the governing party capped a series of scandals in President Luiz Inácio Lula da Silva's administration that frustrated the president's chance to win re-election outright in Sunday's first round of balloting and set up a runoff for later this month against centrist Geraldo Alckmin.

Mr. da Silva, who had for months kept his own image unsullied by widespread fund-raising and payoff scandals in his Workers Party, in the end found himself dragged down by their cumulative weight even though he isn't facing charges. "The voters just got sick and tired of Lula saying he didn't know what was going on," says David Fleischer, who writes a political newsletter from Brasilia. "They saw the pictures of the money themselves."

Mr. da Silva outpolled Mr. Alckmin 48.6% to 41.6%. But the challenger has upward momentum and the remaining 10% of voters could go either way, likely setting the stage for a tight Oct. 29 runoff.

Mr. Alckmin, a former governor of wealthy São Paulo state, trailed Mr. da Silva in the polls by 17 points about two weeks ago. But he picked up ground quickly after the arrest of the Workers Party officials, who have been charged with planning to use $770,000 in cash to buy a dossier linking politicians in Mr. Alckmin's party to a kickback scam involving the procurement of ambulances.

In the first round, Mr. da Silva, a former union leader who is Brazil's first working-class president, tried to stay above the fray. He spurned debates with other candidates and campaigned mostly within his base of low-income voters, who rallied to the government's social programs and Mr. da Silva's common touch.

But Mr. da Silva won't have the luxury of playing it safe in the runoff. "Lula has suffered a shock and he's now facing a highly motivated candidate in what will be an intense race," says Cristiano Noronha, a political consultant.

The electorate is divided in its priorities. In a survey, consultant Antonio Lavareda found that 40% of respondents thought the government's focus should be on social programs, Mr. da Silva's hallmark. But 39% said they thought the government should emphasize anti-corruption measures, Mr. Alckmin's strong suit.

DOJ_NMG_0073545

Brazilian financial markets surged yesterday following Mr. Alckmin's unexpectedly strong performance. While the leftist Mr. da Silva has shown himself to be a fiscally responsible overseer of the economy, Mr. Alckmin is seen by investors as having a clearer agenda to shrink the state and stimulate growth.

Some analysts are viewing the election as a watershed, signaling a new determination on the part of Brazilians to hold their leaders accountable for corruption. Historically, Brazilians have tolerated graft as long as some services or public works were trickling down. The attitude was encapsulated in a famous slogan once used by a shady Brazilian politician: "Rouba, mas faz." He steals, but he gets things done.

But the rebuke to Mr. da Silva shows Brazilians' tolerance for corruption "is coming to an end," says Roberto da Matta, an anthropologist who is a professor emeritus at the University of Notre Dame in Indiana. "Lula, who was a political Robocop, has turned into a human. And Alckmin, who didn't have any charisma, now has a human face."

The disillusionment with Mr. da Silva was particularly marked among wealthier and middle-class voters in Brazil's more economically advanced south. In Rio de Janeiro's trendy Ipanema neighborhood on Sunday, some people walked around with black T-shirts reading: "Lula No. Down With Corruption."

To be sure, the anticorruption trend was less clear-cut in local congressional elections, where patronage politics is often the order of the day. Brazilians re-elected several congressmen who are under federal indictment for receiving payoffs from an alleged Workers Party slush fund. And the top vote-getter among São Paulo congressional candidates was Paulo Maluf, who is accused by federal prosecutors of racketeering, money laundering and corruption.

But in some other local races, voters made candidates pay for their sins. Only five of 50 Congress members involved in the ambulance scam won re-election. And former House Speaker Severino Cavalcanti, who resigned last year after being charged with taking kickbacks from a Congressional restaurateur, also lost his comeback bid.

A Message For Lula (LAT)

The Los Angeles Times, October 3, 2006

FINANCIAL MARKETS CHEERED the failure of Brazilian President Luiz Inacio Lula da Silva to win a majority of the vote in Sunday's election, and the U.S. State Department made some positive noises to the effect that the results demonstrated "the strength of democracy in the hemisphere." But Lula's sudden and surprising fall from grace isn't necessarily good news.

Though polls had long predicted Lula as the clear winner, he instead attracted only 48.6% of the vote, forcing an Oct. 29 runoff with rival Geraldo Alckmin, the former governor of Sao Paulo. Brazilian stock traders were pleased because Alckmin is more business-friendly than Lula and promises to lower the country's crushing tax burden, though he hasn't given many specifics on how to go about it. The benchmark Ibovespa index rose 2% Monday.

Lula's collapse can be traced to a scandal that emerged Sept. 15, when two men tied to his Workers' Party were arrested in what appeared to be a dirty-tricks campaign against political rivals. This followed years of vote-buying scandals, kickbacks and other corrupt dealings by party members and their associates. And though Lula has never been directly tied to any of them, he has also failed to clean house. He didn't help his own case by refusing to participate in a final televised debate among the presidential candidates.

Despite the setback, Lula is heavily favored to win the runoff, not least because Alckmin is nearly devoid of charisma; in a country fond of single names and nicknames, Alckmin is often called "xuxu," which is a flavorless Latin American squash. Yet with his political capital at an all-time low and with the number of friendly seats declining in Congress, Lula may find it very difficult to get much done in his second term.

Some might call that a bonus. Lula's embrace of orthodox economic policies has come as a relief to many investors in Brazil and beyond, but there's little evidence that he ever had any appetite for the reforms Brazil needs if it is to boost its relatively anemic 3% annual growth rate. Latin America's most populous nation suffers from a bloated state that gets in the way of private enterprise. Perhaps a chastened second-term Lula might be more amenable to working with the opposition to improve business conditions in the country.

On the global stage, Lula has been an authoritative voice for social justice, though at times he has been too quick to defer leadership of the Latin American left — oddly, given Brazil's size — to the buffoonish Venezuelan president, Hugo Chavez.

DOJ_NMG_0073546

Judging from Sunday's results, that deference may have diminished Lula's standing at home as well as abroad.

Riots Spread As Incumbent Widens Lead In Zambia Vote (NYT)

By Michael Wines

The New York Times, October 3, 2006

JOHANNESBURG, Oct. 2 — President Levy Mwanawasa of Zambia took an unexpectedly large lead Monday as vote-counting neared an end in the nation's presidential election and some supporters of his populist rival, Michael Sata, rioted for a second day.

Mr. Sata urged his followers to end the violence, but also accused Mr. Mwanawasa of stealing the election and promised "a big battle" against Mr. Mwanawasa's faction in Parliament. Mr. Sata said he would not contest the election results in court, but at the same time refused to formally concede the race. "How can I concede when I am complaining of votes being stolen?" he said.

With votes tallied in all but 15 of Zambia's 150 constituencies, Mr. Mwanawasa had captured 43 percent of the 2.52 million ballots counted, compared with 27 percent for Mr. Sata and 26 percent for Hakainde Hichilema, a businessman, the third major candidate.

The final total was delayed because impassable roads slowed the delivery of ballots from some rural provinces.

Mr. Sata complained that 400,000 votes in his strongholds, in urban areas like the copper-mining regions, were unaccounted for, and the national election commission said it was investigating the charge. European observers and local political analysts have said, however, that the election seemed relatively free of corruption. The largest independent newspaper, The Zambia Post, has reported that the results largely tracked its own surveys of voters leaving the polls.

Some analysts have said that Mr. Sata, 69, a former cabinet minister who promised to improve the lives of Zambia's poor, won over supporters in the capital, Lusaka, and other major cities, but that he did not campaign in rural areas where Mr. Mwanawasa was strong.

Near the end of the campaign, one opinion poll indicated that Mr. Sata was backed by 52 percent of Zambians, but political experts in Lusaka said that that result was clouded by the difficulty of taking accurate samples in a largely rural and poorly educated nation.

Mr. Sata's supporters began rioting in some Lusaka slums on Sunday when ballots from rural areas were counted and his early lead over Mr. Mwanawasa vanished. Mr. Mwanawasa accused his rivals in a national address on Sunday of resorting to violence in the face of defeat and promised a crackdown on lawbreakers, but the disorder continued Monday in Lusaka and spread to Kitwe, an industrial city in the copper-mining region in Zambia's north.

Mr. Sata appealed Monday for calm. "We are not going to do anything that will destroy Zambia," he said.

Japan's Abe Seeks Talks With China, South Korea (WP)

By Anthony Faiola

The Washington Post, October 3, 2006

TOKYO, Oct. 2 -- Seeking to mend Japan's deteriorating relations with its neighbors, Japanese officials on Monday said they were moving quickly to arrange summit meetings between freshly inaugurated Prime Minister Shinzo Abe and his counterparts in China and South Korea.

Officials here said specific dates were still under discussion and cautioned that negotiations with one or both nations might yet break down. But widespread Japanese media reports indicated that Abe was hoping to hold talks with Chinese President Hu Jintao on Sunday and to see South Korean President Roh Moo Hyun the next day.

Scoring such summits so early in his tenure would mark a symbolic breakthrough for Abe, 52, who succeeded Junichiro Koizumi as prime minister on Sept. 26. China and South Korea have boycotted top-level meetings with Japan since last year, citing Koizumi's annual visits to Tokyo's Yasukuni Shrine, which honors Japan's military dead, including convicted World War II criminals.

Japan's relations with both nations have also sharply deteriorated over territorial disputes. Tensions between China and Japan center on drilling rights in the East China Sea, an issue that has increasingly concerned the United States. Japan's schism with South Korea over disputed islets, meanwhile, has helped plunge relations between Washington's two most important allies in the region to their lowest point since the end of World War II.

DOJ_NMG_0073547

"I plan to develop forward-looking relations with our important neighbors, China and South Korea, by building mutual understanding through dialogue and cooperation in every possible level and area," Abe told reporters in Tokyo on Monday.

Analysts were quick to lower expectations for a long-term easing of tensions in the region -- largely because Abe's positions on the issues dividing Japan from its neighbors are at least as hard-line as Koizumi's.

Abe underscored his position on at least one issue Monday, telling parliament that he wished to continue to pray for Japan's war dead and revere their memories. He said he would refuse all comment on whether he intends to do that by visiting Yasukuni annually, as Koizumi did.

Abe is believed to have already made his own visit there last April, although he never publicly confirmed it. Regardless, analysts predict Abe will hold off on visiting the highly symbolic shrine until at least after Japan's key legislative elections in July, when his ruling Liberal Democratic Party must hold on to power for him to continue his premiership.

"For Abe, to have the summit meetings now and illustrate friendship between the countries, then win the July elections and visit Yasukuni later next year would be an ideal scenario," said Minoru Morita, a Tokyo-based political analyst. But China and South Korea "will face major embarrassment at home if that happens."

If Abe manages to meet with Hu and Roh, he'd have much to talk about. Among the issues for discussion might be Abe's support for new Japanese history textbooks, which have been denounced by Beijing and Seoul as whitewashing Japan's past aggression. His push to strengthen patriotism in Japanese classrooms and to rewrite Japan's pacifist constitution to allow for a greater role for the military have also made China and South Korea uneasy.

In April, South Korea dispatched a flotilla of warships to prevent a Japanese survey vessel from entering waters claimed by both nations. Japan and China have become bogged down in negotiations aimed at resolving an increasingly serious dispute over lucrative energy rights near islands called Senkaku in Japanese and Diaoyutai in Chinese. The Chinese have constructed drilling platforms that could tap resources claimed by the Japanese.

Snail Mail As Economy Zooms, India's Postmen Struggle To Adapt (WSJ)

By Eric Bellman

The Wall Street Journal, October 3, 2006

MUMBAI, India -- When Mumbai Region Postmaster General A.P. Srivastava joined the postal system 27 years ago, mailmen routinely hired extra laborers to help carry bulging gunnysacks of letters they took all day to deliver.

Today, private-sector couriers such as FedEx Corp. and United Parcel Service Inc. have grabbed more than half the delivery business nationwide. That means this city's thousands of postmen finish their rounds before lunch. Mr. Srivastava, who can't fire excess staffers, spends much of his time cooking up new schemes to keep his workers busy. He's ruled out selling onions at Mumbai post offices: too perishable. Instead, he's considering marketing hair oil and shampoo.

"We have to find new ways to generate revenues and use excess space and staff," sighs the 52-year-old Mr. Srivastava, sipping tea at his desk piled high with files waiting for his approval. "Laying people off isn't an option."

India's vast postal service, the world's largest, highlights a little-understood feature of this nation's economic transformation. While India often draws criticism for its failure to sell its vast network of state-owned companies, the government has quietly been opening many of its agencies to blistering competition from private-sector rivals.

But as India lets its public sector get squeezed, it faces a big dilemma: What to do with these often huge and politically connected organizations during the painful transition period where they have to become competitive and profitable or extinct?

Once the pride of India's civil service, India Post and its predecessor, the British East India Co., controlled most mail delivery for centuries. But since a reform-minded government started allowing more competition in the 1990s, more-efficient private couriers have eaten deeply into India Post's business.

Likewise, state-owned phone company Mahanagar Telephone Nigam Ltd. used to have a monopoly on much of the phone service in India. Today it is battling with an onslaught of internationally financed competitors that have driven the quality of service up and rates down on everything from local to long-distance to cellular service to Internet connections.

DOJ_NMG_0073548

State-run airlines Air India and Indian Airlines have been under attack for more than a decade and the industry has just become more competitive with six new carriers starting operations in the past two years. The banking sector is still dominated by the giant State Bank of India but the country's growing middle class is taking most of its business to the high-tech private banks, such as HDFC Bank Ltd. and ICICI Bank Ltd. leaving the state banks with the least-profitable businesses and worst borrowers.

Such competition from private business is helping to change the face of the Indian economy. The country is becoming a growing force in the global economy as reforms have unleashed the power of its one billion consumers. India's economy grew at a faster-than-expected 8.9% in the second quarter, nearly matching China's torrid pace.

But the shift toward the private sector has been a gradual process, made necessary by the political reality faced by a succession of unstable coalition governments. Today's Congress Party-led coalition depends on the support of communist parties, which oppose layoffs and privatizations. When the coalition first came to power in 2004 one of the first things it did was close the Disinvestment Ministry which oversaw privatizations.

In contrast, in the U.K., Margaret Thatcher -- one of the earliest promoters of privatization in her country -- was able to use her Conservative Party's strong control of Parliament to push though privatization. She closed down unprofitable organizations and auctioned off many of the U.K.'s largest state-owned companies in the 1980s despite violent strikes and opposition from the left.

In India, Mr. Srivastava's struggle to modernize Mumbai's post offices shows how efforts to reform state-run entities can be tripped up by a convoluted bureaucracy and populist politics. India Post is forced to maintain its 550,000 employees with full benefits and run a vast network of post offices, most of them unprofitable. What's more, politicians keep India Post from raising postal rates, so it loses money on almost every postcard and package it handles.

While India Post runs the largest postal network in the world with more than 155,000 branches, it's also one of the most inefficient. Each of the U.S. Postal Service's 700,000 employees handles more than 15 times as many pieces of mail a year on average as India Post workers. The U.S. service also makes money, reporting an operating profit of more than $1.5 billion last year, while India Post lost $300 million.

The British East India Co. established the first postal stations in Mumbai, the city formerly known as Bombay, in 1688 and in Calcutta (now known as Kolkata) in 1727. About 50 years later, it started regular service between the two cities using runners who carried spears with bells attached to ward off tigers.

Mr. Srivastava fondly recalls the days when the local post office was the only place people could mail a letter or package, or even make a phone call. He joined the postal system in 1979 partly because of its prestige and importance in Indian communities. In his first posting, as head of a post office in the northern state of Uttar Pradesh, Mr. Srivastava was given membership in the best clubs, invited to join a local education committee and was regularly paid visits by local politicians and business leaders: high status for a 27-year-old.

During the annual rush of mail during Diwali -- the festival of lights during which India's 800 million Hindus exchange cards and gifts -- Mr. Srivastava remembers having to use every inch of floor space to sort mail, "even in my office." There was then virtually no competition. When Mr. Srivastava once discovered that a clandestine private courier was transporting mail, he called the police and had the operation shut down.

Today, there are more than 2,000 private companies delivering documents and packages in India, ranging from tiny operations with a handful of men who make around $2 a day to big international players like FedEx. The industry generates $850 million a year in sales, according to estimates by the Express Industry Council of India, which represents private couriers. The market is so promising that in 2004 DHL Corp. decided to take over one of the leading domestic courier services for $160 million.

"The role of the post office was much more important in the lives of the people back" in the old days, says Mr. Srivastava wistfully. "Now, there are so many other opportunities that our service is not given the same respect."

Under pressure from the central government to pay its way, India Post has been forced to try an assortment of new businesses. The agency now sells the outsides of envelopes and mail boxes as advertising space. For the hundreds of millions of Indians without access to computers, the postal service will receive, print and deliver email to its destination by hand. And for the first time in India Post's long history, its local postmen have to pick up mail directly from homes.

DOJ_NMG_0073549

The post office is even outsourcing its postmen to phone and credit-card companies, who use them to confirm the home addresses of new customers. Mahanagar Telephone Nigam, one of India Post's clients, pays 30 rupees (about 64 cents) per confirmation. Other companies, including the Indian arms of Western Union Financial Services Inc. and General Electric Co., now pay India Post commissions to sell their loans and money-transfer services. Mr. Srivastava is even renting out the century-old domed General Post Office at night for movie shoots.

In a dusty corner of the cavernous Mumbai General Post Office, at the former domestic-parcels counter, Shyam Sundar Dhini was peddling cashews, herbal medicines and aloe vera gel. A "Happy New Year" sign hung on the wall above his makeshift shop despite its being September. "I have become a salesman instead of a postman," said Mr. Dhini, a 23-year postal veteran who isn't quite sure what aloe vera gel is used for. "I know everything about letters and stamps, but nothing about sales. No one wanted this job because this is not what postmen do."

Some postmen, who are now under pressure to learn new skills ranging from using a computer to how to accept mutual-fund applications, have been reluctant to adapt. "There is resistance from the staff, especially the older set," who have grumbled about the new chores, concedes Mr. Srivastava. "But if they do not do these other activities they will not have a job to do."

Still, the postal union has repeatedly threatened to strike to block plans to reduce the post office's losses by redeploying its staffers on nonpostal jobs. "We will work hard, but we don't want more work," declares Arvind Y. Salvi secretary for the National Union of Postal Employees in Mumbai. Since the neighborhood postman is the government employee closest to the average citizen, Mr. Salvi says any government that causes them to strike risks losing votes. Few politicians are willing to take that risk.

Postal workers also grouse that they haven't been properly trained to do the new jobs being foisted upon them or given the facilities needed to carry out nonpostal assignments. Mr. Salvi's post office at a busy Mumbai intersection illustrates the problem. Like most such offices in India, it's cramped and dirty and hasn't changed much for decades. Next to his desk is a huge old safe with a skeleton key. Nearby is a roaring gas stove, which is used to melt the plastic to seal registered letters. Following a colonial-era procedure, each registered letter is tied by hand with brown twine, which is then glued to the envelopes with six blobs of plastic, each stamped with the official postal seal.

Two computers, delivered a year ago from the regional headquarters, sit next to the stove, but have never been deployed because no one knows how to use them. "They called employees in one Sunday and taught us for five hours saying 'This is a computer, push this key, push that key' but that's not enough," says Mr. Salvi. "The postmen don't even know what email is."

Motivating demoralized postal workers is tough. A mid-level manager at India Post, for example, makes about $500 a month, roughly one-third the salary of a manager at an international courier in India. Rigid bureaucratic wage scales dictate salaries and restrict bonuses, making it almost impossible for the post office to offer incentives. Mr. Srivastava says the only reward he can give hardworking postmen who have excelled in promoting new products is a thermos bottle or a lunch box.

Meanwhile, to fend off competition from private couriers, India Post is trying a tactic left over from India's socialist days: outlawing the competition. The agency's political backers are pushing for an amendment to postal laws that would make it illegal for private carriers to deliver parcels or documents that weigh less than 300 grams. It would also make couriers pay 10% of their revenues to underwrite India Post's expansion into rural areas and force 100%-owned foreign companies, such as FedEx, to reduce their shareholding in local units to 49%. Legislators will be debating the bill later this year.

"Customers are looking for short transit times and a high level of service and technology but these are not elements that the postal service provides," so any restrictions on couriers will hurt Indian companies says Jacques Creeten, the Mumbai-based managing director for FedEx. "India is not isolated in the world -- it is competing with China, Vietnam and Bangladesh and exporters need the express industry to stay competitive."

Mr. Srivastava says he doesn't need a monopoly, but argues that he can't be expected to compete with couriers that don't have to carry India Post's high administrative costs and political baggage. "We didn't realize this was really going to hit us," he says, as he signs document after document required by India's layers of bureaucratic protocol to run his domain of more than 10,000 workers.

"Some people have still not realized."

--Binny Sabharwal contributed to this article.

DOJ_NMG_0073550

Optimism And Africa (NYT)

By Nicholas D. Kristof

The New York Times, October 3, 2006

MALABO, Equatorial Guinea

The founding president of this country was a witch doctor who murdered tens of thousands, put enemies' heads on pikes, denounced education and spread land mines on the road out of his country to prevent people from fleeing. This was then so vile a place that an American diplomat stabbed another to death here in 1971 and claimed in his trial that he had been driven insane partly by the screams of all the people being tortured.

When the president was finally ousted in 1979, he ran off into the bush with $60 million packed in suitcases. But he was pursued, and in a shootout, the nation's entire foreign exchange reserves burned up.

This little country of Equatorial Guinea was, therefore, a useful place to visit with Casey Parks, the student journalist who won a contest to accompany me on this trip — because it underscores one of the biggest challenges facing Africa today.

That is the need for better governance, meaning both less corruption and better economic policies. The single greatest need to fight poverty and injustice isn't more aid, although that is needed. What matters most is the local decision makers. The single biggest reason Africa is so poor is that it has had unusually bad leadership — a reflection, in turn, of colonial misrule.

Equatorial Guinea traditionally has been Africa's poster boy for bad governance. Even after the old witch doctor was ousted, the kleptocracy continued under Teodoro Obiang, the current president. A new book about the country, "The Wonga Coup," notes that in 2004 President Obiang bought a Boeing 737, one of six personal planes, for $55 million, and outfitted it with a king-sized bed and gold-plated fittings in the extra-large bathroom.

Schools and clinics are needy, but Forbes lists President Obiang as the world's eighth richest ruler, with a net worth of $600 million. Just last year, "The Wonga Coup" says, the president's son spent the equivalent of a third of his country's entire education budget on a vacation home in South Africa and three cars — two Bentleys and a Lamborghini.

That is grotesque, but it is changing. Here in Equatorial Guinea, torture has diminished, and two opposition members of Parliament provide token public criticism. The government is participating in Tony Blair's anticorruption initiative (a terrific program to help poor countries), and Prime Minister Ricardo Mangue told me that his government would begin publishing budgets to try to ensure more transparency.

We should help developing countries broadly, not just by writing checks but also by holding their feet to the fire on corruption and economic reform. An excellent new U.S. aid program, the Millennium Challenge Accounts, rewards good governance, and we can do even more. For example, as Joseph Stiglitz notes in his new book, "Making Globalization Work," the West can modify bank secrecy rules so that it is harder for dictators to pillage their lands.

The time is right, because all across Africa, countries are increasing efforts to fight corruption and improve the investment climate. The World Bank's latest "Doing Business" report shows that some African countries, particularly Tanzania, Ghana, Rwanda and Nigeria, are among the world leaders in reforming their economies.

And where African countries have had sustained good governance, economies have boomed. Examples include Botswana, Mozambique, Rwanda and Mauritius, which in turn are becoming models for neighbors.

Partly as a result, Africa is enjoying an overall economic growth rate this year of 5 to 6 percent, twice that of the U.S. And Africa now has a huge opportunity to move up the ladder into low-wage manufacturing, because Chinese labor costs are rising and some labor-intensive production is being shipped to lower-wage countries. Chinese traders are now everywhere in Africa, although they haven't set up many factories so far.

Senegal has snared a share of the French-language call-center industry, and a few countries, like Mauritius, Lesotho and Namibia, make garments, but manufacturers have generally shunned Africa because of concerns about infrastructure, political instability, corruption and ability to scale up production. If Africa plays its cards right, that could change.

So, yes, Africa is still afflicted by AIDS, misery and the tyranny of "big men" whose sons squander national treasure on Lamborghinis. But leadership is improving, opportunities are appearing, and there's something new in the air: reform, and hope.

DOJ_NMG_0073551

DEPARTMENT OF JUSTICE NEWS CLIPS

PREPARED FOR THE OFFICE OF PUBLIC AFFAIRS, US DEPARTMENT OF JUSTICE

TO: THE ATTORNEY GENERAL AND SENIOR STAFF

DATE: TUESDAY, OCTOBER 3, 2006 7:45 AM EDT

TODAY'S EDITION

Terrorism News:

Tenet Recalled Warning Rice (WP) ... 4
C.I.A. Chief Warned Rice On Al Qaeda (NYT) ... 5
Rice Denies Book's Assertion She Brushed Off CIA Terror Warning (LAT) ... 6
Rice Says She Did Not Ignore Urgent Pre-Sept. 11 Warning (USAT) ... 7
Rice: No Memory Of CIA Warning Of Attack (AP-Y) ... 8
The Leaders We Have (WP) ... 9
Can Bush Save Bush? (WP) ... 10
Iranian Woman Indicted In Brooklyn In Terrorism Case (NYT) ... 11
U.S. Says Woman In Shelter Terror Chief (AP) ... 12
Testimony Ends In Aref And Hossain Trial (CAPN9) ... 13
Wait Ends For Father And Son Exiled By F.B.I. Terror Inquiry (NYT) ... 13
Terror Supporter's Kin Return To U.S. (AP) ... 14
Lawyers For Detainees Challenge Bush Plan (WP/AP) ... 14
Accused Tamil Tiger Supporter On Bail (TORSTAR) ... 15
Merger With Al Qaeda Deepens Threat From Algerian Radicals (CSM) ... 15

Homeland Response:

Terrorism Insurance Still Holds Uncertainties (WSJ) ... 16
UK And US To Meet Over Passenger Data (FT) ... 17
Trial OK'd On One Jewell Claim Against AJC (AJC) ... 17
Judge: Jewell Libel Suit Against Newspaper Can Proceed (CLE) 18
Nagin Wants Minorities In On Katrina Recovery (USAT/AP) ... 18

War News:

Iraqi Premier Offers Plan To Stop Violence (WP/AP) ... 19
Iraqi Leader Unveils New Security Plan Amid Rising Violence (NYT) ... 20
Iraq PM Announces Plan To Unite Parties (AP-Y) ... 21
Iraqis Plan A Team Effort To End Violence (LAT) ... 22
Iraq War Draws Foreign Jihadists, But Not In Droves (CSM) ... 23
Torture Site May Be Linked To Security Forces (USAT) ... 24
More Troops, Please (WSJ) ... 25
Death Never 'in Vain' (USAT) ... 27
Frist: Taliban Should Be In Afghan Gov't (AP) ... 28
After Afghan Battle, A Harder Fight For Peace (NYT) ... 29
Afghan Politics - One Chicken Dinner At A Time (CSM) ... 31

DOJ:

Ohio Prosecutor Named Interim U.S. Attorney (TENN) ... 32

Corporate Scandals:

Feeling 'Slap In The Face' After Fastow's Sentence (WP) ... 32
Memo Suggests When Hurd Knew Of Phone Data (WSJ) ... 34
Cingular Wireless Files Suit Against Investigator Over Hewlett-Packard Pretexting (LAW) ... 35
Sonsini Received Questionable Novell Options (LAW) ... 35
Mills Chief Retires But Must Repay Costs For Jet Travel (WP) .. 37
In Namibia Court, Arguments Over Bail For Options Fugitive (NYT) ... 38
Ex-Comverse Chief Executive Says He Will Plead Not Guilty (AP) ... 39
Checks Already In Place (USAT) ... 39

Criminal Law:

Foley Enters Alcohol Rehab Center (LAT) ... 40
Pressure Grows For G.O.P. Over Foley Scandal (NYT) ... 41
On Political Track For Decades, Foley's Career Derails In Days (USAT) ... 43
Little-known Job Caught In Spotlight (USAT) ... 44
Addictions Are Often Disclosed Amid Scandals (USAT) ... 45
Foley Joins List Of Sex Scandals On Capitol Hill (WT) ... 46
Foley 'drank In Secret,' Seeking Help, Lawyer Says (PALMBEACHP) ... 46
Foley Saga No Shock To Some (LAT) ... 48
Follow The Money (RC) ... 50
Ex-Rep. Foley Checks Into Alcohol Rehab (AP) ... 51
Foley Checks Into Rehab As Republicans Seek Cover (MCT) ... 52
Hastert Says He Wasn't Aware Of Explicit E-Mails (Update1) (BLOOM) ... 53
FBI Knew In July About Foley E-Mails To Teen (WP) ... 55
Hastert Defends Handling Of Page Scandal (AP-Y) ... 56
Pelosi Wants GOP Leaders' Testimony (RC) ... 58
Papers Knew Of Foley E-Mail But Did Not Publish Stories (NYT) 60
Your Page, M'Lord (NYT) ... 61
Foley May Be 1st Member Prosecuted Under Strong Internet-crime Laws (HILL) ... 61
Man Shoots 11, Killing 4 Girls, In Amish School (NYT) ... 63
Four Girls Killed At Pa. Amish School (WP) ... 64
Gunman Slays 4 Amish Schoolgirls (WT/AP) ... 66

Seclusion Shattered By School Slayings (USAT)..... 67
Gunman At Amish School Kills 4 Girls, Wounds 7 (PPG)..... 69
Three Killed, 8 Hurt In Pennsylvania School Attack (Update8) (BLOOM)..... 70
Milk-Truck Driver Kills 3 Girls, Critically Wounds 8 (LAT)..... 71
Gun Reported At North Las Vegas School (AP)..... 73
Expelled Boy Shows Up At School Armed, Then Flees (NYT) ... 73
Bail In School Attack Is $750,000; Safety Cited (MJS)..... 74
Judge Sets Bail At $750,000 In Weston Schools Shooting (AP). 74
National School Violence Conference Set (AP-Y)..... 75
Three Killed, 8 Hurt In Pennsylvania School Attack (Update8) (BLOOM)..... 76
Bush 'Troubled' By School Shooting (AFP-Y)..... 77
'A Horrendous Crime Scene' (USAT) 78
Experts: Events Might Weigh Heavily On Kids (USAT)..... 78
Three School Shootings (NYT)..... 79
Common Tragedy And Culprits (WP) 79
Online Gambling Set For Takeover Wave (FT)..... 80
U.K. Online Gambling Sites Mull Exiting U.S. Market (WSJ/AP) 80
Online Gaming Shares Plummet In Bill's Wake (WP/AP) 81
Bad Luck For Online Gaming (LAT) 81
New Legislation May Pull The Plug On Online Gambling (USAT)82
Attorney General Creates Domestic Violence Unit (AP) 83
Philadelphia Police Dispatchers Charged With Selling Information (AP)..... 84
2 Police Dispatchers Charged In Scheme (PHI) 84
2 Police Radio Dispatchers Face Jail Time (PHI)..... 84
Newark: Bank Robber Sentenced (NYT)..... 85
Jemal Defense Team Questions Deal For Prosecution's Witness (WP)..... 85
Miss. Resident Sentenced For Making False Claims To FEMA (AP)..... 86
BR Woman Gets Prison In Disaster Fraud (AP)..... 86
FBI Joins Expressway Inquiries (SPT) 86
Rell, Blumenthal Announce Reviews Of Troubled Highway Project (AP)..... 88
'Inappropriate' Expenditures Found At Getty (LAT)..... 89
Monitor Named To Oversee Reforms At Getty Trust (NYT) 90
DNA Test Result Casts Doubt On Two Convictions In 1987 Murder (WP) 91
Judge Keeps Karr Pornography Case Sealed (HC/AP) 92
Police Investigate '03 Death After Charge Against Nurse (NYT) 93
Husband Faces Charges In Nevada Official's Death (WT) 94
Manuscript Used To Convict Molester (WT)..... 94
Husband Faces Charges In Nevada Official's Death (WT) 95

Civil Rights:

FAYETTE LOCKUP IS TARGET OF RIGHTS VIOLATIONS INQUIRY (LEXHL)..... 96
Fayette Jail Employee Says He Assisted FBI Investigation (AP) 97
Jail Informant Goes Public (WTVQ-TV)..... 98
EEOC Rules In Favor Of Chesapeake Deputies Who Were Fired (VAPILOT) 98
Bible-Reading Student Gets Lesson In Litigation (WP)..... 99
Euclid OKs Election Plan Hoping To End U.S. Lawsuit (CLPD) 100

Antitrust:

Justice Department, State Settle Suit With Dairy Industry (AP) 100
Dairy Co-op In KC Settles With U.S. (KCS)..... 101
FCC OKs Alltel Buy Of Midwest Wireless (AP-YBIZ)..... 101
McAfee, Others Criticize Vista Security Policies (MERCN)..... 101
Supreme Court Denies Northwest Airlines Appeal In Key Antitrust Case (AP) 102
Supreme Court Rejects UnitedHealth Ohio Doctor Rate Appeal (MRKTWTCH) 103
Supreme Court Won't Hear Calif. Competition Case Against AT&T (MRKTWTCH)..... 103
Broadcom Seeks To Bar Qualcomm Chips In Patent Fight (Update4) (BLOOM) 104
Harrah's Gets $15B Private Equity Bid (USAT)..... 105
Licenses Are The Biggest Hurdle To A Deal For Harrah's (WSJ)106
Not Our Bag, Coach Says In A Lawsuit Alleging Target Sold Counterfeit Purse (WSJ)..... 107
Gilead Agrees To Buy Myogen For $2.5 Billion (WSJ)..... 108
Gilead Plans To Acquire Myogen In $2.5B Deal (USAT/AP) 108
You've Got It Backward: Intel Is Bullying AMD (WSJ)..... 109
Competition And Antitrust Law Can Protect The Internet (HILL)110

Environment:

Supreme Court To Take On Con Ed Case (AP) 111
U.S. To Delay Buying Strategic-Reserve Oil (WSJ) 111

FBI/DEA/ATF/USMS:

Court Upholds Polygraph Tests For FBI, Secret Service Applicants (AP) 111
Ex-FBI Agent Gets 6 Years In Stock Case (WSJ)..... 112
6-Year Sentence In Trading Case (NYT)..... 112
Ex-agent Gets 6 Years In Fraud (NSDY)..... 112
City Briefs (NYDN) 113
Inaccuracies Have To Do With Names In Times Report (ESPN)114
Doubt Cast On Report That Named Players (NYT) 114
Prosecutor: Steroids Story 'Inaccurate' (AP) 115
Pete Rose Admits Taking Amphetamines (AP)..... 115
Drug Ring Suspect Pleads Guilty (ETPA)..... 116
Supreme Court Denies Oakmont Doc's Appeal (PTR)..... 116
Doctor Again Challenges Drugs-for-sex Conviction (PPG) 117
Adolescence: When Young People Use, Parents Seldom Know (NYT) 117
New Evidence Surfaces In Bombing Case (FWST)..... 118
Man Wanted In Shooting At Ohio Football Game Arrested In Wash. (AP)..... 119

Immigration:

Supreme Court Rejects Appeal Of Nazi Concentration Camp Guard (FINDLAW/AP) 120
Border Fence Called Impractical (WP) 120
Crackdown On Immigrants Empties A Town And Hardens Views (CSM)..... 121
Immigration Resolution Passes Early Test (CHIT)..... 122
Bridging A Racial Rift That Isn't Black And White (NYT)..... 123

Tax:

Amherst Man Sentenced For Hiding Funds (BIZBUFF)..... 125

DOJ_NMG_0073553

An Honest Democrat (WSJ) 126
Counting Capital Gains (WSJ) 126

Congress-Administration:

Book And E-mails Hit Republican Nerves (FT) 127
Party's Handling Of Foley Riles Up Voters Frustrated By Immigration, Spending (WSJ) 128
Leaders Face Foley Fallout (RC) 129
Statutory Implications Of E-Mails Are Murky (WP) 131
E-mails Send House GOP Scrambling (HILL) 131
Hastert Says He Didn't Know Of Explicit Contact (USAT) 133
Resign, Mr. Speaker (WT) 134
After Foley, New Fears For The GOP (WP) 134
Hastert Denies GOP Saw Foley's 'Vile' Messages (WT) 136
Analysis: Foley Shadows GOP Election (SFC/AP) 137
Ripple Effect May Shake Reynolds (HILL) 138
Kerry: Foley Scandal Part Of GOP 'culture Of Corruption' (DMR) 139
The Redder They Are, The Harder They Fall (WP) 140
Paging Mr. Hastert (WSJ) 141
The Foley Matter (NYT) 141
Adult Supervision (RC) 142
Foley's Red Lights (LAT) 143
GOP Leaders Deserve Nothing Less Than To Lose Their Jobs (RC) 143
No Spinning Past This Scandal (WP) 144
DHS Loses Court Battle Over Collective Bargaining (FEDTIMES) 145
As Term Begins, Justices Reject 1,900 Appeals (WP) 146
High Court Rejects Appeal Of Trade-Case Decision (WSJ) 147
When Ideologies Clash, Justice May Tip Supreme Court's Balance (WSJ) 148
Justice For Immigrants (NYT) 149
Senate Confirms Director Of National Parks (NYT/AP) 149
Pentagon Gets New Office (HILL) 149
Abramoff Report Reveals Ties To GOP, Democratic Members (HILL) 151
Congress Sets Military Pay Raise, Punts On Civil Service (WP) 152
Congress Leaves Big Question Mark On Pay Raises (WT) 153
Top Civil Servants Honored (WP) 153
Calif. Man Charged With Threatening Bush, Cheney (AP) 154
President To Be On Hand For Christening Of Carrier Named After His Father (VAPILOT) 155

Other News:

Manufacturing Decelerates While Commercial Construction Soars (USAT/AP) 155
Data On Factories Indicate Economy Is Losing Speed (WSJ) .. 156
Another Session Leaves The Dow Chasing Record (WSJ) 156
Dow On Verge Of Closing At An All-time High (WT) 157
Strike 4: Dow Fails To Set Record High (USAT) 158
Most Blacks, Hispanics In Area Own Homes (WP) 158
Across Nation, Housing Costs Rise As Burden (NYT) 160
A Backlash Against Bickering (WP) 161
Those Attacked Online Are Filing Libel Lawsuits (USAT) 162
PodestaMattoon Sues Client For Unpaid Fees (RC) 165
Mean Seniors Face Fresh Round Of Decisions As 2007 Sign-Up Nears (WSJ) 166
Many Obstacles Face Negron In Fla. 16, Especially Foley's Name (CQ) 167
Fla. GOP Picks Foley Replacement (AP-Y) 168
Foley Debacle Tests District Loyalties (LAT) 169
Bush Heads West To Stump For Republicans (WP) 171
Few Will See Bush's Quick Visit Today (SACBEE) 171
Bush, Fund-Raiser In Chief, Hits The Trail In Earnest (NYT) 172
Cheney Slams Dems In Wyo. Stump Speech (USAT) 173
Poll Shows Allen Leading Webb By Six Points (WT) 174
Allen Banks On 2-minute Statewide Ad To Reverse Tailspin (AP) 174
Outside Groups Shoveling Cash Into Tight Races (WP) 175
New Suburbs Could Be New Political Battlegrounds (USAT) ... 177
Lieberman Says He Has Been Promised Seniority (HILL) 178
Poor New Hampshire? Don't Bet Against The Granite State (RC) 179
Veto In California On Electoral College (NYT) 181
After Riding High With Fox News, Murdoch Aide Has Harder Slog (WSJ) 181
In His New Role, Roger Ailes Has Rankled Colleagues; Slow Start At MyNetworkTV (WSJ) 184
All In The Family (WSJ) 185
The Chair Out From Under Them (NYT) 186
Richmond's Obstructionists (WP) 186
Bush Backs Turkey's Entry To E.U. (WP) 187
Bush Backs Turkey's Bid To Join EU (AP-Y) 188
Kurdish Rebels Said To Fuel Anti-U.S. Views (WT) 188
Bush Says U.N. Force Should Go To Darfur (USAT) 189
Bush Says U.N. Should Not Wait On Darfur (AP-Y) 190
Bush Waiver Restores Military Training (AP-Y) 190
U.S. Wins A United Front On Iran (WT) 190
'Good Progress' In Drawing Up Iran Sanctions: US Official (AFP) 191
EU Official Pushes Iran On Nuclear Plans (AP) 192
Rice Meets With Saudi King On Trip To Rally Arab Allies (WP) 192
Rice Faces Calls For Progress In Mideast (FT) 193
Rice Revisiting Mideast Peace Issue (WT/AP) 194
Israelis Reach Out To Arab Nations That Share Fear Of Ascendant Iran (WSJ) 195
Analysts Warm To Lebanon Results (WT) 196
2 Killed As Palestinian Factions Clash For 2nd Day (NYT) 197
Russians Raise The Stakes In Georgia Row (FT) 198
Georgia Frees Russian Officers, But Moscow Moves To Retaliate (WSJ) 199
Russia Severs Transport Links With Georgia (NYT) 200
Russian 'Spies' Freed, But Moscow Vengeful Georgia Faces Sanctions For Arrests (WT/AP) 201
Enough Bullying (WP) 201
S. Korean Strongly Backed To Lead U.N. (WP) 202
Council Backs South Korean For U.N. Secretary General (NYT) 203
South Korea's Ban Wins Support From Major Powers To Head U.N. (WSJ) 204
South Korean Set To Succeed Annan At UN (FT) 204
Ban Ki-Moon Cements Hold On U.N. Post (AP) 205

DOJ_NMG_0073554

Korean Wins A Final Poll For U.N. Chief (WT) 206
S. Korean Poised To Succeed Annan (LAT) 207
The Quiet Diplomat Who May Lead The UN (CSM) 207
'If The U.N. Cannot Be Trusted With Money . . .' (WSJ)..... 209
U.S. General Says Chávez Worries Region (NYT) 210
Early Results Of Bosnia Vote Reinforce Ethnic Split (NYT) 210
Party's Scandals Catch Up To Brazil's President (WSJ) 211
A Message For Lula (LAT) 212
Riots Spread As Incumbent Widens Lead In Zambia Vote (NYT)213
Japan's Abe Seeks Talks With China, South Korea (WP) 213
Snail Mail As Economy Zooms, India's Postmen Struggle To Adapt (WSJ)..... 214
Optimism And Africa (NYT)..... 216

TERRORISM NEWS:

Tenet Recalled Warning Rice (WP)

By Dan Eggen And Robin Wright

The Washington Post, October 3, 2006

Former CIA director George Tenet told the 9/11 Commission that he had warned of an imminent threat from al-Qaeda in a July 2001 meeting with Condoleezza Rice, adding that he believed Rice took the warning seriously, according to a transcript of the interview and the recollection of a commissioner who was there.

Tenet's statements to the commission in January 2004 confirm the outlines of an event in a new book by Washington Post Assistant Managing Editor Bob Woodward that has been disputed by some Bush administration officials. But the testimony also is at odds with Woodward's depiction of Tenet and former CIA counterterrorism chief J. Cofer Black as being frustrated that "they were not getting through to Rice" after the July 10, 2001, meeting.

Rice angrily rejected those assertions yesterday, saying that it was "incomprehensible" that she would have ignored such explicit intelligence from senior CIA officials and that she received no warning at the meeting of an attack within the United States.

Rice acknowledged that the White House was receiving a "steady stream of quite alarmist reports of potential attacks" during that period, but said the targets were assumed to be in the Middle East, including Saudi Arabia, Yemen, Israel and Jordan.

"What I am quite certain of, however, is that I would remember if I was told -- as this account apparently says -- that there was about to be an attack in the United States," Rice said. "The idea that I would somehow have ignored that I find incomprehensible."

The meeting has become the focus of a fierce and often confusing round of finger-pointing involving Rice, the White House and the 9/11 Commission, all of whom dispatched staffers to the National Archives and other locations yesterday in attempts to sort out what had occurred.

Members of the commission -- an independent, bipartisan panel created by Congress to investigate the Sept. 11, 2001, terror attacks -- have said for days that they were not told about the July 10 meeting and were angry at being left out. As recently as yesterday afternoon, both commission chairman Thomas H. Kean and vice chairman Lee Hamilton said they believed the panel had not been told about the July 10 meeting.

But it turns out that the panel was, in fact, told about the meeting, according to the interview transcript and Democratic commission member Richard Ben-Veniste, who sat in on the interview with Tenet. The meeting was not identified by the July 10 date in the commission's best-selling report.

Rice added to the confusion yesterday by strongly suggesting that the meeting may never have occurred at all -- even though administration officials had conceded for several days that it had. A State Department spokesman said later that while the meeting definitely happened, Rice and Tenet disputed Woodward's characterization of her response.

"The briefing was a summary of the threat reporting from the previous weeks," State Department spokesman Sean McCormack told reporters traveling with Rice in Jiddah, Saudi Arabia. "There was nothing new."

Despite this, McCormack said, Rice asked that Tenet provide the same briefing to Defense Secretary Donald H. Rumsfeld and then-U.S. Attorney General John D. Ashcroft. The two men received it by July 17, he said. McCormack was unable to explain why Rice felt the briefing should be repeated if it did not include new material.

Ashcroft said in an interview yesterday that he was never briefed by Tenet or Black about an imminent domestic threat.

DOJ_NMG_0073555

"I didn't get called on by Black or Tenet if they were going around doing such briefings," Ashcroft said. "If in fact they were making visits to emphasize the severity of the domestic threat, I'm a little disappointed they didn't bring that information to my attention."

Neither Black nor Tenet has made any public comments about the assertions in Woodward's book. Woodward declined yesterday to comment in detail, saying only that he stood by his reporting.

Tenet gave testimony about the July 2001 meeting with Rice at his Langley headquarters office on Jan. 28, 2004, occasionally referring to charts and slides. Philip Zelikow, who at the time was the commission's executive director and now works for Rice, was present along with other commission staff members, according to Ben-Veniste and to a portion of the transcript, which was read to The Washington Post by an official with access to it.

At one point in the lengthy session, Tenet recalled a briefing he was given on July 10 by Black and his staff, according to the transcript. He said the information was so important that he quickly called for a car and telephoned Rice to arrange for a White House meeting to share what he had just learned, according to the transcript and Ben-Veniste.

According to the transcript, Tenet told Rice there were signs that there could be an al-Qaeda attack in weeks or perhaps months, that there would be multiple, simultaneous attacks causing major human casualties, and that the focus would be U.S. targets, facilities or interests. But the intelligence reporting focused almost entirely on the attacks occurring overseas, Tenet told the commission.

It was at this session that Tenet said "the system was blinking red," which became a chapter title in the commission report, according to the official who saw the transcript.

According to three people present at the session, including Ben-Veniste, Tenet believed that Rice responded seriously to what she had been told. "We particularly questioned him about whether he had the sense that Dr. Rice and the others on the White House side understood the gravity of what he was telling them," said Ben-Veniste, a former Watergate prosecutor. "He said that they believed that they did. . . . We asked him further whether Dr. Rice just shrugged this off, and he said he did not have such an impression."

Ben-Veniste's comments seem to contradict his own remarks over the weekend to the New York Times, in which he said that "the meeting was never mentioned to us." Ben-Veniste said yesterday that there was confusion between two different meetings and that the meeting described by Tenet is different in character from the one portrayed by Woodward.

Zelikow, who now works as one of Rice's closest aides as a State Department counselor, did not respond to a request for comment yesterday. He told the New York Times that none of the commission's witnesses had drawn attention to a July 10 meeting or had outlined the type of confrontation with Rice described by Woodward.

In comments to reporters, Rice also denied that she had endorsed ousting Rumsfeld at the end of Bush's first term, although she said she did tell President Bush that he might want to consider changing his entire foreign policy team.

"I did tell the president at one point that I thought maybe all of us should go, because we had fought two wars and had the largest terrorist attack in American history," Rice said. "When he asked me to be secretary of state, I said I think maybe you need new people. I don't know if that was somehow interpreted, but what I was actually talking about was me."

Wright reported from Shannon, Ireland, and Jiddah, Saudi Arabia. Staff writer Walter Pincus contributed to this report.

C.I.A. Chief Warned Rice On Al Qaeda (NYT)

By Philip Shenon And Mark Mazzetti

The New York Times, October 3, 2006

JIDDA, Saudi Arabia, Oct. 2 — A review of White House records has determined that George J. Tenet, then the director of central intelligence, did brief Condoleezza Rice and other top officials on July 10, 2001, about the looming threat from Al Qaeda, a State Department spokesman said Monday.

The account by the spokesman, Sean McCormack, came hours after Ms. Rice, the secretary of state, told reporters aboard her airplane that she did not recall the specific meeting on July 10, noting that she had met repeatedly with Mr. Tenet that summer about terrorist threats. Ms. Rice, the national security adviser at the time, said it was “incomprehensible” to suggest she had ignored dire terrorist threats two months before the Sept. 11 attacks.

Mr. McCormack also said records showed that the Sept. 11 commission had been informed about the meeting, a fact that former intelligence officials and members of the commission confirmed on Monday.

When details of the meeting emerged last week in a new book by Bob Woodward of The Washington Post, Bush administration officials questioned Mr. Woodward’s reporting.

Now, after several days, both current and former Bush administration officials have confirmed parts of Mr. Woodward’s account.

DOJ_NMG_0073556

Officials now agree that on July 10, 2001, Mr. Tenet and his counterterrorism deputy, J. Cofer Black, were so alarmed about intelligence pointing to an impending attack by Al Qaeda that they demanded an emergency meeting at the White House with Ms. Rice and her National Security Council staff.

According to two former intelligence officials, Mr. Tenet told those assembled at the White House about the growing body of intelligence the C.I.A. had collected suggesting an attack was in the works. But both current and former officials, including allies of Mr. Tenet, took issue with Mr. Woodward's account that he and his aides had left the meeting feeling that Ms. Rice had ignored them.

Earlier this week, some members of the Sept. 11 commission said they could not recall being told about a meeting like the one described by Mr. Woodward.

On Monday, officials said Mr. Tenet had told members of the commission about the July 10 meeting when they interviewed him in early 2004, but committee members said he never indicated he had left the White House with the impression that he had been ignored.

"Tenet never told us that he was brushed off," said Richard Ben-Veniste, a Democratic member of the commission. "We certainly would have followed that up."

Mr. McCormack said the records showed that far from ignoring Mr. Tenet's warnings, Ms. Rice acted on the intelligence and requested that Mr. Tenet make the same presentation to Defense Secretary Donald H. Rumsfeld and John Ashcroft, then the attorney general.

But Mr. Ashcroft said by telephone on Monday evening that he never received a briefing that summer from Mr. Tenet.

"Frankly, I'm disappointed that I didn't get that kind of briefing," he said. "I'm surprised he didn't think it was important enough to come by and tell me."

Government investigations have shown that Mr. Ashcroft was briefed by other C.I.A. officials in the weeks before the Sept. 11 attacks.

The dispute that has played out in recent days gives further evidence of an escalating battle between the White House and Mr. Tenet over who should take the blame for the failure to stop the Sept. 11 attacks and assertions by Bush administration officials that Saddam Hussein was stockpiling chemical and biological weapons and cultivating ties to Al Qaeda.

Mr. Tenet resigned as director of central intelligence in the summer of 2004 and was honored that December with a Presidential Medal of Freedom at a White House ceremony. Since leaving the C.I.A., Mr. Tenet has stayed out of the public eye, largely declining to defend his record even after several government investigations assailed the faulty intelligence that helped build the case for the Iraq war.

Mr. Tenet is now completing work on a memoir that is scheduled to be published early next year. It is unclear how much he will use the book to settle old scores, although recent books have portrayed him both as dubious about the need to invade Iraq and angry that the White House has made the C.I.A. the primary scapegoat for the war.

In his book "The One Percent Doctrine," the journalist and author Ron Suskind quotes Mr. Tenet's former deputy at the C.I.A., John McLaughlin, as saying Mr. Tenet "wishes he could give that damn medal back."

In his own book, Mr. Woodward wrote that over time Mr. Tenet developed a particular dislike for Ms. Rice, and that the former C.I.A. director was furious when she publicly blamed the agency for allowing President Bush to make the false claim in the 2003 State of the Union address that Mr. Hussein was pursuing nuclear materials in Niger.

"If the C.I.A., the director of central intelligence, had said, 'Take this out of the speech,' it would have been gone, without question," Ms. Rice told reporters in July 2003.

In fact, the C.I.A. had told the White House months before that the intelligence about Niger was dubious, and had managed to keep the claim out of an October 2002 speech that Mr. Bush gave in Cincinnati.

More recently, Mr. Tenet has told friends he was particularly angry when, appearing recently on Sunday talk shows, both Ms. Rice and Vice President Dick Cheney cited Mr. Tenet as the reason that Bush administration officials asserted that Mr. Hussein had stockpiles of banned weapons and ties to Al Qaeda.

Mr. Cheney recalled in an appearance on "Meet the Press" on Sept. 10: "George Tenet sat in the Oval Office and the president of the United States asked him directly, he said, 'George, how good is the case against Saddam on weapons of mass destruction?' The director of the C.I.A. said, 'It's a slam dunk, Mr. President, it's a slam dunk,' "

Rice Denies Book's Assertion She Brushed Off CIA Terror Warning (LAT)

By Paul Richter

The Los Angeles Times, October 3, 2006

State Department officials acknowledged late Monday that Secretary of State Condoleezza Rice was at a 2001 meeting where she was reportedly warned of the need to act on an impending terrorist threat to the United States.

They said she met with then-CIA Director George J. Tenet on or around July 10. A new book by Bob Woodward says she brushed off Tenet's warning at that session.

Earlier on Monday, Rice rejected the book's suggestion as "incomprehensible."

Speaking to reporters on her plane en route to the Middle East, Rice insisted she did not recall. Tenet and his counterterrorism chief seeking a special meeting with her to try to mobilize more vigorous anti-terror action, as Woodward writes in "State of Denial."

"The idea that I would have ignored that, I find incomprehensible," Rice told reporters late Sunday during the flight. "I am quite certain that it was not a meeting in which I was told that there was an impending attack, and refused to respond."

The State Department said Monday that a meeting around the time described by Woodward had in fact taken place, based on government records, but that no new information was given to Rice, who then was President Bush's national security advisor.

In his book, Woodward writes that Tenet and J. Cofer Black, then director of the CIA's counterterrorism center, decided on July 10, 2001, that they had to request a dramatic, "out-of-cycle" meeting with Rice to describe their anxiety over the chance of an attack against American interests, possibly within the United States.

Rice agreed to see them and acknowledged their warnings, but Tenet and Black felt she did not appreciate the gravity of the situation, which Woodward writes was the "starkest warning" yet given to the White House. "She was polite, but they felt the brush-off," Woodward writes.

Rice's reaction to the description of the meeting underscores administration attempts to counter claims, in Woodward's book and elsewhere, that question whether officials heeded internal warnings and reports on terrorism and the Iraq war.

Rice did not deny that any meeting took place, noting she met frequently with Tenet and other intelligence officials and counterterrorism experts during 2001, when she said the administration was developing a comprehensive strategy. But she said the idea of an emergency meeting designed to "shock" her did not make sense.

On Monday, two State Department officials delving into records at Rice's request found that a meeting took place "on or around July 10," as the book reports, said Curtis Cooper, a State Department spokesman. But the officials said that the meeting did not reveal any new threats, and that records about the meeting had been turned over to the national commission that investigated the Sept. 11 attacks, Cooper said. Woodward's book indicates that the Sept. 11 commission had access to the records of the meeting, but did not probe deeply into it.

Cooper said Tenet was asked by Sept. 11 commission members about the meeting. Cooper could not say whether the discussion took place in the commission's public sessions or in private. In public, no commissioner referred to a meeting on July 10. One commission member, Timothy J. Roemer, a former Democratic House member from Indiana, said over the weekend that commissioners had not been told about the meeting.

One of the officials probing meeting records at Rice's request was Philip D. Zelikow, the former Sept. 11 commission executive director whom Rice appointed State Department counselor last year.

Zelikow and State Department legal advisor John Bellinger reported that the information Tenet presented consisted of "threat reporting" from several weeks leading up to the meeting. "The information presented at this meeting was not new," Cooper said.

Rice told reporters that she was meeting regularly during the period with Tenet and Black, and they were getting a "steady stream" of intelligence reports warning of potential strikes. "I was talking to George about them all the time," she said.

Rice also denied that she had complained to Bush that Defense Secretary Donald H. Rumsfeld was not returning her calls, as Woodward writes.

"Secretary Rumsfeld has never refused to return my phone calls — this is ludicrous," she said.

She denied that she tried to convince Bush to dump Rumsfeld, as the book says, though she said at one point she told Bush "that maybe all of us should go" after the demands of two wars, the aftermath of Sept. 11 and other world developments.

Rice said her five-day Mideast trip is aimed at trying to persuade moderate Arab states to do more to help democratic leaders in the region. She said she may meet Friday in London with ministers of the other world powers trying to convince Iran to suspend its uranium program.

Rice Says She Did Not Ignore Urgent Pre-Sept. 11 Warning (USAT)

By Barbara Slavin

USA Today, October 3, 2006

JEDDAH, Saudi Arabia — Secretary of State Condoleezza Rice said Monday that it was “incomprehensible” that she would have ignored an urgent warning from the CIA director two months before Sept. 11, 2001, that al-Qaeda was planning to attack the United States, as a new book reports.

DOJ_NMG_0073558

"I don't remember a so-called emergency meeting," Rice said in addressing several claims in State of Denial by Bob Woodward of The Washington Post. Woodward based his account on interviews with unnamed officials.

Rice discussed the book with reporters who accompanied her on a trip to the Middle East.

Rice dined Monday with Saudi King Abdullah at the start of a week-long tour aimed at bolstering moderate forces in the region in the wake of a 34-day war between Israel and Hezbollah in Lebanon. The radical Shiite Muslim militia, which has been branded a terrorist group by the United States, gained stature in the Middle East for holding its ground against Israel.

Rice flies today to Cairo and then heads to Israel and the Palestinian territories.

In his book, Woodward writes that George Tenet, then director of the CIA, and a senior aide, Cofer Black, held an unscheduled meeting with Rice on July 10, 2001. According to Woodward, Tenet sought the meeting because he wanted to press the new Bush administration to take action immediately against al-Qaeda leader Osama bin Laden to disrupt a possible attack in the USA.

Rice said she recalled "a steady stream of quite alarmist reports of potential attacks" during that period, but they involved targets abroad in Saudi Arabia, Yemen, Israel and possibly Jordan. "There was nothing that related to an attack in the United States," she said.

In her testimony to the 9/11 Commission, which investigated events leading up to the attacks, Rice said it was not until the following month that she recalled hearing about possible terrorist plots in the U.S. homeland. An Aug. 6, 2001, presidential daily report by the CIA was entitled "Bin Ladin Determined To Strike in US." Rice did not tell the commission about any earlier warning.

Rice also challenged a claim in Woodward's book that she had difficulty getting her phone calls returned by Defense Secretary Donald Rumsfeld and that she advised President Bush to fire Rumsfeld at the end of Bush's first term because of Rumsfeld's policy mistakes in managing the war in Iraq.

"Secretary Rumsfeld has never refused to return my phone calls. This is ludicrous," Rice said.

As for Woodward's report that she wanted Rumsfeld to leave the administration, Rice said, "I did tell the president at one point that maybe all of us should go" so Bush could appoint a fresh national security team for his second term.

In the end, Bush asked only one top national security adviser to leave: Rice's predecessor as secretary of State, Colin Powell, according to a second new book. Soldier, a biography of Powell by Washington Post reporter Karen DeYoung, portrays the former Cabinet member as receiving shabby treatment from others in the Bush administration.

The book alleges Vice President Cheney's aides added unverified intelligence about Iraqi development of weapons of mass destruction to a presentation Powell made before the United Nations Security Council in the lead-up to the U.S. invasion of Iraq in 2003. It said Powell tried to verify the information but much of what he said before the Security Council has turned out to be inaccurate. Last year, Powell called his speech a "blot" on his record of public service.

The book also says Powell was forced out of the administration even though he was willing to stay in a second term.

Asked about the portrait of Powell, Rice said: "I know the president had an open door for Colin Powell. …. He was treated not only with respect but with admiration."

Rice: No Memory Of CIA Warning Of Attack (AP-Y)

By Anne Gearan, Ap Diplomatic Writer

AP, October 3, 2006

Secretary of State Condoleezza Rice said she cannot recall then-CIA chief George Tenet warning her of an impending al-Qaida attack in the United States, as a new book claims he did two months before the attacks on Sept. 11, 2001.

"What I am quite certain of is that I would remember if I was told, as this account apparently says, that there was about to be an attack in the United States, and the idea that I would somehow have ignored that I find incomprehensible," Rice said.

Rice was President Bush's national security adviser in 2001, when Bob Woodward's book "State of Denial" outlines a July 10 meeting among Rice, Tenet and the CIA's top counterterror officer.

"I don't know that this meeting took place, but what I really don't know, what I'm quite certain of, is that it was not a meeting in which I was told there was an impending attack and I refused to respond," Rice said.

Speaking to reporters en route to Saudi Arabia and other stops in the Middle East, Rice said she met with Tenet daily at that point, and has no memory of the wake-up call from Tenet described in the book.

"It kind of doesn't ring true that you have to shock me into something I was very involved in," Rice said.

There was near constant discussion of possible attacks overseas, and high alarm, Rice said.

Meanwhile, former Attorney General John Ashcroft said Monday that he should have been notified of any such report dealing with a pending attack on the United States. "It just occurred to me how disappointing it was that they didn't come to me with this type of information," Ashcroft said in an interview with The Associated Press.

DOJ_NMG_0073559

"The FBI is responsible for domestic terrorism," Ashcroft said. He said both Tenet and Cofer Black of the CIA should have been aware that he had pressed for a more aggressive policy in going after bin Laden and his followers in the United States and should have briefed him as well. Rice knew of this advocacy, he suggested.

"There was no covert action to kill him and we needed one," Ashcroft said.

The meeting between Tenet, Rice and Black was not mentioned in the reports from several investigations of the Sept. 11 attacks, but Woodward wrote that it stood out in the minds of Tenet and Black as the "starkest warning they had given the White House" on al-Qaida leader Osama bin Laden and his network.

Tenet asked for the meeting after receiving a disturbing briefing from Black, according to the book.

But though Tenet and Black warned Rice in the starkest terms of the prospects for attack, she brushed them off, Woodward reiterated Monday. He told NBC's "Today" show that Black told him the two men were so emphatic, it amounted to "holding a gun to her head" and doing everything except pulling the trigger.

Black reportedly laid out secret intercepts and other data "showing the increasing likelihood that al-Qaida would soon attack the United States." Tenet was so worried that he called Rice from his car and asked to see her right away, the book said.

"Tenet and Black felt they were not getting through to Rice," Woodward wrote of the session. "She was polite, but they felt the brush-off."

Rice referred to the session as "the supposed meeting" and noted that it is not part of the independent Sept. 11 Commission's report.

"I remember that George was very worried and he expressed that," Rice told reporters. "We were all very worried because the threat reporting was quite intense. The problem was that it was also quite nebulous."

Rice, who was promoted to secretary of state in Bush's second term, also said she never argued that Secretary of Defense Donald Rumsfeld should be fired. The book's suggestion that Rumsfeld would not take her calls is "ludicrous," Rice said.

Rumsfeld and Rice are not close, and he is often considered her rival in administration decision making. Woodward wrote that then-White House Chief of Staff Andrew Card twice tried to get Bush to sack Rumsfeld and replace him with Bush family counselor James A. Baker III, and that both then-Secretary of State Colin Powell and Rice backed the plan.

Woodward interviewed Rice for his new book.

Rice's latest Middle East trip is focused on strengthening support for Palestinian President Mahmoud Abbas and other moderate Arab leaders after a series of setbacks for democratic and moderate forces in the region.

Her trip includes visits to allies Saudi Arabia and Egypt and a meeting of other friendly nations that ring the Persian Gulf, before visits to Israel and the West Bank.

Rice is looking for new ways to improve Abbas' standing in his standoff with Hamas radicals trounced Abbas' secular Fatah Party in Palestinian elections in January. Abbas was elected separately and retains his position, but he has been hamstrung by the divided government and a cutoff of Western aid.

The Bush administration and Israel are increasingly convinced Hamas will crumble, and look to Abbas to capitalize. Rice may ask other countries to do more to bolster Abbas' security forces, and she hopes to breathe life into stalled agreements and talks that would help Palestinians move more freely across their borders with Israel.

Iran's nuclear ambitions will also be part of Rice's discussions, as an unofficial deadline passes this week for Iran to heed a U.N. Security Council demand to shelve disputed nuclear activities.

Rice said Sunday she may close her trip Friday with a meeting of world powers in Europe to look at what to do next. The United States wants to press for U.N. Security Council sanctions, but it is not clear she has full support from other permanent members of the council.

___

On the Net:

State Department: http://www.state.gov

The Leaders We Have (WP)

By George F. Will

The Washington Post, October 3, 2006

While leading the hunt for weapons of mass destruction in Iraq in the summer of 2003, David Kay received a phone call from "Scooter" Libby, Dick Cheney's chief of staff, who wanted a particular place searched: "The vice president wants to know if you've looked at this area. We have indications -- and here are the geocoordinates -- that something's buried there." Kay and his experts located the area on the map. It was in the middle of Lebanon.

This story from Bob Woodward's "State of Denial" would be hilarious were it not about war. The vignette is dismaying because it seems symptomatic of a blinkering monomania that may have prevented obsessed persons from facing facts.

DOJ_NMG_0073560

Some will regard "State of Denial" as Katrina between hard covers, a snapshot of dysfunctional government. But it is largely just a glimpse of government , disheartening as that fact may be to those who regard government as a glistening scalpel for administering social transformation.

Once, when President William Howard Taft was listening to an aide talk about "the machinery of government," Taft murmured, "The young man really thinks it's a machine." Actually, government is people, and not a random slice of the population. Those at government's pinnacle generally are strong-willed, ambitious, competitive, opinionated and have agendas about which they care deeply. That is why they are there. And why almost any administration, carefully scrutinized, looks much like a teaspoon of pond water viewed under a microscope -- a teeming, disorderly maelstrom of sometimes rival life forms. That is especially true of an administration staffed with such canny Washington survivors as Cheney, Donald Rumsfeld and Colin Powell. A government of rookies or shrinking violets would be more harmonious. So, how much of a virtue is harmony?

"State of Denial" will take a toll on government collegiality and the candor of its deliberations. It is based on astonishing indiscretions -- current and past officials making private memos and conversations public for motives that cannot be pure.

The book is hardly a revelation about supposed hidden chaos in Washington that produced the obvious chaos in Iraq. It does demonstrate that President Bush and others were shockingly slow to recognize Iraq's complexities and downward spiral. But we already knew that.

The book does not demonstrate that the president is in a state of denial. His almost exclusive and increasingly grating reliance on the rhetoric of unwavering resolve may be mistaken. It certainly has undermined his reputation as a realist. But he believes a president must be "the calcium in the backbone" of the nation, so the resolute face that he thinks he must show the nation does not preclude private anguish.

The book's central figure, however, is not Bush, whose lack of inquisitiveness is a defect, but Rumsfeld, whose abrasive inquisitiveness is supposedly a defect. The prologue begins with Rumsfeld's selection as defense secretary. The 45th and final chapter contains much about Bush but revolves around an interview with Rumsfeld.

The book actually includes one heartening story that should enhance Rumsfeld's reputation. On Veterans Day 2005, the president traveled to a Pennsylvania Army depot to deliver a speech announcing the new military policy for Iraq, the policy of "clear, hold and build." Woodward says Rumsfeld, having read the speech, called Andy Card, the White House chief of staff, a half-hour before Bush was to deliver it, and said, "Take that out." Card replied that the three words were the centerpiece of the speech, not to mention the war strategy. Rumsfeld replied, "Clear, we're doing. It's up to the Iraqis to hold. And the State Department's got to work with somebody on the build."

At last, a division of labor that uses the U.S. military only for properly military purposes and assigns responsibilities in a way that will force Iraq's government to grow up. In the name of counterinsurgency, there has been too much of what today's military argot calls "full-spectrum operations" -- operations that go beyond killing insurgents to building schools, connecting sewers and other civil projects that keep the training wheels on the Iraqi government's bicycle and keep the United States chasing the chimera of "nation-building."

"Where's the leader?" Bush, according to Woodward, has exclaimed in dismay about the Iraqi government's dithering. "Where's George Washington? Where's Thomas Jefferson? Where's John Adams, for crying out loud?" For a president to ask that question about Iraq, that tribal stew, is enough to cause one to ask it about the United States.

Can Bush Save Bush? (WP)

By Richard Cohen

The Washington Post, October 3, 2006

Not too long after Franklin D. Roosevelt died, Republicans insisted on what was to become the 22nd Amendment to the Constitution. It was meant to ensure that never again would a president serve more than two terms. Now is the time for yet another amendment. This one would ensure that no child of a president could become president. This would avert another George W. Bush.

The reasons for this amendment can be amply found in Bob Woodward's new book, "State of Denial." If ever a title was apt, this is the one. As if to prove that Woodward had it right, Bush reacted to the book's revelations about Don Rumsfeld -- intransigent, incompetent and intellectually intolerant -- by reaffirming his confidence in him. To Bush, and indeed to the rest of us as well, Rumsfeld has come to personify the conduct of the Iraq war. His leaving, especially his firing, would be an admission of the obvious: failure.

My proposed amendment comes to mind because from time to time Woodward would quote someone on why Bush ran for president in the first place and what determines his executive style: his father. He wanted to best his father but also even the score for him. This score was a twofold thing. George W. Bush wanted, in effect, to win the second term that George H.W. Bush had lost (to Bill Clinton), and he also wanted to finish the job his father had started with Saddam Hussein. If there is a better explanation for why Bush -- not necessarily the neocons around him -- so fervently wanted war, I cannot come up with it.

DOJ_NMG_0073561

This descent into the fog of Freudian politics is, I know, just the sort of thing Washington eschews. Such musings lack position papers or paper trails -- paper of any kind, actually -- and rely instead on elastic language sometimes known as psychobabble. Yet those of us who are both fathers and sons know the truth of these matters. There is no more complicated relationship on the face of the earth. It is fraught with competition, a kind of canine sniffing that is suffused with both an edgy rivalry and an immense love that does not quit even with the grave. If I say that George W. Bush was out to both vanquish and redeem his father, many a man will know what I mean.

But I don't have to say it. Brent Scowcroft, the elder Bush's close friend and his former national security adviser, says it for me. This is what Woodward writes about Scowcroft: "In his younger years, Scowcroft thought, George W. couldn't decide whether he was going to rebel against his father or try to beat him at his own game. Now, he had tried at the game, and it was a disaster."

It was not only Scowcroft, though, who thought -- or feared -- that Bush had approached the challenge of Saddam Hussein the wrong way. There are suggestions in the book that both of Bush's parents felt that way. Woodward quotes a conversation Barbara Bush had with former senator David Boren, an old family friend, in which she says that she and her husband are "worried" about Iraq -- with the former president "losing sleep over it." Boren asks why the father did not talk to the son.

"He doesn't think he should unless he's asked," Barbara Bush said.

I go on about this matter because in Woodward's book, as with everything else I've read about the 43rd president, it's apparent that Bush had no reason to run for the office other than to satisfy some psychological compulsion -- and had no accomplishment to his name that did not stem from primogeniture. Especially in foreign policy, he was an ignoramus who smugly thought that his instincts trumped experience and knowledge. What's even more appalling is that over and over in Woodward's book, Bush sticks to his losing hand, refusing to challenge his own assumptions -- or, it seems, his steadfast belief that his is a divine mission.

The conventional script in Washington for ending the Iraq war is for Bush to approach key Democrats and seek bipartisan cover for a methodical American withdrawal. Maybe that will happen or maybe it will be Republicans such as James Baker, Bush senior's secretary of state, who will do the approaching. But given the nature of the problem, maybe it would be best if the father shed his reluctance and offered his son some sharp advice. After all, it is now clear that the finest service one president can provide another -- not to mention his country -- is to reassert a parental role. The kid's in way over his head.

Iranian Woman Indicted In Brooklyn In Terrorism Case (NYT)

By William K. Rashbaum

The New York Times, October 3, 2006

A frail 51-year-old Iranian woman was indicted last week in Brooklyn on a charge of supporting a terrorist group based in Iraq that seeks the violent overthrow of the Iranian government, federal authorities said yesterday.

The woman, Zeinab Taleb-Jedi, is free on a $500,000 bond and living in an East Side women's shelter. A law enforcement official said she did not pose a direct threat to the United States.

Prosecutors said Ms. Taleb-Jedi, who was arrested in late March when she flew to Kennedy Airport from Amman, Jordan, was a member of the leadership council of the Iranian resistance group People's Mujahedeen, which both the United States and the European Union describe as a terrorist organization.

She was indicted on Friday in Federal District Court in Brooklyn on a single count of providing material support to the group. The case against her was based on an investigation by the F.B.I. and federal prosecutors in California, but she will be tried in New York.

Ms. Taleb-Jedi, who became an American citizen in 1996, has been free on a personal recognizance bond signed by her son, a recent college graduate, since shortly after her arrest, according to court records. After that she lived for a short while with him on West 128th Street and then at the Lenox Hill Neighborhood House Park Avenue Women's Shelter, according to court papers.

Shelter officials said it housed older women with mental health disorders. The woman and her son could not be located for comment last night. At the time of her arraignment, on April 1, her court-appointed lawyer, Justine Harris, said Ms. Taleb-Jedi, who then weighed just 95 pounds, came to the United States to seek medical care for severe digestive problems.

The People's Mujahedeen was first designated as a foreign terrorist organization in 1997, according to an affidavit filed in the case by F.B.I. Special Agent Mark Broihier, who said he had been investigating the group for five years.

DOJ_NMG_0073562

Two informers cited in the affidavit said Ms. Taleb-Jedi was a member of the group's leadership council. One said the council was "responsible for making leadership decisions for the organizations, including approving specific acts of terrorism" against Iran, the affidavit said.

When American forces invaded Iraq in April 2003, they disarmed the military arm of the group and ordered its members to assemble at a base about 40 miles north of Baghdad, where they turned over a range of heavy weapons, from tanks and artillery, along with lighter weapons, according to the affidavit.

F.B.I. agents went to the base and interviewed about 200 people associated with the group, including Ms. Taleb-Jedi, the affidavit said. They found firing ranges and bomb shelters and shrines to the group's "martyrs," along with bunkers that had been used to store a range of ordnance, including 420,000 pounds of plastic explosives.

In her interview at the Iraqi base, Ms. Taleb-Jedi said she had began her college education in Iran but came to the United States in 1978 to work on her master's degree in political science in Atlanta, according to the affidavit.

She eventually moved to Queens, where she continued her activities for the group, and then to northern Virginia, according to the affidavit. In 1995 and 1996, she registered, under the Foreign Agents Registration Act, as a press officer for the People's Mujahedeen of Iran.

U.S. Says Woman In Shelter Terror Chief (AP)

By Tom Hays, ASSOCIATED PRESS WRITER

AP, October 3, 2006

NEW YORK -- An Iranian widow who became a naturalized U.S. citizen 10 years ago was a top official for a heavily armed, Iraq-based terrorist organization dedicated to the violent overthrow of Iran's government, the U.S. government alleges in court documents.

The documents, obtained from Brooklyn court files on Monday, say two confidential informants in Iraq identified Zeinab Taleb-Jedi, 51, as a leader of the Mujahedeen Khalq. The group was identified in court papers as Mujahedin-e Khalq.

One of the informants told the FBI that Taleb-Jedi was on a council "responsible for making leadership decisions for the organization, including approving specific acts of terrorism" against Iran, the papers said.

Taleb-Jedi was arrested in March after flying from Jordan to Kennedy International Airport. A judge agreed to release her on $500,000 (euro394,166) bond. The court papers said she has been living at a women's shelter in Manhattan.

Taleb-Jedi was among 200 Muhjahedeen Khalq members detained and questioned by the FBI in 2004 after U.S. military forces took over parts of Iraq once controlled by the group, the documents said. U.S. soldiers seized tanks, anti-aircraft weapons, rocket-propelled grenade launchers and more than 420,000 pounds of plastic explosives.

At the time, Taleb-Jedi allegedly told agents she "wholeheartedly supports the Mujahedin," the papers said.

Federal prosecutors in Los Angeles, who have been investigating the group, announced last week that a grand jury in Brooklyn had indicted Taleb-Jedi on charges of providing support to a terrorist organization. If convicted, she faces up to 15 years in prison.

The group, also known as the People's Mujahedeen Organization of Iran, and its affiliates were deemed foreign terrorist organizations by the U.S. State Department in 1997. The designations bar anyone in the United States from providing material support.

The defendant, who was born in Iran, came to the United States on a student visa in 1978 to pursue a master's degree in political science in Georgia, court papers said. She later moved to Queens before settling in Virginia, where she became a naturalized U.S. citizen.

In her FBI interview, Taleb-Jedi told agents her husband joined the Mujahedeen and went to Iraq in 1986. In 1999, after learning her husband was killed in a bombing, she "left her job, sold all her belongings and traveled" the group's Ashraf Base in Iraq, 40 miles (64 kilometers) north of Baghdad, documents said.

A call to her attorney on Monday was not immediately returned.

Arguing for her release at an arraignment, defense attorney Justine Harris said her client had returned to the United States to see her adult son and to seek medical treatment for a severe digestive ailment that had pushed her weight down to 95 pounds.

"This a middle-age woman with absolutely no record," the lawyer said.

The group was founded in Iran in the 1960s and moved to Iraq in the early 1980s to base its activities against Iran's government. It sided with Iraq in its 1980-88 war against Iran.

The State Department says the groups were funded by Saddam Hussein, supported the seizure of the U.S. Embassy in Tehran in 1979 and are responsible for the deaths of Americans in the 1970s.

DOJ_NMG_0073563

Testimony Ends In Aref And Hossain Trial (CAPN9)

By By: Steve Ference

Capital News 9, October 3, 2006

It's been more than three weeks and soon both defendants Mohammed Hossain and Yassin Aref will find out if the jury believes them to be innocent or guilty of supporting terrorism through money laundering when they got caught up in a 2004 FBI-sting operation.

Defense attorneys for Yassin Aref continued to try to dispel the prosecution's accusation that Aref knew what an FBI informant was talking about when he mentioned the word "missile." In order to show Aref, whose native language is Kurdish, knew what missile meant, they read an article from a pamphlet called "Rally for Jihad."

Prosecutors read an excerpt:

"How wonderful it is, oh Muslims, when you see the enemy shot down by your bullets and their body parts ripped by your missiles."

It's been years since news of an FBI sting surprised the Capital Region. And led to the arrest of two men for allegedly laundering money to support terrorism. Soon the case will be in the hands of the jury, now that both sides have rested. Our Steve Ference has more on the last day of testimony.

Defense attorneys argued just because the word missile was found in one of hundreds of books and papers owned by Aref means little.

But prosecutors again showed the jury a page written by Aref where he translated English words to better understand them. He wrote "rocket equals missile." Again defense attorneys argued it didn't mean much, because Aref had also written the word “wet” equaled the Arabic word for dry.

His attorneys also argued the codeword used by the FBI informant for missile - Chaudhry - wasn't clear. At one point, the informant referred to it by saying, "one of my family members is married in Dr. Chaudhry's, uh family, my niece is married to one of the family members."

So what did either defendant understand was going on then? A friend of Yassin Aref, May Saffar, said other witnesses brought in by the government mistranslated words, and she's afraid it might confuse the jury.

Saffar said “To bring in an Urdu translator to the jury and have her mistranslate an Arabic word - how does this help him?”

She says at first she denounced both defendants, but now isn't convinced they did anything wrong. But either way, she says at least Aref believes his future is up to God.

“It doesn't matter what the outcome is, fair or not” Saffar said. "I will just have to accept it."

We'll see closing arguments Tuesday, and then the jury will get instructions on how to handle the case that will then be in their hands.

Judges' juror instructions:

Another intriguing part of the case the judge instructed jurors not to concern themselves with why the FBI became interested in Aref as part of their sting operation. Defense attorneys have maintained that their client was unfairly targeted - and was simply a witness to a loan transaction. But the judge told jurors that the FBI had "certain valid suspicions." Prosecutors also presented evidence in court that Aref's name and address was found in a address books at three separate terror camps in Iraq in 2003.

Wait Ends For Father And Son Exiled By F.B.I. Terror Inquiry (NYT)

By Randal C. Archibold

The New York Times, October 2, 2006

LOS ANGELES, Oct. 1 — Two American citizens of Pakistani descent returned to the United States on Sunday, five months after they were denied permission to fly home to California unless they submitted to an interrogation by F.B.I. terrorism investigators.

The men, Muhammad Ismail, 45, and his son, Jaber, 19, of the Northern California farming town of Lodi, returned from Pakistan on a flight that landed at Kennedy Airport in New York around 3:30 p.m. Eastern time. They were scheduled to arrive in California on Sunday night or early Monday on a connecting flight, their lawyer said Sunday.

The Ismails are an uncle and cousin of Hamid Hayat, a Lodi man who was convicted in April in federal court of providing material support to terrorists. Mr. Hayat told investigators he had attended a terrorism training camp during a long stay in Pakistan and intended to carry out unspecified attacks in the United States. Mr. Hayat’s father, Umer, was convicted on a lesser charge of lying to investigators about the amount of cash he carried to Pakistan on a 2003 trip, but a jury deadlocked on terrorism charges.

DOJ_NMG_0073564

The Ismails were not charged in the case. They attributed their predicament to being related to the Hayats, the only people to have been charged in what federal prosecutors have described as an investigation into possible terrorism links in Lodi.

Julia Harumi Mass of the American Civil Liberties Union of Northern California, who is representing the Ismails, said the pair had no terrorism connections. In a complaint in August to the Department of Homeland Security, she urged the authorities to explain any accusations against them and why they had been denied permission to fly home.

Legal experts said the matter raised questions about balancing terrorism investigations against American citizens' right to travel freely without having been charged with a crime or detained as a suspect.

On Sept. 6, nearly a month after Ms. Mass's complaint, the Homeland Security Department notified her in a letter and telephone call that unspecified records had been modified "to address any delay or denial boarding" the pair had encountered. Ms. Mass said she took that to mean they were cleared to fly, and the Ismails arranged financing and bought tickets home.

"I never imagined that the country I was born in would stop me from coming home for five months and separate me from my family, especially when I was not charged with a crime," Jaber Ismail said in a statement released through the A.C.L.U.

Hamid Hayat had told investigators he believed that Jaber, who was born in Lodi, attended a terrorism camp, but he lacked details. Mr. Hayat's lawyers attacked the investigators' questioning of Mr. Hayat as vague and coerced. Muhammad Ismail, a naturalized citizen who was born in Pakistan, said in the statement that they had traveled to Pakistan so Jaber Ismail could pursue religious study there.

On April 21, as juries were weighing the Hayats' cases, the Ismails were not permitted to board a connecting flight to San Francisco from Hong Kong and returned to Pakistan, where Jaber Ismail was questioned by F.B.I. agents at the American embassy in Islamabad. The agents, Ms. Mass said, requested further interviews with him and his father and a polygraph, which the Ismails refused.

The United States attorney's office in Sacramento, which prosecuted the Hayats, has declined to comment on the investigation other than to acknowledge that agents wished to speak with the Ismails. A Homeland Security spokesman said he had no information about the case.

Terror Supporter's Kin Return To U.S. (AP)

AP, October 3, 2006

SAN FRANCISCO - Two American citizens related to a California man who was convicted of supporting terrorists flew home from Pakistan, five months after they were barred from returning to the United States for refusing an FBI interrogation, their attorney said.

Muhammad Ismail, 45, and his son, Jaber, 19, arrived at Kennedy Airport on Sunday afternoon, according to Julia Harumi Mass, an attorney with the American Civil Liberties Union of Northern California. They were scheduled to take a connecting flight to San Francisco yesterday, she said.

The Ismails are an uncle and cousin of Hamid Hayat, 23, of Lodi, who was convicted in April of one count of providing material support to terrorists and three counts of lying about it to FBI agents.

His father, Umer Hayat, was convicted of lying to investigators about the amount of cash he carried to Pakistan on a 2003 trip, but a jury deadlocked on terrorism charges.

In April, the Ismails were barred from boarding a connecting flight to San Francisco from Hong Kong and returned to Pakistan.

There, Jaber Ismail was questioned by FBI agents, but the two refused further interviews and a polygraph.

After complaining to the federal government, Mass received a letter last month from the Department of Homeland Security suggesting that the two were cleared to fly.

"I never imagined that the country I was born in would stop me from coming home for five months and separate me from my family, especially when I was not even charged with a crime," Jaber Ismail said. "I went to Pakistan for religious studies, but I knew that I always wanted to return home to California."

Lawyers For Detainees Challenge Bush Plan (WP/AP)

By Matt Apuzzo, Associated Press

The Washington Post, October 3, 2006

Attorneys for 25 men being held in Afghanistan have launched the first legal challenge of President Bush's plan for prosecuting and interrogating terrorism suspects.

Documents filed yesterday in federal district court here demand that the men be released or be charged and allowed to meet with attorneys. Such a filing, known as a habeas corpus petition, is prohibited under the legislation approved by Congress last week.

DOJ_NMG_0073565

That bill says the military may detain enemy combatants indefinitely and, if officials choose to bring charges, the cases will be heard before a military commission, not a civilian judge.

Bush has not signed the bill but expects to do so soon. Supporters say it is a necessary tool in the war on terrorism.

Yesterday's filing initiates what is likely to be a drawn-out legal fight similar to the one over detainees at a U.S. military prison in Guantanamo Bay, Cuba. Detainees there have dozens of petitions pending.

In civilian courts, the government is required to tell people why they are being held and allow them access to attorneys. People accused of crimes are then afforded speedy trials before juries of their peers.

"With the move that Congress made, the capitulation it made to the president, those rights are in danger of being curtailed," said Vincent Warren, executive director for the Center for Constitutional Rights, which filed the petition.

The new law protects detainees from blatant abuses such as torture but does not require that they be granted legal counsel. It also allows prosecutors to use evidence, such as hearsay, that wouldn't be allowed in civilian courts.

Though the petition was filed before the bill was signed, the law was written retroactively, so a judge would have to strike down at least some of the law in order for the detainees represented by the center to prevail.

The case was assigned to U.S. District Judge Richard J. Leon, who, in a Guantanamo Bay case last year, ruled that Congress had authorized the president to order the detention of "enemy combatants" for the duration of the war on terror. Leon did not set a hearing date for the new case.

The detainees named in the case are being held at Bagram air base north of Kabul, according to court papers.

Accused Tamil Tiger Supporter On Bail (TORSTAR)

By San Grewal, STAFF REPORTER

Toronto Star, October 3, 2006

A 29-year-old Mississauga man facing extradition to the United States on charges that he provided support to a Tamil terrorist group was released on $680,000 bail yesterday in a Brampton courtroom.

Ramanan Mylvaganam will be reunited with his mother and five siblings after spending more than a month in custody, but under the terms of his release will not be allowed to live with them.

Mylvaganam was arrested Aug. 22 after a joint RCMP-FBI investigation.

The fourth-year computer-engineering student at the University of Waterloo is one of 11 men accused of conspiring to help the Tamil Tigers, an organization listed as a terrorist group in both Canada and the U.S. All 11 were arrested since late August, some in Canada and others south of the border.

U.S. authorities are holding three Canadians in custody.

Judge John Belleghem read out the conditions of Mylvaganam's release, which stipulate that he must live with one of the named sureties, must be in the presence of one of them or his mother at all times, and may not communicate with the co-accused.

In addition, he will be required to surrender his passport and report in every Monday. He is banned from using the Internet, a cellphone or any other electronic communication device.

A publication ban on the court proceedings is in effect.

About a dozen relatives in the courtroom broke into smiles and congratulated one another when the decision came down.

Mylvaganam's lawyer, Jeffry House, said the decision, which came after the Crown recommended his client's release, was the right one.

"There's certainly nothing linking my client to the Tamil Tigers," said House, who pointed out the family responsibility his client shoulders. "He brought his mother and five siblings from Sri Lanka, including his disabled sister. Essentially, he's the head of the family; he's the main breadwinner."

Mylvaganam had been working for Microsoft in Seattle in a co-op program before returning to Ontario in May.

Merger With Al Qaeda Deepens Threat From Algerian Radicals (CSM)

By Aron Lund, Contributor To The Christian Science Monitor

The Christian Science Monitor, October 3, 2006

Italian police said Monday they broke up a cell with ties to Algeria's Salafist Group for Preaching and Combat.

ALGIERS, ALGERIA

It was a quiet Ramadan evening, the sunset casting a red glow on the white colonial facades along the city's seafront. With the call of the muezzin, the Muslim prayer crier, Algerians had returned home to break the fast with friends and family, leaving the city nearly deserted.

DOJ_NMG_0073566

During this holy month of Ramadan, the quiet has become reassuring. Many here are anxious; the Islamist radicals of the Salafist Group for Preaching and Combat, better known by the French acronym GSPC, have threatened attacks in the capital during Ramadan.

Already, officials blame the group for violence outside of Algiers. Overnight Friday, in separate incidents, two security officers were killed near a mosque and a bomb derailed a train, according to the Associated Press.

Authorities have amassed some 3,000 police around the city. While the radical Salafist group has been active for years, officials have new cause to take greater precaution to its threats.

In a videotape released by Al Qaeda Sept. 11, 2006, Osama bin Laden's second-in-command Ayman al-Zawahiri announced that "the Salafist Group for Preaching and Combat has joined the Al Qaeda organization ... may this be a bone in the throat of American and French crusaders, and their allies, and sow fear in the hearts of French traitors and sons of apostates."

Born out of Algeria's civil war, which began in 1992 when the army overturned an Islamist electoral victory, the GSPC has long expressed a willingness to join Mr. bin Laden. But not until now has Al Qaeda officially acknowledged a merger. Indeed, this alliance underlines the regional, rather than Algerian, focus of GSPC.

It also underscores concerns spelled out in the National Intelligence Estimate, parts of which were recently declassified, that said "several North African groups, unless countered, are likely to expand their reach and become more capable of multiple and/or mass-casualty attacks outside their traditional areas of operation."

For years, the GSPC has been moving units into the areas of the Sahara, away from the military pressure brought to bear in Algeria's north. A GSPC faction was involved in the desert kidnapping of 32 European tourists in 2003, and in 2005 the group overran a Mauritanian military base. GSPC activity has also been reported in Mali and Niger, and support cells have popped up in surrounding Muslim countries and Europe.

According to the French newspaper Le Figaro, the French Antiterrorist Coordination Unit (UCLAT) estimates that tens of indigenous Islamist cells have contacts with the GSPC, and, adding to their concern, Zawahiri exhorted the Algerians to strike at France in his Sept. 11 tape.

Monday, Italian police reported that they had broken up an Algerian cell that "financed and gave logistical support to Islamic terrorism responsible for massacres in Algeria," [a news agency] reported.

This internationalization, and the GSPC's attempts to rally militants in surrounding countries, has long worried the US. In 2002, the Pentagon announced the Pan-Sahel Initiative, assigning US military advisers to train and equip the militaries of Mauritania, Mali, Niger, and Chad. Also involved are Algeria and Morocco, though both governments deny reports of US forces stationed within their countries.

Some, however, take a less alarmist view of events. University of Virginia professor and Algeria analyst William Quandt, responding to questions via e-mail, describes it as "a pretty small, marginal group that is just struggling to survive," and says that "whatever links it may have to Al Qaeda must be quite tenuous." He estimates the group to have no more than a few hundred members.

But even if real contacts are scarce, official Al Qaeda status could still bolster the GSPC's standing. By linking their struggle to the Iraqi jihad, the organization is able to tap into popular anger at American foreign policy, and the widespread support for Iraq's armed groups that this has generated.

HOMELAND RESPONSE:

Terrorism Insurance Still Holds Uncertainties (WSJ)

The Wall Street Journal, October 3, 2006

WASHINGTON -- Federal officials said the market for terrorism insurance has improved since the Sept. 11, 2001 attacks but further development is uncertain because of the unpredictability of potential damage from a terrorist strike and inadequate demand from policyholders.

An interagency working group headed by Treasury Secretary Henry Paulson, in a report released yesterday, found that the private market hasn't adapted to provide thorough property and casualty coverage for terrorism risks. But it makes no recommendation on whether Congress should make a temporary post-9/11 insurance program permanent.

The findings were consistent with a study by the Government Accountability Office, a congressional watchdog agency, that private insurance and reinsurance markets are reluctant to provide coverage for chemical, nuclear, biological and radiological weapon strikes. But for other forms of coverage, such as group life insurance, policies covering terrorism risks have generally remained available.

DOJ_NMG_0073567

Congress has until the end of next year to study the issue before having to decide whether to extend the current backstop insurance program. The White House has opposed making the program permanent.

UK And US To Meet Over Passenger Data (FT)

By Doug Cameron

Financial Times, October 3, 2006

The UK transport secretary is due to meet with his US counterpart and the country's head of homeland security on Wednesday in a move that could help break impasses over the sharing of airline passenger information and efforts to liberalise the transatlantic aviation market.

Douglas Alexander will meet Michael Chertoff, the US homeland security chief, as well as Mary Peters, who was last week confirmed to succeed Norman Mineta as US transportation secretary.

Mr Alexander's visit comes amid continuing efforts by the US and the European Union to forge a new deal on the provision and sharing of sensitive passenger information.

The US authorities regard the extension of a 2004 pact, which expired on September 30, as a key weapon in its fight against terrorism. While officials on both sides point to "broad agreement" over a new deal, European negotiators have had to wrestle with potential legal challenges over privacy and civil liberties resulting from any expanded agreement.

Mr Alexander is also due to address the International Aviation Club in Washington during his brief US visit, providing the first public platform to express lingering unease among EU governments over progress in long-running efforts to reach a new transatlantic aviation agreement covering route access, as well as competition and security matters.

The UK remains a key player in the negotiations because of the pivotal role of access to London's congested Heathrow airport. Critics of the preliminary pact agreed last year maintain that access to the airport will not be improved by the proposed deal, which is being closely watched by others countries as a potential template for multilateral air transport negotiations.

Heathrow access for US airlines is still viewed as a key element in negotiations with the EU, which, together with the UK, is seeking, expanded investment opportunities in the US industry despite fierce opposition to such moves in the US Congress.

The UK role is heightened by the efforts of Sir Richard Branson, the British entrepreneur, to launch a domestic US carrier, Virgin America, which has held up by widespread domestic opposition.

Mr Alexander's planned meeting with Mr Chertoff reflects widespread industry concern about the need to reach a new deal on the sharing of passenger information.

EU-based airlines have continued to operate flights normally and provide the data to the US authorities through a series of temporary deals and de facto amnesties from legal action by some member states while negotiations continue.

Mr Chertoff backed a proposed deal at the weekend, but EU negotiators returned from Washington to seek clearance for a new pact. Airline officials said the proposal mirrored the existing arrangements, but extended the length of time, which US authorities could keep the information beyond the eight years outlined in the expired deal.

Mr Chertoff has also made it clear in recent speeches that his department would look to share information with intelligence agencies in the US and elsewhere, despite concerns from civil liberties groups on both sides of the Atlantic.

Carriers have to provide the DHS with two sets of information, with passport data sent electronically to the department before take-off under the Advance Passenger Information programme. The current talks centre around the use of details contained in a Passenger Name Reference (PNR), which also include name, contact and payment details which the US authorities said was maintain are invaluable in tackling terrorism and organised crime.

Trial OK'd On One Jewell Claim Against AJC (AJC)

By Gayle White, The Atlanta Journal-constitution

The Atlanta Journal-Constitution, October 3, 2006

Olympic park security guard Richard Jewell's libel suit against The Atlanta Journal-Constitution can go to trial on one of 22 claims, a Fulton County judge ruled Monday.

State Court Judge John R. Mather dismissed most claims against the newspaper in a suit that has been pending since shortly after the 1996 Olympics.

The judge said the newspaper reported truthfully that Jewell was the focus of a federal investigation, that he fit the profile of a lone bomber and most other points surrounding the investigation.

But Mather said a jury would need to decide whether the newspaper was wrong to report that investigators believed Jewell placed a 9-1-1 call warning law enforcement that a bomb would go off in the park.

DOJ_NMG_0073568

The judge acknowledged that Jewell may have initially been suspected of making the call. But, Mather wrote, it ultimately became clear that the call was made just three minutes after Jewell reported finding a suspicious knapsack in the park. The call came from a telephone booth several blocks away, possibly a five to eight minute walk.

Jewell's lawyer, Lin Wood, said Monday, "It is a significant victory for Richard Jewell to get his case before a jury."

Wood indicated he doesn't plan to appeal and is eager to proceed to a trial.

The newspaper's reports regarding the telephone call were "absolutely, undisputably false," Wood said.

The newspaper's lawyer, Tom Clyde, said the reporting accurately reflected the information that was available in the days following the bombing.

"At the time of our reporting, the timing sequence of when the bomb went off and when the phone call was made remained very much in question," he said.

As the timing became clearer, the newspaper "led the way" in reporting the evidence that exonerated Jewell, Clyde said.

John Mellott, publisher of The Atlanta Journal-Constitution, said he is pleased with the court's decision.

He said the newspaper will seek permission to appeal the ruling on the 9-11-call claim "and looks forward to the opportunity to show the accuracy of our reporting on that issue to the Court of Appeals."

Jewell was initially lauded as a hero after a bomb went off at the July 27, 1996, Olympic celebration. He called attention to the suspicious knapsack that held a bomb and helped evacuate the area. But he was later identified by the Journal-Constitution and other media as a suspect.

Jewell was later cleared. In April, 2005, Eric Rudolph pleaded guilty to setting the bomb and three others.

The Olympic Park bomb killed Alice Hawthorne of Albany and injured more than 100 other people.

In August, Gov. Sonny Perdue marked the 10th anniversary of the bombing by commending Jewell, who is now a deputy sheriff in Meriwether County, Ga.

Judge: Jewell Libel Suit Against Newspaper Can Proceed (CLE)

The Columbus Ledger-Enquirer, October 3, 2006

ATLANTA - A judge ruled Monday that former Olympic security guard Richard Jewell's libel suit against The Atlanta Journal-Constitution can proceed, although he dismissed most of Jewell's claims that the newspaper had defamed him in its reports on the 1996 bombing at Centennial Olympic Park.

State Court Judge John R. Mather said a jury would decide whether the newspaper was wrong to report that investigators believed Jewell placed a 911 call warning that a bomb would go off in the park.

The July 27, 1996 bombing killed one person and wounded more than 100. Jewell was praised as a hero for finding the backpack that contained the bomb and helping to clear park visitors from the scene. But he soon fell under a cloud of suspicion after it was reported that the FBI was investigating him for possible involvement.

Jewell was later cleared, and some news organizations settled legal claims that he had been defamed. The Journal-Constitution defended its reporting of the investigation.

In April, 2005 Eric Rudolph pleaded guilty to setting the Olympic park bomb and three others, including a fatal explosion at a Birmingham, Ala., abortion clinic.

This year, Gov. Sonny Perdue marked the 10th anniversary of the bombing by commending Jewell, who is now a deputy sheriff in Meriwether County.

Mather ruled that the Journal-Constitution reported truthfully that Jewell was the focus of investigation, that investigators believed he fit the profile of a lone bomber and most other points surrounding the probe.

However, the judge acknowledged that although Jewell may have been suspected initially of making the 911 call, it became clear that the call was made three minutes after Jewell found the suspicious backpack - from a telephone booth several blocks away.

Jewell's lawyer, Lin Wood, said the newspaper's reports on the telephone call were "absolutely" false.

"It is a significant victory for Richard Jewell to get his case before a jury," Wood said.

Tom Clyde, the newspaper's lawyer, said that when the stories were published, "the timing sequence of when the bomb went off and when the phone call was made remained very much in question."

Clyde said the Journal-Constitution later "led the way" in reporting evidence that exonerated Jewell.

The newspaper's publisher, John Mellott, said it will seek permission to appeal the ruling on the 911-call claim "and looks forward to the opportunity to show the accuracy of our reporting on that issue to the Court of Appeals."

Nagin Wants Minorities In On Katrina Recovery (USAT/AP)

USA Today, October 3, 2006

NEW ORLEANS — New Orleans Mayor Ray Nagin signed an order Monday requiring that large businesses use as many local and minority-owned firms as possible when they seek millions of dollars in tax incentives and grants for Hurricane Katrina recovery.

Nagin's executive order requires applicants for the incentives to involve at least 50% local businesses and 35% women- or minority-controlled businesses whenever possible.

A similar requirement has been in place for government contracts, but the mayor's order expands it to businesses applying for assistance promised by federally funded recovery programs that are administered by the city and the state.

"We just want to make sure we don't go back to a city of haves and have-nots," Nagin said. "This is imperative, not only for us but for our kids and grandkids."

In the immediate aftermath of the August 2005 storm, many local firms complained that the main beneficiaries of large government contracts for emergency cleanup and recovery were out-of-state businesses and workers.

Nagin said his order should help ensure that local firms enjoy the benefits of the enormous federal rebuilding investment and help them secure small-business loans and other financing.

He said his order should not slow the rebuilding or send more businesses to adjacent parishes that don't have similar requirements. "This is such a big pie. We just want to make sure this pie expands," Nagin said at a news conference.

City workers will examine projects seeking incentives or tax breaks and determine reasonable goals for local and women- or minority-controlled companies, said Judith Williams, co-chair of the mayor's 100-day commission, established at the start of Nagin's second term.

"We're not looking to make it impossible for folks to do business here," she said.

In addition to the executive order on local and disadvantaged businesses, Nagin announced the signing of two other executive orders Monday.

One requires city agencies to develop a list of pending projects so small businesses are aware of potential contracts, and another requires businesses planning developments to account for historic and natural resource effects.

WAR NEWS:

Iraqi Premier Offers Plan To Stop Violence (WP/AP)

By Lee Keath

The Washington Post, October 3, 2006

BAGHDAD, Oct. 2 -- Iraq's prime minister announced a new plan Monday aimed at ending the deepening crisis between Shiite and Sunni parties in his government and uniting them behind the drive to stop sectarian killings that have bloodied the country for months.

The four-point plan, which emerged after talks between both sides, aims to resolve disputes by giving every party a voice in how security forces operate against violence on a neighborhood-by-neighborhood basis.

Local committees will be formed in each Baghdad district -- made up of representatives of every party, religious and tribal leaders and security officials -- to consult on security efforts. A Sunni representative, for example, could raise a complaint if he thinks police are not pursuing a Shiite militia after an attack. A central committee, also comprising all the parties, will coordinate with the armed forces.

"We have taken the decision to end sectarian hatred once and for all," Prime Minister Nouri al-Maliki said. "We have vowed before almighty God to stop the bloodshed."

In a possible boost to the effort to rein in the violence, a radical cleric who leads one of the most powerful Shiite militias, Moqtada al-Sadr, has ordered his followers to put aside their weapons temporarily, a Sadr spokesman said.

Maliki announced his plan hours after gunmen abducted 14 computer shop employees in a bold midday attack in downtown Baghdad, the second mass kidnapping in as many days.

The bodies of seven of the 24 captives seized Sunday at a frozen-meat factory were found dumped in southern Baghdad.

Sunni politicians blamed Shiite militias for both mass kidnappings and demanded the government take action.

Maliki is under increasing pressure to stop the violence, which has killed thousands since February. U.S. Ambassador Zalmay Khalilzad warned this week that Maliki must make progress within the next two months to avert a crisis.

But Maliki's administration has been plagued by growing mistrust between its Shiite and Sunni members, who each accuse the other of fueling the bloodshed.

DOJ_NMG_0073570

When Maliki took office in May, he announced a 24-point reconciliation plan that laid out ways to tackle violence -- including an amnesty for militants who put down their weapons as well as security crackdowns. So far, the plan has done little to stem the daily killings.

Sunnis accuse the Shiite-led security forces of turning a blind eye to killing of Sunnis by Shiite militias -- some of which are linked to parties in the government. Sunnis have accused Maliki, a Shiite, of being hesitant to crack down on the militias.

Shiites, meanwhile, accused Sunni parties of links to terrorists after a bodyguard of a Sunni party leader, Adnan al-Dulaimi, was arrested by U.S. forces Friday and accused of plotting al-Qaeda bombings. Some Shiite politicians demanded a government reshuffle to push out Sunni parties.

The local committees aim to resolve these disputes.

Iraqi Leader Unveils New Security Plan Amid Rising Violence (NYT)

By Richard A. Oppel Jr. And Qais Mizher

The New York Times, October 3, 2006

BAGHDAD, Oct. 2 — Faced with unrelenting sectarian killings and growing anger from Sunni Arab leaders, Prime Minister Nuri Kamal al-Maliki announced a new security plan on Monday that calls for committees of neighborhood leaders to try to defuse sectarian crises in their own areas and also for new supervision of the news media.

But the details of the plan were vague, and it was not clear how effective it would be in the face of recent unsuccessful attempts, through both political and military initiatives, to quell the sectarian violence and growing militia dominance that have pushed the country to the verge of civil war.

News of the plan came amid brazen sectarian abductions and killings in the past two days that have enraged Sunni legislators, some of whom accused Shiite lawmakers of focusing their efforts against Sunni militants while ignoring — and even empowering — Shiite militiamen.

In addition, the past few days have been one of the deadliest stretches for coalition forces in months, as the military reported the deaths of 10 more American and British servicemen since Saturday. At least 13 troops have been killed in the past three days.

The 10 newly reported deaths included five marines killed in Anbar Province, three of them in enemy attacks, one in a vehicle accident Sunday and one in an attack Saturday. Three soldiers were killed in Baghdad on Monday by small-arms fire, and another died Sunday after his vehicle was struck by a roadside bomb. A British soldier was also reportedly killed in Basra on Sunday.

In Baghdad, increasingly bold abductions have continued to underscore the degree to which many areas of the capital are not under the government's control.

Shortly after noon on Monday, men wearing police uniforms and riding in eight pickup trucks resembling those used by Interior Ministry forces blocked off a street near a technical college in eastern Baghdad and abducted 14 men working at an electronics store, according to the Iraqi police. The kidnappers' trucks did not have license plates, but otherwise the men appeared to possess all of the gear and dress of official security forces, the police said.

The abductions followed the kidnapping on Sunday of 26 food-processing workers in the western Baghdad neighborhood of Amel — and the discovery of the dead bodies of at least 10 of them shortly afterward, an Interior Ministry official said Monday.

The bodies were found in a southern Baghdad neighborhood, some with clear signs of torture, and most shot in the head, the official said. Four of the food workers escaped or were released, but the fate of the other 12 is unknown, he said.

The kidnappings prompted the country's most influential Sunni party, the Iraqi Islamic Party, to demand to know how victims from Amel could be transported so far without being discovered at Iraqi police and army checkpoints.

"We are sure that this work was done by terrorist militias working hard to kill Iraqis in the daylight, without anything to fear" from the Iraqi police or troops, the party said in a statement.

In Parliament, what normally would have been a perfunctory exercise to extend by a month the country's state of emergency led some Sunnis to denounce the government's inability to stop militias that have infiltrated Iraqi security forces. Continuing to give the security forces expanded powers makes it easier for militiamen to literally get away with murder, some charged.

"The state of emergency gives power to these bad guys in the security forces," said Salim Abdullah, a Sunni member of Parliament. "We give them power, but they are not accountable."

Some Shiite politicians, meanwhile, have accused Sunni lawmakers of having close ties to insurgents.

In the past week, Mr. Maliki's four-month-old government has faced growing criticism from some American military officials as well as Sunni lawmakers for its inability so far to rein in militiamen who operate with impunity, sometimes with the protection of Iraqi security forces.

DOJ_NMG_0073571

In an effort to make some strides against militias, Mr. Maliki's security plan would create local committees of political leaders, tribal sheiks, clerics and members of the security forces that would monitor security in every Baghdad neighborhood.

"We are doing this to end sectarianism in Iraq forever," said Mr. Maliki, a Shiite, as he announced the plan on television flanked by Sunni lawmakers.

The committees would have no control over the security forces and would instead function as arbitrators of local sectarian disputes, intelligence gatherers for security forces, and as a bridge between civilians and the police and army, according to lawmakers involved in drafting the plan.

"These commissions will never have any authority to lead or command security forces," said Jalaladin al-Sagheir, a Shiite member of Parliament. "It will just let the people know that they are a part of their district's protection."

The local committees will report to a "central commission for peace and security," which will work with Iraqi armed forces. There will also be a new commission for monitoring the news media, but no other details were available. The plan will be reviewed by lawmakers every month.

Iraq PM Announces Plan To Unite Parties (AP-Y)

By Lee Keath, Associated Press Writer

AP, October 3, 2006

Iraq's prime minister announced a new plan Monday aimed at ending the deepening crisis between Shiite and Sunni parties in his government and uniting them behind the drive to stop sectarian killings that have bloodied the country for months.

The four-point plan, which emerged after talks between both sides, aims to resolve disputes by giving every party a voice in how security forces operate against violence on a neighborhood by neighborhood level.

Local committees will be formed in each Baghdad district — made up of representatives of every party, religious and tribal leaders and security officials — to consult on security efforts. A Sunni representative, for example, could raise a complaint if he feels police are not pursuing a Shiite militia after an attack. A central committee, also made up of all the parties, will coordinate with the armed forces.

"We have taken the decision to end sectarian hatred once and for all," Prime Minister Nouri al-Maliki told reporters. "We have vowed before Almighty God to stop the bloodshed."

In a possible boost to the effort to rein in the violence, a radical cleric who heads one of the most powerful Shiite militias, Muqtada al-Sadr, has ordered his followers to put aside their weapons temporarily, a Sadr spokesman told The Associated Press.

Al-Maliki announced his plan hours after gunmen abducted 14 computer shop employees in a bold, midday attack in downtown Baghdad, the second mass kidnapping in as many days.

The bodies of seven of the 24 captives seized Sunday were found dumped in southern Baghdad. Sunni politicians blamed Shiite militias for both mass kidnappings and demanded the government take action.

Al-Maliki is under increasing pressure to stop the violence, which has killed thousands since February. U.S. Ambassador Zalmay Khalilzad warned this week that al-Maliki must make progress within the next two months to avert a crisis.

But al-Maliki's administration has been plagued by growing mistrust between its Shiite and Sunni members, who each accuse the other of fueling the bloodshed.

Al-Maliki announced a 24-point reconciliation plan when he took office in May, which laid down ways to tackle violence — including an amnesty for militants who put down their weapons as well as security crackdowns. So far, the plan has done little to stem the daily killings.

Sunnis accuse the Shiite-led security forces of turning a blind eye to killing of Sunnis by Shiite militias — some of which are linked to parties in the government. Sunnis have accused al-Maliki, a Shiite, of being hesitant to crack down on the militias.

Shiites, meanwhile, accused Sunni parties of links to terrorists after a bodyguard of a Sunni party leader, Adnan al-Dulaimi, was arrested by U.S. forces on Friday and accused of plotting al-Qaida bombings. Some Shiite politicians demanded a government reshuffle to push out Sunni parties.

The local committees aim to resolve these disputes.

"We will spare no efforts to succeed in this great initiative which we agreed on today to stop the violence and killings in Baghdad and in all Iraq," al-Dulaimi said at a news conference with al-Maliki. The two men signed an agreement with other Sunni and Shiite politicians on the four-point plan.

In addition to the local and central committees, the plan calls for establishment of a media committee and a monthly review of progress, al-Maliki said.

However, the new plan does not directly tackle the issue of cracking down on Shiite militias, a step Sunnis demand but many Shiites oppose.

DOJ_NMG_0073572

In theory, the committees would give Sunnis a venue to press security forces to take action against militias. But Shiites on the committee would have an equal chance to try to prevent action.

The top parties are to meet Tuesday to work out the details of how the committees will work, but already divisions were showing — even over wording. Shiite parties want the new plan to be focused on "terrorism," which would suggest insurgents, while Sunnis want it to address "violence," which would include Shiite militias.

The most well-known of these militias is the Mahdi Army led by al-Sadr, who on Friday ordered his fighters to put aside their weapons temporarily. He told supporters "the resistance (should) be political. ... He does not want to see a single drop of (Iraqi) blood shed," said Sadr spokesman Amir al-Husseini.

The Mahdi Army has been blamed for many attacks on Sunnis since the bombing of a Shiite shrine north of Baghdad in February sparked the wave of sectarian violence. But U.S. commanders have suggested that since then some militants have split from al-Sadr, saying he is not radical enough and carrying out attacks on their own.

Violence has not slowed in the wake of al-Sadr's orders. A curfew slapped on Baghdad on Saturday after the arrest of al-Dulaimi's bodyguard brought a day of calm. But as soon as it was lifted, violence explode.

More than 50 bodies — most bound and many of them showing signs of torture — were found in Baghdad alone on Sunday, apparent victims of sectarian killings, police said.

Midday Monday, gunmen wearing military-style uniforms pulled up to a group of computer stores at the Technical University in downtown Baghdad and pulled out 14 employees, forcing them into SUVs and driving off, police said.

On Sunday, gunmen stormed into a frozen meat factory in Baghdad and forced 24 workers into a refrigerator truck, shooting two others who refused to get in.

Hours later, seven bodies were found in a Sunni district of the Baghdad neighborhood of Dora and were identified as workers from the factory. The fate of the other abducted workers was not known. In similar mass kidnappings in the past, the attackers have sorted out Shiites and Sunnis and killed those of the rival sect.

Lawmakers from the Iraqi Islamic Party, a Sunni political group, said the kidnapped workers were all Sunnis and called on the government to act.

"It is the time the government takes serious and urgent steps to disband these criminal organizations and to save the people from their harm," they said in a statement.

At least 20 other people were killed in attacks around Iraq, including a bomb blast in Baghdad's downtown Al-Nasir Square that killed four people and wounded 13, and mortar barrages against two Sunni neighborhoods that killed two people and wounded dozens.

The U.S command said three U.S. Marines died in Anbar province Saturday — two in combat and the third in a vehicle accident. A British soldier was killed and another wounded in a mortar attack in the southern city of Basra. One shell hit a nearby house, killing two children.

____

AP correspondent Qassim Abdul-Zahra in Baghdad contributed to this report.

Iraqis Plan A Team Effort To End Violence (LAT)

By Solomon Moore

The Los Angeles Times, October 3, 2006

BAGHDAD — Leaders of Iraq's major political blocs announced a plan Monday to create local committees of clerics, tribal leaders and military officers to help quell violence in the capital.

The committees would have no police powers but would work with Iraqi authorities to set up checkpoints and identify dangers in the community, and advise police officers on other security issues.

The government also announced that a central committee for peace and security would monitor police performance in Baghdad's neighborhoods and report abuses.

The plan, unveiled by Prime Minister Nouri Maliki in a televised news conference, appeared to gain broad support among Iraq's major Sunni and Shiite political blocs Monday night.

Sunni Arab insurgent groups and Shiite Muslim militias, some tied to Iraq's leading political parties, are blamed for most of the slayings in the capital, which has been a sectarian battleground for more than a year.

"The agreement between the leaders of the political blocs is going to be activated tonight, and our brothers will work hard to stop the bloodshed," said Maliki, flanked by political party leaders in Baghdad's fortified Green Zone.

Although the plan appears to conflict with a Shiite proposal to create bands of armed volunteers to guard neighborhoods, Shiite politicians and clerics endorsed Maliki's announcement.

DOJ_NMG_0073573

"Despite the bloodshed taking place every day, there is a strong intention by the political blocs," said Hadi Amri, a parliament member and leader of the Badr Brigade, one of the nation's largest Shiite paramilitary groups. "During the last two days, we sensed a universal desire to stop the violence, which is harming all the political blocs and, most importantly, the Iraqi people."

Shiite cleric and legislator Sheik Jalaluddin Saghir urged Iraqis to work with the plan.

"I hope that people from all sects will take this message presented today from the political blocs and understand that the politicians have agreed, and not weaken in their fight against terror," he said.

Ammar Wajeeh, a prominent Sunni Arab politician, was more cautious. "We will see whether this agreement will be effective or not," he said. "The purpose of this initiative is to strengthen national reconciliation and to end the influence of militias."

The announcement came less than a week after senior U.S. military officials in Iraq told reporters that Maliki, a Shiite, was not doing enough to stop sectarian violence in Baghdad, and that he was impeding planned offensives against Shiite paramilitary fighters.

Army Gen. George W. Casey Jr., the commander of ground forces in Iraq, disavowed that criticism last week. On Monday, he issued a joint statement with U.S. Ambassador Zalmay Khalilzad, saying the plan was the result of "two days of frank and intense discussions and negotiation."

"This is a significant step in the right direction and shows that the Iraqi leaders want their country to succeed and are responding to the wishes of their people for security," the statement said.

As the politicians announced their security plan, Al Sharqiya, an Iraqi satellite television channel, reported that the number of violent deaths in Baghdad had reached a high of 1,980 in September.

The figure could not be independently confirmed, but if correct it would undercut assertions by U.S. officials that an offensive in the capital was making headway against sectarian violence.

The announcement also came on a day when Baghdad police found at least 40 bodies, many of them handcuffed and bearing gunshot and torture wounds. Ten of the victims were identified as Sunni Arabs who had been among a group of 22 people kidnapped from a food processing plant Sunday.

At least 20 people were killed throughout Iraq on Monday, including two U.S. soldiers shot to death in Baghdad.

The U.S. military also announced that a Marine was killed in combat and another died in an accident Saturday. Both occurred in Al Anbar province.

In Baghdad, a large force of gunmen dressed in police uniforms and driving seven identical sport utility vehicles commonly used by Iraqi security forces abducted 14 employees from an electronics market.

Interior Ministry officials denied any connection to the incident.

A group of armed men hijacked a minibus, fatally shot the driver and kidnapped four female Finance Ministry employees. Police fought off the attackers and rescued the women.

Gunmen also shot at an Education Ministry security convoy, killing one guard and injuring another.

Mortar attacks on a Sunni Arab neighborhood in southwest Baghdad killed four people and injured 20, and four bomb attacks elsewhere in the capital killed at least seven people and wounded at least 29 others.

North of Hawija, in the Kirkuk oil region, insurgents shot and killed one policeman and injured another.

In the southern port city of Basra, a British convoy was attacked by gunmen. A soldier was reportedly killed.

In Babil province, a car with four occupants exploded at an Iraqi army checkpoint, killing the motorists.

U.S. forces turned over Forward Operating Base Duke, a military base in the southern province of Najaf, to Iraqi border patrol forces.

Iraq's Interior Ministry assumed control of a wide swath of desert extending from the Saudi Arabian border to Al Anbar province.

Iraq War Draws Foreign Jihadists, But Not In Droves (CSM)

By Peter Grier

The Christian Science Monitor, October 3, 2006

WASHINGTON

It may be true that Iraq is shaping a new generation of terrorist leaders, and that the US presence there is a "cause célèbre" for jihadists, as a recently declassified US intelligence assessment holds.

But that doesn't mean the Iraqi insurgency is a wholly owned Al Qaeda subsidiary. Foreign fighters make up a relatively small slice of the forces targeting the US military in Iraq. Most insurgents are native Iraqi Sunni Islamists or former members of the old Baath party regime.

DOJ_NMG_0073574

Thus, to Osama bin Laden, Iraq might be more important as a symbol than a physical battlefield or training ground. Fighting there may not produce as many hardened mujahideen eager to export jihad as did the struggle against the Soviet occupation of Afghanistan.

"It is not obvious now how many Iraqi jihadists will support the global jihad of bin Laden and how many will focus their efforts on Iraq's fledgling state," says a recent analysis of the evolving terrorist threat by the Center for Strategic and International Studies.

The leak of a National Intelligence Estimate on terrorism trends to The New York Times, and President Bush's subsequent move to declassify the NIE's key judgments, has focused new attention on the relationship between the war in Iraq and global jihad.

One NIE conclusion is that US involvement in Iraq has served as a recruiting sergeant for Islamist terrorism. "Perceived jihadist success there would inspire more fighters to continue the struggle elsewhere.... Should jihadists leaving Iraq perceive themselves ... to have failed, we judge fewer fighters will be inspired to carry on the fight," says the NIE.

But the NIE - or at least the portions declassified so far - does not estimate how many of these jihadists are fighting in Iraq today, and how many may be members of terrorist cells elsewhere, looking to Iraq for inspiration. Foreigners a small share of Iraqi opposition

Abu Musab al-Zarqawi, the Jordanian-born leader of Al Qaeda in Iraq killed by a US airstrike in June, was undoubtedly a key insurgent leader, able to rally native Iraqi Sunni Islamists to his cause. Evidence suggests, however, that foreign fighters such as he are a small minority of the overall insurgent force.

Between 50 and 70 foreign fighters sneak over the border into Iraq every month, Maj. Gen. William Caldwell, chief US military spokesman in Iraq, said last week. Most come from Saudi Arabia, Sudan, Egypt, or Syria.

Between January and mid-September, US or Iraqi government forces captured some 630 foreign fighters, according to General Caldwell. Of these, 370 remain in detention in Iraq. The rest have been processed through Iraqi courts and sentenced, or released. Some may have been taken to undisclosed locations elsewhere.

The total number of foreign fighters in Iraq is between 800 and 2,000, according to estimates by the Brookings Institution, a think tank in Washington. In contrast, the total strength of the insurgency is more than 20,000 people, according to Brookings. That means the vast majority of its fighters come from Iraq itself.

"In proportion to the whole insurgency, [the percentage of foreign fighters] is very small," says Aidan Kirby, a terrorism expert at the Center for Strategic and International Studies (CSIS).

On the one hand, this makes Iraq's effect on the global jihad of Mr. bin Laden unpredictable. The Afghan war against Soviet invaders in the 1980s created substantial numbers of battle-hardened Islamist fighters. It's unclear whether Iraq will have an effect of the same magnitude.

Some native Iraqi insurgents may become part of the larger Al Qaeda network. But many more are likely to be uninterested in uprooting themselves to take the fight to other countries. 'It only takes a few'

On the other hand, numbers are not the sole indicator of the scale of the danger. Already there are anecdotal reports of foreign fighters traveling back to Europe from Iraq, prepared to spread jihad, says Ms. Kirby of CSIS.

"It really only takes a few people," she says. "They're acting as a force multiplier."

Jordan, Kuwait, Syria, Qatar, and Saudi Arabia have seen some spillover of violence from Iraq inside their borders, notes a CSIS analysis of Al Qaeda. And terrorists appear to have won a sanctuary in Iraq's overwhelmingly Sunni Anbar Province. "The likelihood is that this sanctuary will be there for years," says the report.

Moreover, the death of Mr. Zarqawi may affect Al Qaeda's targeting. A charismatic leader with his own agenda, he was focused on attacking "the near enemy," according to Brian Fishman, a scholar at the US Army's Combating Terrorism Center. And Zarqawi's near enemy appeared to be apostate Arabs in the Middle East.

Bin Laden, on the other hand, emphasizes the "far enemy" - the US and the West. "Zarqawi's death may actually strengthen the negotiating position of jihadists dedicated to attacking the US homeland," writes Mr. Fishman in an article in the current issue of The Washington Quarterly.

Torture Site May Be Linked To Security Forces (USAT)

By Rick Jervis

USA Today, October 3, 2006

BAGHDAD — U.S. and Iraqi troops conducting a raid in Baghdad found a blood-soaked torture chamber that may have been operated by a Shiite Muslim militia with ties to the government.

Soldiers found Interior Ministry badges in the compound, and U.S. forces saw an Iraqi policeman on the roof of the compound before Sunday's raid, said Lt. Col. Avanulas Smiley, 40, a battalion commander who led U.S. troops in the raid.

DOJ_NMG_0073575

"If there's linkage to Iraqi security forces, then obviously we have a problem and it needs to be addressed," Smiley said.

One room of the complex contained a long wooden bench stained with a large pool of blood and urine, which could indicate victims were tortured there.

In another room, posters of radical Shiite cleric Muqtada al-Sadr and his white-bearded father, the late Grand Ayatollah Mohammed Sadiq al-Sadr, were plastered on the walls. On the floor were stained mattresses strewn among baseball bats, bayonets and electric drills.

The compound was empty when it was raided, Smiley said. Troops found a hole at the back of the complex, through which its occupants may have escaped, he said.

The compound belongs to a social organization named for al-Sadr's father, who was killed by Saddam Hussein's regime in 1999, said Lt. Col. Jonathan Withington, a 4th Infantry Division spokesman.

On Monday, Brig. Gen. David Halverson, deputy commander of U.S. troops in Baghdad, toured the one-story office complex as investigators looked over evidence.

Members of a special U.S. task force that investigates death squads collected blood samples and placed pieces of evidence in plastic bags. The investigators, who work with Iraqi counterparts, will try to determine whether the site was tied to Muqtada al-Sadr's organization, Smiley said.

U.S. and Iraqi forces launched an offensive in June aimed at securing Baghdad, a city of 6 million. As part of the offensive, an additional 10,000 U.S. and Iraqi troops were moved into the capital to reinforce the roughly 52,000 already here.

The biggest challenge for U.S. and Iraqi forces now is tackling religious violence that has pitted Sunnis against Shiites, particularly in the capital. "Violence carried out by Sunni and Shiite factions appeared to be carving Baghdad, and the country as a whole, into sectarian zones, protected by various armed groups," said a report last week by Anthony Cordesman of the Center for Strategic and International Studies.

There have been signs that some of the militias may have ties to the Shiite-dominated government security forces, particularly paramilitary forces in the Interior Ministry.

U.S. and Iraqi officers have pledged to crack down on any illegal militias, regardless of their affiliation or connections. "Whoever's doing the killing, we don't really care what political party they belong to," Halverson said. "If they're breaking the rule of law, we're going to bring them to justice."

U.S. and Iraqi officers have expressed concerns, however, that the Shiite-dominated government may prevent the military from aggressively going after Shiite militias. "The government should announce clearly to the public that all militias should be dissolved," Maj. Gen. Bashar Mahmoud Ayoub said in August.

"There should be a militia policy that is supported by (Iraq's parliament) to enhance the security in Iraq," Halverson said.

Muqtada al-Sadr's militia, the Mahdi Army, battled U.S. forces in 2004. Today, however, al-Sadr's organization has 30 seats in the parliament and controls five Cabinet posts. Prime Minister Nouri al-Maliki, a Shiite, relies on al-Sadr's organization for political support.

Sunday's raid was conducted after Iraqi officers developed the intelligence and planned the operation. The Iraqis then invited their U.S. advisers along, Smiley said.

Smiley said he is impressed with the progress of the Iraqi army and national police troops with whom he has worked. But he said he remains distrustful of some local Iraqi police, who often act on tribal or political loyalties.

"I wouldn't say I find it often, but I suspect it often," Smiley said. "You can't always prove it. And that can cause some frustration on the street with soldiers."

More Troops, Please (WSJ)

By Pete Hegseth

The Wall Street Journal, October 3, 2006

I've heard President Bush repeatedly state he will send more troops to Iraq if the commanders on the ground ask for them. I think, having returned home from Iraq two months ago, that there must be a breakdown in communication somewhere along the line. Maybe units on the ground are painting too rosy a picture for the generals. Perhaps the generals aren't asking because it goes against the "can do" ethos of the Army. Possibly the military is being squeezed by the Pentagon to do more with less. Or maybe the White House doesn't want to admit more troops are needed. In any case, while I do not have the answers nor do I seek to place blame, it is painfully obvious there's a disconnect.

I volunteered to serve in Iraq because I believe in our mission there. I share the president's conviction about the Iraq war -- we can and must win, for the Iraqi people, for the future of our country and for peace-loving people everywhere. But I'm frustrated. America is fighting with a hand tied behind its back. Soldiers have all the equipment we need -- armored humvees, body armor for every body part, superior technology, etc. -- but we simply do not have enough troops in Iraq, and we need them now. * * *

DOJ_NMG_0073576

After witnessing two national elections during three months in Baghdad, my Army unit moved north to Samarra, where we spent eight months sowing the seeds of progress. While we had success in uprooting the insurgency and building the local government, it wasn't enough. We had just enough troops to control Samarra and secure ourselves, but not enough to bring lasting stability or security. "Not enough" became the story of my year in Iraq.

The future of Samarra and Iraq as a whole, ultimately lies in the hands of her people -- their sympathies are the ultimate prize in this war. No matter how many insurgents we kill, city leaders we meet or policemen we enlist, it is all for naught if we cannot provide security and stability. Tribal sheikhs told us that even within Samarra -- deep in the Sunni triangle -- a vast majority of people just want peace and order and will side with whoever can provide it. Right now Samarrans rightfully question who that will be.

The end goal in Samarra is for Iraqis to do everything for themselves. But their government and security forces are not ready. Insurgents use death threats and murder to assert power over anyone working with the City Council or joining the police force. This atmosphere forces moderate Samarrans to keep their mouths shut, and their silence abets the insurgents who live and fight in Samarra. Despite killing scores of insurgents, we are unable to provide lasting security, and so the Samarran street slips away.

Two things are to blame for our predicament, one a corollary of the other. The first reason is that we did not have enough troops in Samarra. The skill and courage of 150 American soldiers prevented chaos, but was never enough to fully secure a city of 120,000 people or maintain the rule of law. The soldiers in the city were preoccupied with defending themselves and conducting night raids, and were therefore largely unable to regularly patrol during the day -- thus giving insurgents reign to move freely and intimidate the local population. A visitor in Samarra on an average day would be hard-pressed to point out a single American humvee traversing local neighborhoods. The same is true for Baghdad.

Our four-vehicle civil affairs patrol was often the only American presence deep inside the city and we were frequently greeted by locals with the question, "Where have you been?" Americans can't of course be omnipresent; but we should at least be there when it matters. When Americans are there, either the insurgents are not or they are on the losing side of a firefight.

Second, because of a lack of troops, American military leaders are forced to make a choice between mission objectives and self-preservation. Many of our leaders are opting to guard supply routes and coagulate on sprawling military bases, rather than consistently moving into dangerous areas and fighting the insurgency. In our case, we had 500 soldiers stationed outside Samarra who made infrequent trips into the city center. There is little reason why most of these troops were not stationed inside Samarra, canvassing every neighborhood with platoon-sized patrol bases and suffocating insurgent operations. Rather than take the risks necessary -- like small patrol bases and frequent foot patrols -- our unit opted to secure itself and its supply routes rather than commit resources inside the city. And while this approach is safer in the short run, it only prolongs mission accomplishment, ultimately endangering more troops. We often speculated our unit would be back next year, driving the same streets with even fewer guys.

In due time, the Iraqi Security Forces will take over Samarra, but they are not ready yet. If the Americans left today, the Iraqis would be co-opted by the insurgents -- who are utterly ruthless, willing to kill family members of policemen or decapitate Iraqi soldiers to preserve disorder. It will take time. Both the Iraqi Army and Samarra Police need to get bloodied a bit and bounce back, proving their strength to the people. They will eventually be ready, but until then, security belongs to us.

I also understand calling for more troops is contrary to conventional thinking inside government and the military. Supporters of the current approach argue sending more troops would further inflame anti-American sentiment, incite more violence and retard independent progress. My experience suggests otherwise. American troops are tolerated, even welcomed when they effectively provide security; but their presence is cursed when it does not accompany progress. Violence persists not because American troops are present, but because our presence is futile. Many local leaders asked us, "How come the most powerful country in the world cannot defeat local criminals and thugs?" They suggested our failure was part of a larger conspiracy to keep the Iraqi people suffering.

I have not lost the optimism that sent me to Iraq. We did make gains. Our 10-man civil affairs team established good relationships with brave Iraqi leaders and sat across from them as equals. I watched city leaders battle insurgents, not only with guns but with newspapers and economic development. By the time we left, the City Council was meeting on its own accord and with increasing legitimacy, forming committees to oversee fuel allocation, new construction and security. Increased home construction was evident and local markets were open.

Even the security situation inside the city improved. Previous summers in Samarra had been extremely violent, but the summer of 2006 was different. Days passed without a significant attack inside the city. Less than 150 Americans, along with Iraqi counterparts, controlled a town of over 120,000 Sunni Arabs through targeted raids and sniper operations. One local insurgent even begged city leaders for amnesty in exchange for good conduct. Our unit killed or captured hundreds of insurgents, knocking the wind out of the local insurgency -- but never crushing it.

DOJ_NMG_0073577

I believe, as the president noted, that "the safety of America depends on the outcome of the battle in the streets of Baghdad." Why then do we have just enough troops in Iraq not to lose? Most of the people I've spoken with since coming home -- those both for and against the war -- believe we must finish the job in Iraq. Americans understand a defeat in Iraq would have horrible consequences for America and its allies for decades to come. America has the capacity to win and the will to support a winning strategy.

Why then are we pursuing a bare minimum approach?

First Lt. Hegseth served as an infantry platoon leader and civil-military operations officer in Iraq with the 101st Airborne Division.

Death Never 'in Vain' (USAT)

By Kathy Roth-douquet

USA Today, October 3, 2006

Died in vain?

President Bush wants to stay the course in Iraq so that those who have died there will not have died "in vain." Anti-war activist Cindy Sheehan urges us to pull out immediately to prevent more Americans from dying in vain.

Bush and Sheehan have both got it wrong.

Too many partisans in the battle for Iraq policy have used soldiers' deaths as a football in a bid to score points. It's cruel (imagine being a family member and being told the death of your loved one was in vain), but even more, it's just wrong. Those who argue that a soldier's death has meaning only if the politics are "right" misunderstand military service in America.

"We think of Kristian (Menchaca) as a hero," says Sylvia Grice of her cousin, 23, one of the soldiers kidnapped, tortured and killed by insurgents last June in Iraq. "He didn't have to do this. He believed in what he was doing." The terrible death's meaning, in other words, came from the soldier's commitment. It is his commitment that gives his life meaning, and even his country's possible errors — staying in too long, leaving too early — can't take that meaning from him.

The phrase "died in vain" comes to us from our great moralist president, Abraham Lincoln. In Gettysburg's graveyard, Lincoln urged the gathered to fight on for the survival of the United States so that those interred in that ground would not have died in vain. He did not argue that a soldier who loses his battle or his war has died in vain. Instead, he noted that America itself — its ideas and ideals — is what gives the soldier's life meaning.

So where does the meaning of military sacrifice come from?

Military service in America flows from our Constitution as a covenant among free people. The parties to this sacred contract are, on one hand, a group of citizens who assent to bear arms for their country for a time, and on the other, the rest of us, the civilians whose task it is to decide whether to send our compatriots into peril. Those bearing arms promise to bring their loyalty, skill and honor to the task; the civilians, for their part, promise to weigh the fate of those soldiers with seriousness and care, and provide the support necessary to those who go.

The meaning in the lives of those who bear arms resides in their loyalty to the democracy that sends them, and the skill and honor they bring to their task. If the civilians who send them falter in their decision-making, it dishonors those who steer and not those who serve.

So let's apply this to the war in Iraq. What if the war is a mistake, or we pull out too early? Are the deaths then for naught?

From the standpoint of a soldier or Marine, or in my case, a Marine's wife, the answer to these questions must be no. Why? Because despite any partisan's passion for the rightness of a position, none of us will know how right or wrong we really are until long after the last shot is fired. So we make decisions the way one does in a self-governing society of 300 million cantankerous souls: imperfectly, inelegantly, with unnecessary suffering.

Whether we are led by Democratic presidents or Republican ones — great men such as Franklin D. Roosevelt or middling men such as Warren G. Harding — there will be mistakes, judged differently at different times in history and perhaps never resolved utterly in consensus. Even in the "good war," there were bad engagements, bad decisions, unnecessary, sad, tragic deaths.

Service, then, is even more ennobling because it represents an act of faith in an unwieldy system — a representative democracy of human beings. The weakness of our system lends poignancy to the decision to serve: Those who go into harm's way recognize that our society is in many ways deeply flawed, but to paraphrase Winston Churchill, it's the best one available yet.

Philosopher Nancy Sherman says the military resolves this tension by adopting a version of the ancient Stoic philosophy, which holds that one may be judged only by the rightness or wrongness of one's own acts, not by the acts of others. A soldier who does his portion morally and well cannot be tarred by the brush of a leader's bad policy. This does not mean that some individuals' willingness to serve translates into a blank check for irresponsible policy — if anything it requires us to constantly scrutinize our policy and commit to do better.

DOJ_NMG_0073578

In complicated times like these, it's important to remember that self-government is perishable — it can be killed not only by enemies outside the gate, but also by indifference and alienation within. The decision to serve is a decision to be part of our country and, ideally, to make the part one touches the best possible. This is what has value, so that even in the tragic cases of friendly fire, or accidental deaths or deaths in battles later lost, those who die did not die in vain. They died in service to an ideal — Lincoln's ideal that the government of the people, by the people and for the people shall not perish from the face of this earth.

There is nothing vain about that.

Kathy Roth-Douquet is the co-author, with Frank Schaeffer, of AWOL: The Unexcused Absence of America's Upper Classes from Military Service — and How It Hurts Our Country. She lives on a military base in North Carolina.

Frist: Taliban Should Be In Afghan Gov't (AP)

By Jim Krane, Associated Press Writer

AP, October 3, 2006

U.S. Senate Majority Leader Bill Frist said Monday that the Afghan war against Taliban guerrillas can never be won militarily and urged support for efforts to bring "people who call themselves Taliban" and their allies into the government.

The Tennessee Republican said he learned from briefings that Taliban fighters were too numerous and had too much popular support to be defeated on the battlefield.

"You need to bring them into a more transparent type of government," Frist said during a brief visit to a U.S. and Romanian military base in the southern Taliban stronghold of Qalat. "And if that's accomplished, we'll be successful."

Afghanistan is suffering its heaviest insurgent attacks since a U.S.-led military force toppled the Taliban in late 2001 for harboring al-Qaida leader Osama bin Laden.

According to an Associated Press count, based on reports from U.S., NATO and Afghan officials, at least 2,800 people have been killed nationwide so far this year. The count, which includes militants and civilians, is about 1,300 more than the toll for all of 2005.

The top U.S. military commander in Afghanistan, Lt. Gen. Karl Eikenberry, told Pentagon reporters last month that while the Taliban enemy in Afghanistan is not extremely strong, their numbers and influence have grown in some southern sections of the country.

President Bush has been criticized for his handling of the war and is trying to contain the damage ahead of midterm elections this fall. On Friday, Bush acknowledged setbacks in the training of Afghan police to fight against the Taliban resurgence but predicted eventual victory.

Frist said asking the Taliban to join the government was a decision to be made by Afghan President Hamid Karzai. Karzai's spokesmen were not immediately able to be reached for comment.

Sen. Mel Martinez, a Republican from Florida accompanying Frist on his trip, said negotiating with the Taliban was not "out of the question" but that fighters who refused to join the political process would have to be defeated.

"A political solution is how it's all going to be solved," he said.

Frist said he had hoped the U.S. would be able to withdraw its forces from Afghanistan soon. But he said the 20,000 U.S. troops in the country are still needed to support the NATO alliance, which will assume direct control over most military operations here.

"We're going to need to stay here a long time," Frist said.

The senator said he was warned to expect attacks to increase. There appears to be an "unlimited flow" of Afghans and foreigners "willing to pick up arms and integrate themselves with the Taliban," he said.

He said the only way to win in places like the volatile southern part of the country is to "assimilate people who call themselves Taliban into a larger, more representative government."

"Approaching counterinsurgency by winning hearts and minds will ultimately be the answer," Frist said. "Military versus insurgency one-to-one doesn't sound like it can be won. It sounds to me ... that the Taliban is everywhere."

Frist and Martinez flew to this dust-blown mountain city 220 miles south of Kabul during a one-day stop in Afghanistan on a regional tour that includes stops in Pakistan and Iraq.

The pair had intended to visit a new $6.5 million hospital built by the United Arab Emirates, but a group of wounded Taliban fighters were recuperating there, including a midlevel commander, and U.S. commander Lt. Col. Kevin McGlaughlin canceled the visit because of security concerns.

DOJ_NMG_0073579

In violence Monday, a suicide bomber blew himself up next to a NATO convoy in the capital Kabul, wounding three foreign soldiers and three civilians, while a roadside bomb in the eastern Paktia province killed three Afghan soldiers and wounded three others, officials said.

Maj. Luke Knittig, a military spokesman, said he could not disclose the nationalities of the NATO soldiers who were wounded. The attack came two days after another suicide bomber killed 12 people and wounded more than 40 outside Afghanistan's Interior Ministry.

In the southern province of Helmand, five civilians were killed when their vehicle hit a mine on a road usually used by NATO and Afghan forces, said Ghulam Muhiddin, the governor's spokesman.

Suspected Taliban on a motorbike, meanwhile, killed two policemen and wounded two others in Gereshk district, he said. NATO-led troops killed three militants in Nawzad district.

After Afghan Battle, A Harder Fight For Peace (NYT)

By Carlotta Gall

The New York Times, October 3, 2006

PASHMUL, Afghanistan — NATO forces scored one of their biggest victories here in ferocious fighting in September, flushing out an area of southern Afghanistan that had been swarming with Taliban insurgents. But almost immediately a new and more difficult battle began — for support of the local people.

Villagers trickling back to their homes broke into an argument over who was to blame for the heavy destruction, NATO or the Taliban.

"My house was bombarded and my grape store destroyed," said Hajji Bilal Jan, 48, a farmer from the upper part of Pashmul. "The coalition forces are cruel, without reason. There were no Taliban in our house. Why did they bombard the house?"

Another man, Neamatullah, 45, who like many Afghans uses only one name, stopped to listen and then countered: "Why did you let the Taliban come to your village? You brought them to your village."

The battle here, the biggest for the American-led forces in the country since March 2002, was a long-awaited success for NATO forces in a year in which the Taliban have revived with surprising strength.

But it also showed that fighting the insurgency was not just about winning the battle, but securing the peace. Pushing out the Taliban is one thing, NATO and Afghan commanders emphasize, and keeping them out another.

NATO officials estimate that the Taliban lost 500 fighters over all and say 136 have been captured, mostly as they tried to escape. Five Canadian soldiers died in the operation. But just afterward, four more were killed in a suicide bombing.

To help enlist the support of local villagers, military commanders and the governor of Kandahar Province have started handing out half a million dollars in humanitarian aid and have promised families more help with repairing the war's damage.

"If the people cooperate with us, the Taliban can do nothing," said Capt. Majid Khan, commander of a unit of the Afghan Army that took part in the fighting and is now based in Pashmul.

Most villagers here, who grow grapes and pomegranates in the rich soil along the Arghandab River valley, said they opposed the Taliban but had been powerless to stop the groups of armed men who moved into the area over recent months.

But among them were those who fed and sheltered the Taliban and possibly fought alongside them. The villagers said the leader of the Taliban group in this area, Abdul Khaleeq, was from Pashmul, and he had fighters from surrounding villages as well as outsiders.

"Most of the people are with the government," Mr. Neamatullah said. "Just a few people get special benefits from the Taliban."

"He knows everything about the Taliban," he added, pointing out the man he had argued with, Mr. Jan.

"It was very good, the bombing," Mr. Neamatullah said. "I am happy, because the Taliban must be finished off."

The Taliban first moved into two densely populated farming districts in this area, Panjwai and Zhare, west of Kandahar, in May just as NATO forces, led by Brig. Gen. David Fraser of Canada, were taking over command from United States forces in the southern region of the country.

"The whole place was full of Taliban," said Faizullah, 26, a farmer who was later wounded in the bombing of the nearby village of Zehdanan. "They did not stay more than two nights in one place. They were telling people to leave."

In July and August the Taliban began building up their forces there in a clear bid to set up an area of control and threaten the city of Kandahar, the provincial capital, General Fraser said in an interview in his headquarters at the Kandahar air base.

"They put a lot of resources into this area, a lot of intellectual capital and psychological commitment," he said. "This was a fight unlike the fight I've had with the Taliban for the last eight months."

DOJ_NMG_0073580

One of the Taliban leaders, Hajji Mullah Abdul Rauf, a former provincial governor, taunted the American military in an interview with Al Jazeera television in the Panjwai area in late August. “Where has the American power gone?” he said. “Why could they not capture the Taliban and mujahedeen in their caves?”

“It is Afghans who are helping us,” he said. “They give food, they give help and they have come out against this government. They do not want this government.”

But Mr. Neamatullah said he had challenged some of the Taliban fighters he came across. He met a group sitting under a mulberry tree, not far from his village, Char Kutsa, also near Pashmul, where women were washing clothes in a stream.

He said he had asked the men: “Why do you come here? Do you want the women to get bombed?” He said he did the same with another group the next day in the mosque of a neighboring village. “The Taliban’s special answer was always that ‘somebody ordered us to come here’ to this village,” he said.

Villagers said the Taliban were mostly Afghans, but from neighboring provinces and districts, as well as from Pakistan. The Taliban were well equipped with radios, satellite telephones and weapons, they said.

NATO and Afghan forces finally mounted a carefully planned operation, beginning on Sept. 2, after warning civilians to leave the area and dropping leaflets promising the Taliban safe passage out if they gave up their weapons.

The Taliban concentrated their fighters in several pockets on either side of the river — at Sperwan, Pashmul and Siah Jui — and NATO deployed forces from the south, north and east in a pincers movement.

More forces guarded the western and southern flanks to cut supply and escape routes. Canadian forces hit a mine on their first attempt to breach the river stronghold from the south into Pashmul and then suffered multiple casualties in an airstrike from an American A-10 attack jet.

The commander of United States forces in southern Afghanistan, Col. R. Stephen Williams, 46, from Anchorage, joined the battle four days later. He gathered Canadian, American and Afghan forces for an attack on Pashmul on Sept. 12.

After wearing the Taliban down for six days with rock music blaring across the river valley, and artillery fire and airstrikes wherever they spotted a concentration of fighters, they found a weak spot in the Taliban’s defenses.

Playing his favorite song, AC/DC’s “Back in Black,” to hide the sound of the armored vehicles, Colonel Williams took the Taliban by surprise, crossing the river and driving through the cornfields from the northeast.

The fighting was intense for a day and a half. The Taliban were dug in under ideal cover in vineyards, with deep irrigation channels and high mud-wall barns for drying grapes. “It was Normandy invasion tactics with bunker systems and trenches,” Colonel Williams said as he walked journalists through a battlefield tour.

“We found a lot of bunkers, with metal roofs and air holes with metal pipes running up for ventilation,” the colonel said, standing over one bunker that had been destroyed by his forces “They used the canals as trenches and then would pull back to the bunker.”

The village school, a cluster of white painted classrooms built with American aid money in the last four years, was destroyed by repeated air and artillery strikes. “The Taliban used this as a weapons cache and their command and control place,” the colonel said. “For some reason they kept coming back in here every time we bombed the place.”

In small mud buildings, his soldiers found a makeshift field hospital. “We found tons of bloodied rags, bandages, IV bags and needles,” he said. “We took away five to six garbage bags for examination.”

The Taliban pulled out in groups during the attack, leaving small numbers of men to delay the NATO advance. Colonel Williams calculated from battlefield reports that his force alone had killed 150 to 200 insurgents in 10 days of fighting, and only had four men wounded on their side. Seven to eight Taliban commanders were lost in the fighting, he said.

Although NATO and Taliban forces told villagers to leave before the fighting, some civilians were killed and wounded in the conflict. United Nations officials have gathered reports of at least 40 civilians killed. A government commission sent by President Hamid Karzai to investigate the fighting said that 53 civilians had been killed in the fighting and that it had caused an estimated $750,000 in damage.

Kandahar’s main hospital took in 24 wounded people from the Panjwai and Zhare districts from Sept. 3 to 18, as well as two girls wounded in the suicide bombing, which happened on Sept. 18.

Rahmatullah, 33, a farm laborer, lay in bed with two broken legs. He lost two nephews, ages 3 and 1, when their house in Zangabad was bombed. As family members were trying to save the children’s mother from the rubble, a NATO plane struck a second time, wounding more women and children, he said.

Despite their injuries and losses, there was little sympathy for the Taliban among the patients or other villagers interviewed. In Pashmul, a 19-year-old high school student, also named Neamatullah, and his brother Habibullah, 17, climbed the broken wall where the gate to their house was destroyed.

They gestured with shock at the devastation before them. A bomb had gouged out a 25-foot-deep crater in their yard, smashing the well and the main building of the house.

DOJ_NMG_0073581

Asked whom he blamed for the damage, Neamatullah said the Taliban. “Before they came, there was no bombing,” he said.

Afghan Politics - One Chicken Dinner At A Time (CSM)

By Scott Peterson

The Christian Science Monitor, October 3, 2006

NARAY, EASTERN AFGHANISTAN

Bold, full of hope, and with a healthy fear for their speck-on-a-map villages, the Afghan elders arrived at this US firebase recently for a change-of-guard ceremony.

Expected to be a gracious host - but with little suitable food and after being caught off-guard by the elders who had arrived one day in advance - US Army Capt. Dennis Sugrue invited the handful of weathered men to join him for lunch on cushions on the floor.

The air was thick with concerned expectation. The US officers hoped to win these elders as allies against a growing insurgency with promises of development projects and friendship. And there has been some progress: a growing number of project requests, and even help finding insurgent locations.

But would there be enough food, when the lids were removed, to honor the Afghan guests? Or would the two Army captains find themselves embarrassed by a meager offering?

After the lids were swept from two large platters, the assembled party caught its collective breath. Two small grilled chickens would be enough meat to forge closer bonds between these Afghan elders and their American hosts. Business could commence.

"The American help is very important," says elder Haji Hamidullah, who ticks off four US-funded projects in his village of Mandagal, including water pipes and a collection basin, and a microhydro power setup. "Now there is now clean water, but there will be. At night, we stay in the dark. If we have light, it will be very good."

Mr. Hamidullah's village is one of more than a dozen in the poor Kamdesh district of Nuristan along Afghanistan's porous border with Pakistan. US Army units of the 3rd Squadron, 71st Cavalry moved in over the summer to pay attention, with projects and money, to a region that ranks near the bottom of Afghanistan's development index.

"If some [insurgents] come down to the village, we will fight them," vows Hamidullah, who is here to accept the first installment - more than $6,000 worth of freshly printed red 1,000 Afghani notes, in three bundles - for the $25,000 water-pipe scheme. The day before, US officers had doled out $75,000 for approved projects.

Trust was so high in Mandagal that the Americans would pay, that elders had already hired an engineer and paid with their own money to complete much of the work.

"There are a lot of hills and trees in Nuristan. In the day, the enemies hide in the trees; at night, they plant IEDs [improvised explosive device] and leave night letters," says Hamidullah.

"We're not afraid of these people," boasts Hamidullah. "People are sometimes scared, but they see the government is powerful and fighting them," he says, gilding the lily a bit. But he acknowledges that "without the Americans" there would be "big problems."

A firm stance like Hamidullah's is not easy to maintain, as pressure grows from the Taliban and other insurgents. In the past month, one prominent elder was tortured and killed, and a senior border policeman assassinated. Threats are common, and come in the form of "night letters," which appear overnight from insurgents, warning people that they will die if they cooperate with US or Afghan forces.

"Whenever construction is going on, [militants] come down from the hills to stop it," says Captain Sugrue, a civil engineer from Watertown, N.Y., who launched the first 15 or so projects with discretionary funds available for such work to US commanders. He says the rugged terrain makes Nuristan a "natural refuge" for militants looking for training bases.

"The insurgents can't compete with the money we are going to pour into reconstruction," adds Sugrue. "People who are likely targets are scared. If you are a shura [local council] leader, you are a target."

The learning curve for the Americans has been steep. The first time they set foot in Kamdesh, US troops were fired upon. Later, at a US-sponsored gathering of district elders, a moderate mullah from Mirdish, named Abdullah, explained the need to develop local relationships.

" 'If you had come to me first, you would not have been shot at,' " Sugrue recalls Mr. Abdullah telling him. "What he was saying is that there is a right way to do things."

Local know-how is a requirement to successfully balance the needs of the villages while navigating among the local contractors and spreading wealth. But it's an uncommon trait among US military officers in Iraq and Afghanistan, whose tours are often too short - and whose mandates are too uncertain - to gain such a detailed knowledge of an area.

DOJ_NMG_0073582

Sugrue's first big project taught another important lesson. Engineers had chosen the worst 14 sections of the 20-mile road from Naray to Kamdesh village for improvement. To do the job, Sugrue tapped a well-established contractor from Jalalabad - some 70 miles away.

But when it became clear to locals from the Naray region that the road project was proceeding with an outside firm, they began to have second thoughts about initially cold-shouldering the effort. One group of out-of-town road workers was beaten up. While the project is nearly complete, Sugrue says "I have a guy with no vested interest in a doing a good job with the road; he's just trying to get away with his life."

Contracts are now made in conjunction with village leaders "to make sure the right people do the work, and have a stake in it." The trade-off is that, while there is a community approval for the work, there are local limits to technical expertise. Sugrue and his colleagues are now plotting the best way to do another road project that goes through 10 villages, and has become more of a political problem than an engineering one.

Of the 15 or so US-funded projects in Kamdesh so far, half of the biggest ones are now being handed over to the Provincial Reconstruction Teams (PRT), which are purpose-built US military units that are being deployed across eastern Afghanistan in areas controlled by US forces. Each PRT includes two civilian engineers and civil affairs officers to handle big-ticket projects like roads and bridges.

Small, high-visibility projects will still be run by individual squadrons, at least here with the 3-71 Cav., so that US patrols have a reason to keep visiting villages to assess progress and make their presence felt.

"We are improving our methods, though there are still shortfalls," says Sugrue. Elders understand the long-term importance of such projects for the community, he says, though many villagers are illiterate and see the projects solely as a "job for three months swinging a hammer."

But there are larger issues at stake for some. At the same lunch, Mir Mohamed Khan, an elder from nearby Nangal village - where Army money will help to complete a previous drinking water project started by a European-funded agency called Afghan Aid - breaks off a piece of grilled chicken and wraps it in bread.

He says that recent US shelling from this base at insurgents who had attacked with rockets overshot the target. "They fired from the first village, and you almost hit the third village," says Mr. Khan. "If you come to our village, everyone will let you know where they fired from."

Outside, Khan pointed to the configuration of hills, where he said shepherds had seen insurgents in action. They had been trained by Pakistani intelligence, he claimed, and in religious schools."

"They call it a religious way, but it is not a religious way," says Khan. "They are enemies of both of us....The enemies are trying to stop reconstruction, but they will never do it."

DOJ:

Ohio Prosecutor Named Interim U.S. Attorney (TENN)

By BONNA De La CRUZ, Staff Writer

Nashville Tennessean, October 3, 2006

A federal prosecutor from Ohio will serve as interim U.S. Attorney in Nashville, the U.S. Justice Department said in a statement today.

Craig S. Morford will serve as interim as Jim Vines leaves the job as the top federal prosecutor for the Middle District of Tennessee. Vines' last day was Oct. 1, the statement said. He is returning to private practice with the King and Spalding firm.

Morford has served as the first assistant in the U.S. Attorney's office in the Northern District of Ohio since November, 2003. He has a law degree from Valparaiso University School of Law and a bachelor's degree from Hope College, the statement said.

Contact Bonna de la Cruz at 726-5990 or bdelacruz@Tennessean.com.

CORPORATE SCANDALS:

Feeling 'Slap In The Face' After Fastow's Sentence (WP)

By Carrie Johnson

The Washington Post, October 3, 2006

DOJ_NMG_0073583

When a federal judge took four years off the prison sentence of former Enron Corp. finance chief Andrew S. Fastow last week, he surprised legal analysts, angered onetime employees and sparked anew a debate about just punishment for white-collar criminals.

In a much-heralded 2004 plea deal, Fastow admitted to a pair of conspiracy charges that carried a maximum penalty of 10 years. He also agreed not to seek a reduction in his prison term. But one week ago, U.S. District Judge Kenneth M. Hoyt granted some mercy to the architect of the era's biggest accounting fraud and sent him to prison for just six years.

That means Fastow, who improperly took more than $45 million from the coffers of the Houston energy-trading company, could spend closer to 3 1/2 years in prison if he gets credit for completing a drug-treatment program and for good behavior.

The reduction, former Enron worker Rod Jordan said yesterday, "was a slap in the face to employees."

No former employees appeared at last week's sentencing, with most preferring to wait until former chief executive Jeffrey K. Skilling is sentenced on fraud charges Oct. 23. "A lot of them decided to skip Fastow because they thought it was a done deal," Jordan said, referring to the 10-year term.

Fastow served as one of the government's most important witnesses in the trial of Skilling and Enron founder Kenneth L. Lay, who were convicted in May. Prosecutors in that case told the jury that Fastow had "locked in" a 10-year prison sentence as part of a plea bargain with the Justice Department's Enron Task Force.

But Fastow's lawyer, John W. Keker, implored the judge last week to send Fastow away for five years because of his repentance, his cooperation with prosecutors and shareholders, and the toll on his family. Keker pointed out that Fastow's wife, Lea, spent nearly a year in prison after pleading guilty to underreporting the couple's income.

At the hearing, prosecutors did not object to the proposed reduced sentence. But they had previously filed a document agreeing with a probation department report that would have exposed Fastow to a sentence longer than 10 years.

Daniel M. Petrocelli, a lawyer for Skilling, called Fastow's reduced sentence "disturbing" in an e-mail. During the trial, Petrocelli regularly attacked government witnesses for misrepresenting the sentence reductions they would receive for cooperating with prosecutors. Legal analysts said yesterday that the contention could become a ground for Skilling's expected appeal.

"What is disturbing is that in the trial against Mr. Skilling, Fastow and the prosecutors represented to the jury that Fastow would serve a minimum of 10 years," Petrocelli wrote. "Now, with the trial over, they come into court and argue for a substantially lesser sentence."

Legal analysts said the proceeding, and the debate it provoked, underscore the power that federal judges enjoy. Since Fastow's plea deal was struck in 2004, a U.S. Supreme Court decision made sentencing guidelines advisory, rather than mandatory, for judges. That gave the judge more leeway to give Fastow less time.

However, judicial discretion can cut both ways. A few former Enron workers who agreed to help prosecutors have been sentenced to a wide range of prison terms: from probation to six years behind bars. The Fastow case is drawing the most heated commentary because a week earlier, the same judge who sentenced Fastow was far more stern with former Enron executive David W. Delainey.

Delainey, a Canadian citizen who voluntarily agreed to travel to the United States several times, pleaded guilty to a single insider-trading charge and began cooperating with prosecutors even before his October 2003 deal. Delainey's lawyers had asked for probation, but instead Hoyt reduced his possible sentence by only three months, ordered him to serve 2 1/2 years in prison and warned that he could have faced far more serious charges for his conduct at Enron. The disparity in treatment fueled anger from John Dowd, a Washington lawyer who defended Delainey.

"The message from the court was clear," Dowd said. "If you square your account with the law early, accept the consequences, fully cooperate for three years and receive the enthusiastic support of the government at sentencing: Tough luck; you get a cut of three months. If you fight the truth and get others involved in crime, and receive no support from the government, then you receive the mercy of the court and get a cut of four years off what you agreed to."

Within the next few weeks, former Enron investor relations official Paula H. Rieker, who pleaded guilty to a single insider-trading charge, and former accounting chief Richard A. Causey, who pleaded guilty to securities fraud, will be sentenced by other federal judges in Houston. Causey, who did not reap the same personal gains from Enron that Fastow did, faces the possibility of a longer sentence.

Philip Hilder, a Houston defense lawyer who represented several witnesses in the Enron investigation, said he was "surprised" by the leniency toward Fastow. But, Hilder added, Hoyt appeared to have considered Fastow's circumstances.

"He really has transformed himself from somebody who was vilified to someone who seemed almost sympathetic on the stand and who genuinely accepted responsibility for his actions," Hilder said. "I wish more judges would view defendants as individuals."

DOJ_NMG_0073584

Memo Suggests When Hurd Knew Of Phone Data (WSJ)

By Peter Waldman And Don Clark

The Wall Street Journal, October 3, 2006

Despite hours of testimony before a House subcommittee last week, Hewlett-Packard Co. still hasn't answered a key question about its leak-investigation scandal: When did Mark Hurd, H-P's chief executive officer, learn that private phone records were being examined as part of the probe?

A memo from H-P's outside law firm suggests that Mr. Hurd may have learned about the use of phone records as early as July 2005 -- a few months after the leak probe began -- though it doesn't indicate he knew that they were obtained through means that may have been illegal.

The memo, from the firm of Wilson Sonsini Goodrich & Rosati, says Mr. Hurd recalled that during one meeting, "probably on July 22, 2005," somebody "mentioned obtaining phone records off the Web." Mr. Hurd "remembered thinking" there must be a Web site with such information, according to the memo, which was prepared by Wilson Sonsini lawyers who were asked to investigate H-P's tactics in investigating the leak probe.

Investigators for H-P obtained the phone records of board members, reporters and H-P employees using a technique called pretexting, which involves obtaining records through impersonating a phone customer. Disclosure of H-P's tactics have prompted several government investigations and the resignations of three H-P executives and Chairman Patricia Dunn, who helped lead the leak investigation and recently yielded her title to Mr. Hurd.

TRACKING THE SCANDAL

See a graphical timeline1 and key documents in the H-P scandal. Plus, read profiles2 of former H-P Chairman Patricia Dunn, CEO Mark Hurd and other key players in the leak-probe controversy. · Complete coverage3

The Wilson Sonsini memo, which was based on a telephone interview by the lawyers with Mr. Hurd on Aug. 25, 2006, is the first evidence to emerge that Mr. Hurd may have known about the use of phone records during the investigation. In his House testimony and other statements, Mr. Hurd has said he didn't recall discussion of the methodology of the leak investigation in the July meeting, focusing instead on the results of the investigation so far.

Michael Moeller, an H-P spokesman, yesterday wouldn't go into details of the Wilson Sonsini memo. But he added: "We believe the documents, Mark's witness interview, the memo, and his testimony provide a complete and accurate picture of his knowledge of the investigation."

During a hearing Thursday before a subcommittee of the House Energy and Commerce Committee, Ms. Dunn testified that she learned early in the investigation that phone records were being sought by Ronald DeLia, the Boston-based private investigator that was handling the matter for H-P. But she said she believed that the information was being gathered in a legal way, and that she didn't understand what pretexting meant until much later.

"It was my understanding that these records were available through permitted mechanisms and that it was the common practice within Hewlett-Packard to use phone records to perform investigations," she testified.

But those assumptions were challenged by House members during the hearing. "You honestly believed that it was that simple, that your phone records, that anybody in the world can just call up and get them?" asked Rep. Greg Walden (R, Ore.).

Mr. Hurd has apologized profusely for the affair, and has said he should have done more to learn about the details of the investigation. He has previously disclosed his attendance at the July 2005 meeting, as well as another in March 2006, at which findings of a second phase of the investigation were discussed.

In the Wilson Sonsini memo, the lawyers wrote that Mr. Hurd said he wasn't aware that pretexting was being used to obtain phone records. Mr. Hurd told the lawyers he had only heard the term for the first time recently.

But Mr. Hurd's recollection about the July 22, 2005, meeting, as reported in the lawyers' memo, contains inconsistencies. On the second page of the three-page document, the lawyers wrote that Mr. Hurd confirmed that he attended about 45 minutes of a scheduled, hour-long briefing on the leak probe by H-P's investigators.

Mr. Hurd recalled learning then that the results of the investigation, at that point, were inconclusive, the memo states. He added that he didn't recall what, if any, investigative techniques were discussed at the meeting, or if anyone mentioned phone carriers. On the third page of the memo, however, the lawyers cite his recollection about the possibility that phone records had been obtained off of a Web site.

According to other Wilson Sonsini memos, several other participants at the July 2005 meeting told the lawyers that phone records were discussed, and possibly the use of pretexting as well. H-P investigators Kevin Huska and Tony Gentilucci, who both attended the meeting with Mr. Hurd, told Wilson Sonsini that phone records were discussed, but neither could recall if pretexting was also raised.

DOJ_NMG_0073585

Mr. DeLia told the lawyers that any results discussed at the meeting "would have had to include the results of the telephone research." Mr. DeLia also told the lawyers that he explained how pretexting was used at the July 2005 meeting, though he told them he wasn't sure if Mr. Hurd was in the room during the discussion of phone records.

The Wilson Sonsini memo also describes Mr. Hurd's recollection of the March 2006 meeting, which was held in Los Angeles and coincided with H-P's shareholder meeting. Mr. Hurd told the lawyers that Kevin Hunsaker -- an H-P vice president who helped lead the leak probe, and has subsequently resigned -- "explained that they had information regarding phone calls," the memo states.

But questions about the legality of obtaining such records weren't raised, because of Mr. Hurd's previous statements to Ann Baskins, H-P's general counsel, who has also resigned.

"Because Hurd had previously told Baskins that the investigation must be legal, he did not feel the need to question Hunsaker on this point," the memo states, referring to Mr. Hurd.

Write to Peter Waldman at peter.waldman@wsj.com4 and Don Clark at don.clark@wsj.com5

Cingular Wireless Files Suit Against Investigator Over Hewlett-Packard Pretexting (LAW)

By Joe Crea, Legal Times

Legal Times, October 3, 2006

Cingular Wireless filed a lawsuit Friday against Charles Kelly, one of five private investigators who allegedly impersonated Hewlett-Packard Co. board members in an effort to obtain customer calling information.

The case, filed in the U.S. District Court for the Northern District of Georgia, is seeking to get Kelly and his firm, Georgia-based CAS Agency Inc., along with any of its agents, to return confidential caller information and any profits made from the obtained data. The suit asks for an injunction from the court to prevent Kelly and his firm from obtaining any further customer information. It also claims punitive damages.

Kelly, along with other private investigators, was subcontracted through Security Outsourcing Solutions Inc., the company HP hired to determine who on the computer giant's board was leaking sensitive information to the press. Last Thursday, Kelly was subpoenaed to appear before a subcommittee of the U.S. House Energy and Commerce Committee investigating the HP scandal. Kelly and the others took the Fifth Amendment against self-incrimination and were immediately dismissed.

Kelly could not be reached for comment.

Cingular is represented by David Balser and Nathan Garroway of McKenna Long & Aldridge in Atlanta. The suit claims that Kelly and his firm did not obtain authorization from Cingular, its customers or law enforcement agencies to acquire personal customer information, in violation of federal law.

Lawmakers grilled current and former HP executives on Thursday over the scandal, in which hired private investigators for the Palo Alto, Calif.-based company impersonated HP board members, employees, and journalists. The hired guns rifled through people's trash, planted spies in newsrooms, obtained phone records through a practice known as "pretexting," and spied on targeted individuals and their relatives.

On the day of the hearing, Verizon Wireless filed a similar lawsuit in a Trenton, N.J., federal court in response to the HP pretexting scandal.

"Ours is a John Doe lawsuit," says Jeffrey Nelson, executive director of corporate communications for Verizon Wireless. "We don't name any particular individuals [in our suit], but we believe it involved one member of HP's board and potentially a family member of that board member."

Sonsini Received Questionable Novell Options (LAW)

By Justin Scheck, The Recorder

California Recorder, October 3, 2006

As a director and lawyer for several companies suspected of illegally backdating stock options, Larry Sonsini has been under scrutiny the last six months for any role he may have played in option deals for employees.

But a Recorder review of SEC documents suggests Sonsini's involvement with suspiciously dated options wasn't limited to those he approved for other people.

Indeed, records filed by software maker Novell Inc. -- which recently announced it has hired outside counsel to review past option grant practices -- show that in 1999, Sonsini and the rest of the company's board deviated from their normal compensation plan by awarding themselves 50,000 options apiece.

That grant came on Oct. 26, when the stock was priced at a 17-month low. Over the next two months the share price would more than double, making the award worth more than $1 million on paper.

DOJ_NMG_0073586

The timing of the Novell grant raises the question of whether the options were actually doled out the day the company said they were, according to corporate governance experts.

But that's not the only issue raised by these options. Less than a month after the grant, Novell announced exceedingly rosy financial figures from the previous fiscal year. From a nadir of $16.69 on the grant date, the stock eventually hit $39.94 by the end of December.

Ultimately, the options would become worthless before vesting due to the tech market crash.

Nevertheless, the series of events makes experts wonder whether the grants were also "spring-loaded" -- that is, intentionally issued just before positive disclosures that the board knew would impact share prices. The SEC does not seem to view spring-loading with nearly the same severity as it does backdating, but the practice still troubles many experts, especially in this case.

"It doesn't smell good," said Boalt Hall School of Law professor Jesse Fried, an expert in corporate governance and insider trading. "This was at the annual low and was an off-cycle grant, and it's highly likely that this was spring-loaded."

Neither Sonsini -- who left the Novell board in 2002 -- nor a spokeswoman from the firm he chairs, Wilson Sonsini Goodrich & Rosati, would comment for this story.

On Aug. 29, though, Novell announced it was reviewing its option grant practices, and that the audit could lead to a restatement of past earnings under SEC rules governing executive pay.

"It's a comprehensive review," said Novell spokesman Bruce Lowry. He wouldn't comment on the ongoing work being done by lawyers at Morgan, Lewis & Bockius. Linda Griggs, a partner at the firm who is working on the probe, said Friday she was too busy to comment.

However, Lowry did confirm that grants to board members would be included in the examination. "It is all grants that are being reviewed," he said.

ABNORMAL PRACTICES

Novell's disclosure came at the tail end of a long train of admissions by companies that their option grants raised suspicion.

Since The Wall Street Journal first reported early this year on the apparently widespread practice of changing dates on stock options, more than 100 companies have come under scrutiny.

At least six companies gave out suspiciously dated options at times when Sonsini sat on their boards. Two of them -- Pixar and Novell -- have publicly announced internal probes of past grants. Another, Brocade, has seen former executives indicted for past options practices. And three others, LSI Logic, Lattice Semiconductor Corp. and Echelon Corp, were identified by The Recorder in August as having suspiciously timed grants to top executives.

Speaking privately because they are involved in stock option probes, several attorneys said questions about director grants have come up at a handful of companies being investigated by the SEC. But, they said, such cases are rare. At the majority of companies, board members only received options once a year at a pre-determined date outlined in a director compensation plan.

Novell had just such a system to keep directors out of the awkward position of awarding options to themselves. Every spring, on the day of Novell's annual shareholder meeting, each director would receive 15,000 options at the share price on the day of the meeting, in accordance with guidelines ratified by shareholders in 1996.

"No person shall have any discretion to select which outside directors shall be granted options, or to determine the number of shares to be covered by options granted to outside directors," the plan said.

But Novell's directors deviated from that policy three times between 1996 and 2001, granting themselves options at dates other than the annual meetings. On those occasions, the board cited a 1991 stock plan for the authority to make such grants.

The fact that Novell had guidelines for option grants -- and that directors strayed from them -- is particularly disturbing, said lawyers and academics.

"It should be an issue of shareholder concern whenever a board changes its own compensation," said Kirk Hanson, the director of the Markkula Center for Applied Ethics at Santa Clara University and a former Stanford University business professor.

While directors are generally permitted to award themselves whatever they want as long as it is publicly disclosed, Hanson said basic principles of corporate governance hold that they should avoid giving themselves pieces of the company just because they can.

It's not entirely clear from documents filed with the SEC how Novell's board decided to make the out-of-cycle grants in 1997, 1999 and again in 2001. Besides Sonsini, two other ex-board members -- former FCC Chairman Reed Hundt and Jack Messman, who was ousted as Novell CEO earlier this year -- declined to explain.

At the time of the 1999 grant, Hundt served on the company's compensation committee, while Messman sat on both the compensation and corporate governance committees.

DOJ_NMG_0073587

"I think it is inappropriate for me to comment," Messman said, especially given the terms of his severance agreement. "I'm in a contract that prevents me from talking."

Hundt, who is also a former Latham & Watkins partner, said he didn't recall discussions about options grants in 1999, and that they wouldn't have been of any importance to him because he didn't exercise Novell options.

MEASURING THE FALLOUT

When the company's 1999 fiscal year ended Oct. 31, the stock options ostensibly awarded a week earlier already looked promising. The company had had a successful fourth quarter, capping off a good year. After sliding by nearly 50 percent over the previous three months, the company's stock had begun climbing again.

On Nov. 10 Messman and Hundt reported their options to the SEC. On Nov. 23 Novell announced that its 1999 financial results were extremely positive. Sonsini reported his options a few weeks later.

"The options were awarded before good news was released, when they probably knew good news would be released," said Fried, the Boalt professor, basing his opinion on a description of the events at Novell. As far as the dates on the grants go, "we don't know if there was backdating, but if options were granted on a low like that, the probability the options would be granted on a low is very low."

None of the other out-of-cycle grants to Novell directors came at annual lows; the 2001 grant, for example, was awarded on Sept. 10 that year -- hardly a good time to receive any stock. Ironically, that grant now is much more valuable than the questionable 1999 award. The 2001 option to buy 50,000 shares came at a strike price of $3.92. With Novell now trading at just over $6 a share, that grant was worth just over $110,000 as of last week. It is unclear whether Sonsini has ever exercised any of those options.

It's also unclear what -- if any -- consequences Novell's directors could face if they're found to have improperly handled options. First, the company will need to disclose the results of its internal investigation. And even if the Morgan Lewis lawyers find wrongdoing, it may not be serious enough to warrant a significant financial restatement, or government interest.

While spring-loading remains troubling to business ethicists, the SEC's chief accountant, Conrad Hewitt, issued a letter Sept. 19 indicating that the SEC won't consider the practice to have significant accounting ramifications.

As far as criminal or civil liability goes, that's less certain: Federal prosecutors and SEC enforcement agents haven't said whether they'll consider the behavior problematic, though white collar defense lawyers say they don't expect it to be a major issue.

"Some may see it as unseemly or distasteful," said one attorney speaking on condition of anonymity because he is conducting probes of several companies where spring-loading questions have come up. "However, if someone felt there was an ironclad theory of prosecution, you would have heard of it by now."

But that doesn't make Fried feel any better.

"The problem is with disclosure. They were giving themselves in-the-money options," he said. "They were formally at-the-money, but they were really in the money."

And while the SEC might say it's legal, "from a corporate governance perspective, they're doing something improper, or they appear to have done it," Fried said.

Mills Chief Retires But Must Repay Costs For Jet Travel (WP)

By Terence O'hara

The Washington Post, October 3, 2006

Laurence C. Siegel, who ran one of the most successful mall empires in America before a series of operational and accounting blunders cost his investors billions of dollars, retired as Mills Corp. chief executive Friday and is being asked to repay more than $360,000 in personal travel on a company-chartered jet.

Mills, which has lost nearly $2.2 billion of its market value in the past 12 months, will pay Siegel $2.5 million in severance pay and $10.5 million if the company is sold by the end of next year, a likely event because Mills is actively trying to find a buyer for a 42-mall portfolio that includes Potomac Mills in Virginia and Arundel Mills in Maryland.

The Chevy Chase company described the departure of Siegel, 53, as a retirement and said its timing was not related to the personal travel expenses he is being asked to repay or to a soon-to-be completed investigation by the company's independent directors into Mills management and accounting failures.

"They're unrelated," said Mark S. Ordan, a veteran retail real estate executive who was appointed chief operating officer of Mills earlier this year and then was named to succeed Siegel as president and chief executive. "He felt this was a good time to leave, a natural time to leave, given everything that is going on with the company. It had nothing to do" with the travel expenses.

Siegel did not respond to requests for comment. Both he and the company signed agreements not to disparage each other.

DOJ_NMG_0073588

Siegel, who became chief executive of Mills in 1996, expanded the concept of the regional mega-mall to spectacular size and ostentation, and shoppers flocked to the company's properties in the 1990s. Mills, fueled by a bull market in real estate stocks and billions in investment from the German real estate fund company Kan Am, planned, built and bought dozens of malls in the last decade to become a rival to such mall companies as Indianapolis-based Simon Property Group Inc., Australia's Westfield Group and New York's Vornado Realty Trust.

The rapid growth masked underlying problems in Mills' operations, which surfaced in a series of accounting errors. As the nature and extent of the problems became clear over the past nine months, Siegel rapidly lost credibility with the investors that had provided Mills with capital to keep its costly developments afloat.

The company's biggest construction project, a $2 billion retail and entertainment complex called Xanadu in northern New Jersey, became emblematic of Siegel's ambitions. Plans include an indoor ski slope and a 30-story Ferris wheel tall enough to be seen in Manhattan, eight miles away. Siegel held a $2 million party at the site two years ago to celebrate the signing of a lease with New Jersey officials. The project is now over budget and under increasingly skeptical scrutiny from its lenders and financial backers, and Mills is negotiating to sell its interest.

Ordan defended the $10.5 million Siegel could receive if Mills is sold.

"Larry has been the CEO of this company for a very long time, and the portfolio of assets that we have were developed and bought under his guidance," Ordan said. "And most of the payments we're talking about are contractual obligations."

Nonetheless, two Wall Street analysts were critical.

"The award seems somewhat excessive given the company's fall from grace," RBC Capital Markets analyst Rich Moore told investors in a research note yesterday.

Bank of America analyst Ross Nussbaum said the $10.5 million in cash Siegel will be paid if the company is sold presents a conflict because Siegel will remain on Mills' board of directors and would vote on any deal. Nussbaum said the sales-related bonus gives Siegel an incentive "to vote for a sale of the company at a lower price than if he were receiving a stock payment."

Siegel agreed to remain non-executive chairman of Mills. If Xanadu is sold, Mills said he might "join the new joint venture" that would acquire the mall and resign his chairmanship, while remaining on the board. Mills is currently in a protracted negotiation with Kan Am and Colony Capital, which would take over the project and agree to fund its remaining construction costs. The closing of the deal has been delayed twice, however, because of the complexities of the transaction, Ordan said. The deal is considered by Wall Street as a vital step in the ultimate sale of Mills. Further complicating matters: Kan Am has three of Mills' 14 board seats and is a large shareholder in Mills.

Siegel's personal use of the company aircraft was left largely unexplained by the company in a Securities and Exchange Commission filing yesterday. Ordan declined to comment on it. Personal use of jets by chief executives has been a controversial corporate governance issue for years. SEC and Internal Revenue Service rules regarding what makes a trip personal and not business, and whether it should be disclosed, have been toughened in the last two years.

Siegel would have had ample opportunity to use a jet, personally tending to business all over the country and in European capitals where Mills owned or was building malls. While the company did not own such a plane, it had access to several, including a Gulfstream G-III, from a chartering company.

In yesterday's SEC filing, Mills said Siegel must repay "any non-business related perquisites that may have been provided to (him), including $362,156 for personal use of the company chartered aircraft and personal flights paid by the company."

Siegel has two weeks to make the payment, documents said.

Mills has never before disclosed in SEC documents that Siegel or any other executive used corporate aircraft for any purpose. Siegel was paid more than $5 million in cash in 2004, the last year for which Mills reported executive compensation.

In Namibia Court, Arguments Over Bail For Options Fugitive (NYT)

By John Grobler

The New York Times, October 3, 2006

WINDHOEK, Namibia, Oct. 2 — After arriving here two months ago, Jacob Alexander, the former chief executive of Comverse Technology wanted in the United States on stock option fraud charges, transferred about $16 million to Namibia from Israel, bought a house and put his children into a local school, a Windhoek court was told on Monday.

During the hearing on his bail application, Mr. Alexander, 54, showed every sign that he would fight efforts to extradite him to the United States to face charges of conspiracy, securities fraud and money laundering involving a suspected scheme to backdate stock options at Comverse.

A 32-count indictment against Mr. Alexander was unsealed last week by federal prosecutors in Brooklyn.

DOJ_NMG_0073589

One of Mr. Alexander's lawyers here, Herman Oosthuizen, said his client would be willing to hand over his Israeli passport and post bail of about $1.36 million. Mr. Oosthuizen also told the court in Windhoek that Mr. Alexander had invested about $1.5 million in local low-cost housing and other start-up business ventures in Namibia and had been granted a two-year work permit.

Mr. Alexander and his wife bought a house in a gated community adjoining the government-owned Windhoek Country Club, according to an affidavit by Mr. Alexander.

An F.B.I. agent, Marilyn Williams, who works out of the United States Embassy in Pretoria, South Africa, urged the court to reject the bail application. She said Mr. Alexander failed to return to New York on July 20 from a vacation in Israel to face questions from federal prosecutors.

Mr. Alexander, she said, had also offered as much as $5 million — and then "a name-your-price offer" — to a colleague at Comverse to take the blame in the stock options case. She did not identify the employee, but said that the person had agreed to cooperate with the investigation.

The bail hearing will continue on Tuesday. Mr. Alexander remains incarcerated.

Ex-Comverse Chief Executive Says He Will Plead Not Guilty (AP)

By Celean Jacobson

AP, October 3, 2006

JOHANNESBURG, South Africa — The fugitive ex-CEO of Comverse Technology Inc., who is wanted in the United States for stock-options fraud, told a Namibian court Monday he intends to plead not guilty and claimed the warrant for his arrest was invalid.

Jacob "Kobi" Alexander, the former chief executive of the New York-based maker of voice mail software, said he entered the southern African nation openly and lawfully and had invested in businesses there before he was arrested after a two-month international manhunt.

Alexander was arrested Sept. 26 in the Namibian capital of Windhoek at the request of the FBI. He is accused of making about $6.4 million by illegally backdating stock options.

A bail hearing began Monday in a Namibian court and will continue Tuesday. The Namibian government said it opposed bail pending a formal extradition request from the United States, said Justice Ministry official Dennis Khama. Marlene Williams, an FBI agent based in South Africa, also opposed bail.

The U.S. has 30 days to lodge a formal extradition request. U.S. Attorney Roslynn Mauskopf said last week that she would seek Alexander's swift extradition to face charges in federal court in New York.

In an affidavit filed with the court, Alexander, 54, an Israeli citizen, said he had been living in the desert country with his wife and three children since July and had transferred almost $16 million from Israel to Namibian commercial banks.

"While in Namibia I have used my own name openly and publicly in all my encounters and ventures with government officials and private individuals alike," he said. "I entered Namibia openly and lawfully, and I have not in any manner tried to hide my whereabouts from anyone."

Alexander, who has a two-year permit to live and work in Namibia, stays in a $500,000 home he purchased on the Windhoek Country Club Estate. His children attend the city's international school.

According to his statement, he has invested a further $1.5 million in various business ventures in Namibia with local partners.

It is alleged that from 1991 through 2005, Alexander exercised options and sold stock worth approximately $150 million, making a $138 million profit. Of that, about $6.4 million was generated by backdating options.

Checks Already In Place (USAT)

By Dale Oesterle

USA Today, October 3, 2006

Two high profile hedge fund calamities in the past week will no doubt result in renewed calls for more "hedge fund regulation," whatever that is.

Amaranth Advisors lost a whopping $6 billion in trades of natural gas futures, and Pirate Capital is being investigated of failing to publicly disclose its stock sales. Pirate Capital has been one of the nation's most visible (and colorful) "activist" hedge funds, funds that purchase stock in a company to force through major changes.

The lessons of these events are the reverse of those offered by the hedge fund alarmists. Amaranth's investors quickly accessed the fund books and minimized their losses. There was no general market panic. A maverick trader caused the losses. In a moment of frenzy he simply lost it, exceeding the fund's risk authorization guidelines. There was no institutional intent to defraud anyone. Fund investors will withdraw what money remains, and the fund will whither and die. Pirate Capital has similarly suffered for its transgressions. The Securities and Exchange Commission is after the fund, and several of its top analysts have left.

DOJ_NMG_0073590

In other words, the current system of penalties has plenty of bite for funds that misbehave. The plight of Amaranth and Pirate hardly supports a claim for more regulation.

On the other hand, consider the threat of the consequences of regulation too heavy handed. This is an industry of close to 10,000 funds estimated at holding close to $1.3 trillion dollars. It must have some attraction to investors. Overzealous regulation trying to control what cannot be controlled, the financial markets, will encourage more funds to locate offshore and encourage more investors to use foreign markets. Regulation could cost us control over hedge funds, not enhance it. The initial public offering market is already moving from New York to London because of the overly regulatory Sarbanes-Oxley Act of 2002. Our financial industry and its derivative professional communities are suffering as a result.

Hedge funds take huge risks, and inevitably some will fail. A hedge fund failure is not a national calamity, it is a natural and to be expected part of the industry.

Dale Oesterle is a law professor at Ohio State University.

CRIMINAL LAW:

Foley Enters Alcohol Rehab Center (LAT)

By Noam N. Levey And Chuck Neubauer

The Los Angeles Times, October 3, 2006

WASHINGTON — Former Rep. Mark Foley, the disgraced Florida lawmaker who quit last week after revelations about explicit messages he sent to a former teenage House page surfaced, has begun seeking treatment at a rehabilitation facility for alcoholism, his lawyer said today.

"I strongly believe that I am an alcoholic and have accepted the need for immediate treatment for alcoholism and other behavioral problems," Foley said in a statement released through his attorney, David Roth. The lawyer did not reveal where Foley was receiving treatment.

Pressure has been mounting on Republicans over their handling of the scandal involving Foley. The FBI said Sunday that it had begun a preliminary inquiry to determine whether the disgraced Florida lawmaker had violated federal law by sending sexually explicit instant messages to at least one teenager who had served as a congressional page.

House Speaker J. Dennis Hastert (R-Ill.), who had asked for a federal investigation, told reporters today that no party leaders had seen the messages until ABC News released them Friday.

"Congressman Foley duped a lot of people," Hastert said. "I have known him for all the years [12] he has served in this House, and he deceived me too."

Hastert expressed relief that Foley had resigned. "If he had not," Hastert said, "I would have demanded his expulsion."

Appearing with Hastert, Rep. John Shimkus (R-Ill.), chairman of the board that oversees Congress' page program, said the board in recent years had provided a new dormitory for pages with "state-of-the-art security measures." He said the board would provide a toll-free hotline for family members with concerns about safety.

Hastert and Shimkus refused to take questions from reporters, who wanted to know when they learned about Foley's messages to the teenage page.

Hastert — who has been battling accusations that House Republicans inadequately handled concerns that Foley had sent inappropriate though not overtly sexual e-mails last year to another former page — also asked Florida Gov. Jeb Bush to see whether state laws had been broken.

In response to these charges, Hastert said today, "Since I have been speaker, we have moved aggressively to ensure the safety of these kids."

But the Republicans' effort to distance the party from Foley may be complicated by his close ties with the party's campaign operation.

Foley's longtime chief of staff is now a senior aide to Rep. Thomas M. Reynolds (R-N.Y.), who as chairman of the National Republican Congressional Committee is leading the effort to maintain the GOP majority in the House. In addition, Foley's campaign committee gave $100,000 to the NRCC this summer, campaign finance records show.

Seizing on the campaign donation, which put Foley among the GOP committee's bigger donors, the Democratic National Committee stepped up its accusations that Reynolds and other Republican leaders were more interested in protecting Foley than investigating potential misconduct.

DOJ_NMG_0073591

"Why did Republican congressional leaders choose not to ask the critical questions about the nature and full extent of Congressman Foley's criminal actions involving minors at the time they first learned about it?" Democratic Party Communications Director Karen Finney said Sunday.

Foley, a six-term Republican who was co-chair of the Congressional Missing and Exploited Children's Caucus, resigned his seat Friday after ABC News questioned him about the sexually explicit instant messages he reportedly sent three years ago.

House Republican leaders have been under pressure since then to explain what they knew about Foley's behavior and when they knew it. They acknowledged Saturday that they had known for some time about Foley's "over-friendly" e-mails, sent to a 16-year-old Louisiana boy, but said they had not known about the sexually explicit earlier messages before last week.

In the fall of 2005, the 16-year-old, who had finished a term as a page that year sponsored by Rep. Rodney Alexander (R-La.), complained to a staffer in Alexander's office after receiving a series of e-mails from Foley. In them, the congressman asked for a photo and talked to the teenager about another boy being "in great shape."

After hearing from the teen and his parents, Alexander's staffers discussed their concerns with their counterparts in Hastert's office. As a result, the House clerk and the congressman in charge of the House Page Board met with Foley, who told them that his relationship with the boy was that of a mentor. They instructed him to cease his contacts with the boy.

Earlier this year, Alexander also discussed the matter with Reynolds and with House Majority Leader John A. Boehner (R-Ohio). Reynolds has said that he discussed it with Hastert, though the House speaker has said he has no recollection of the conversation but has no reason to doubt Reynolds.

In his letter to Gonzales, released several hours after Senate Minority Leader Harry Reid (D-Nev.) had demanded a Justice Department investigation, Hastert said the House clerk and the head of the Page Board had believed their private meeting with Foley "resolved the situation."

But the revelation of the sexually explicit instant messages — sent, Hastert said, to "another former page or pages" — warranted criminal referral for two reasons: to determine whether Foley had violated federal laws on interstate communications, and to discover whether "there are persons who knew or had possession of these messages but did not report them to the appropriate authorities."

Given that the instant messages were sent in 2003, Hastert said, "I request that the scope of your investigation include any and all individuals who may have been aware of this matter — be they members of Congress, employees of the House of Representatives, or anyone outside the Congress."

Hastert's efforts did not quell the political storm gathering around the GOP, however.

House Minority Leader Nancy Pelosi (D-San Francisco) on Sunday called on GOP House leaders to explain their actions under oath before the House Ethics Committee.

The Democratic National Committee noted Sunday that Foley's contribution, which the NRCC reported receiving on Aug. 7, came after Reynolds had acknowledged having learned about the Louisiana page's complaint.

NRCC spokesman Carl Forti said the campaign donation had no impact on how Reynolds handled the matter, explaining that Reynolds told Hastert about the problem as soon as he learned about the e-mails.

"This is nothing more than pure politics at its worst," Forti said, dismissing the Democratic charge that Reynolds should have done more.

"Even to insinuate that is ridiculous."

Forti said Reynolds had not known about the explicit instant messages, in which Foley discussed sexual matters with at least one other former page.

But Reynolds did work closely with someone who knew Foley well.

Kirk Fordham, a veteran Republican legislative staffer who has worked on Capitol Hill for much of the last 17 years, served as Foley's chief of staff from 1995 to 2004. Fordham also managed Foley's first campaign for Congress, in 1994.

In 2005, Fordham went to work for DCI Group, a leading GOP political strategy group. The same year, he became Reynolds' chief of staff.

Fordham could not be reached for comment Sunday.

Forti said Sunday he did not know whether Reynolds and Fordham had discussed Foley after Reynolds was told of the page's complaint.

Pressure Grows For G.O.P. Over Foley Scandal (NYT)

By Carl Hulse And Jeff Zeleny

The New York Times, October 3, 2006

DOJ_NMG_0073592

WASHINGTON, Oct. 2 — Speaker J. Dennis Hastert faced intensifying questions on Monday about why Republicans had not reacted more assertively to Representative Mark Foley's messages to a teenage page, as members of his party, fearing a political debacle, demanded a strong response.

Straining to hold the party together five weeks from Election Day amid unfolding revelations about the case, Mr. Hastert and his leadership team held a conference call with House Republicans on Monday night and heard blunt advice and criticism from participants who pressed for further action to reassure voters.

"This is a political problem, and we need to step up and do something dramatic," Representative Ray LaHood of Illinois said afterward, adding that he had proposed abolishing the Congressional page program.

Mr. Foley, 52, who resigned Friday after being confronted with sexually explicit instant messages he had sent to pages, released a statement saying he had entered a rehabilitation clinic for treatment of "alcoholism and related behavioral problems."

At a news conference in West Palm Beach, Fla., late Monday, Mr. Foley's lawyer, David Roth, said that Mr. Foley had sent the inappropriate e-mail messages while under the influence of alcohol and that he had kept his drinking problem secret.

A former aide and other associates said in interviews that they did not believe Mr. Foley had a drinking problem.

ABC News, which first reported the sexually explicit messages on Friday, said Monday that additional messages suggested that Mr. Foley had met in person with a teenage page outside Capitol Hill and had sought a relationship.

"I miss you lots since San Diego," Mr. Foley wrote, using his screen name, Maf54, according to a transcript obtained and released by ABC.

"Ya I cant wait til dc," the page replied.

Federal law enforcement officials said the F.B.I. in recent months had been given e-mail messages between Mr. Foley and a page but had found insufficient grounds to open a criminal investigation. A group called Citizens for Responsibility and Ethics in Washington said Monday that it had forwarded the messages to the Federal Bureau of Investigation on July 21 and requested an investigation. The group would not say where it had obtained the messages; it made them public after the ABC report.

Federal agents on Monday began contacting men who were in the Congressional page program in recent years, said government officials briefed on the matter, who asked not to be named because they were not authorized to discuss the inquiry. The officials said the agents were trying to find any former or current pages who had had contact with Mr. Foley and to authenticate e-mail and instant messages attributed to the former lawmaker that had circulated on the Internet in recent days.

The officials said that several pages who had received electronic messages from Mr. Foley had already been located.

At the White House, Tony Snow, President Bush's press secretary, initially characterized the scandal as "naughty e-mails," drawing a blistering response from Democrats who said his words suggested that Republicans did not understand the gravity of the situation.

Mr. Hastert, who returned to the Capitol to deal with the escalating scandal, was pressed by reporters to explain why the first communication between Mr. Foley and a page, which was brought to the attention of Republican leaders last year, had not led to more assertive efforts to determine if it was an isolated case.

Mr. Hastert defended the Republicans' handling of a parent's complaint last year about communication from Mr. Foley to the parent's teenage son. But he acknowledged that the e-mail inquiring about the boy's well being and requesting a photo was potentially troubling.

"I think that raised a red flag, raised a red flag with the kid, raised a red flag with the parents," said Mr. Hastert, who repeated that he could not recall learning of the messages before news of them broke last week. But the speaker said he and others had been "duped" by Mr. Foley, who when questioned about the e-mail said it was an innocent effort to make sure that the young man, who was from Louisiana, had made it through Hurricane Katrina.

Representative John Shimkus, Republican of Illinois, and the House clerk, Jeff Trandahl, instructed Mr. Foley to break off any contact with the former page. At the time, Republicans did not purse the matter further, considering the case closed.

"Would have, could have, should have," Mr. Hastert said, responding to questions about whether Republicans should have done more.

In Florida, Republicans met on Monday and chose Joe Negron, a conservative state representative, as a replacement candidate for the 16th Congressional District seat held by Mr. Foley. The ballots, however, have already been printed, and Mr. Foley's name will remain. If he wins, the votes will go to Mr. Negron.

The House majority leader, John A. Boehner of Ohio, dismissed that possibility. "To vote for this candidate, you have to vote for Mark Foley," Mr. Boehner said on a conservative radio program hosted by Sean Hannity. "How many people are going to hold their nose to do that?"

The case has led to varying accounts from two members of the leadership. Representative Thomas M. Reynolds of New York, who runs the House Republican campaign effort and is in a close race, has acknowledged learning generally about Mr.

Foley's initial e-mail messages this past spring. Mr. Reynolds has said he raised the matter with Mr. Hastert, who said he did not recall the exchange but did not dispute that it happened.

"I did what most of us would have done in the workplace," Mr. Reynolds told reporters in Amherst, N.Y., on Monday night. "I heard something, I took it to my supervisor."

Across the country, in competitive and noncompetitive races, Democrats seized on an issue that they said was resonating with voters. In an effort coordinated in Washington by the Democratic Congressional Campaign Committee, the party's candidates urged their Republican opponents to call for the resignation of Mr. Hastert and other leaders.

In Indiana, Baron Hill, a Democratic candidate for a House seat, asked the incumbent, Representative Mike Sodrel, a first-term Republican, to reject any financial contributions from the national party. In North Carolina, where Representative Robin Hayes, a Republican, is engaged in a tough campaign fight, the state Democratic Party issued a statement asking, "Who does Robin Hayes stand up for — Mark Foley and the Republican House leadership or under-age children?"

As Congressional Republicans campaigned Monday in their districts, they responded to the Democratic criticism and distanced themselves from Mr. Foley's behavior.

"We need to admit that this was done on our watch," Mr. LaHood said. He added that when he arrived home after Congress adjourned early Saturday, the page program was what constituents asked about.

"The first three questions I was asked when I arrived in Peoria," he said, "were not about immigration, the war or taxes. It was, 'What are you going to do about the page program?' "

The Foley case also drew criticism from conservative groups. "It's one of the worst Congressional scandals ever," Cliff Kincaid, editor of the conservative Accuracy in Media Report, wrote Sunday in an editorial circulated by Gopusa.com, a Republican Web site. "A top House Republican who denounced sex predators as 'animals' stands accused of acting like one."

At the news conference Monday night, Mr. Roth, Mr. Foley's lawyer, denied that Mr. Foley had ever had inappropriate physical contact with minors. "Mark Foley has never, ever had inappropriate sexual contact with a minor in his life," Mr. Roth said. "He is absolutely, positively not a pedophile."

On Political Track For Decades, Foley's Career Derails In Days (USAT)

By Susan Page

USA Today, October 3, 2006

WASHINGTON — It may well have been the proudest moment of Mark Foley's career in Congress: standing in the front row of lawmakers in the Rose Garden as President Bush signed a sweeping bill the Florida Republican had helped draft and pass.

The Adam Walsh Child Protection and Safety Act, toughening laws designed to shield children from exploitation, represented "a huge step forward," Foley told USA TODAY in an interview just before the ceremony in July. The Internet had given sexual predators new ways to reach kids, and the laws needed to respond, he said: "We track library books better than we do sex offenders."

Foley's worst moment was, presumably, nine weeks later, when he resigned in the wake of allegations that he had sent improper e-mails and instant messages, some of which were sexually explicit, to teenage boys who had worked as congressional pages.

As the FBI looked into whether federal laws were broken, Foley announced in a statement that he accepted "full responsibility" and was checking himself into a rehabilitation facility for alcoholism treatment.

It was an abrupt end to the political ambitions that began when Foley was 6 and watched admiring constituents flock around his congressman. He has been running for a succession of offices since he was 23. Just three years ago, he was a leading contender for a U.S. Senate seat.

Now, at 52, he has joined the rogues' gallery of members of Congress who resigned in disgrace.

"He was very well-liked, very outgoing, very likable," says Florida state Sen. Dave Aronberg, a Democrat who often ran into Foley at community gatherings. "He was at every event. He used to say, 'I'd go to the opening of an envelope.' "

Foley was the most accessible member of Congress from the area, Aronberg says, adding, "I hope he gets help."

In an interview last year with The Hill, a newspaper for members of Congress and their staffs, Foley recalled riding his bike to the Lantana Shopping Center in South Florida at age 6. Rep. Paul Rogers, who was shaking hands, gave Foley $5 to hand out campaign brochures. "For whatever reason, it stuck," Foley said. "That was my dream."

He was a local boy — born in Newton, Mass., but a resident of Lake Worth since his family moved there when he was 3. He attended Palm Beach Junior College for a year, then opened a restaurant, the Lettuce Patch. At 23, he was appointed to the Lake Worth City Council. He was a Democrat at first but switched to the GOP before he began a slow climb through political offices: vice-mayor of Lake Worth, a member of the Florida House of Representatives, then a Florida state senator at age 38.

Lois Frankel, a onetime Democratic leader of the state House, remembers Foley as a "master" of politics. "No matter what side of the aisle you were on, you had to admire his ability to work a room, to deliver a message," says Frankel, who is now mayor of West Palm Beach.

When state House district lines were redrawn and Foley found himself in a predominantly Democratic district, he ran for a state Senate seat instead. "He kept picking himself up and moving on," Frankel says.

When the local member of Congress decided to retire in 1994, Foley won a three-way Republican primary and trounced his Democratic opponent by 16 percentage points. He has never gotten less than 60% of the vote for re-election.

Once in Congress, Foley generally voted as a conservative Republican but showed an independent streak on social issues. For one thing, he supported abortion rights. He voted in favor of the Defense of Marriage Act, which defined marriage as between a man and a woman, but against amending the Constitution to ban gay marriage.

He sometimes broke with the Bush administration on trade, opposing the Central American Free Trade Agreement last year because, he said, it could hurt Florida's sugar industry.

Foley earned a reputation in Washington as a hard worker, a prodigious fundraiser and a reliable person for Capitol Hill reporters to go to for a quote. "If he said he would do something, he did it," says former Florida senator Bob Graham, a Democrat.

Joe Scarborough, a former Florida congressman first elected with Foley in 1994, says Foley reached out to him. "Mark knew I had never been an elected official before," says Scarborough, now the host of a program on MSNBC. "He said if there was anything he could do to help me out, he'd be glad to do it."

In 2002, Foley was the Republican speaker — freshman New York Sen. Hillary Rodham Clinton was the Democratic one — delivering humorous remarks to the annual dinner sponsored by the Washington Press Club Foundation.

He delivered a David Letterman-style "Top 10" list of "suspicious activities in Washington."

No. 4 was "Defense Secretary Donald Rumsfeld addressing reporters as adults." No. 3 was "former vice president Al Gore saying: 'Pie? No thanks. I'm on a diet.' "

"And the No. 1 most suspicious activity in Washington," Foley concluded to laughter, "is Mark Foley telling a reporter 'no comment.' "

Foley had hopes of moving up one more step — to the U.S. Senate when Graham retired in 2004. The congressman began campaigning across the state. After several publications in Florida and Washington ran stories saying he was gay, Foley called a news conference in May 2003 to address the swirling rumors.

"Everyone's talking about it," he acknowledged, but he called it nobody's business. "My mother and father raised me and the rest of my family to believe that there are certain things we shouldn't discuss in public." He said the speculation was "revolting and unforgivable."

Four months later, he withdrew from the Senate race, saying he wanted to spend more time with his ailing 82-year-old father.

Rumors about Foley's sexual orientation didn't cause much of a stir in Washington and didn't imperil his re-election to the House. In 2004, he was unopposed in the Republican primary and won the general election with 68% of the vote.

Allegations in recent days of his behavior toward congressional pages, however, have cost him dearly. Some of his colleagues express bafflement at what was apparently a double life. "There were two Mark Foleys," says Rep. Clay Shaw, a fellow Florida Republican. "One was a nice guy and the other is a child predator."

Some of those who worked with him on children's issues — he was co-chairman of the House Caucus on Missing and Exploited Children — are dumbfounded. Patty Wetterling, a children's advocate in Minnesota who is running for Congress as a Democrat, says she feels "a very big sadness and betrayal."

Singer-turned-politician Sonny Bono and his wife, Mary, worked with Foley on a task force designed to boost ties between Republicans and Hollywood. When Sonny Bono died in a skiing accident, Mary Bono sold his 1994 Jeep Wrangler to Foley.

On Monday, Mary Bono, now a Republican House member from California, issued a statement calling Foley's conduct "unacceptable and abhorrent." If he has violated the law, she said, "he should be prosecuted."

Little-known Job Caught In Spotlight (USAT)

By Brad Heath

USA Today, October 3, 2006

Like many former congressional pages, Ben Cavataro said he was drawn to the page program by an interest in politics and the opportunity to see the workings of government up-close.

Cavataro, a 17-year-old high school senior from Palm Beach Gardens, Fla., said Rep. Mark Foley, a Republican representing his district, nominated him to be a page last summer.

DOJ_NMG_0073595

On Friday, Foley abruptly quit the House of Representatives after ABC News reported he had sent sexually explicit messages to a former page. House leaders subsequently asked the FBI to investigate.

In the wake of Foley's resignation, the role — and relative security — of these high school students is facing new scrutiny. Rep. John Shimkus, R-Ill., the chairman of the board that oversees the program, said the House will set up a hotline for pages and their parents to report concerns.

The allegations against Foley surprised Cavataro, who only briefly met Foley during his three-week stint as a page last summer.

"There was no indication of anything improper with Foley or anybody else," Cavataro said. "We talked for like two minutes and shook hands."

His experience mirrored those of many of the scores of other pages who ferry messages between members of Congress on Capitol Hill each year. Theirs is typically one of Washington's least-noticed jobs. No longer.

"I hope it doesn't make the page program into a joke like the White House internship program was after (Monica) Lewinsky," said Dave Aronberg, a Democratic state senator in Florida and former House page who was referring to the intern who had oral sex in the Oval Office with President Clinton. "It's given a lot of kids a lot of great opportunities."

The House and Senate each select a group of pages annually to shuttle messages from office to office and to and from the floor of the Capitol. Typically, the job spans a semester of a school year or a few weeks during the summer.

The House takes about 60-70 pages during each period; the Senate takes about half as many. During the school year, the pages attend morning classes at schools that are part of the program.

House and Senate pages must be at least 16 years old when they're nominated. The programs are meant to be strictly supervised. House pages live in a brick dormitory near the Capitol, under a 10 p.m. weeknight curfew.

Rush Seale, who was a Senate page in 1999 and a House page in 2000, said few pages have one-on-one access to members of Congress. "It would have been kind of unusual," Seale said.

In 1983 the House censured two representatives for sexual encounters with 17-year-old pages. As a result, pages were required to live in the program's dorm.

Rick Gagliano, who was a page in 1976, said the scandals shouldn't overshadow the program. "Yes there have been some terrible situations in the page program history, but like the institution of the House of Representatives itself, the positive experiences and good work the page program does far outweigh the negatives," he said.

Addictions Are Often Disclosed Amid Scandals (USAT)

By Emily Bazar

USA Today, October 3, 2006

Former congressman Mark Foley's statement that he's an alcoholic, coming after reports that he sent sexually explicit e-mails to congressional pages, makes him the latest public figure to enter rehab in the face of scandal.

Reps. Patrick Kennedy, D-R.I., and Bob Ney, R-Ohio, and actor/director Mel Gibson have sought treatment in recent months for alcohol or drug addiction during trying circumstances.

Doing so removes them from the public eye and may win sympathy, says Gary Jacobson, a political science professor at the University of California, San Diego. It's also a way to shift some of the blame from the person to the addiction, he says.

"This seems to have become standard operating procedure," Jacobson says. "It's a way of both taking responsibility and denying it at the same time."

Kennedy checked into treatment in May, a day after he crashed his car near the Capitol. Kennedy, who has a history of drug and alcohol problems, said he was battling an addiction to prescribed painkillers.

Gibson entered an alcohol treatment program this summer after pleading no contest to drunken driving. Gibson made anti-Semitic remarks to arresting officers when he was stopped in Malibu.

Ney announced last month that he was seeking treatment for alcoholism the same day he agreed to plead guilty to corruption charges related to the Jack Abramoff influence-peddling scandal.

Foley's announcement Monday surprised Sarah Chamberlain, executive director of the Republican Main Street Partnership. Foley emceed the group's annual dinner Wednesday.

"At the dinners, he was always working, so usually he didn't have anything to drink," she says.

Foley has not acknowledged or denied that he sent the e-mails.

Alcoholism may exacerbate other disorders, says Fred Berlin, founder of Johns Hopkins University's Sexual Disorders Clinic. "It can impair a person's judgment and can lead them to become disinhibited with respect to their impulses," he says. "It's like throwing gasoline on the fire."

DOJ_NMG_0073596

Berlin says alcoholism has reached a level of acceptance that sexual disorders have not. “It's much less socially stigmatizing to admit to alcoholism than it may be to admit to some other problem,” he says.

Foley Joins List Of Sex Scandals On Capitol Hill (WT)

By Eric Pfeiffer

The Washington Times, October 3, 2006

The resignation of former Rep. Mark Foley has shocked Washington, but it is not the first accusation of impropriety with underage congressional pages to make headlines. The investigation of Mr. Foley's misconduct adds to a long history of Capitol Hill sex scandals.

One congressional historian said House members have proven more prone to such scandals.

"With the exception of Bob Packwood, it's mostly been on the House side," said Donald A. Ritchie, associate historian in the Senate's Historical Office. "That doesn't mean there weren't things going on, but it wasn't something that ruined their careers."

Mr. Packwood, Oregon Republican, was forced to resign from the Senate in 1995 in the wake of accusations that he had sexually harassed women.

In 1983, Rep. Gerry Studds, Massachusetts Democrat, was censured by the House for sexual involvement during the previous decade with a 17-year-old male page. Mr. Studds turned his back on members of the House as the charges were read against him. Afterward, Mr. Studds held a press conference with the former page, acknowledging their relationship.

Unlike Mr. Foley, Mr. Studds did not resign from Congress. In fact, he became the first openly homosexual member of Congress and won re-election six more times before retiring in 1996.

Also in 1983, former Rep. Daniel Crane, Illinois Republican, admitted to having an affair with a 17-year-old female page. Mr. Crane apologized for his actions on the House floor, saying, "I only hope my wife and children will forgive me."

He was voted out of office in 1984.

Why have some members of Congress survived sex scandals while others have not?

"What makes [the Foley scandal] different is that it was off the grid of social acceptability," said Eric Dezenhall, a crisis-management consultant. "You can't spin it. Americans are much more offended by hypocrisy than they are by dishonesty."

Mr. Foley had been co-chairman of the House Caucus on Missing and Exploited Children.

In an interview with CNN yesterday, House Speaker J. Dennis Hastert said he was not aware of Mr. Foley's reported misconduct until the Florida congressman resigned.

"First I was really aware of this was last Friday when it happened," Mr. Hastert said. "And all of a sudden, the press came out and said that there were these e-mails that were from 2003."

Mr. Hastert, Illinois Republican, spent much of the day yesterday meeting privately with the clerk of the House and the Republican chairman of the House page board, CNN reported.

Sex scandals on the Hill have not been limited to those involving congressional pages.

In 1990, Rep. Barney Frank, Massachusetts Democrat, was reprimanded by the House after it was revealed that Mr. Frank's former associate, Steve Gobie, was running a male prostitution ring out of Mr. Frank's apartment. Mr. Frank refused to resign from Congress and has been subsequently re-elected.

In 1989, former Sen. John Tower, Texas Republican, was nominated by President George Bush for secretary of defense. However, Mr. Tower failed to win Senate confirmation after being accused of alcoholism and having affairs with multiple women.

In 1976, Rep. Wayne Hays, Ohio Democrat, resigned after his former secretary, Elizabeth Ray, told reporters that the congressman had hired her and given her raises under the condition that she act as his mistress.

"I can't type. I can't file. I can't even answer the phone," Ms. Ray said at the time.

In 1974, Rep. Wilbur D. Mills, a powerful Arkansas Democrat who was chairman of the House Ways and Means Committee, was a passenger in a car pulled over at 2 a.m. by U.S. Park Police. Mr. Mills was drunk and was accompanied by an Argentine stripper known by the stage name Fanne Foxe, but the ensuing scandal did not prevent him from being re-elected that year.

Later, however, when Mr. Mills was spotted in a nightclub where Miss Foxe was performing, he was stripped of his committee chairmanship and did not seek re-election in 1976.

Foley 'drank In Secret,' Seeking Help, Lawyer Says (PALMBEACHP)

By Brian E. Crowley, Palm Beach Post Political Editor

Palm Beach Post (FL), October 3, 2006

DOJ_NMG_0073597

WEST PALM BEACH — Mark Foley is not a pedophile and "never ever" had sexual contact with minors, his attorney said Monday.

Instead, David Roth, a prominent criminal defense attorney with offices in West Palm Beach, portrayed Foley as a troubled alcoholic who has suffered from mental illness much of his adult life.

"Mark is an alcoholic. He drank in secret. He did not drink in public," Roth said. "He had two lives with regard to his alcohol consumption. In public, and in public service, he was sober. When he was alone, he was not sober. He is an acknowledged alcoholic."

Foley is now in treatment for alcoholism and mental illness at an undisclosed center, where he is expected to remain for at least 30 days, Roth said.

Roth said he was contacted by Foley on Friday, minutes after the Fort Pierce Republican resigned from Congress after being confronted with sexually explicit Internet messages he exchanged with a teenage boy.

Asked if Foley, 52, had physical contact with any of the boys with whom he was communicating, Roth said, "Based on all the information that I have, Mark Foley has never ever had an inappropriate sexual contact with a minor in his life."

Asked if Foley is a pedophile, Roth said, "He is absolutely, positively not a pedophile."

He described Foley as "contrite, remorseful and devastated by the harm that his actions have caused.... He blames no one but himself."

But even as Foley tried to make the case that his problems stemmed from alcohol and mental illness, the FBI and the Florida Department of Law Enforcement were beginning preliminary investigations to determine whether he broke any laws.

On Capitol Hill, House Speaker Dennis Hastert, R-Ill., and other leaders were moving quickly and vigorously to distance themselves from Foley.

Hastert said Monday that House Republican leaders were unaware of the "vile and repulsive" sexually explicit messages Foley had sent to a former page.

"Congressman Foley duped a lot of people," Hastert said at a news conference. "He deceived the good men and women in organizations around this country with whom he worked to strengthen our child predator laws. I have known him for all the years he served in this House. He deceived me, too."

Foley's name was removed from the wall outside his office early Monday. Later in the morning, a congressional employee posted a new sign reading, "Office of the 16th Congressional District of Florida."

His staff now works for the House clerk's office, which also took over his congressional Web site. The staff was warned early Monday not to talk to the media, one staffer said.

And now, what had been considered a safe congressional seat for Republicans is up for grabs. At a hastily called meeting of Republican leaders at the Orlando airport, state Rep. Joe Negron of Stuart was chosen as the nominee.

But Foley's name will remain on the ballot, increasing the odds that turned-off voters will pick Democrat Tim Mahoney, a political newcomer.

House Majority Leader John Boehner, R-Ohio, said in a radio interview with conservative commentator Sean Hannity that Negron is virtually doomed because "to vote for this candidate, you have to vote for Mark Foley. How many people are going to hold their nose to do that?"

Although Hastert said GOP leaders didn't know of the instant messages Foley sent to at least one former page, he conceded earlier that they were aware of other personal but less explicit e-mails Foley had sent to another 16-year-old former page.

In addition to Hastert's office, those informed about the e-mails included Boehner; Rep. John Shimkus, R-Ill., who heads the board overseeing the House page program; and Rep. Thomas Reynolds, R-N.Y., chairman of the National Republican Congressional Committee.

Reynolds said he discussed the e-mails with Hastert. The speaker said he did not dispute Reynolds' account but did not recall the conversation.

Boehner told the Dayton Daily News he was "99 percent" sure he talked to Hastert about the matter, but also said he did not recall their conversation.

Last year, Shimkus said he spoke to Foley about the e-mails, insisting that they cease immediately. But the matter was not made public, taken to the House ethics committee or revealed to Democratic members of the page board.

The GOP leaders' handling of the matter prompted criticism even from some Republicans who said they should have acted more forcefully.

"If they knew or should have known the extent of this problem, they should not serve in leadership," said Rep. Christopher Shays, R-Conn.

DOJ_NMG_0073598

Republican leaders also are concerned that the fallout from Foley's exit could hurt other GOP candidates in November. Tony Perkins, president of the Family Research Council, said there is "a real chance" the episode could threaten the GOP's majority status.

"I think the next 48 hours are critical in how this is handled," he said. "When a party holds itself out as the guardian of values, this is not helpful."

Meanwhile, the political firestorm was getting worse in Washington. Democrats were quick to accuse Republicans of not doing enough to protect the congressional pages who live in dorms near the Capitol.

"Republican leaders admitted to knowing about Mr. Foley's abhorrent behavior for six months to a year and failed to protect the children in their trust," said Minority Leader Nancy Pelosi, D-Calif. "Republican leaders must be investigated by the ethics committee and immediately questioned under oath."

Even the White House was brought into the fray. Spokesman Tony Snow attempted to deflect the political repercussions.

"The House has to clean up the mess, to the extent there is a mess," he said. "This does not affect every Republican in the United States of America, just as bad behavior on Democrats' part is not a reflection on the entire party."

Leaders from dozens of socially conservative groups held a conference call late Monday afternoon, and participants were described as livid with House GOP leaders.

"They are outraged by how Hastert handled this," said Paul Weyrich, a conservative activist who participated in the call. "They feel let down, left aside. How can they allow a guy like that to remain chairman of the committee on missing and exploited children when there is any question about e-mails?"

A watchdog group, Citizens for Responsibility and Ethics in Washington, said it had obtained copies of Foley's e-mails to the 16-year-old former page in late July and immediately turned them over to the FBI.

"They (the e-mails) should have raised a red flag over at the FBI," said Melanie Sloan, the group's executive director and a former prosecutor specializing in sex crimes.

On Monday, the group asked the Justice Department's inspector general to investigate why Foley's e-mails were not pursued.

Sloan said that though the 2005 e-mails were not sexually explicit — asking about the boy's birthday and progress in school, and requesting a photo — "they set off alarm bells for me."

"These are strategies pedophiles often use" to draw in their targets, Sloan said in a conference call with reporters.

Asked about the preliminary inquiry under way at the FBI, Attorney General Alberto Gonzales said Monday: "We're just beginning to look at it right now. I haven't received a report."

The Justice Department sent Hastert a brief letter that said the FBI was "conducting a preliminary investigation into this matter and will work closely with the department's prosecutors to determine whether any violations of federal law have occurred."

The Washington Post reported that a former chief of staff for Foley made one last effort to keep the most damaging messages from going public.

According to media reporter Howard Kurtz, the unnamed chief of staff contacted ABC's Brian Ross, offering to give the network an exclusive about Foley's resignation if Ross agreed "not to publish the raw, sexually explicit messages." Foley resigned after ABC confronted him with those messages.

"I said we're not making any deals," Ross said.

Foley's longtime former chief of staff, Kirk Fordham, did not return a call seeking comment. Fordham is now chief of staff for Reynolds, one of the congressmen who notified Hastert of the complaint from a former page.

Foley Saga No Shock To Some (LAT)

By Noam N. Levey, Maura Reynolds And Richard B. Schmitt

The Los Angeles Times, October 3, 2006

WASHINGTON — Years before sexually explicit electronic messages sent by Rep. Mark Foley to teenage House pages became public last week, some on Capitol Hill say, the Florida Republican was known to have a special interest in younger men.

In interviews with the Los Angeles Times, several current and former congressional employees and others said they recalled Foley approaching young male pages, aides and interns at parties and other venues.

"Almost the first day I got there I was warned," said Mark Beck-Heyman, a San Diego native who served as a page in the House of Representatives in the summer of 1995. "It was no secret that Foley had a special interest in male pages," said Beck-Heyman, adding that Foley, who is now 52, on several occasions asked him out for ice cream.

Another former congressional staff member said he too had been the object of Foley's advances. "It was so well known around the House. Pages passed it along from class to class," said the former aide, adding that when he was 18 a few years ago and working as an intern, Foley approached him at a bar near the Capitol and asked for his e-mail address.

Like most of those willing to discuss Foley, the young man asked not to be named because of concern that speaking openly could harm his career.

Foley resigned from office Friday. His attorney said Monday that Foley had checked himself into an alcohol rehabilitation center. In a statement, Foley said: "I strongly believe that I'm an alcoholic and have accepted the need for immediate treatment for alcoholism and other behavioral problems."

News reports about the messages Foley sent sparked a furor that continues to build. Much of the controversy centers on whether Republican congressional leaders responded aggressively enough when they learned late last year about less salacious e-mails Foley had sent to another page. In those e-mails, Foley asked the page to send a photo of himself and asked how old he was.

The GOP leaders said Monday, as they have since Foley resigned, that the matter had been appropriately handled last year, when the House clerk and congressman in charge of the page program told Foley to cease contact with the page. They also have said they knew nothing about more explicit instant messages — in which Foley graphically discussed sex — and had no reason to be suspicious about Foley's behavior.

House Speaker J. Dennis Hastert (R-Ill.), in public comments Monday, called the explicit messages "vile and repulsive, both to myself and to my colleagues." He added: "No one in the Republican leadership saw those messages until last Friday, when ABC News released them to the public."

ABC reported Monday that in another set of instant messages, Foley tried to arrange a rendezvous with another young teenage page.

Hastert also held a rare off-camera question-and-answer session with reporters Monday, during which he said that Foley's inappropriate contacts with pages appeared to have occurred after the teenagers had left Washington and returned home.

"I understand that these are pages that have all left the program," Hastert said. "This was after the fact. And you know — woulda, coulda, shoulda."

At least one Republican lawmaker, however, has said that GOP lawmakers should have dug deeper into Foley's behavior months ago.

West Virginia Rep. Shelley Moore Capito, who sits on the board overseeing the page program but who has said she was not told of any of the e-mails, told the Charleston Gazette over the weekend that even the less-explicit ones should have been viewed as suspicious

"I don't think it would pass the sniff test," she told the newspaper. "Even asking those questions — that is not normal between a 52-year-old adult and a 16-year-old…. It's not like they're family friends or anything. I think it would raise some serious questions."

The current and former congressional staffers interviewed by The Times, who are from both parties, said it was well known within the Capitol's gay community that Foley was interested in young men.

"Among the gay political community, there was a pretty wide understanding that he had an eye for the interns and the younger staff," said one former congressional staffer.

The staffers said Foley — who was elected to the House in 1994 and is not openly gay — would seek out the young men in bars, restaurants and even around the Capitol.

The former intern said he was approached by Foley at Bullfeathers, a popular restaurant and bar a few blocks from the Capitol. "He asked for e-mail, which I gave him," said the young man. "I was 18. To have a congressman take an interest in you seemed pretty cool."

But he said he quickly regretted it. Foley began sending him e-mails, asking for more information about him. "It was a patented act," he said. He stopped responding to Foley soon afterward.

Beck-Heyman, the former page, said several other male pages in his class also had been approached by Foley. "Mark Foley knew he could get away with this type of behavior with male pages because he was a congressman," he said.

Another former staffer said it was an oft-repeated story around Capitol Hill that Foley's former chief of staff, Kirk Fordham, would sometimes accompany the congressman to keep him out of trouble.

Fordham represents a link between Foley and House GOP leaders. Shortly after leaving Foley's office last year, he became chief of staff to Rep. Thomas M. Reynolds (R-N.Y.), chairman of the National Republican Congressional Committee.

Reynolds has said he was told this spring about the e-mails that sparked the initial complaint about Foley.

Fordham has not responded to repeated requests for comment from The Times.

Democratic congressional leaders continued Monday to attack the Republican handling of the Foley case.

"This is about a member of Congress who used his position to prey on young children, and a Republican leadership team who set out to cover it up," said Senate Minority Leader Harry Reid (D-Nev.).

DOJ_NMG_0073600

As criticism of GOP leaders mounted, the FBI — which reported Sunday that it had launched a preliminary investigation of Foley's behavior — came under fire Monday for not acting more quickly.

The advocacy group Citizens for Responsibility and Ethics in Washington said it sent the FBI the less explicit Foley e-mails in July. The group's officials now have asked the Department of Justice to investigate why the bureau didn't begin its investigation sooner.

FBI officials declined to comment on the complaint.

But a law enforcement official said investigators are trying to determine the scale and scope of potential crimes, and have been reviewing the messages that have become public.

The official, who requested anonymity because of the investigation's sensitivity, said that the bureau hoped to speak with some pages and their families soon to determine whether they would be willing to cooperate with the investigation.

Federal law makes it a crime to use the Internet to solicit sex from anyone under 18 years of age. Offenders can be fined and imprisoned for up to 30 years with a minimum sentence of five years in prison.

As of late Monday, the FBI had not requested access to the computers in Foley's former congressional office.

The office has continued to operate, handling constituent requests and other routine chores, but under the auspices of the clerk of the House.

Follow The Money (RC)

By Mary Ann Akers

Roll Call, October 3, 2006

How fitting that of all the politicians disgraced former Rep. Mark Foley (R-Fla.) chose to give money to this campaign cycle, the only two Members of Congress to whom he donated were Rep. Bob Ney (R-Ohio) and Sen. George Allen (R-Va.).

Foley's campaign committee made a total of three donations: $100,000 to the National Republican Congressional Committee; $2,000 to Friends of George Allen; and $1,000 to Bob Ney for Congress.

What, did Foley have some sixth sense that they'd all implode in the same year? Could he have predicted that he and Ney both would wind up in the tank, out of a job?

Ney, the only Member of Congress to be criminally nailed in the Jack Abramoff lobbying scandal, is scheduled to officially plead guilty in federal court on Oct. 13. Allen, the only Member of Congress ever known to use the word "macaca," is pleading his case to the people of Virginia (forget about the people of America, that dream is over) 24-7 until Election Day; and Foley, well, he's looking like the straw that broke the camel's back on the GOP scandal front.

Worst Pretty Boy in the World. Obviously, Keith Olbermann, host of MSNBC's "Countdown," doesn't know how narcissistic Congressional Chief of Staff Jason Roe is. When Olbermann gave Roe his nightly "Worst Person in the World" award Friday night, Roe wasn't upset in the slightest, he just hoped he looked hot if the show aired a photo of him.

Roe, chief of staff to Rep. Tom Feeney (R-Fla.), has taken a leave of absence to work on GOP candidate Peter Roskam's House campaign in the Illinois 6th district against Democrat Tammy Duckworth, a combat veteran who lost both her legs in Iraq. Olbermann derided Roskam for saying that Duckworth wanted to "cut and run" from Iraq "even though," Olbermann pointed out, "she lost both her legs there while serving as a helicopter pilot."

The reason Roe got the award is because he called "Countdown" to complain that Roskam was misquoted, charging the show with "intellectual dishonesty."

Well, that just did it. With a big photo of Roe and Roskam up on the screen behind him, Olbermann looked into the camera, addressing Roe, and said, "Hey, pal, this is about campaigning against a woman who has no legs because they were CUT OFF while she served in Iraq. ...You leave the intellectual to us, we'll leave the dishonesty to you."

He thus declared Roskam and Roe "Worst Persons in the World."

A friend of Roe who saw the segment called to tell him about it, saying, "Dude, you're not going to like this. They just named you 'Worst Person in the World.'" Well, he shoulda known. His pal Roe's first reaction: "Did they put my picture up?"

The tanned, toothy and handsome Roe, who never has a wrinkle in his designer clothes or a hair out of place, wrote the producers of "Countdown" an e-mail saying, "Thanks for using a good picture of me. The only disappointment is that since no one watches Olberman [sic], none of my friends will ever get to see my award. Try to get some viewership."

Roe's wife, Patty Roe, chief of staff to Rep. Rick Renzi (R-Ariz.), is a head-turning blonde who, nevertheless, said she's a slob compared to her prissy husband. She told us, "He wakes up looking that beautiful. With all the products not even a pillow can mess up his hair!"

Foley Memories. Boy oh boy (no pun intended) are the Foley "victims" crawling out of the woodwork! One of them, a boyish looking former reporter turned big-shot lawyer living in California, had until Friday tried to suppress the memory of repeatedly being "asked out" by Foley in the mid- to late '90s when the former scribe was in his 20s but looked about 18.

DOJ_NMG_0073601

He said the ex-Congressman used to occasionally ask him out for “a beer.” Though nothing ever happened, the all-grown-up-now former scribe is wigged out thinking about it.

After Foley resigned over the Pagegate scandal Friday, our source, whom we hesitate to call Deep Throat on the Left Coast, recalled something that happened about 10 years ago — he thinks it was early 1997 — one night at Café Deluxe.

“Last night I remembered another weird Foley incident,” DT on the LC told us.

He was out to dinner with a gal pal when he suddenly heard someone yelling his name from across the restaurant. DT on the LC was mortified when he saw Foley, who he said “was drunk,” approaching their table and quickly asked his friend to say she was his girlfriend.

Foley, who checked himself into an alcohol rehab clinic over the weekend, came over, exchanged pleasantries with the reporter and his friend and asked if the two were dating.

“Yes,” our source recalled his pal saying. Foley, according to our source replied, “Well, I’ve been asking [name redacted] out for years, and he always says no. What’s your secret?”

The former reporter froze. “I swear to God,” he said. “We were both so stunned we didn't know what to say. Luckily, the food came at his table and he left right after that.”

At some point during Foley’s attempted courtship (or beership) of the young reporter, our source went to a party at Foley’s house one night with another young male journalist. “I remember very vividly leaving his house and thinking, ‘That guy drinks way too much and is going to get himself in big trouble.’”

Please send your hot tips, juicy gossip or comments to hoh@rollcall.com.

Ex-Rep. Foley Checks Into Alcohol Rehab (AP)

By Lara Jakes Jordan, Associated Press Writer

AP, October 3, 2006

WASHINGTON (AP) - Former Rep. Mark Foley, under FBI investigation for salacious e-mail exchanges with teenage congressional pages, has checked himself into rehabilitation facility for alcoholism treatment and accepts responsibility for his actions, his attorney said Monday.

The attorney, David Roth, would not identify the facility, but told the Associated Press in West Palm Beach, Fla., that Foley had checked in over the weekend.

``I strongly believe that I am an alcoholic and have accepted the need for immediate treatment for alcoholism and other behavioral problems," Foley, a Republican, said in a statement, Roth told the AP.

In scorching language, House Republican leaders on Monday condemned Foley's actions as they tried to contain the damage to the party five weeks before midterm elections.

``Congressman Foley duped a lot of people ... He deceived the good men and women in organizations around the country with whom he worked to strengthen child predator laws," Speaker Dennis Hastert told reporters. ``I have known him all the years he served in the House and he deceived me too."

The Bush administration, meanwhile, sought to distance itself from the scandal and the increasing questions about when members of the House Republican leadership knew of the e-mail exchanges and what did they know of Foley's actions. Coming five weeks before the election, the scandal involving the Republican congressman could cost the GOP control of the House.

``The House has to clean up the mess, to the extent there is a mess," White House spokesman Tony Snow told reporters at a briefing.

Foley abruptly quit Congress on Friday after reports surfaced that he'd sent sexually charged electronic messages to boys working as pages. In the statement, Foley said the ``events that led to my resignation have crystalized recognition of my long-standing and significant alcoholism and emotional difficulties."

``I deeply regret and accept full responsibility for the harm I have caused," Foley said. He also expressed ``gratitude for the prayers and words of encouragement that have been conveyed to me."

The FBI, meanwhile, ``is conducting an assessment to see if there's been a violation of federal law," according to FBI spokesman Richard Kolko.

The Florida Department of Law Enforcement said Monday it was also investigating whether the e-mail communications violated state law. Spokesman Tom Berlinger called the state probe ``a precursor to a possible criminal investigation."

Florida Republicans picked state Rep. Joe Negron to replace Foley as its candidate in the West Palm Beach district, which is largely Republican.

House Republicans went into damage control mode amid charges by Democrats that some House leaders may have known for months about Foley's inappropriate overtures toward the young pages.

Hastert met with his staff, the House clerk and Rep. John Shimkus, R-Ill., the congressman who oversees the page program, to review the procedures on protecting the teenage pages while they are working at the Capitol and after they finish their assignments.

Hastert in a letter sent Sunday to Attorney General Alberto Gonzales, asked the Justice Department to ``conduct an investigation of Mr. Foley's conduct with current and former House pages,'' including ``any sexually explicit communications between Mr. Foley and any former or current House pages and what actions such individuals took, if any, to provide them to law enforcement.''

Democrats demanded that investigators determine whether Republican leaders tried to cover up Foley's actions for political reasons.

``The attorney general should open a full-scale investigation immediately,'' Senate Democratic leader Harry Reid of Nevada said in a statement, including whether GOP leaders ``knew there was a problem and ignored it to preserve a congressional seat this election year.''

FBI cyber sleuths are looking into the text of some of the Foley messages, checking to see how many e-mails and instant electronic messages were sent and how many computers were used, according to a law enforcement official, who spoke on condition of anonymity because of the ongoing investigation.

The FBI also was trying to determine if any of the teenagers who received messages are willing to cooperate with the investigation, the official said.

Ironically, Foley, who is 52 and single, could be found to have violated a law that he helped to write as co-chairman of the Congressional Missing and Exploited Children's Caucus.

Rep. Thomas Reynolds of New York, head of the House Republican election effort, said he told Hastert months ago about the allegations involving a 16-year-old boy from Louisiana.

Hastert acknowledged that his staff had been made aware of concerns about what they termed ``over-friendly'' e-mails Foley had sent to the teenager - including one requesting his picture - in the fall of 2005, and that they referred the matter to the House clerk.

But Hastert said those e-mails were not viewed as ``sexual in nature'' and that he was not aware of ``a different set of communications which were sexually explicit ... which Mr. Foley reportedly sent another former page or pages.''

AP reporter Brian Skoloff contributed to this story from West Palm Beach, Fla.; AP reporter John Heilprin contributed from Washington

Foley Checks Into Rehab As Republicans Seek Cover (MCT)

By Margaret Talev And Marisa Taylor

McClatchy, October 3, 2006

WASHINGTON - Republicans sought cover Monday from the FBI probe of former Rep. Mark Foley's sexual communications with underage male congressional pages, as the scandal's aftershocks spread across the political world and conservative activists began talking about a possible shakeup of the House Republican leadership.

As Foley, a Florida Republican, entered an alcohol and behavioral rehabilitation program, legal experts said criminal prosecution isn't a foregone conclusion. In some states, 16 is the age of sexual consent.

Yet in an ironic twist, federal laws championed by Foley himself make it a crime in some circumstances to use the Internet to persuade, induce or entice someone under 18 to engage in sexual activity.

While it hasn't been proved that Foley engaged in sexual acts with anyone under 18, ABC News on Monday reported sexually charged instant-message exchanges in which Foley urged a former page to meet him and referred to a prior meeting between them in California.

House Speaker Dennis Hastert, R-Ill., called a news conference on Capitol Hill to state unequivocally that no one in the party leadership knew until late last week of Foley's "vile and repulsive" instant messages, which ABC published online and which included explicit dialogue about masturbation. He said he wanted to find out who did know.

Hastert asked the Justice Department on Sunday to investigate not only Foley's actions, but what anyone in Congress knew about them.

Hastert has been under fire since Foley's abrupt resignation Friday. Hastert then suggested he was just learning there was a problem. But Rep. Tom Reynolds, R-N.Y., chairman of the GOP's congressional campaign committee, has said he made Hastert aware of the situation months ago.

The head of the House Page Board, Rep. John Shimkus, R-Ill., acknowledged learning late last year, along with the House clerk, that Foley had sent a former page an e-mail that wasn't sexually explicit but that asked personal questions that made the young man uncomfortable. Shimkus told Foley to stop communicating with the young man, but didn't share the information with his fellow Page Board members.

DOJ_NMG_0073603

None of the Republican leaders acknowledged knowing about the sexually explicit messages.

Democrats are accusing Republicans of an election-year cover-up.

Rep. Dale Kildee, D-Mich., a member of the House Page Board who said Shimkus didn't inform him about Foley's e-mail, accused Republicans of being "more concerned with finding political cover for themselves than with the safety and well-being of the House pages."

Shimkus said the young man's parents didn't want to pursue an investigation and that Foley was questioned, professed innocent motives and agreed not to contact the young man again.

Several conservative leaders voiced anger that House Republican leaders knew they had a potential predator in their ranks and didn't take it more seriously.

"After the elections, if the Republicans are still in power, this may signal a change in the leadership, if it appears they knew more than they have reported to us," said Mike Mears, executive director of Concerned Women for America's political action committee.

Richard A. Viguerie, a leader of the conservative movement for decades, suggested that Hastert's call for a Justice Department investigation "could be part of an effort to cover this up until after the election." He called for the immediate resignation of any House leader who knew of improper conduct and didn't act.

Tom Fitton, president of the conservative group Judicial Watch, said Hastert, Majority Leader John Boehner, Shimkus and Reynolds have "some serious explaining to do."

David Keene of the American Conservative Union said he doubts that Hastert had any idea of the extent of Foley's communications, but that Hastert nevertheless may pay a political price for not acting sooner.

Republican congressional candidates across the country feared the controversy's potential to depress conservative turnout at the polls in November or sway independent voters toward Democrats.

Republican Vern Buchanan, in a competitive Florida race to succeed Rep. Katherine Harris of Sarasota, gave to charity $2,000 that Foley's political action committee had contributed to his campaign. Buchanan's Democratic opponent, Christine Jennings, called it disconcerting to find Buchanan "in such a small group of recipients to benefit from Mark Foley's PAC."

Rep. Clay Shaw, a Fort Lauderdale Republican in a tight race, is donating $2,000 from Foley's campaign and political action committee to the Center for Missing and Exploited Children. Spokeswoman Gail Gitcho said, "No one is going to mistake Clay Shaw for Mark Foley," but acknowledged that the scandal "has completely eaten up the news cycle."

White House Press Secretary Tony Snow initially minimized the scandal in an interview with CNN.

"Look, I hate to tell you, but it's not always pretty up there on Capitol Hill, and there have been other scandals, as you know, that have been more than simply naughty e-mails," he said.

But he backed away from that line later, telling White House reporters, "Look, this is an awful and disturbing story. ... I think people are trying to put us in a box, and say, you know what, unless you come out and you condemn Denny Hastert, you're saying that this behavior is acceptable. It's not."

Citizens for Responsibility and Ethics in Washington (CREW), a liberal watchdog group, said it asked the FBI to investigate non-explicit e-mails between Foley and a former page back in July, after a "third party" made the e-mails available to the group. CREW asked Monday for the Justice Department's inspector general to investigate why the FBI didn't act. An FBI spokesman wouldn't comment, except to confirm that an investigation had been launched.

John Pierce, a former federal prosecutor of 14 years now in private practice, said if a crime was committed, the Justice Department could investigate members of Congress for knowing about a "commission of a felony" and failing to report it. However, Pierce expressed doubts that Hastert would have called for such a probe if he believed there was a cover-up within his party's ranks.

Barry Coburn, a criminal defense attorney and former federal prosecutor, said the allegations didn't clearly present solicitation of a minor.

"It might have been clearly inappropriate, and it might yet conceivably turn out to be something short of criminal solicitation," he said.

McClatchy Newspapers correspondents Lesley Clark and Alan Bjerga contributed to this report.

Hastert Says He Wasn't Aware Of Explicit E-Mails (Update1) (BLOOM)

By William Roberts

Bloomberg, October 3, 2006

Oct. 2 (Bloomberg) -- House Speaker Dennis Hastert, under fire for his response to Florida Representative Mark Foley's e-mails to teenage congressional pages, said he was unaware of any sexually explicit e-mails until Foley resigned.

``Republican leaders of the House did not have them," Hastert said at the Capitol. ``Someone did have them. And the Ethics Committee, the Justice Department, the news media, and anyone who can should help us find out who."

Hastert's comments are part of an effort to rebut Democratic suggestions that House Republican leaders didn't act aggressively enough after they learned about what they called ``overly friendly" but not sexual message that Foley sent to a teenage former page in 2005. Some Democrats said Republican leaders may have wanted to protect Republican control of Foley's district.

Foley, 52, resigned Sept. 29 after ABC News asked him about explicit e-mails that were sent to teenagers in 2003.

Some Republican congressional candidates distanced themselves from the scandal, fearing it might deal a final blow to the party's bid to keep control of the House in November elections.

`Toleration'

``Toleration of inappropriate behavior is almost as bad as the behavior itself," said Representative Heather Wilson, a Republican from New Mexico who faces a difficult race in November.

Hastert met today with Representative John Shimkus, the Illinois Republican who is chairman of the board that oversees the congressional page program. After their meeting, Hastert and Shimkus read prepared statements in front of news cameras in the Capitol and declined to take questions.

``Congressman Foley duped a lot of people," Hastert said. ``I have known him for all the years he served in this House. He deceived me, too."

House Democratic Leader Nancy Pelosi said in a statement today that Hastert ``failed to answer the question that every mother and father in America is asking: how could Republican Leaders chose partisan politics over protecting children?"

Foley has checked himself into a rehabilitation center for treatment of alcoholism, Palm Beach, Florida, television station WPBF reported. Joe Negron, a Republican state representative, has been chosen to replace Foley as the party's nominee in the 16th District, which stretches from Jupiter Beach on Florida's east coast across Lake Okeechobee to Port Charlotte on the west coast, CNN reported.

A Letter

Hastert yesterday sent a letter to Attorney General Alberto Gonzales asking for a criminal investigation of Foley.

In his letter to the attorney general, Hastert defended his handling of the matter, noting that after learning of Foley's 2005 e-mails to a male former page, Shimkus and the House clerk confronted Foley, demanded he stop contacting the page and believed the issue had been resolved privately as the parents had requested.

The FBI has opened an initial assessment of the matter ``to determine if there has been a violation of federal law," said Stephen Kodak, a spokesman for the agency in Washington.

FBI

Melanie Sloan, executive director of Citizens for Responsibility and Ethics in Washington, said she received the non-sexual e-mails July 21 from an unnamed congressional aide and gave them to an FBI agent.

She called for an investigation into the FBI's failure to act on them until now, saying agents should have recognized them as more than ```overly friendly."

Cynthia Schnedar, counselor to the Justice Department's inspector general, Glenn Fine, said officials are reviewing Sloan's complaint.

Democrats said any Justice Department investigation of Foley should include how House Republican leaders responded after the first indications that Foley had sent inappropriate e-mails to teenage pages in 2005. House Democrats demanded that the chamber's ethics committee produce a preliminary report on the matter within 10 days.

``Central to the investigation is immediately questioning, under oath, the House Republican leadership," Pelosi wrote in a letter to lawmakers on the committee yesterday.

Quickly Enough

White House officials declined to say whether Republican leaders in Congress had reacted quickly enough to warnings about Foley.

``The House is responsible for enforcing its standards," White House spokesman Tony Snow said. ``That has always been the case."

He rejected the suggestion that the scandal would harm his party's prospects in the November elections.

``This does not affect every Republican," Snow said. ``If you try to paint with a broad brush, I think you run the risk of tarring respectable people."

DOJ_NMG_0073605

Democrats, advocacy groups and some Republicans demanded full disclosure by Republican leaders of how the episode unfolded. Representative Peter King, a New York Republican, said yesterday that House leaders ``have to get all the facts out as quickly as possible."

Representative Rob Simmons of Connecticut said yesterday that all lawmaker should be held accountable for their actions.

``If it is found that any member of Congress or staff willingly participated in a cover-up of Mr. Foley's actions, that individual should resign immediately," Simmons said.

To contact the reporter on this story: Laura Litvan in Washington at llitvan@bloomberg.net ; Jay Newton-Small in Washington at jnewtonsmall@bloomberg.net

FBI Knew In July About Foley E-Mails To Teen (WP)

By Charles Babington And Jonathan Weisman

The Washington Post, October 3, 2006

The FBI acknowledged yesterday that it did not begin an investigation in late July after receiving copies of e-mails sent in 2005 by then-Rep. Mark Foley (R-Fla.) to a Louisiana teenager -- messages that troubled the boy's parents.

Key House Republicans learned of the e-mails in 2005 and chose to deal with Foley privately, warning him to cease contact with the 16-year-old former House page. Top aides to Speaker J. Dennis Hastert (R-Ill.) did not inform him about the incident, Hastert said yesterday, and he defended their actions in a Capitol Hill news conference.

But the GOP's handling of the Foley matter has rocked the party since it was revealed last week that Foley had sent far more sexually explicit electronic messages to teenage former pages in 2003 and 2004.

Many Democrats and some Republicans sharply criticized the decision by key House GOP members to handle the matter of the Louisiana e-mails so quietly that only one of the three lawmakers who oversee the page program knew anything about it. The other two -- one Democrat, one Republican -- expressed anger yesterday that they had been kept in the dark.

Also yesterday, ABC News posted on its Web site instant messages -- reportedly between Foley and another former House page -- in which the lawmaker repeatedly tried to set up a dinner date and indicated that the boy had spent time with him in San Diego. Previously disclosed messages had not indicated that Foley was trying to make personal contact with the boys, who had served as runners and helpers for a year in Washington.

Foley abruptly resigned Friday, and his attorney David Roth said yesterday that the six-term lawmaker is now at an alcohol-treatment center in Florida. In a statement faxed to news outlets Sunday night -- Foley's only public comments since his resignation -- he said: "I deeply regret and accept full responsibility for the harm I have caused."

Roth, interviewed last night on CNN, said that Foley is "absolutely, positively not a pedophile" and "has never, ever had an inappropriate sexual contact with a minor in his life." He said Foley wrote the e-mails "under the influence of alcohol" and was "suffering from mental illness."

Officials from the liberal-leaning group Citizens for Responsibility and Ethics in Washington said yesterday that they received copies of the Louisiana e-mails on July 21 and turned them over to the FBI the same day. Melanie Sloan, the group's executive director, said she spoke with a special agent in the Washington field office, and she questioned yesterday why the FBI did not investigate Foley weeks ago.

An FBI official, who spoke on the condition of anonymity because the investigation is ongoing, said the field office concluded that the e-mails "did not rise to the level of criminal activity." The bureau announced Sunday that it would begin a preliminary investigation into Foley's more explicit electronic exchanges with teenagers.

Some House Republicans said yesterday that the FBI and House leaders erred in not considering the e-mails -- and the concern they raised among the recipient's parents -- as justification for an inquiry.

"This thing should have been looked into months ago," said Rep. Walter B. Jones Jr. (R-N.C.), who said he is "disgusted" by his leaders' response. "That's abnormal for a 52-year-old man having those kinds of e-mails going to a 16-year-old child."

In a written statement, Rep. Christopher Shays (R-Conn.) said the Republican leadership needs to be shaken up. "If they knew or should have known the extent of this problem, they should not serve in leadership," he said.

Hastert, as the House's top officer and the man in line after the vice president to succeed the president, has been the main target of questions and barbs from both parties. He reiterated yesterday that he recalled hearing nothing about Foley's e-mails until last Friday, but he does not dispute the assertion of Rep. Thomas M. Reynolds (R-N.Y.) that he informed the speaker last spring.

"If Reynolds told me, it was in a line of things, and we were in the middle of another crisis this spring, so I just don't remember that," Hastert told reporters. He defended the decision by several top staffers to handle the Foley matter without telling him. "I see no reason to bump it up to me at that time," he said.

DOJ_NMG_0073606

Hastert noted that the 2005 e-mails to the Louisiana teenager were ambiguous. In one, Foley asked the boy to send a picture of himself, which reportedly alarmed the youth and his parents. Hastert agreed yesterday that an adult's request for a teenager's photo "would raise a red flag." But he said he would not second-guess his party's handling of the situation.

The boy's parents approached the office of Rep. Rodney Alexander (R-La.) in late 2005, asking that Foley stop contacting their son and that the matter be kept quiet, according to House accounts.

Reynolds, who chairs his party's House campaign committee, and Majority Leader John A. Boehner (Ohio) were among prominent Republicans who also knew of the parents' concerns earlier this year. But the matter was left to Rep. John M. Shimkus (R-Ill.), who chairs the House Page Board, and then-House clerk Jeff Trandahl, also a board member.

Shimkus has said that Foley assured them that the e-mails were innocent, and that they closed the discussion by telling him to respect pages and to cease contacting the Louisiana boy. Trandahl, now executive director of the National Fish and Wildlife Foundation, did not return phone calls yesterday.

Hastert said that he and other House leaders knew nothing of the instant messages between Foley and former pages in 2003 and 2004, which, ABC has reported, were much more graphic and discussed topics including masturbation.

ABC reported yesterday that Foley used the screen name "Maf54" and wrote a former page: "I miss you lots since san diego," to which the teenager responded, "ya I cant wait til dc." The youth asked, "did you pick a night for dinner." Maf54 replied, "not yet . . . but likely Friday."

In another exchange, Maf54 wrote, "I want to see you." The teenager replied, "Like I said not til feb . . . then we will go to dinner." Maf54: "and then what happens?" Teenager: "we eat . . . we drink . . . who knows . . . hang out . . . late into the night." When Maf54 pressed further, the teenager wrote, "hmmm, I have the feeling that you are fishing here . . . im not sure what I would be comfortable with . . . well see."

Rep. Shelley Moore Capito (W.Va.), Shimkus's fellow Republican on the Page Board, said she knew nothing of Foley's electronic exchanges until last week.

"As a member of the Page Board -- and, more importantly, as a mother -- I am appalled by Mark Foley's despicable conduct," she said. "I deeply regret not being made aware of this situation as a member of the Page Board."

White House spokesman Tony Snow contributed to the political firestorm yesterday when he told CNN the scandal involved "simply naughty e-mails." Democrats assailed the comment, and Snow later called the messages "disturbing," "appalling" and "reprehensible."

Hastert Defends Handling Of Page Scandal (AP-Y)

By Andrew Taylor, Associated Press Writer

AP, October 3, 2006

House Speaker Dennis Hastert on Monday defended his office's handling of questions raised about Rep. Mark Foley last year, saying the parents of a former male page were concerned about an e-mail Foley sent their son but didn't want the matter pursued.

Hastert said neither he nor other GOP leaders were aware until last Friday of far more lurid computer exchanges two years earlier between the Florida Republican and another page.

Hastert, R-Ill., acknowledged that Foley's 2005 e-mail to a Louisiana boy seeking a photograph raised a "red flag" with the Louisiana congressman who sponsored the page, but said his staff aides and Rep. John Shimkus, another Illinois Republican who chairs a board of House members who oversee the page program, did not know the contents.

Rep. Tom Reynolds, the House GOP campaign chairman, said he told Hastert in the spring of this year about the questionable e-mail. Hastert says he does not recall the conversation but does not dispute Reynolds' account.

Shimkus, appearing with Hastert on Monday, said new measures would be implemented to keep pages safe, including a toll-free hotline for pages, former pages and their families to confidentially report any incidents.

Democrats protested that those decisions should be made by the bipartisan page board.

"Once again, the House Republican leadership is following the same pattern of unilateral decision-making that caused this problem in the first place," said Rep. Dale Kildee of Michigan, longtime Democratic member of the board.

Hastert's media offensive came as the burgeoning scandal entered its fourth day, souring the outlook for Republicans in the November elections and raising questions about the judgment of senior House officials who handled the controversy. GOP leaders scheduled a late-afternoon conference call on the matter with rank-and-file Republicans.

Shimkus and the House clerk called Foley last fall and told him to cut off all communication with the former page. Only after ABC News reported the 2005 e-mail late last week did the more lurid material surface, as pages forwarded further messages to ABC.

DOJ_NMG_0073607

The network reported instant messages between Foley and a San Diego teenager, who suggested he was uncomfortable in an exchange discussing dinner plans for when the boy was to come to Washington.

"and then what happens," Foley messaged at one point.

"I have the feeling that you are fishing here ... im not sure what I would be comfortable with ... well see," the teen replied.

Democrats hammered at GOP leaders' handling of the Foley subject as an internal party matter instead of bringing it to the attention of the page board or the House Ethics Committee.

"Republican Leaders admitted to knowing about Mr. Foley's abhorrent behavior for six months to a year and failed to protect the children in their trust," said Minority Leader Nancy Pelosi, D-Calif. "Republican Leaders must be investigated by the Ethics Committee and immediately questioned under oath."

The FBI has begun an inquiry into Foley's computer contact with pages, and Hastert wrote a letter to Florida Gov. Jeb Bush asking for an investigation into whether state laws were broken.

Meanwhile, Florida newspapers — who were leaked copies of the e-mail with the Louisiana boy last year — defended their decision not to run stories. Both The St. Petersburg Times and The Miami Herald were given copies of the e-mail, as were other news organizations, including Fox News.

"Our decision at the time was ... that because the language was not sexually explicit and was subject to interpretation, from innocuous to 'sick,' as the page characterized it, to be cautious," said Tom Fiedler, executive editor of the Herald. "Given the potentially devastating impact that a false suggestion of pedophilia could have on anyone, not to mention a congressman known to be gay, and lacking any corroborating information, we chose not to do a story."

Hastert called on any person who was aware of the 2003 instant messages to speak to law enforcement authorities. He said no Republican leader in Congress was aware of those exchanges until Friday, when ABC News reported it had questioned Foley about them.

A watchdog group, Citizens for Responsibility and Ethics in Washington (CREW), said it had obtained copies of Foley's e-mails to the 16-year-old former page in late July and immediately gave them to the FBI.

"They (the e-mails) should have raised a red flag over at the FBI," said Melanie Sloan, the group's executive director and a former prosecutor specializing in sex crimes. The group on Monday asked the Justice Department's inspector general to investigate why Foley's e-mails were not pursued.

Asked about the preliminary inquiry under way at the FBI into Foley's actions, Attorney General Alberto Gonzales told reporters Monday afternoon, "We're just beginning to look at it right now. I haven't received a report."

The Justice Department sent Hastert a brief letter that said the FBI "is conducting a preliminary investigation into this matter and will work closely with the department's prosecutors to determine whether any violations of federal law have occurred."

The congressional page program has traditionally been a starting point for young people interested in making a career of politics.

There currently are 72 House pages, 48 selected by Republicans and 24 by Democrats, according to a recent report by the Congressional Research Service. The Senate breakdown is 30 pages, 18 chosen by Republicans and 12 by Democrats.

Leadership officials had been aware since last year of the 2005 e-mail exchange, which they said was "over friendly" but did not include overtly sexual references. They said they did not follow up other than to instruct Foley to not communicate with the Louisiana page.

But Sloan of the CREW watchdog group said that while the 2005 e-mail was not sexually explicit — asking about the boy's birthday and progress in school and requesting a photograph — "they set off alarm bells for me."

"These are strategies pedophiles often use to draw in their" targets, said Sloan in a conference call with reporters.

Foley, 52, checked into an alcohol rehabilitation center over the weekend, his attorney said Monday. In a statement, Foley said, "I strongly believe that I'm an alcoholic and have accepted the need for immediate treatment for alcoholism and other behavioral problems."

Florida Republicans on Monday chose a member of the state Legislature, Rep. Joe Negron, to replace Foley as the party's candidate for the state's 16th congressional district, which covers an area north and west of Palm Beach.

Democrat Tim Mahoney said Monday that his campaign learned about the Foley e-mails through a reporter and wasn't sure what to believe until actually seeing them.

"There was information that obviously had been out and about. It had to be one of the biggest open secrets in Washington D.C."

White House spokesman Tony Snow attempted to deflect the political repercussions, saying, "The House has to clean up the mess, to the extent there is a mess."

"This does not affect every Republican in the United States of America, just as bad behavior on Democrats' part is not a reflection on the entire party," Snow said.

Pelosi Wants GOP Leaders' Testimony (RC)

By John Bresnahan

Roll Call, October 3, 2006

House GOP leaders and the FBI faced new questions on Monday over their handling of the sex scandal surrounding former Rep. Mark Foley (R-Fla.), with Democrats and a Congressional watchdog group suggesting Foley's activities were covered up or deliberately ignored for months to keep his seat under Republican control.

House Minority Leader Nancy Pelosi (D-Calif.) has asked for Speaker Dennis Hastert (R-Ill.) and other top Republicans to be questioned under oath by the ethics committee regarding their handling of the Foley scandal, including what they knew, and when, about a series of July 2005 e-mails from Foley to a 16-year-old former Congressional page and how they responded to the incident.

Hastert has said repeatedly that he was not personally aware of the initial batch of Foley e-mails since the scandal first broke last Thursday, although Majority Leader John Boehner (R-Ohio) and National Republican Congressional Committee Chairman Tom Reynolds (N.Y.) have both stated publicly that they informed the Speaker of the messages in the spring or early summer of this year. Boehner now says he cannot remember whether he told Hastert, and Hastert himself does not "recall or remember" any conversation with Reynolds regarding Foley.

"Republican Leaders admitted to knowing about Mr. Foley's abhorrent behavior for six months to a year and failed to protect the children in their trust," Pelosi said in a statement released by her office. "Republican Leaders must be investigated by the Ethics Committee and immediately questioned under oath."

Three of Hastert's top aides were made aware of the Foley e-mails in the fall of 2005 by Rep. Rodney Alexander (R-La.), according to a timeline released by the Speaker's office on Saturday. The teen lived in Alexander's district, and his parents sought Alexander's help in getting Foley to stop contacting their son.

The July 2005 e-mails do not include sexually explicit language but were disturbing enough that Rep. John Shimkus (R-Ill.), chairman of the House Page Board, and Jeff Trandahl, the former Clerk of the House, interviewed Foley about them last year. Foley agreed to stop the e-mails, and Hastert's staff was then informed of his promise but took no further action, according to Hastert's office. Hastert told reporters on Monday that "there [was] no reason to bump it up to me at that time."

Since ABC News first reported on the July 2005 e-mails last Thursday, a series of electronic messages between Foley and other former pages have surfaced, a number of which include sexually graphic comments by the former lawmaker to teenage boys. Foley resigned from the House on Friday, and his Congressional office was taken over by the Clerk of the House. Foley has reportedly checked himself into alcohol rehabilitation in Florida, becoming the second GOP lawmaker to do so in the past month.

The House approved a resolution late Friday evening directing the ethics panel to look into the Foley scandal, although Reps. Doc Hastings (R-Wash.) and Howard Berman (D-Calif.), chairman and ranking member of the committee, have not announced yet if or how they would conduct any investigation.

The ethics committee traditionally has deferred to the Justice Department or other law enforcement agencies in the handling of criminal matters, although in this case, sources close to the panel said the two lawmakers are anxious to have the panel weigh in on this matter as quickly as possible.

The ethics committee would need a quorum of at least six of its 10 members present to approve any investigation or appoint an investigative subcommittee to undertake a probe, and that has not occurred as of Monday night, according to House insiders. Members of the committee also would have to physically present to approve subpoenas to any lawmakers or current or former House staffers.

At this time, Pelosi has not called for a special or independent counsel to oversee the investigation, although some Democrats privately are suggesting their leadership should back that proposal. But the appointment of an outside counsel would almost certainly slow down any committee investigation, and Hastings and Berman are under intense pressure to show some results in the five weeks before the midterm elections.

Hastert asked for both Attorney General Alberto Gonzales and Florida authorities to begin a criminal investigation of Foley. FBI officials said the bureau now has begun a "preliminary review" of the Foley messages to determine their authenticity and whether any federal laws were violated by the Florida Republican.

Hastert also has vowed that the ethics committee and House officials will work in tandem with any federal probe. "Well, obviously, if federal investigators come in, we always cooperate with them," Hastert said.

But Melanie Sloan, head of the liberal watchdog group Citizens for Responsibility and Ethics in Washington, told reporters on Monday that she had turned over the July 2005 e-mails to an FBI special agent on July 21 of this year. Sloan questioned whether the FBI, at the behest of the White House or other Republican officials, covered up Foley's allegedly improper behavior to protect his House seat for the GOP.

DOJ_NMG_0073609

Sloan has asked the Justice Department's Inspector General office to look into the FBI's handling of the Foley e-mails. The IG's office had no comment on Monday other than to say it had received Sloan's request.

"Since the FBI has known about Rep. Foley's e-mails since July, the question arises: Did the administration help to cover up Rep. Foley's conduct and leave a potential sexual predator on the loose? Was the administration more concerned with protecting a powerful ally in Congress than with protecting children?" Sloan said in a Monday conference call with the press.

Sloan, a former federal prosecutor and House Democratic staffer, said the initial batch of Foley e-mails, which included no explicitly sexual references, were disturbing enough that they warranted a criminal probe as soon as the FBI became aware of them. Sloan did not name the FBI special agent to whom she turned over the e-mails.

"There are the strategies that pedophiles use to draw in their victims," Sloan said of the initial Foley e-mails, which included Foley asking former pages some friendly questions, followed by a request for a photo of one teen.

Sloan said she "never heard back from the FBI" after turning the e-mails over to the special agent but was not alarmed by that since the bureau would not inform her of their actions in the case. When the Foley scandal broke last week, Sloan said she became concerned that GOP leaders or Bush administration officials blocked a probe of the former lawmaker.

"The American public deserves to know not just how and why members of Congress failed to take action to protect the youngsters entrusted to the care of the House of Representatives, but also why the FBI — an agency charged with protecting the public — failed to safeguard other youngsters from a potential sexual predator," Sloan said in her letter to the Justice IG's office.

A potentially thorny legal question facing House leaders is what to do with any documents or materials still in Foley's Cannon Building office or district offices.

Although he has resigned from Congress and the Clerk of the House is officially running his former office and has changed the locks on the office doors, Foley still personally owns any documents, materials or electronic records in those offices, and the House may not be at liberty to turn them over to criminal investigators short of a subpoena, which Foley could potentially contest in court on the grounds that some of the materials may be privileged, similar to the claim that has arisen in the corruption probe of Rep. William Jefferson (D-La.).

In addition, it is unclear what electronic or telephone records the House has in its possession at this time relating to Foley, and how such records could be turned over to investigators.

With Foley facing potential federal and state criminal investigations, legal experts also are divided as to whether he will be able to spend freely on his legal defense from his $2.8 million campaign account that is left over from his aborted re-election bid.

If forced to pay legal bills out of his own pocket, Foley will find it a difficult endeavor if any investigation is prolonged and requires a well-financed team of advisers.

According to a review of his financial disclosure statement for 2005, Foley is not among the most wealthy Members of Congress, with a net worth of at least $237,000.

In recent years, most Members of Congress caught up in federal investigations have been granted free reign by the Federal Election Commission to spend from their campaign accounts on their defenses, with the commission usually applying a standard that allows such expenses if the probes are clearly related to the Member's status as a federal candidate or actions taken as a Member of Congress.

Some defense lawyers believe the FEC would not place any limits on Foley and his ability to pay for his legal team with leftover campaign funds, citing the generally broad leeway other lawmakers have been given by the commission to pay legal bills.

Cleta Mitchell, a GOP campaign finance expert at the firm Foley & Lardner, said this investigation falls under the "but for" standard that the FEC applies — but for Foley being a Member of Congress, this investigation wouldn't have started.

"It is pretty broadly interpreted — and all the Members who've had to deal with allegations of criminal misconduct have been advised that their excess campaign contributions can in fact be used to defray legal expenses arising from their service as Members of Congress. Even if the costs are associated with defending allegations of a criminal nature," the GOP lawyer said.

But other lawyers say that standard may not apply to Foley, particularly if the FEC decides that these actions under scrutiny had no connection to his actual work as a Member of Congress.

"It's not a slam dunk," said Marc Elias, a Democratic attorney with Perkins Coie.

Elias noted a 2003 decision by the FEC that was a split verdict for James Treffinger, a GOP Senate candidate from New Jersey in 2000 and 2002 who came under a 19-count federal indictment for extorting contributions to his campaign from county contractors who were awarded local business. In that case, the FEC ruled that half of Treffinger's actions were not related in any fashion to the Senate campaign and were about local corruption, forbidding him from using the leftover funds to defray legal costs.

DOJ_NMG_0073610

In Foley's case, Elias said the FEC may rule that his actions with the teenagers was "purely personal conduct," particularly if the investigation were to lead to actions with other minors not connected to the House Page program.

Paul Kane contributed to this report.

Papers Knew Of Foley E-Mail But Did Not Publish Stories (NYT)

By Anne E. Kornblut And Katharine Q. Seelye

The New York Times, October 3, 2006

WASHINGTON, Oct. 2 — At least two news organizations were tipped off to e-mail messages sent by Representative Mark Foley long before the story of his sexually explicit remarks to teenage pages broke last week and forced him to resign.

The St. Petersburg Times and The Miami Herald received copies of an e-mail exchange between Mr. Foley, Republican of Florida, and a teenager, but neither paper gathered enough solid material to publish a story, according to statements by the papers' editors.

It was not until the exchanges were published online last week, first by an anonymous blogger, then on the ABC News Web site, that the story gained momentum and grew more damaging as other teenagers came forward.

The trickle of information about Mr. Foley's messages, first made known to the news media almost a year ago, has raised questions not only for Congressional officials but also for news organizations about how to handle anonymous sources making explosive accusations in an election year.

At the same time, the papers' decisions not to report the accusations are being cited by Republican leaders as justification for why they themselves did not step forward earlier to try to stop Mr. Foley.

"He deceived his in-state newspaper when they each questioned him," Speaker J. Dennis Hastert said Tuesday. "He deceived me, too."

The St. Petersburg Times said that last November, it received copies of an e-mail exchange between Mr. Foley and a former page from Louisiana. The newspaper said the boy, who was under age, did not want his name used, and the paper said it did not want to publish accusations based on unnamed sources. The Miami Herald apparently received the same information, although it is not clear when it received it.

Brian Ross of ABC News said he learned about the e-mail messages in August but was too busy with Hurricane Katrina and the anniversary of the Sept. 11 attacks to pursue them immediately. None of the organizations seemed to anticipate how big the story would become.

"I never thought it would lead to his resignation," Mr. Ross said.

When The St. Petersburg Times received its first tip on the e-mail messages in late 2005, the editors decided it was "friendly chit-chat," with nothing overtly sexual, but nonetheless assigned two reporters to find out more, according to an editor's note.

The reporters tracked down the teenager, but he refused to let them use his name in a story. They found a second page who had corresponded with Mr. Foley and was willing to let them use his name but said he did not have a problem with the messages, undercutting the premise.

When the newspaper asked Mr. Foley about the messages, he "insisted he was merely trying to be friendly," Scott Montgomery, the newspaper's government and politics editor, wrote Saturday in a note to readers.

The editor of The Herald, Tom Fiedler, said the initial messages did not seem to justify writing a story. "We determined after discussion among several senior editors, including myself, that the content of the messages was too ambiguous to lead to a news story," Mr. Fiedler was quoted in his paper as saying.

Then, in June, the reports resurfaced on Capitol Hill, where a neighborhood resident struck up a conversation in a bar with someone who had provided the e-mail messages. He said he passed them on to several news outlets. The resident, who said he was not affiliated with either party and was motivated by concern for the teenager, would talk only on condition of anonymity.

No one acted on the information until last week, and even then, it was a Web site that first posted the exchange. It is not clear who maintains the Weblog, stopsexpredators.blogspot.com, which appears to be largely devoted to the Foley scandal.

ABC News had its first account several days later on its Web site.

Mr. Ross said he was surprised by how quickly the congressman's office confirmed the authenticity of the e-mail messages, first when ABC reported them on Sept. 28, and again a day later when confronted with much more explicit exchanges.

Mr. Ross dismissed suggestions by some Republicans that the news was disseminated as part of a smear campaign against Mr. Foley.

"I hate to give up sources, but to the extent that I know the political parties of any of the people who helped us, it would be the same party," Mr. Ross said, referring to Republicans.

DOJ_NMG_0073611

Your Page, M'Lord (NYT)

By John Tierney

The New York Times, October 3, 2006

Suppose Nike's founder, Phil Knight, asked taxpayers to subsidize a program for 16-year-olds to leave their homes to become "squires" running errands at Nike headquarters. Or suppose, before his death, Sam Walton had asked Congress to build a dormitory in Arkansas to house teenage "serfs" spending a semester away from their schools to work on a Wal-Mart loading dock.

These executives would become national jokes. They'd be denounced for trying to revive 19th-century child-labor practices and 12th-century feudalism. There would be no public money appropriated for Knight's Squires or Sam's Serfs.

Yet Congress sees nothing strange about dragging teenagers from their families and schools to become pages, one step below a squire in the feudal food chain. They're not being forced to wear Prince Valiant haircuts, but they have to do scut work that's probably even less useful than what they could learn at Nike or Wal-Mart.

Congressional pages spend much of their time hand-delivering documents, a job that's done electronically in most 21st-century institutions. When educators talk about preparing youth for jobs in the Information Age, they're not talking about training messengers.

The justification for the page program is that it gives teenagers an insider's glimpse of how Congress works. But why disillusion them at such a tender age? If they stayed in school, they could maintain their innocence by reading the old step-by-step textbook version of how a bill becomes law. By going to Capitol Hill, they see how the process has changed:

1. A bill is introduced to build highways.
2. A congressman receives a donation from a constituent who wants to open a go-kart track.
3. The congressman persuades his committee chairman to slip in a $350 million "earmark" for an "alternative sustainable transportation research facility" in his district.
4. The chairman quietly adds similar earmarks for all members of the committee.
5. The bill is passed unanimously.
6. The president complains about the "wasteful spending" but signs it into law anyway.
7. The congressman attends a fund-raiser at the new go-kart track.

What lesson has the page learned? That Congress is the closest thing in modern America to a medieval court: an enclave governed by arcane ancient rules of seniority, a gathering of nobles who spend their days accepting praise and dispensing favors to supplicants.

They're so secure in their jobs, and so used to being surrounded by groveling minions, that they assume the privileges of feudal lords when dealing with pages and other lieges. Which is why, on occasion, they try to exercise the droit du seigneur.

Unlike previous scandals, in which members were censured for having sex with pages, the current one so far doesn't involve physical contact. But it features lewd messages from Representative Mark Foley to a teenager asking about his sex life and requesting a picture. When you are chairman of the House Caucus on Missing and Exploited Children, as Foley was, this does not qualify as research for your job.

Even if you could somehow quell Congressional libidos, even if this scandal taught members of Congress not to hit on teenagers, the page program still wouldn't be worth paying for. It should be eliminated, as Representative Ray LaHood has proposed, for the sake of both Congress and the pages. They need to be spared not just from lustful congressmen but from the chief lesson taught by the program: that success is all about making the right connections.

To get into the program, you (or your parents or their well-connected friends) have to find a member of Congress to sponsor you. Once in, the supreme goal is to ingratiate yourself with someone powerful enough to help you move up the Washington hierarchy. As Rachel Swarns reported in The Times, Foley was a favorite of the pages because he offered them the gift of access.

"If a congressman was talking to you, it was the best thing in the world," said one former page, Patrick McDonald.

Spend enough time as a page, and you can easily believe it's not what you know, it's who you know — and whom you flatter. Granted, toadying can be a useful skill in most lines of work. But it's not a lesson teenagers need to study for a whole semester, especially when it's being taught in text messages from a lord on Capitol Hill.

Foley May Be 1st Member Prosecuted Under Strong Internet-crime Laws (HILL)

By Jackie Kucinich

The Hill, October 3, 2006

DOJ_NMG_0073612

Former Rep. Mark Foley (R-Fla.) is not the first member of Congress to face a firestorm of public outrage for engaging in inappropriate conduct with underage pages, but he could be the first to be prosecuted under strong Internet-crime laws.

Ex-House counsel Stanley Brand said that the difference between the current page incident and an incident two decades ago involving two other lawmakers is the passage of cyber crime laws in recent years and the presence of Internet communication.

"It's not just someone's word against another; there are e-mails," he said. "The difficulty of proving an illicit solicitation is not there. I'm sure that is what the FBI is looking into."

Foley resigned suddenly on Friday after ABC News reported about questionable e-mails and sexually explicit instant messages between a page and the six-term legislator Thursday and Friday. On Monday, Foley checked himself into an alcohol rehabilitation center for treatment.

House GOP leaders, Brand said, could also face consequences politically and legally if the FBI discovers that members of the leadership team knew about Foley's behavior before ABC News released the e-mails and instant messages.

In 1983, the House censured Reps. Daniel B. Crane (R-Ill.) and Gerry E. Studds (D-Mass.) after their inappropriate relations with House pages were discovered.

Crane lost his election shortly thereafter while Studds was reelected and remained in the House until retiring in 1997.

While Crane and Studds escaped prosecution, Foley likely will not. According to Orin Kerr, an associate professor at George Washington University, Foley could have broken the law under 18 U.S. Code 2422(b), which states that an individual "using the mail or any facility or means of interstate or foreign commerce … who knowingly persuades, induces, entices, or coerces" an individual who is under the age of 18 to "engage in prostitution or any sexual activity" can be charged with a criminal offense. If convicted, the individual can be imprisoned for five to 30 years.

As a result of Crane and Studds's misconduct, the House created the Page Board, a body of lawmakers and House officials, which oversee the activities and education of pages.

Three members of the House as well as House Sergeant at Arms Wilson Livingood, Clerk of the House Karen Haas and former clerk Donald Anderson make up the Page Board, according to House Administration Committee spokeswoman Sally Collins.

Reps. John Shimkus (R-Ill), Shelley Moore Capito (R-W.Va.) and Dale Kildee (D-Mich.) are the board's House members.

Speaker Dennis Hastert (R-Ill.) announced several changes to the page program yesterday at a joint press conference with Shimkus including the establishment of a hotline for "parents, grandparents, pages, former pages …"

"Anyone who has a concern about improper contact … can confidentially report improper contact," Hastert said.

Although many improvements have been made to the page program in order to provide more supervision of students, Hastert said House leaders should do more to ensure that pages are safe after they leave their positions in the House.

Shimkus added that he plans to meet with the Page Board in the coming weeks to construct further programs to protect pages.

One member of the board said he was left out of the discussions entirely.

"I am now equally outraged to learn that Republican House Speaker Dennis Hastert announced today that there will be changes in the policies of the House page program," said Kildee. "Once again, I was not informed of the meeting today, nor was I consulted in any way about any proposed changes."

"Speaker Hastert's announcement this afternoon is yet another example of the House Republican leaders being more concerned with finding political cover for themselves than with the safety and well being of the House pages," he added.

Capito, for her part, directed all of her outrage towards Foley.

"As a member of the Page Board — and more importantly as a mother — I am appalled by Mark Foley's despicable conduct and hope that his actions be held accountable by the full weight of our justice system," she said in a release.

The board typically meets two times a year to discuss the agenda for the pages, plan activities, arrange seminars and discuss enrollment, according to Collins.

There are 63 pages admitted to the program each year; Republican members choose 45 of them and Democrats choose 18.

In order to be admitted to the competitive program, applicants must be at least 16 years old, a junior in high school and have a grade point average of 3.0 or above during the academic year.

Members of Congress sponsor page applicants and then page program staffers interview them. The Clerk's office manages the page program.

Once accepted, pages live in an on-campus dormitory and attend classes in addition to their service in the House.

The program is highly regimented. Pages attend classes in the Jefferson Building of the Library of Congress at 6:45 a.m. and are taught a range of topics including mathematics, social studies and foreign languages.

When they are not in class, their duties are mainly to deliver correspondence and legislative material between members, answer phones in party cloakrooms and prepare the House Floor for sessions. They have a 10 p.m. curfew on weeknights, which extends to midnight on weekends.

They are paid an annual rate of $17,540, with a monthly gross salary of $1,461.67, according to informational materials provided on several members' websites. They are required to pay a residence hall fee of $400 a month, which includes meals and is automatically deducted from their paychecks.

At all times during the workday they are to remain in uniform: blue blazers, a white shirt and gray slacks or skirts.

The page program has had its share of problems traditionally associated with teenagers. In 2002, 11 pages were dismissed for marijuana use. In 1996, five pages were suspended from the program for alcohol use.

Matthew Loraditch, a 21-year-old former page, told the Chicago Tribune Sunday that he had known about the "creepy" e-mails for years. Loraditch runs the House Page Alumni Association's Internet messaging board. That website was shut down Monday.

"Because of the current situation. I am shutting down the board until I can provide a proper statement about my part in what has been going on. I appreciate your patience," the site said. The site was taken down entirely yesterday afternoon.

Loraditch is listed as the website's licensee at the bottom of the home page.

Man Shoots 11, Killing 4 Girls, In Amish School (NYT)

By David Kocieniewski And Gary Gately

The New York Times, October 3, 2006

NICKEL MINES, Pa., Oct. 2 — A dairy truck driver, apparently nursing a 20-year-old grudge, walked into a one-room Amish schoolhouse here Monday morning and systematically tried to execute the girls there, killing four and wounding seven before killing himself, the police said.

The heavily armed gunman first ordered the 15 boys in the room to leave, along with several adults, and demanded that the 11 girls line up facing the blackboard. As the gunman lashed the students' legs together with wire and plastic ties, the teacher dashed from the room and called the police around 10:35 a.m.

The gunman, identified as Charles C. Roberts, 32, killed himself as the police stormed the West Nickel Mines Amish School, which is set back in a cornfield on a street of stone houses, barns and silos in Lancaster County, about 50 miles west of Philadelphia. Several of the wounded were in critical condition in area hospitals.

"He wanted to find female victims," said Col. Jeffrey B. Miller, commissioner of the Pennsylvania State Police. "This was a target of opportunity."

Mr. Roberts had no criminal record or history of psychiatric illness, the authorities said. But notes he left at his home — where he lived with his wife, Marie, and their three children — said he was distraught about a slight that had occurred more than 20 years ago.

The police would not describe the incident that had upset him. But Colonel Miller said Mr. Roberts, who lived near the school but was not Amish, did not appear to have been motivated by religious bias. The police said they were looking into a report that the couple lost an infant daughter in 1997.

When Mr. Roberts arrived at the school shortly before 10:30 a.m., he was carrying a 9-millimeter handgun, Colonel Miller said, and asked the teacher, "Have you seen anything like this?" referring to the weapon. "Can you help me find it?"

When the state police arrived around 10:45, Mr. Roberts had barricaded the doors with bolts and lumber he had brought in his pickup truck, Colonel Miller said.

After a brief cellphone exchange with his wife and then with the state police, Mr. Roberts began shooting, aiming the handgun and a shotgun at the children as they stood lined in front of the room. As the police began charging the building around 11, Mr. Roberts fired a shot into his head, Colonel Miller said.

"He was angry with life; he was angry at God," Colonel Miller said. "It appears he chose this school because it was close to his home, it had the female victims he was looking for, and it probably seemed easier to get into than some bigger school."

The rampage was the third fatal shooting at a United States school in the past week but seemed nearly incomprehensible to many residents of the Amish community, where crime rates are so low that many homeowners do not lock their doors and many towns have no police force.

The Amish community in Pennsylvania, which numbers about 55,000, lives an agrarian lifestyle, shunning technological advances like electricity and automobiles. And many say their insular lifestyle gives them a sense that they are protected from the violence of American society. But as residents gathered near the school, some wearing traditional garb and arriving in horse-drawn buggies, they said that sense of safety had been shattered.

DOJ_NMG_0073614

"If someone snaps and wants to do something stupid, there's no distance that's going to stop them," said Jake King, 56, an Amish lantern maker who knew several families whose children had been shot.

Mr. Roberts's relatives said they, too, were stunned by his violent outburst and had had no indication that he had been planning any attack. His wife issued a written statement offering sympathy to the families of his victims and said she could not reconcile the day's events with the man she had loved.

Her statement was read by a family friend, Dwight Lefever, and described Mr. Roberts as a devoted father who had always taken the time to play with his three children, ferry them to soccer practice and birthday parties, and had "never once refused to help change a diaper."

"The man that did this thing is not the Charles I was married to for nearly 10 years," Mrs. Roberts said in the statement.

The police did not release the names of the victims but said all had been girls from 6 to 13.

Once the police entered the building, they found a cache of weapons and supplies that indicated Mr. Roberts had prepared for a long siege. He had a 9-millimeter semiautomatic pistol, two shotguns, a stun gun, two knives, two cans of gunpowder and 600 rounds of ammunition.

In a toolbox near his body, the police discovered bolts he had used to barricade the school doors with two-by-fours, pliers and wires he had used to bind the girls' legs. Another five-gallon bucket he brought into the building contained earplugs, bathroom tissue and a clean change of clothing, the police said.

Mr. Roberts lived just over a mile from the school in the town of Bart, in a modular home that had a trampoline and sandbox in the yard and was already decorated for Halloween. Neighbors said he was jovial and generally well liked, and they were struggling to understand what had driven him to violence.

"I am dying to know what kind of insult from a girl 20 years ago could have led to this," said Mary Miller, who lived on his street.

The police said, however, that Mr. Roberts's co-workers had noticed changes in his behavior over the past several months. While he had long been known as an upbeat and outgoing person, this year he began to appear sullen, his co-workers told the police. Then, late last week, Mr. Roberts once again appeared upbeat at work, Colonel Miller said.

"We think that's when he decided to do what he did," Colonel Miller said. "It's like his worries and burdens were lifted from him."

The police said most of Mr. Roberts's weapons appeared to be legal. He bought the 9-millimeter semiautomatic, which he fired at least 13 times during his rampage, from a store five miles from the schoolhouse in 2004. The shotguns and ammunition also appeared to be legal, the police said, although it was not clear whether his possession of a stun gun violated any law.

The police said Mr. Roberts had bought the ammunition and other supplies from area stores over the past several months, so there was no glaring sign that might have alerted store owners that he was about to burst out in violence.

The police said Mr. Roberts called his wife from a cellphone while he was inside the school just moments before the shooting. During the call, Colonel Miller said, Mr. Roberts made a reference to the grievance that he blamed for his despair, then told her: "The police are here. I'm not coming home."

Colonel Miller said that once the gunfire began troopers charged the building and broke in through several windows in the school. By the time they arrived, however, the children lay dead or wounded in the front of the classroom and Mr. Roberts's body was a few feet away. One child died in the arms of a trooper as he rushed her out of the building to get medical help, Colonel Miller said.

Lancaster County school officials held an emergency meeting last night to try to ease the concerns of school administrators and parents unnerved by the shooting. County officials said that despite the bloodshed, residents should be confident that most of the schools were safe.

That reassurance gave little comfort, however, to people like Dwylin Bieler, 42, whose 8-year-old daughter played with one shooting victim.

"You think something like this will never happen, especially in a place like this," said Mr. Bieler, who is Mennonite, and says the Amish community makes him and others feel welcome. "You pray that it won't happen. But you just never know. You can't know. And that's hard to accept."

Four Girls Killed At Pa. Amish School (WP)

By Raymond Mccaffrey And Paul Duggan

The Washington Post, October 3, 2006

BART TOWNSHIP, Pa., Oct. 2 -- A truck driver armed with three guns, two knives and 600 rounds of ammunition burst into a one-room schoolhouse in this Amish community Monday, lined at least 11 girls against a blackboard and shot them "execution style," fatally wounding four before taking his life, police said.

DOJ_NMG_0073615

The fourth girl died late last night at a hospital, a spokeswoman for the Pennsylvania State Police said. Of the seven other girls who were shot, as many as six were critically wounded. Their conditions were "very, very dire," said Col. Jeffery B. Miller, commissioner of the state police.

Miller called it "a horrendous crime scene" and said the victims, at least one as young as 6, were shot at close range in the back of the head. The condition of one girl, a 13-year- old, was upgraded last night to serious, a hospital official said.

The shootings in this Lancaster County farming community occurred as police outside the schoolhouse were trying to make contact with the assailant, Charles Carl Roberts IV, 32, who drove a milk tank truck and lived in the area, Miller said.

"It was over within a matter of seconds," he said last night.

Miller said Roberts -- armed with a semiautomatic handgun, a rifle, a shotgun and a stun gun -- apparently was motivated by rage over a long-ago incident unconnected to the school or the Amish.

"Apparently there was some sort of an issue in his past that he, for some reason, wanted to exact revenge against female victims," Miller said. "It's obvious to us that this was a premeditated hostage scenario where, I believe, based on what the investigators have so far, he intended not to walk out of there alive. But he also intended to kill innocent victims."

Three young students and a teacher's aide who was believed to be about 15 or 16 were fatally wounded in the rampage, police said.

Miller said that 15 rounds were fired from the handgun and three from the shotgun. One shotgun blast was directed toward police outside the building, the police official said.

Roberts left notes for his wife and three children "along the lines of suicide notes," Miller said.

The school had 26 students in attendance yesterday, 15 boys and 11 girls, authorities said. The attack shocked the quiet people of this community, whose religion and traditions require them to remain separate from the outside world and shun the trappings of modern life, including electricity and motor vehicles. Roberts was not Amish, and Miller said he had no known criminal history.

The shootings here were the third at a U.S. school in five days.

On Wednesday, a 53-year-old drifter took six girls hostage in Platte Canyon High School in Bailey, Colo., sexually assaulted them and fatally shot a 16-year-old girl before killing himself. Two days later, a 15-year-old former student allegedly shot and killed a principal in Cazenovia, Wis.

Elsewhere, three teenagers were charged in Green Bay, Wis., on Thursday in an alleged plot to bomb and burn a high school and shoot students as they emerged. And on Monday, officials in Las Vegas said they locked down four schools after a student was spotted entering a high school carrying a gun.

Bart Township, about 60 miles west of Philadelphia, has about 3,000 people and a landscape of grain silos, dairy farms and tobacco fields. Its country roads host the horse-drawn buggies of the Amish.

According to Miller, Roberts's wife, Marie Roberts, told police that her husband worked until 3 a.m. Monday delivering unprocessed milk from Amish farms to a dairy and then went home. He took his children to a bus stop about 8:45 a.m. before driving to the Amish school on White Oak Road.

Roberts apparently was prepared for a long siege, Miller said. In addition to the weapons and rounds of ammunition, he had two cans of smokeless gunpowder, rolls of tape, tools and a change of clothes.

Marie Roberts later found several suicide notes and tried to call her husband, Miller said. About 11 a.m., Roberts called his wife from the schoolhouse and "told her he wasn't coming home," Miller said. Roberts told her that "he couldn't go on anymore" and that "he was getting revenge for something that happened 20 years ago," Miller said.

Miller also said that "there may have been a loss of a child some time in his life."

From the notes to his family and telephone calls, it was clear Roberts was "angry at life, he was angry at God," Miller said. Co-workers at the dairy said Roberts, once given to joking, had seemed to grow despondent not long ago, according to Miller.

But in the past two or three days, Miller said, Roberts changed again. Miller said police were told that Roberts appeared more at ease, which might suggest that he had come to a decision about what he would do.

Miller said he did not believe that Roberts was influenced by the recent school shootings but instead settled on his course independently.

"The man who did this today is not the Charlie that I've been married to for almost 10 years," Marie Roberts said in a statement released to the news media.

Quoting a teacher who escaped, Miller said that when Roberts entered the school, he showed students the handgun and spoke to them in a "rambling discourse," Miller said.

In a news conference, Miller said Roberts arrived at the school in the morning in a borrowed pickup. He said Roberts separated the boys, ages 6 to 13, from the girls at the school.

DOJ_NMG_0073616

Roberts then told the girls to line up against a blackboard and bound their feet with wire ties and plastic handcuffs, Miller said, his voice choked with emotion. Roberts allowed the boys to leave, along with a pregnant woman and three women with infants.

As the women, who apparently are teacher's aides, were leaving, a teacher was able to flee, and she called police from a nearby farm at 10:36 a.m., Miller said.

As officers arrived at the school and a hostage negotiator tried to contact Roberts, he called a police dispatcher and warned that he would start shooting in 10 seconds if police did not withdraw, Miller said. Seconds later, shots rang out, and state troopers carrying ballistic shields rushed the building. Miller said Roberts had barred the doors with lumber that he had brought for that purpose and with desks from the classroom.

Roberts spoke to his wife by cellphone moments before he opened fire, Miller said. In addition to shooting at the girls, he fired out a window at approaching state troopers but did not hit them. Miller said troopers did not fire. One was injured slightly by broken glass while going in a window.

Police found Roberts face down on the floor, with the weapons beside him, Miller said, adding that "one of the girls died in the arms of one of my troopers."

Television news footage showed ambulances and police vehicles on the road outside the schoolhouse, which is surrounded by a white fence. A blue pickup with a white cap over the bed was backed up to the front of the schoolhouse. At one point, firefighters and Amish men walked abreast through nearby fields, looking for students who might have fled and were not accounted for.

The wounded were taken to several hospitals, in locations that included Hershey, Pa., Philadelphia and Delaware.

At the Penn State Milton S. Hershey Medical Center in Hershey, a 6-year-old girl and an 8-year-old girl remained in critical condition last night in the pediatric intensive care unit, a hospital spokesman said.

He said the girl who was upgraded to serious had undergone about five hours of surgery and was able to communicate with family members by blinking her eyes and giving hand signals.

The death of the fourth girl, about 12 hours after the shooting, was reported by Trooper Linette Quinn, a state police spokeswoman. It was not clear at what hospital she died.

The first Amish settlers arrived in Lancaster County in the early 18th century, according to the Pennsylvania Dutch Country Web site.

Donald Kraybill, a leading national scholar of Amish communities, said violence is rare at Amish schoolhouses, which he said are characterized by an emphasis on order, but where pranks and giggles are not uncommon. About 150 small Amish schoolhouses dot Lancaster County.

Monday, Amish people gathered on a farm near the school, bearded men in black pants, suspenders and broad-brimmed straw hats and women in long dresses and bonnets.

Irene Moyer, who is Amish, said she was contacted by the parents of one of the children at the school. "One of the Amish neighbors knocked at the door and said: 'Can you take care of my children? There's a gunman at the school.' "

A family spokesman, Dwight LeFever, read a statement from Roberts's wife, saying: "Our hearts are broken, our lives are shattered, and we grieve for the innocence and lives that were lost today. Above all, please, pray for the families who lost children and, please, pray, too, for our family and children."

Staff writers Daniel de Vise, Tamara Jones, Kari Lydersen, Dan Morse, Clarence Williams and William Branigin, researcher Meg Smith and the Associated Press contributed to this report.

Gunman Slays 4 Amish Schoolgirls (WT/AP)

By Mark Scolforo

The Washington Times, October 3, 2006

NICKEL MINES, Pa. -- A milk-truck driver carrying three guns and a grudge stormed a one-room Amish schoolhouse yesterday, sent the boys and adults outside, barricaded the doors with two-by-fours, and then opened fire on a dozen girls, killing four of them before committing suicide.

It was the nation's third deadly school shooting in less than a week, and it sent shock waves through Lancaster County's bucolic Amish country, a picturesque landscape of horse-drawn buggies, green pastures and neat-as-a-pin farms, where violent crime is virtually nonexistent.

Most had been shot, execution-style, after being lined up along the chalkboard, their feet bound with wire and plastic ties, authorities said. The names and ages of the dead were not released.

"This is a horrendous, horrific incident for the Amish community. They're solid citizens in the community. They're good people. They don't deserve ... no one deserves this," State Police Commissioner Jeffrey B. Miller said.

DOJ_NMG_0073617

Two young students were killed, along with a female teacher's aide, Col. Miller said. Authorities said the aide was about 15. Late last night, Philadelphia's Fox affiliate WTXF and CNN said a fourth student had died.

At least six other victims were critically wounded, state police said.

The gunman, Charles Carl Roberts IV, a 32-year-old truck driver from the nearby town of Bart, was bent on killing young girls as a way of "acting out in revenge for something that happened 20 years ago," Col. Miller said, though he gave no details on what the grudge was.

Roberts was not Amish and apparently had nothing against the religious community, Col. Miller said. Instead, Col. Miller said, he apparently picked the school because it was close by, there were girls there and it had little or no security.

Col. Miller said Roberts was apparently preparing for a long siege, arming himself with a 9 mm semiautomatic pistol, a 12-gauge shotgun and a rifle, along with a bag with about 600 rounds of ammunition, two cans of smokeless powder, two knives and a stun gun on his belt. He also had rolls of tape, various tools and a change of clothes.

Roberts had left several rambling notes to his wife and three children that Col. Miller said were "along the lines of suicide notes." The gunman also called his wife during the siege by cell phone to tell her that he was getting even for some long-ago offense, Col. Miller said.

The shooting took place at the one-room West Nickel Mines Amish School, a neat white building set amid green fields about 55 miles west of Philadelphia, with a square white horse fence around the schoolyard. The school had about 25 to 30 students, ages 6 to 13.

From the suicide notes and telephone calls, it was clear Roberts was "angry at life, he was angry at God," Col. Miller said. And it was clear from interviews with his co-workers at the dairy that his mood had darkened in recent days and that he had stopped chatting and joking around with fellow employees and customers, the officer said.

Col. Miller said Roberts had been scheduled to take a random drug test yesterday. But the officer said it was not clear whether that played a role in the attack. The colonel also said investigators were looking into whether the attack was related to the death of one of Roberts' own children. According to an obituary, Roberts and his wife, Marie, lost a daughter shortly after she was born in 1997.

Reporters were kept away from the school after the shooting, and the Amish were reluctant to speak with the press, as is their custom. The victims were members of the Old Order Amish. Lancaster County is home to some 20,000 Old Order Amish, who eschew automobiles, electricity, computers, fancy clothes and most other modern conveniences, live among their own people, and typically speak a German dialect known as Pennsylvania Dutch.

Bob Allen, a clerk at a bookstore in the Amish country tourist town of Intercourse, said residents see the area as being safe and the Amish as peaceful people.

"It just goes to show there's no safe place. There's really no such thing," he said.

After entering the building, Roberts released about 15 boys, a pregnant woman and three women with babies, Col. Miller said.

"Very, very traumatic situation. Some of my troopers, actually one of the girls died in the arms of one of our troopers," Col. Miller said.

A Roberts family spokesman, Dwight Lefever, read a short statement from Mrs. Roberts that said, in part, "Our hearts are broken, our lives are shattered, and we grieve for the innocence and lives that were lost today. Above all, please pray for the families who lost children and please pray too for our family and children."

Seclusion Shattered By School Slayings (USAT)

By Thomas Frank And Alan Levin

USA Today, October 3, 2006

BART TOWNSHIP, Pa. — They shun electricity, telephones and the court system to try to stay disconnected from a world they consider polluted by modern convention and comfort.

But the rural seclusion the Amish have here in central Pennsylvania's rolling hills was shattered Monday by the execution-style shooting of three Amish girls in a one-room schoolhouse.

“You read about it, you hear about it. But you don't expect it to happen this close to home,” said John Fisher, 33, an Amish man who lives a half-mile from the school.

The killings — the girls were bound together and had to be cut apart by rescue workers according to the Pennsylvania State Police — devastated the ordinarily composed Amish. Many were “crying and weeping and hugging, and the Amish people don't usually show too much emotion,” said Annie Beiler, 66, whose farm abuts the school property. “They are quiet, private people.”

DOJ_NMG_0073618

Lancaster County District Attorney Don Totaro said, “It's beyond comprehension that anyone would slaughter children in this manner.”

“It's like a dream. It's something you hear of in a city,” said Naomi Fisher, whose runs an auction house nearby. “You read it in the paper. But not in a quiet little country school.”

David Bernard, 66, of Parkesburg works as a driver for some Amish neighbors and accompanied them to the school Monday night. Bernard said the Amish viewed the violence as a demonstration of the problems posed by the modern world.

“This is a place of blood,” he said of the school. “People died here, so they'll probably tear it down.”

The violence seemed unlikely to change the tight religious sect that is rooted in non-violence and resistance to change.

“I don't see it as having a large effect on their lifestyle,” said David Weaver-Zercher, a professor at Messiah College in Pennsylvania. “In a certain way, it confirms a general orientation about the world not being a very good place.”

Since the Amish emerged as a small Protestant sect in late-17th-century Switzerland, its adherents have strived to maintain religious purity. Nonviolence — or “non-resistance” — was an early tenet that arose from a literal reading of the New Testament.

“They take the words of Jesus seriously: to love your enemies and not to do evil to fellow people,” said Donald Kraybill, an Amish expert at Elizabethtown College in Pennsylvania. “There is very little violence in the Amish community.”

Crime by the Amish is so rare that only one adherent is thought to have been convicted of murder: an Amish man from western Pennsylvania who killed his wife in 1993 saying he wanted to excise the devil.

The gunman Monday, Charles Carl Roberts IV, was not Amish and was not targeting the Amish but apparently picked the school because it was near his home and had little security, said Col. Jeffrey Miller of the Pennsylvania State Police. Roberts killed himself in the school building.

Amish schools — typically one-room schoolhouses with 25-30 students and a young, female teacher — reflect the community's efforts to protect itself against the dangers of worldliness. The Amish went to the U.S. Supreme Court in 1972 to preserve their right to end classroom education after eighth grade.

They won a decision in 1972 that said the Amish weren't against education itself but oppose “conventional formal education” in high school years “because it comes at the child's crucial adolescent period of religious development.”

“The Amish view is that they should provide the basic education for children to live productively in the Amish community,” said Herman Bontrager of the National Committee for Amish Religious Freedom, which brought the Supreme Court case. “Additional things really aren't necessary for living productively in their community. They distract and maybe lead you into another world.”

The Amish have negotiated a tricky path between accepting and rejecting convention since the rise of technology in the mid-19th century. They number about 200,000. The largest communities are in Ohio, Pennsylvania and Indiana.

Many have moved away from farming, particularly in Lancaster County, Pa., the site of Monday's shooting and the setting for the acclaimed 1985 film Witness, in which Harrison Ford plays a Philadelphia police officer who takes refuge on an Amish farm.

About 60% of Lancaster's Amish run businesses such as greenhouses, woodworking shops and farmer's markets, said Kraybill.

That has challenged the Amish's effort to “separate from the world,” said Weaver-Zercher, the Messiah College professor. “They look at various technology and how that would connect them.”

The Amish eschew electricity that would literally connect them to society through power lines, but they use self-contained power sources such as batteries and gas to run refrigerators and stoves.

They pay federal income taxes and local property taxes, but they won an act of Congress to exempt them from paying and receiving Social Security benefits. “They feel the church should provide support for its own members,” Kraybill said.

Amish avoid phones in their homes, where they would enable intrusions that interrupt family life. Phones are in some Amish businesses and at roadside booths where families share them.

After the gunman took students hostage in the school, a teacher ran to a farmhouse where someone called 911.

Although Amish enjoy police protection, many of them are reluctant to cooperate with criminal investigations, viewing prosecution as a form of force.

Steven Nolt, a historian at Goshen College in Indiana who's written several books about the Amish, recalled cases in which Amish people were murdered but relatives refused to help win convictions “because they weren't going to engage in that kind of retributive violence.”

Weaver-Zercher of Messiah College said he expects the Amish to “reach out” to the gunman's widow.

“They'll try to express their forgiveness,” he said, “and sense that in some ways, this woman is a victim.”

DOJ_NMG_0073619

Gunman At Amish School Kills 4 Girls, Wounds 7 (PPG)

By Tom Barnes And Tracie Mauriello, Pittsburgh Post-gazette

Pittsburgh Post-Gazette, October 3, 2006

Lancaster County milk truck driver kills himself after slaughter

NICKEL MINES -- It was a bloodbath, made even more horrible by its location and its innocent victims, who became targets of a lone gunman apparently because they simply lived near his home.

Charles Carl Roberts IV, 32, a rural milk truck driver and father of three, walked into West Nickel Mines School, the tiny schoolhouse less than 2 miles from his home that housed children in grades one through eight.

Armed with three guns and 600 rounds of ammunition, he ordered all but the girls to leave, then barricaded the doors with lumber, bound the children's legs and lined them up against the chalkboard.

He called his wife to say he was "angry at life, angry at God" then shot each girl, most of them in the back of the head and all at close range.

Police had arrived on the scene before the shots were fired and tried to hail Mr. Roberts using loudspeakers.

Mr. Roberts used a cell phone to call a 911 center and tell them he would begin shooting if state police did not leave. When police at the scene tried to call Mr. Roberts back, that's when they heard the sound of gunfire.

By the time police managed to break into the school, they found Mr. Roberts dead.

Mr. Roberts, apparently seeking revenge for a mysterious incident 20 years ago when he was a boy, had planned the slaughter for days, based on the weapons, tools and other equipment police recovered inside the school.

"It's clear to us he did a great deal of planning in this," said state police Commissioner Jeffrey Miller. "It was clear he intended to be prepared for a lengthy siege. It was not a spur of the moment thing. He intended to harm these kids and himself."

Two young girls and Mr. Roberts died inside the schoolhouse, a third female, a 15-year-old teacher's aide, died later at Lancaster General Hospital. Another girl died later last night, and seven others were fighting for their lives at hospitals in Philadelphia, Hershey and Wilmington, Del.

It was the nation's third deadly school shooting in the last week, and it prompted the Bush administration to call for a national conference next week on school violence.

"It would be a miracle if we were able to somehow not have any further loss of life," Col. Miller said. Police did not release the names of the victims.

Two had such severe head wounds they could not be identified for hours. State police showed photographs of the wounded children to families of the victims so they then could be taken to the correct hospital to see their daughters.

"They were killed at close range, execution style," Col. Miller said. "I have never seen anything like this. This was a horrendous tragedy."

The incident did not appear to be related to the Amish. Mr. Roberts is not Amish.

Col. Miller would say little else about a motive except that something might have happened 20 years ago, when Mr. Roberts was 12. Col Miller refused to elaborate.

"It seems as though he wanted to attack young, female victims," Col. Miller said.

He also said the death of Mr. Roberts' infant daughter in 1997 may have played a part in yesterday's tragedy.

"How these pieces fit together we don't know. We may never know," he said. "We believe he was going through some sort of personal strife, something from 20 years ago."

Neighbors and distant relatives said they did not know about any incident from 20 years ago.

"I completely don't know anything about anything like that," said Ken Scott, who used to work with Mr. Roberts.

"It appears this location was probably picked because it was close by. It was a target of opportunity," Col. Miller said. "He was able to locate individuals in the age group he was looking for."

Police say Mr. Roberts, who lived in the town of Bart, dropped off his children at a school bus stop, then drove a borrowed pickup truck to the school at about 9:45 a.m. Brandishing a semiautomatic pistol, he also carried a range bag containing a shotgun, a rifle, two knives, a stun gun, two cans of smokeless gunpowder, a change of clothes, a hammer, a hacksaw, tape and lumber, which he used to secure the doors and to prevent police from storming inside.

Before securing the building, Mr. Roberts allowed 15 boys, a pregnant woman and three women with infants to leave the building, then lined up 11 girls, age 6 to 15, against a chalkboard, their feet bound with wire ties and flexible plastic ties, Col. Miller said.

It was about that time that the teacher and another adult at the school fled to a nearby farmhouse, and someone there called 911 around 10:30 a.m. to report a gunman holding students hostage.

Most of the victims were shot in the back of the head, although some were hit in other parts of their bodies.

DOJ_NMG_0073620

It was over in seconds.

Police could not easily enter the schoolhouse because Mr. Roberts "had taken extreme measures to fortify this location. He took two-by-sixes and two-by-fours and nailed them to the doors and then used flex-ties so there was practically no way we could get in quickly."

Police believe Mr. Roberts held the hostages for about 45 minutes before the teacher got away and reached a telephone to call for help.

About the same time, police received another call from Mr. Roberts' distraught wife, Marie, who had returned home to find suicide notes left by her husband for her and their children.

Most of the injured were badly hurt.

Two girls -- ages 8 and 6 -- remained in critical condition last night at the Penn State Children's Hospital in Hershey, while a 13-year-old girl was upgraded to serious condition after surgery, spokeswoman Amy Buehler Stranges said.

Three girls, ages 8, 10 and 12, were flown to Children's Hospital of Philadelphia, where they were still in surgery last night, spokeswoman Peggy Flynn said. The youngest girl was being treated for gunshot wounds of her neck and arm. The 10-year-old was suffering from head injuries. The oldest girl was being treated for arm and leg injuries.

One victim was transported by helicopter to Christiana Hospital in Delaware, spokesman Spiros Mantzavinos said. He declined to give the person's age or release information about the condition or type of injuries, citing confidentiality laws.

The incident left the peaceful Amish farming community of about 300 looking for answers.

"Our children are defenseless. He picked an easy target. It takes a real target to do that," said John Fisher, 33, one of several dozen Amish men clustered at an informal state police command post, about 300 yards from the school.

"This is a sad day, something I never expected in this community," said another Amish man, Jacob King, a 31-year-old stonemason and lifelong resident.

Many of the Amish neighbors spent a lot of time being interviewed by reporters, although some objected to television interviews because they didn't want their pictures taken.

Some Amish and non-Amish residents speculated the incidents might affect relations between the cultures.

Daniel Beiler, 30, who is Amish, said it could make the Amish even further reject the outside world. But Mr. Fisher wasn't so sure.

"We have a very good relationship with the non-Amish. We get along very well," he said.

Longtime residents of the area were equally shocked.

"I can't believe anybody could do this to children," said Shirley Woerth, who has lived here for 53 years.

Mr. Roberts had no criminal history and no active warrants out against him. He grew up in the area, and his and his wife's families still live in the area.

State police were examining his milk truck, which was found parked several hundred yards from the shooting scene.

A family spokesman, Dwight LeFever, read a short statement from Mr. Roberts' wife that said, in part, "Our hearts are broken, our lives are shattered, and we grieve for the innocence and lives that were lost today. Above all, please pray for the families who lost children and please pray too for our family and children."

The Amish live among their own people and maintain a lifestyle that eschews modern conveniences, such as television and radio. They typically speak a German dialect known as Pennsylvania Dutch.

Land O'Lakes, based in Arden Hills, Minn., issued a statement confirming that Mr. Roberts was employed as a truck driver and assigned to Northwest Food Products, a wholly owned Land O'Lakes subsidiary.

The shootings were disturbingly similar to an attack last week at Platte Canyon High School in Bailey, Colo., where a man took several girls hostage in a school classroom and then killed one of them and himself. Authorities said the man in Colorado sexually molested the girls.

"If this is some kind of a copycat, it's horrible and of concern to everybody, all law enforcement," said Monte Gore, undersheriff of Park County, Colo.

Col. Miller, though, said he believed the Pennsylvania attack was not a copycat crime: "I really believe this was about this individual and what was going on inside his head."

Three Killed, 8 Hurt In Pennsylvania School Attack (Update8) (BLOOM)

By Todd Zeranski And Chris Dolmetsch

Bloomberg, October 3, 2006

Oct. 2 (Bloomberg) -- Three people were killed and eight were critically wounded by a gunman at a one-room Amish school in rural Lancaster County, Pennsylvania, authorities said.

DOJ_NMG_0073621

The gunman, Charles Carl Roberts, 32, a milk truck driver who lived in the area, also killed himself, state police Commander Jeffrey Miller said in a televised press conference. Roberts left a suicide note saying he was seeking revenge for something that happened 20 years ago, Miller said.

``He split them up, males and females," Miller said. ``He let the males go, some of the adults go. He bound the females at the blackboard, and apparently executed them."

Roberts was armed with a semi-automatic handgun, a shotgun, a stun gun and several knives, in addition to tools such as a hammer, hacksaw and wooden boards he used to barricade the classroom after letting some of the people go, said Miller, who added that Roberts had no previous criminal record.

The attack took place at Georgetown Amish School in Bart Township, a farming area with about 3,000 people, 60 miles (97 kilometers) west of Philadelphia. The Amish are a Christian sect that stress separation from the modern world. Many drive horses and buggies rather than cars and don't have electricity in their homes.

``This is the last place on earth that something like this would happen," said Raymond Bial, author of the books ``Amish Home" and ``Visit to Amish Country."

`Don't Fight Back'

``The Amish are pacifists," he said in a phone interview. ``They don't believe in taking part in any conflict, and sometimes people take advantage of that because they don't fight back."

The contents of Roberts's suicide note, which was left at home for his wife and three children, weren't immediately disclosed, nor what drove Roberts to seek revenge.

The killings were the third attack at an American school in six days. A gunman took six students hostage at Platte Canyon High School in Bailey, Colorado, before killing one girl and himself on Sept. 27. A principal in Wisconsin was shot to death by a former student on Sept. 29.

President George W. Bush instructed Attorney General Alberto Gonzales and Education Secretary Margaret Spellings to convene a meeting in Washington next week among educators and law enforcement officials to come up with ways to deal with school violence.

``The president is deeply saddened by the recent school shootings," deputy White House press secretary Dana Perino told reporters today traveling aboard Air Force One to a political rally for Representative Dean Heller in Reno, Nevada.

Emergency Call

Police surrounded the Pennsylvania school after receiving an emergency telephone call at about 10:36 a.m., Miller said. When officers attempted to contact the attacker, multiple shots rang out inside the schoolhouse, Miller said.

Police stormed the school and broke windows to get inside, only to find the attacker and his victims dead, Miller said.

``This was a premeditated hostage scenario," Miller said. ``He intended not to walk out of there alive, but he also intended to kill innocent victims."

Fifteen boys were freed, as well as one pregnant adult and three women with infants, Miller said. A teacher who escaped called the police.

None Unharmed

``I don't believe, based on the numbers we had, that there was a female student or teacher's aide that got out of the building alive or not hit by a bullet," Commander Miller said.

The critically injured children were flown to pediatric hospitals in Philadelphia, Hershey and Reading, Pennsylvania, and Delaware, Lancaster General Hospital spokesman John Lines said.

Three girls, aged 8, 10 and 12, who were taken to the Children's Hospital of Philadelphia are out of surgery and no longer in critical condition, the hospital said in a statement sent by PR Newswire.

Miller said he didn't think the attack was targeted against the Amish. Roberts wasn't Amish, he said.

Amish children attend schools until eighth grade, according to the Pennsylvania Dutch Convention & Visitors Bureau's Web page.

``I don't recall ever a story like this, going into a school and taking the most innocent of innocent," said Herman Bontrager, chief executive officer of New Holland, Pennsylvania- based Goodwill Mutual Casualty Co., located about 10 miles from the site of the shooting. ``It has people in shock pretty much around here."

There are about 25,000 Amish in Lancaster County, the bureau said, citing Raber's 2004 Almanac.

To contact the reporters on this story: Todd Zeranski in New York at tzeranski@bloomberg.net ; Chris Dolmetsch in New York at cdolmetsch@bloomberg.net .

Milk-Truck Driver Kills 3 Girls, Critically Wounds 8 (LAT)

By Ellen Barry And Stephanie Simon, Times Staff Writers

DOJ_NMG_0073622

The Los Angeles Times, October 3, 2006

NICKEL MINES, Pa. -- Calling on their faith for guidance, the Amish community here coupled sorrow with forgiveness Monday after a milk-truck driver armed with a small arsenal burst into a one-room schoolhouse, killing three girls and critically wounding eight before committing suicide.

The attack was methodical, gruesome and baffling. Charles Carl Roberts IV, a 32-year-old father of three with no criminal record, entered the schoolhouse with a gun in his hand about 10 a.m., State Police Commissioner Jeffrey B. Miller said. Roberts, who was not Amish and had no known connection to the school, ordered the 15 male students, the teacher and several aides with infants to leave. Then he set about preparing for a siege.

According to Miller, Roberts lined up 10 female students, ages 6 to 13, and a young teacher's aide against the chalkboard. He wrapped wire and plastic ties around their ankles, binding their feet together -- or to one another. He barricaded the door with wooden boards and piled-up desks.

Outside, the teacher and the boys raced for help, cutting through fields to the nearest farmhouse. The Amish eschew most modern technology, so none of them had a cell phone. Many homes here -- like the schoolhouse -- do not have phones, although Amish farmers often have a line running to the barn or corn crib.

At 10:36 a.m., the teacher reached a phone and dialed 911.

Inside the schoolhouse, Roberts waited. He had a shotgun, a semiautomatic pistol and a rifle, 600 rounds of ammunition, explosive powder, a stun gun, two knives, a change of clothes, and a bucket with pliers, a hacksaw and wire. At some point, Roberts called his wife on his cell phone. He talked of a grudge from long ago, said he was getting even. He kept the girls silent as he talked. On the other end of the line, his wife heard nothing but his voice.

State police pulled up to the pale-yellow building at 10:45 a.m., nine minutes after the call for help. They tried to contact the gunman using the public-address system on their squad cars. Roberts did not respond. Instead, he called 911 and demanded they leave. If they did not back off within 10 seconds, he said, he'd start shooting.

Seconds later, gunfire erupted.

Roberts shot the girls in the head -- one after another, in quick order -- with his 9-millimeter automatic, stopping once to reload. He opened fire briefly on the troopers as they stormed the school but did not hit them. Then he turned the gun on himself; he fell face-down on the floor, dead.

"It was all over in a matter of seconds," Miller said.

One girl died instantly. A second passed away moments later, in a trooper's arms. A third was pronounced dead when she arrived at the hospital. Eight other children were in critical condition Monday night; Miller said "it would be a miracle" if they all recovered.

"He executed those children," Miller said.

Authorities said Roberts apparently was looking to take revenge on young girls, and found the school a convenient target -- "a location of opportunity," as Miller put it.

Employed by Land O'Lakes and assigned to deliver milk for a subsidiary called Northwest Food Products, Roberts was known around the community as outgoing and personable. Co-workers told authorities that Roberts had seemed tense of late, not his usual, quick-to-joke self, but had been more relaxed in the past few days.

When he finished his milk route about 3 a.m. Monday, Roberts parked the truck on a hill outside the school, as was his custom. He slept a few hours at his nearby home, but was up by 8:45 a.m. to take his children to the bus stop. His wife, Marie, noticed nothing wrong; the day was unremarkable, routine. "His family had no inkling," Miller said.

Marie Roberts released a statement Monday night to the media saying: "The man who did this today is not the Charlie that I've been married to for almost 10 years. My husband is loving, supportive, thoughtful, all the things you'd always want and more. ... Our hearts are broken our lives are shattered, and we grieve for the innocence and lives that were lost today."

Before driving to the school in a borrowed pick-up truck, Roberts left notes for each of his young children. His suicide letters, like his final call to his wife, alluded to resentment over a past grievance. Miller speculated that it could have something to do with a child that Roberts and his wife lost years ago. Mostly, Miller said, the notes expressed rage: "He was angry with life. Angry with God."

But Roberts' brutality evoked very little anger among the community Monday. Men in broad-brimmed hats and suspenders and women in bonnets and long dark dresses expressed grief and shock, but in hushed, muted tones. "It's a sad day," Jacob King, a 31-year-old stonemason said. He could think of nothing else to add, just repeated that one word, "sad."

Rather than dwell on the victims -- though this is a close-knit community, where few are strangers -- Amish residents spoke of their concern for Roberts' family; their sorrow that a man could become so unhinged, so alienated from the Lord.

"I wish someone could have helped him out, poor soul. It's obvious that something was troubling him," said Steve, a 54-year-old carpenter who, like many here, would not give his full name.

Of the tragedy, he would say only that it was "uncalled for," and unexpected.

An Amish woman who gave her name as Irene also expressed compassion for the gunman. "I am very thankful," she said, "that I was raised to believe you don't fight back. You should forgive."

About 20,000 Old Order Amish live among the dairy farms and cornfields in Lancaster County, about an hour's drive west of Philadelphia. They shun modern conveniences such as computers and television; many do not have electricity, and some do not have indoor plumbing. Their children usually walk the mile or two to the local schoolhouse, often a one-room building with a few dozen students from first grade through eighth. Most Amish children leave school after eighth grade to work on the family farm.

Communities do not typically have their own police force, but rely on the county sheriff or state troopers. "There's no need for police," said Aaron Meyer, 60, who owns a local business giving buggy rides to tourists.

Monday's attack in many ways echoed a fatal school shooting last week in rural Bailey, Colo. In that incident, a drifter named Duane Morrison, 53, entered a high school English class, ordered the teacher and male students to leave, and kept six girls as hostages. He sexually molested some of them during a four-hour standoff. When police swarmed the classroom, Morrison fatally shot one girl and then killed himself.

Also last week, a 15-year-old boy shot and killed his principal at a school in Cazenovia, Wis. And on Monday, school police in North Las Vegas, Nev., spotted a former student on campus with a gun; he fled before firing any shots.

Here in Lancaster County, violence also is not completely unknown: Just this past spring, a young man confessed to killing six of his relatives, aged 5 to 64. A few months later, the county was hit with a string of robberies, including the knifepoint mugging of a buggy driver.

As night fell, the wooden schoolhouse remained cordoned off with crime-scene tape. A pumpkin sat out front; in the back, the doors to two outhouses were propped open. A few orange flags marked the places where evidence had been retrieved.

But for a cluster of TV trucks, the valley was still and dark.

Barry reported from Nickel Mines and Simon from Denver.

Gun Reported At North Las Vegas School (AP)

By Ken Ritter, Associated Press Writer

AP, October 3, 2006

LAS VEGAS, Nev. — Four public school campuses were locked down Monday while police searched for a teenager who was spotted at a high school with a gun, authorities said.

No shots were fired, and police said they had no indication the teen _ a former student who had been banned from Mojave High School _ had threatened anyone.

Police gave up their search of a residential area in suburban North Las Vegas after more than three hours.

"We know who he is," North Las Vegas police spokesman Tim Bedwell said. "He will be found eventually."

Bedwell would not disclose the teen's name or age, but said he believed the youth had been expelled or transferred from the high school for academic or disciplinary reasons.

The teen ran from the Mojave High campus when school police recognized him and confronted him about 7 a.m., authorities said. School police reported finding a .25-caliber handgun behind a nearby church.

About 2,300 students at the high school and 2,900 youngsters at two nearby elementary schools and a middle school were locked down during the police search of a square-mile residential area. The security measure meant students were kept in rooms while instruction continued, said David Sheehan, a school district spokesman.

The Clark County School District, with about 300,000 students and 325 schools, is the fifth-largest district in the nation.

Bedwell said the teen could face charges including trespassing, possession of a handgun by a minor and possession of a weapon on school property, a felony.

School districts across the country have been especially sensitive to threats after deadly shootings last week at schools in Wisconsin and Colorado, and then another on Monday in Pennsylvania's Amish country.

On Friday, a school principal was gunned down in Cazenovia, Wis., and a 15-year-old student was charged with murder. Just two days earlier, an adult gunman held six girls hostage in a school at Bailey, Colo., before killing a 16-year-old girl and then himself.

Expelled Boy Shows Up At School Armed, Then Flees (NYT)

By Cathy Scott

The New York Times, October 3, 2006

DOJ_NMG_0073624

NORTH LAS VEGAS, Nev., Oct. 2 — A 15-year-old boy who had been expelled from his high school returned to the grounds there Monday morning with an automatic pistol and an AK-47 assault rifle, but fled when he was recognized and remained at large, the police said.

The youth, whose name was not released, did not fire the weapons and apparently did not threaten anyone, the police said, but four public schools were locked down throughout the morning as the neighborhood around the high school was searched.

The youth was expelled from the school, Mojave High, in the last academic year, though it is not clear why. The authorities were waiting for him there Monday morning, having received a tip from a student, said Sgt. Phil Gervasi of the Clark County school district police.

When the youth recognized the officers, Sergeant Gervasi said, he dropped the loaded .25-caliber pistol and fled. After three hours, the search in the neighborhood was called off, he said.

"They're still looking for an AK-47 he stole from his parents' house," Sergeant Gervasi said.

A growing number of guns in schools has been a pressing issue in Clark County, which, with 300,000 students enrolled at 325 schools, has the fifth-largest school district in the country. Last Thursday 50 members of the school police protested at a school board meeting, seeking the hiring of more officers.

Bail In School Attack Is $750,000; Safety Cited (MJS)

By Journal Sentinel Staff And The Associated Press

Milwaukee Journal Sentinel, October 3, 2006

A Sauk County prosecutor told a judge Monday that 15-year-old Eric Hainstock may have had other targets in mind when he entered his high school and killed his principal Friday.

Advertisement

District Attorney Patricia Barrett disclosed the potential of other targets in successfully arguing for a bail amount of $750,000 for the teen, who remains in the Sauk County Law Enforcement Center.

Hainstock appeared in court with his attorneys through a video feed from jail. When Circuit Judge Patrick Taggart asked him if he understood he could face life in prison, Hainstock replied calmly and firmly, "I do."

In following Barrett's bail recommendation, the judge said, "It goes without saying the public does need protection in this matter."

Barrett told the judge there were other "persons of interest" for Hainstock when he went to Weston Schools Friday morning and shot Principal John Klang.

"There were potentially other people that he had a beef with at the time," she said, but did not elaborate.

Hainstock's attorneys asked for $10,000 bail.

He has been charged with one count of first-degree intentional homicide in Klang's death. Taggart set a pretrial conference for Hainstock for Oct. 13.

According to the criminal complaint, Hainstock carried a shotgun and a .22-caliber revolver to the school on Friday morning. A custodian tugged the shotgun away from the youth, who then ran down a hallway while pulling the revolver from a pocket.

Klang, the 49-year-old school principal, confronted the boy and struggled with him in the hallway. He was shot three times while wrestling Hainstock to the floor, the complaint says.

Judge Sets Bail At $750,000 In Weston Schools Shooting (AP)

By Todd Richmond, Associated Press Writer

AP, October 3, 2006

BARABOO, Wis. -- A judge set bail at $750,000 Monday for a 15-year-old boy accused of killing his high school principal after prosecutors said the teen may have been looking for others to attack as well.

Sauk County District Attorney Pat Barrett told the judge there were other "persons of interest" for Eric Hainstock when he went to Weston Schools in Cazenovia Friday morning and shot Principal John Klang. She told reporters after the five-minute hearing that Hainstock may have had additional targets picked out.

"There were potentially other people that he had a beef with at the time," she said, but did not elaborate.

Hainstock's attorneys asked for $10,000 bail, saying the teen has lived in the Sauk County area his whole life and has no convictions.

But Circuit Judge Patrick Taggart agreed with Barrett.

"It goes without saying the public does need protection in this matter," he said.

DOJ_NMG_0073625

If Hainstock were to post the $750,000 cash bond, he would have to submit to electronic monitoring, the judge said. He also would be barred from leaving Sauk County or having contact with anyone at the schools or the Klang family.

A handful of students attended the hearing.

Hainstock and his attorneys appeared in court through a video feed from jail. He sat with his chin in his hand. When Taggart asked him if he understood he faces life in prison, Hainstock replied calmly and firmly, "I do."

He has been charged with first-degree intentional homicide. Wisconsin does not have the death penalty.

Taggart set a pretrial conference for Hainstock for Oct. 13.

Search warrants show deputies found a note at Hainstock's house from him to his father, along with boxes of ammunition, discipline reports from Weston Schools and a photo of a girl with her eyes poked out. Klang gave Hainstock a disciplinary notice for having tobacco in the school Thursday, the day before the shooting, according to the criminal complaint.

Investigators had been to the Hainstock home before. Court records show Hainstock's 35-year-old father, Shawn Hainstock, was charged in 2001 with felony child abuse.

Shawn Hainstock kicked his son several times in the hip for not giving water to some pets, put hot sauce or hot peppers in the boy's mouth for lying or using foul language, and spanked the child with a wooden paddle marked "the board of education," the complaint in that case said.

The elder Hainstock pleaded no contest to misdemeanor battery in 2002 as part of a deferred prosecution agreement, which allows people facing criminal charges to have them dismissed if they fulfill certain conditions. The charge against Shawn Hainstock was dismissed in 2003.

Court records also say Eric Hainstock had a medical condition that affected his behavior but he was not receiving treatment because the family could no longer afford drugs or counseling.

The pain from Friday's violence was still apparent Monday in Cazenovia, a tiny farming community of 300 people about 70 miles northwest of Madison.

"Forever changed. 9-29-06," read billboards outside of the town's only gas station and its municipal building, referring to the date of Klang's death.

Flags at the school complex were at half-staff. Some students and staff met with counselors, while others walked the halls, talking and holding each other.

About a half dozen Sauk County investigators also were in the school reviewing the shooting, but Superintendent Terry Milfred said things were starting to get back to normal. Volleyball practice went on Monday morning, and Friday's football game was still scheduled, he said.

"The spectrum varies from grief ... all the way to seeing a group that is absolutely normal," he said. "That's especially noticeable with students, who are live and vibrant even though they are grieving."

A funeral Mass for Klang will be celebrated at 11 a.m. Wednesday at the Weston High School gymnasium.

National School Violence Conference Set (AP-Y)

By Nedra Pickler, Associated Press Writer

AP, October 3, 2006

The Bush administration will host a conference next week to discuss the recent string of school violence across the country, the White House said Monday.

Presidential spokeswoman Dana Perino said the conference will bring together education and law enforcement officials to talk about the nature of the problem and federal action that can help communities prevent violence and deal with its aftermath.

Three schools have been hit by deadly attacks in the past week. A gunman killed himself and three others Monday at a one-room Amish schoolhouse in Pennsylvania; on Friday a 15-year-old Wisconsin student shot and killed his principal; and last Wednesday a man took six girls hostage in Colorado, sexually assaulting them before fatally shooting one girl and killing himself.

"The president is deeply saddened and troubled by the recent school violence and shootings that have taken place in different communities across America," Perino said. "It breaks America's collective heart when innocent children who are at school to learn are violently taken hostage and cut down in their own schools."

Perino said the conference was still in the planning stages, so a specific date, location and other details were not ready to be announced. It was not clear whether President Bush would attend.

Education Secretary Margaret Spellings, Attorney General Alberto Gonzales and Bush's domestic policy adviser, Karl Zinsmeister, met Monday at the White House to discuss the conference. They met while the president was on a cross-country flight to begin a three-day fundraising trip for Republican candidates in the midterm election.

DOJ_NMG_0073626

Perino said participants on the education side would include groups like the National Parent Teacher Association, school principals and teachers' unions. The Federal Bureau of Investigations would be among those representing law enforcement, she said.

Perino said the president plans to use his fundraising spree through Nevada, California, Arizona and Colorado to draw a clear line between Democrats and Republicans, particularly on the war on terror, as the campaign begins its final month.

Bush began Monday evening at an airport hangar in Reno, Nev., where a few hundred people who donated a combined $360,000 gathered to support Secretary of State Dean Heller's congressional campaign. Heller is up against Democrat Jill Derby for the seat being vacated by Rep. Jim Gibbons, who is running for governor.

"I want you all to remember when you go to the polls here in Nevada, what political party supported the president to make sure we have the tools necessary to protect the American people and which political party didn't," Bush said.

Bush criticized some Democrats for voting against legislation authorizing warrantless monitoring of phone calls and e-mails to detect terror plots and another bill that would allow tough interrogation of terror suspects.

"It sounds like they think the best way to protect the American people is to wait until we're attacked again," Bush said. "That's not the way it's going to be under my administration."

The donors paid $500 to attend the reception, held on a cement-floored hangar decorated with blue curtains, or $2,100 to also be photographed with the president.

Republicans have held the seat since it was created 25 years ago to represent more than 100,000 square miles — nearly the entire state except for Las Vegas. Republicans hold an edge of more than 47,000 registered, mostly rural voters, but polls make it a close race.

About 100 protesters rallied near the fundraiser, chanting, "Vote for change."

"I think it's an indication of how desperate the Republicans have gotten to try to hang onto a seat that just a year ago was considered a slam dunk for the Republicans," said Pam duPre, executive director of the Washoe County Democratic Party.

___

Associated Press Writer Scott Sonner contributed to this report.

___

On the Net:

http://www.whitehouse.gov

Three Killed, 8 Hurt In Pennsylvania School Attack (Update8) (BLOOM)

By Todd Zeranski And Chris Dolmetsch

Bloomberg, October 3, 2006

Oct. 2 (Bloomberg) -- Three people were killed and eight were critically wounded by a gunman at a one-room Amish school in rural Lancaster County, Pennsylvania, authorities said.

The gunman, Charles Carl Roberts, 32, a milk truck driver who lived in the area, also killed himself, state police Commander Jeffrey Miller said in a televised press conference. Roberts left a suicide note saying he was seeking revenge for something that happened 20 years ago, Miller said.

``He split them up, males and females," Miller said. ``He let the males go, some of the adults go. He bound the females at the blackboard, and apparently executed them."

Roberts was armed with a semi-automatic handgun, a shotgun, a stun gun and several knives, in addition to tools such as a hammer, hacksaw and wooden boards he used to barricade the classroom after letting some of the people go, said Miller, who added that Roberts had no previous criminal record.

The attack took place at Georgetown Amish School in Bart Township, a farming area with about 3,000 people, 60 miles (97 kilometers) west of Philadelphia. The Amish are a Christian sect that stress separation from the modern world. Many drive horses and buggies rather than cars and don't have electricity in their homes.

``This is the last place on earth that something like this would happen," said Raymond Bial, author of the books ``Amish Home" and ``Visit to Amish Country."

`Don't Fight Back'

``The Amish are pacifists," he said in a phone interview. ``They don't believe in taking part in any conflict, and sometimes people take advantage of that because they don't fight back."

The contents of Roberts's suicide note, which was left at home for his wife and three children, weren't immediately disclosed, nor what drove Roberts to seek revenge.

DOJ_NMG_0073627

The killings were the third attack at an American school in six days. A gunman took six students hostage at Platte Canyon High School in Bailey, Colorado, before killing one girl and himself on Sept. 27. A principal in Wisconsin was shot to death by a former student on Sept. 29.

President George W. Bush instructed Attorney General Alberto Gonzales and Education Secretary Margaret Spellings to convene a meeting in Washington next week among educators and law enforcement officials to come up with ways to deal with school violence.

``The president is deeply saddened by the recent school shootings," deputy White House press secretary Dana Perino told reporters today traveling aboard Air Force One to a political rally for Representative Dean Heller in Reno, Nevada.

Emergency Call

Police surrounded the Pennsylvania school after receiving an emergency telephone call at about 10:36 a.m., Miller said. When officers attempted to contact the attacker, multiple shots rang out inside the schoolhouse, Miller said.

Police stormed the school and broke windows to get inside, only to find the attacker and his victims dead, Miller said.

``This was a premeditated hostage scenario," Miller said. ``He intended not to walk out of there alive, but he also intended to kill innocent victims."

Fifteen boys were freed, as well as one pregnant adult and three women with infants, Miller said. A teacher who escaped called the police.

None Unharmed

``I don't believe, based on the numbers we had, that there was a female student or teacher's aide that got out of the building alive or not hit by a bullet," Commander Miller said.

The critically injured children were flown to pediatric hospitals in Philadelphia, Hershey and Reading, Pennsylvania, and Delaware, Lancaster General Hospital spokesman John Lines said.

Three girls, aged 8, 10 and 12, who were taken to the Children's Hospital of Philadelphia are out of surgery and no longer in critical condition, the hospital said in a statement sent by PR Newswire.

Miller said he didn't think the attack was targeted against the Amish. Roberts wasn't Amish, he said.

Amish children attend schools until eighth grade, according to the Pennsylvania Dutch Convention & Visitors Bureau's Web page.

``I don't recall ever a story like this, going into a school and taking the most innocent of innocent," said Herman Bontrager, chief executive officer of New Holland, Pennsylvania- based Goodwill Mutual Casualty Co., located about 10 miles from the site of the shooting. ``It has people in shock pretty much around here."

There are about 25,000 Amish in Lancaster County, the bureau said, citing Raber's 2004 Almanac.

To contact the reporters on this story: Todd Zeranski in New York at tzeranski@bloomberg.net ; Chris Dolmetsch in New York at cdolmetsch@bloomberg.net .

Bush 'Troubled' By School Shooting (AFP-Y)

AFP, October 3, 2006

US President George W. Bush was "deeply saddened and troubled" by a shooting at a Pennsylvania schoolhouse that left at least three girls dead, the White House said.

Bush ordered cabinet officials to find ways for the government to help in the aftermath of recent school shootings, said Dana Perino, a White House spokeswoman.

Bush is "deeply saddened and troubled by the recent school violence," Perino told reporters on a presidential trip to Reno, Nevada.

"It breaks America's collective heart when innocent children who are at school to learn are violently taken hostage and gunned down," Perino said.

Attorney General Alberto Gonzales and US Education Secretary Margaret Spellings will convene a conference next week with education and law enforcement groups to discuss school violence, she said.

Gonzales and Spellings met Monday with Bush's domestic policy adviser, Zinsmeister, to discuss the issue, Perino said.

A truck driver burst into an Amish schoolhouse in rural Pennsylvania Monday and killed at least three girls "execution style" after lining them up in a classroom, police said.

It was the third fatal killing in a US school in the past week.

Last week a 16-year-old schoolgirl was killed when a gunman took six hostages at a Colorado school before opening fire and turning the gun on himself as police stormed a classroom.

On Friday, the principal of a Wisconsin high school was killed after being shot by a student.

DOJ_NMG_0073628

‘A Horrendous Crime Scene' (USAT)

By Alan Levin And Laura Parker

USA Today, October 3, 2006

NICKEL MINES, Pa. - A milk-truck driver claiming to have a 20-year-old grudge barricaded himself inside a one-room Amish schoolhouse Monday and shot 12 girls, killing three of them, before he committed suicide in the latest shocking attack at a U.S. school.

At least eight girls were in critical condition at area hospitals, said Col. Jeffrey Miller, commissioner of the Pennsylvania State Police. Most were shot in the head, he said.

“It's a horrendous crime scene,” Miller said. “One of the children died in the arms of one of our troopers.”

The shootings stunned this quiet, insular community in the rolling cornfields and pastures of Amish country, about 60 miles west of Philadelphia. It was the third fatal school shooting in the USA in six days. The attack was similar to one in Bailey, Colo., last week. There, a gunman took several girls hostage at a high school and killed one of them.

In Washington, meanwhile, the White House said President Bush will convene a conference on school violence next week.

The Pennsylvania gunman was identified as Charles Carl Roberts IV, 32, who lived near the school. Miller said Roberts backed a pickup to the front door of the yellow schoolhouse around 10:35 a.m., then began boarding up the doors with lumber that he had brought in the truck. He had a handgun, a rifle and a shotgun, Miller said.

Roberts took over the classroom, but quickly allowed several people to leave, including about 15 boys ages 6-13, Miller said.

He also released four adult women, including the teacher, a pregnant woman, and other women who had infants. He lined the girls up in front of the blackboard, where he bound their feet with “flex-cuffs,” disposable handcuffs, Miller said.

The teacher and adults ran to a nearby farm to call police. The school has no electricity or phone service.

After Pennsylvania State Police officers arrived at the scene, Roberts contacted the Lancaster County sheriff's office and warned the state police to back off “within 10 seconds” or he would start shooting, Miller said.

He began shooting moments later “in rapid succession,” Miller said. The dead girls included two students and a student aide about 15 years old, Miller said.

Roberts left “rambling” suicide notes at his home Monday morning for his three children, Miller said. He was not Amish. Police believe that he chose the school because it was an easy target, Miller said. After seeing the notes, Roberts' wife called her husband's cellphone about 11 a.m., Miller said. Roberts told her he was “seeking revenge” for something that happened 20 years ago, Miller said.

Miller declined to elaborate about what drove Roberts to attack the girls, but he said investigators were looking into the possibility that Roberts had been affected by the death of a child. He would not say whether the child was Roberts' or someone else's.

Roberts also told his wife that “the police were here and that ‘I'm not coming home.' He told her he loved her and that was it,” Miller said.

Roberts apparently planned for a long siege, Miller said. He had brought a change of clothes, a bucket and toilet paper. With the three guns, he brought 600 rounds of ammunition. He shot the students with a 9mm handgun and reloaded, Miller said.

Miller said co-workers described Roberts as friendly and talkative — but said he had become less so recently. In the past few days, a calm came over him, they told police. Miller said he believed that was an indication that Roberts had decided to attack the school.

“He was angry at life. He was angry at God,” Miller said.

Most Amish live in rural communities and are seldom exposed to crime. In nearby Strasburg, the FBI recorded just two violent crimes in 2005: a robbery and an assault.

“They just don't take provisions for or expect outsiders to come walking in,” said Steven Nolt, a historian at Goshen College in Indiana who's written books about the Amish.

Experts: Events Might Weigh Heavily On Kids (USAT)

By Robert Davis, Usa Today

USA Today, October 3, 2006

School safety experts say that the first order of business in classrooms across the nation today should be to take the psychological pulse of children.

The slayings at a Pennsylvania schoolhouse Monday most likely sent shivers of fear through students, teachers and parents everywhere, they say.

DOJ_NMG_0073629

"This has been one of the most gruesome weeks I've ever encountered in 20 years of dealing with school safety," says Ronald Stephens, executive director of the National School Safety Center, which helps schools prepare for and respond to crisis. "It's hit an entirely new low. Parents are going to be wondering if their children are safe returning to school."

He and others hope that counselors are available today in the nation's schools. "Students are going to have a number of feelings they need to express," Stephens says. "It's going to be very difficult for a whole lot of learning to take place until some of these emotional issues have been given some attention."

Experts such as Stephens say children can be upset even if they're not directly involved with a tragedy. They say disturbing events can stir up the memory of trauma from a child's past. Signs of emotional distress include lethargy or withdrawal and changes in personality, appetite or sleep.

Security has become more visible since the shootings at Colorado's Columbine High School in 1999. About 15,000 schools now have their own police officer, says William Lassiter of the Center for Prevention of School Violence. But schools remain easy targets.

"You have this unease about who can we trust and who is safe," says George Greger-Holt, a school counselor who focuses on safety in Chatham County, N.C.

Three School Shootings (NYT)

The New York Times, October 3, 2006

No one will rise up to defend a man who walks into an Amish school, lines young girls up against a blackboard, ties up their feet, and then kills them before killing himself. But a surprising number of people will inevitably rise up to defend his guns, to call the man guilty but his weapons innocent.

When Charles Roberts snapped, the tools lay ready to hand. It is not clear what led him to seek out a quiet country school in Lancaster County, Pa., but it is possible he chose it because he knew that it belonged to a trusting, insular community, where there would be no one to stop him from entering with a shotgun, a rifle and an automatic pistol.

This is the third school shooting in a week. What will stick in almost everyone's minds is the gross disparity between Mr. Roberts's murderous intentions and the bucolic peacefulness of an Amish school in early October. But this killing is no different from the ones that took place in Wisconsin and Colorado recently.

The weapons were the same, and so was the conflict between the hideous assault of a damaged mind and the atmosphere of openness and trust that makes education possible. There are no simple solutions to this conflict. It is neither possible nor tolerable to secure every school or guard every child. Nor is it possible or politically tolerable to keep tabs on every gun. But in these killings we see an open society threatened by the ubiquity of its weapons, in which one kind of freedom is allowed to trump all others. Most gun owners are respectable, law-abiding citizens. But that is no reason to acquit the guns.

Common Tragedy And Culprits (WP)

The Washington Post, October 3, 2006

A SCHOOL shooting is, by definition, obscene, yet there is a special horror to the tragedy in Nickel Mines, Pa. Perhaps it is because the setting, a picturesque community in Lancaster County, was so peaceful. Or that the target was a one-room Amish school amid fields of green. Or that the victims were young girls. Yes, there are unique features that make yesterday's attack a singular tragedy. There is, however, one aspect that makes it shamefully commonplace -- guns.

The 32-year-old man who walked into the Georgetown Amish School in a rural area about 60 miles west of Philadelphia had, authorities said, armed himself with a shotgun, a rifle and a semiautomatic handgun. After releasing all the boys and some women, the gunman barricaded the doors with boards and, having bound the feet of his victims, shot to death three girls before killing himself. Eight others were critically wounded; one of the wounded later died. "This is the last place on Earth that something like this would happen," Raymond Bial, author of books on the Amish, told Bloomberg News, as if being pacifist guarantees protection from the world.

Yesterday marked the third time in less than a week that a school was the site of a fatal shooting. In Colorado, on Sept. 27, a man armed with two handguns sexually assaulted some of the six girls he held hostage before killing one of them and himself. In Wisconsin, just two days later, a 15-year-old student fatally shot a principal. Like yesterday's shootings, each incident was tragic and certainly each had unique circumstances, but all -- including near-tragedies in Florida, North Carolina and Nevada that barely made headlines -- shared the fact of the far-too-easy availability of guns.

At this early stage, it is not known what drove Charles Carl Roberts IV to yesterday's rampage or whether it could have been prevented. Indeed, there are those who will argue that nothing -- least of all laws controlling guns -- can stop a madman. That doesn't mean, though, that we shouldn't try. Sadly, rather than making it harder for the wrong people to get guns, some in Congress are seeking to make it easier. Witness the recent vote by the House of Representatives to make it more difficult for authorities to crack down on bad gun shops. Thankfully, the Senate didn't have time to take up that measure.

DOJ_NMG_0073630

Our sympathies go to the people of Nickel Mines. We hope that the singular calamity that befell this community will wake up the nation to do something about the madness it can control.

Online Gambling Set For Takeover Wave (FT)

By Roger Blitz, Leisure Industries Correspondent

Financial Times, October 3, 2006

Internet gambling companies face a wave of consolidation in the wake of the US clampdown on online gaming, which could see American casinos and gambling businesses swooping for bargains in the sector, the heads of two of the biggest online gambling sites said on Monday.

Mitch Garber, chief executive of PartyGaming, and Gigi Levy, who takes over as chief of 888 Holdings this year, made their predictions as the sector felt the impact of the bill passed in the Senate on Friday making it illegal for banks and credit card companies to process online gaming payments from the US.

Investors wiped $7bn (£3.7bn) off the market value of what at the start of trading was an industry worth $12bn, as heavyweight internet gambling companies said they would suspend indefinitely their US operations.

PartyGaming, the biggest company in the sector, lost 57.94 per cent after announcing it would suspend all money gaming business with the US indefinitely when President George W. Bush signs the bill into law.

Across the sector, internet gambling stocks went into freefall. Sportingbet lost 64 per cent of its value, falling to 66p.

888 Holdings, which has also indefinitely suspended US operations and expects to take a charge, dropped 26 per cent.

Mr Garber told the Financial Times that he expected the pace of consolidation to quicken, with MGM and Harrah's, which built their gaming empires around the fully regulated Las Vegas casino industry, likely to step in. However, Harrah's had other matters on its mind yesterday with news that it had received a $15bn takeover offer from private equity companies Apollo Management and Texas Pacific.

Now that listed internet gambling companies are expected to quit the US en masse, the remains of their businesses will be free from the spectre of illegality that in the past might have put off investors and prospective buyers.

Mr Garber said: "I wouldn't be surprised if they [MGM and Harrah's] didn't have an interest in winning non US-facing companies as a means of tipping their toes in the internet world."

Mr Garber said he expected PartyGaming to be involved in buying up companies likely to suffer heavily from the impact of the new US legislation. "We are very focused on mergers and acquisitions. I see our liquidity as being very attractive to smaller players who may not be able to survive on their own."

A banking adviser in the sector said: "This is going to create a round of consolidation but what format and nature and how broad is a different matter."

Mr Levy said consolidation would happen first between online operators in order to restore the high margins lost by the US debacle followed by takeovers by big onshore operators coming from both the US and the UK.

U.K. Online Gambling Sites Mull Exiting U.S. Market (WSJ/AP)

Associated Press

The Wall Street Journal, October 3, 2006

LONDON -- Several British online gambling companies may cease doing business in the U.S. as a result of Congress passing legislation prohibiting the use of credit cards, checks and electronic fund transfers for online gaming.

PartyGaming PLC, the world's biggest online gambling company, said it would pull out of the U.S. if President Bush signs the legislation into law. Meanwhile, 888 Holdings PLC said it's suspending online betting operations in the U.S. and Sportingbet PLC said it called off takeover talks with World Gaming PLC.

The legislation was part of a port securities bill passed by the House and Senate on Saturday. It is expected to be signed by President George W. Bush

Shares of all three companies tumbled in trading on the London Stock Exchange Monday.

The companies hit hardest by the ruling are those that offer betting markets denominated in U.S. dollars, and usually operate from bases in the Caribbean or Central America. Most of the big British and Irish sites, by contrast, keep their operations in Europe and take deposits only off credit cards denominated in pounds and euros.

Investec Private Bank commented that it was difficult to assess the value of online betting companies with heavy exposure in the U.S. because the allocation of costs is unclear.

DOJ_NMG_0073631

Sportingbet, which does more than 60% of its business in the U.S., said the impact of the legislation was unclear. However, the company called off talks about a potential bid for World Gaming.

"The precise effect of the legislation is unclear," 888 Holdings said in a statement. "However, this legislation indicates Congressional intent to treat Internet gaming, whether sports-related or not, as illegal."

The legislation, if enacted, "will make it practically impossible to provide U.S. residents with access to its real money poker and other real money gaming sites," PartyGaming said. "If the president signs the act into law, the company will suspend all real money gaming business with U.S. residents."

Austrian-based Bwin.com Interactive Entertainment AG, which gets 22% of its revenue from the U.S., said it was reviewing its options. "It's a difficult situation right now, and we need to have our lawyers take a close look, review the situation and what it could mean to us," Bwin spokeswoman Karin Klein said in Vienna.

William Hill PLC, one of Britain's biggest bookmakers, announced on Sept. 27 that it would cease accepting casino and poker business from clients with a U.S. address or a credit card issued in the U.S.

Paddy Power, the Irish bookmaker, gets about half its revenue from online betting but "we have made every effort to block U.S. play," said spokesman Breon Corcoran. "We would be excited about bringing an Irish brand to the States, but given the climate there, it's unlikely to happen," Mr. Corcoran said.

Copyright © 2006 Associated Press

Online Gaming Shares Plummet In Bill's Wake (WP/AP)

By Robert Barr

The Washington Post, October 3, 2006

LONDON, Oct. 2 -- Shares in British online gambling companies dived Monday after Congress passed legislation prohibiting the use of credit cards, checks and electronic fund transfers for online gaming.

PartyGaming, the world's biggest online gambling company, said it would pull out of the United States if President Bush signs the legislation into law.

The company 888 Holdings PLC said it is suspending online betting operations in the United States as a result, and Sportingbet PLC said it called off takeover talks with World Gaming PLC.

The legislation was part of a port securities bill passed by the House and Senate on Saturday.

Shares in PartyGaming plunged 58 percent yesterday to end at 84 cents, shares in 888 sank 26.1 percent to finish at $2.03, while Sportingbet shares dropped 64.5 percent to close at $1.24.

The companies hit hardest by the ruling are those that offer betting markets denominated in U.S. dollars and usually operate from bases in the Caribbean or Central America. Most of the big British and Irish sites, by contrast, keep their operations in Europe and take deposits only off credit cards denominated in pounds and euros.

Investec Private Bank said it was difficult to assess the value of online betting companies with heavy U.S. exposure because the allocation of costs is unclear.

Sportingbet, which does more than 60 percent of its business in the United States, said the impact of the legislation was unclear. However, the company called off talks about a potential bid for World Gaming.

"The precise effect of the legislation is unclear," 888 Holdings said in a statement. "However, this legislation indicates congressional intent to treat Internet gaming, whether sports-related or not, as illegal."

The legislation, if enacted, "will make it practically impossible to provide U.S. residents with access to its real money poker and other real money gaming sites," PartyGaming said. "If the president signs the act into law, the company will suspend all real money gaming business with U.S. residents."

William Hill PLC, one of Britain's biggest bookmakers, announced on Sept. 27 that it would cease accepting casino and poker business from clients with a U.S. address or a credit card issued in the United States.

Bad Luck For Online Gaming (LAT)

By Michael A. Hiltzik

The Los Angeles Times, October 3, 2006

Online gambling companies were grappling with a new crisis Monday after the Senate quietly passed a bill forbidding American banks and credit card companies from processing payments to them.

Shares of publicly traded Internet gaming operators plummeted on the London Stock Exchange after the measure was attached as a rider to a bill designed to enhance U.S. port security and passed late Friday.

The House passed a similar bill this year, and the legislation is expected to be signed by President Bush. It prohibits banks and credit card companies from making payments to online gaming websites that appear on a list to be drafted within nine months by the Justice Department and the Federal Reserve.

Online websites also would be prohibited from accepting U.S. payments, but because most are based overseas, the ability of U.S. authorities to prosecute them is uncertain.

Also unclear is what sort of gambling falls under the prohibition. Although Internet sports betting is plainly outlawed by the federal Wire Act, there is some doubt whether online poker or other games fall under the same prohibition.

"That's a major weakness" of the new measure, said I. Nelson Rose, an expert in gambling law at Whittier Law School.

"It left out expanding the reach of the Wire Act, so poker sites can say, 'We're not covered by that.' "

The gambling provision's late-night passage took many in the gaming world by surprise. Many thought the Senate bill was dead in the current session, meaning that both houses of Congress would have to start from scratch next year.

U.S. casinos were neutral on the bill. Although they don't like the offshore competition, domestic gambling companies might someday want to open their own online casinos.

Online gaming companies headquartered in Britain were among those taking the biggest hit from the measure. Although most have been trying in recent months to wean themselves from the U.S. market as the threat of congressional regulation has risen, American customers still account for the greatest share of their business.

"This development is a significant setback for our company, our shareholders, our players and our industry," said Mitch Garber, chief executive of PartyGaming Ltd., the operator of the PartyPoker website, in a statement.

Shares of PartyGaming, based in Gibraltar, lost 58% in Monday's trading in London.

Shares of Neteller, a British payment processing company based on the Isle of Man, fell more than 60%. Such companies have sprung up in recent years after American payment processors, such as the PayPal subsidiary of EBay Inc., voluntarily ceased accepting payments to online gambling sites.

In a statement issued after the Senate vote, Neteller said, "It is currently unclear how Neteller, a European company, with no assets, presence or employees in the U.S., would be affected by this bill." The company said it would have a "clearer view" after U.S. authorities issued the regulations.

U.S. banks and credit card companies have generally ceased transferring funds for internet gambling over concerns that they could be charged with aiding and abetting illegal activities. But they have opposed legislation that makes them criminally liable for such transfers, arguing that in many cases they don't have the ability to determine whether a recipient is a gambling website.

Representatives of industry groups said Monday that they were satisfied that the new bill took that difficulty into account.

"We wanted to be sure that there was some protection if we act in good faith," said Floyd Stoner, executive director for congressional relations at the American Bankers Assn.

The Senate's action followed a string of other legal attacks in the U.S. on the online gaming industry. In July, David Carruthers, CEO of London-listed firm BetOnSports, was arrested while making an international air connection in Dallas. Charges against him include racketeering and mail fraud.

Last month Peter Dicks, then chairman of Sportingbet, a British online company, was arrested at New York's Kennedy Airport on a warrant alleging that he violated a Louisiana law barring online gambling. Dicks was released and returned to Britain on Friday.

michael.hiltzik@latimes.com

New Legislation May Pull The Plug On Online Gambling (USAT)

By Michael Mccarthy And Jon Swartz, Usa Today

USA Today, October 3, 2006

The $12 billion online gambling industry could turn into a house of cards now that the Congress has passed a law banning the use of credit cards, checks and electronic fund transfers for Internet gaming, industry experts warn.

President Bush is expected to sign the Unlawful Internet Gambling Enforcement Act, which makes it illegal for banks, credit card companies and online payment systems to process payment to online gambling companies.

Senate Republican leader Bill Frist of Tennessee tacked the bill on to the popular Safe Port Act bill on Saturday, before Congress went into recess for November's elections.

The surprise passage of the law threw the online gambling industry into a tailspin Monday. Shares of publicly traded companies PartyGaming, Sportingbet and 888 Holdings tumbled in heavy trading on the London Stock Exchange, wiping out nearly $8 billion in market value. PartyGaming, the world's largest online-gambling company, said it will stop taking bets from

DOJ_NMG_0073633

920,000 active U.S. customers as soon as Bush signs the proposed law. Sportingbet said it is calling off its bid for World Gaming.

Shares in the publicly traded PartyGaming plunged 60% to 81 cents on the British market and 888 Holdings said it is suspending online betting operations in the USA. Its shares tanked 48% to $1.42 on the British market.

Sportingbet, which gleans more than half its business in the USA, said the bill's impact is unclear. Sportingbet shares slumped 67% to $1.12 on the British market.

"This develop is a significant setback for our company, our shareholders, our players and our industry," said Mitch Garber, PartyGaming's CEO.

The federal government has been cracking down on Internet betting on sports, poker and other casino games that it considers illegal under the 1961 Wire Act. Considering that American bettors generate 50%-60% of industrywide revenue, many operators will be forced to either cash in their chips and go out of business or sell or merge with another provider, experts say.

Roughly half the estimated 500 companies operating 2,300 gambling websites across the Caribbean, Central America and Europe could be wiped out, predicts Sue Schneider, publisher of Interactive Gaming News. The survivors will have to make do on sharply reduced revenue, while seeking ways around the U.S. ban and building up their business in Asia.

After the bill is signed, U.S. Attorney General Alberto Gonzales will have 270 days to determine how the law will be enforced.

Most credit card companies already ban customers from paying gaming sites as the result of a settlement between New York Attorney General Eliot Spitzer and several major credit card issuers a few years ago.

PartyGaming generated 80% of its $1 billion in 2005 revenue from the U.S. market. During the first half of 2006, American bettors accounted for 78% of $662 million in revenue, says John Shepherd, a spokesman for the Gibraltar-based company.

"If you lop off 80% of somebody's revenues, it's going to hurt," Schneider says. "A lot of them have been trying to build up their non-U.S. business."

Unfortunately for players, the companies eliminated in the shakeout are more likely to be publicly traded operators that answer to regulators in Britain than privately held firms more likely disappear into the ether of the Web, warns Linda Goldstein, a partner with Manatt, Phelps & Phillips.

"The upshot is the legislation will drive away larger, more reputable gaming operators, leaving consumers with less reliable options," says Ken Dreifach, an Internet lawyer who once worked for Spitzer. That could expose consumers to more fraudulent operators, he says.

A stock listing is no guarantee, however. Many U.S.-based customers of BetOnSports have been waiting to cash out the money in their accounts since July, when a federal grand jury issued a 22-count indictment charging CEO David Carruthers with racketeering, conspiracy and fraud.

"We're telling folks 30-90 days," says BetOnSports spokesman Kevin Smith, who declined to comment on how many players are owed how much money.

Michael Bolcerek, president of the Poker Players Alliance, says he'll seek congressional support for a legislative exception for online poker, similar to the carve-outs for fantasy sports, horse racing and state lotteries in the proposed law. Bolcerek argues poker is a uniquely American sport, enjoyed by 23 million Americans.

"We believe poker is a skill game that should be separated from other forms of gambling," he says.

Attorney General Creates Domestic Violence Unit (AP)

AP, October 3, 2006

JACKSON, Miss. - A new domestic violence unit is being established by the Mississippi attorney general's office and funded by a $1.5 million grant.

The unit will act as a resource for law enforcement, prosecutors, judges and all other individuals or entities having legal duties related to domestic violence victims or providing services to victims.

"What this division does is bring a cohesiveness to the state's efforts to fight domestic violence," said Attorney General Jim Hood. "Our state ranks second highest in the nation for domestic violence. That dubious distinction alone is enough to say we have to improve our efforts and that's what we are dedicated to doing."

Hood's office said the unit will partner with the Administrative Office of Courts, the Judicial College, the Mississippi Department of Public Safety Planning and the Mississippi Coalition Against Domestic Violence.

"When a group of dedicated individuals and organizations make a commitment to act as one, the possibilities to create positive change are endless," Michele Carroll, executive director of the Mississippi Coalition Against Domestic Violence, said in a statement. "With the award of this grant and the development of this program we have a truly unique opportunity to work collaboratively to end the violence."

DOJ_NMG_0073634

The two-year grant was awarded by the U.S. Justice Department's Office on Violence Against Women.

Philadelphia Police Dispatchers Charged With Selling Information (AP)

AP, October 3, 2006

PHILADELPHIA (AP) — Two police department radio dispatchers are facing federal extortion charges after investigators said they provided names and addresses connected to auto license tags to someone they thought was going to rob the homes.

Patricia Bradley, 35, and Tamara Mitchell, 38, both civilian dispatchers employed by the Philadelphia Police Department, have been charged with extortion and aiding and abetting, U.S. Attorney Patrick Meehan said Monday.

The women ran license tags on the police department's computer system and gave the names and addresses connected to those tags to a man they believed was going to rob the residences, according to investigators with the FBI and the city police department's internal affairs division.

Investigators said Bradley and Mitchell believed that the vehicles, two registered in Pennsylvania and two in New Jersey, belonged to drug dealers. Authorities said they made deals to share in the proceeds of the planned robberies with the man — identified in court documents only as "I.B." — to whom they provided the privileged information.

"These defendants deliberately undermined the work of the very officers they were supposed to be supporting," Meehan said.

Bradley worked as a dispatcher from March 2003 until she was fired in February. Mitchell, who has worked as a dispatcher from 2001 until the present, also will be fired, Meehan said.

A police department spokeswoman said she was not aware of the case and had no immediate comment.

If convicted, Bradley faces a maximum sentence of 80 years in prison and a $1 million fine; Mitchell faces a maximum of 40 years in prison and a $500,000 fine, authorities said.

Neither of the women had listed phone numbers and it was not immediately clear whether they had attorneys.

Court documents did not state whether any of the planned robberies occurred. U.S. Attorney's spokesman Rich Manieri said he could not immediately elaborate on details of the case not included in the documents released Monday.

2 Police Dispatchers Charged In Scheme (PHI)

By Michael Hinkelman

The Philadelphia Inquirer, October 3, 2006

Federal prosecutors yesterday charged two Philadelphia police dispatchers with extortion for allegedly selling information from the Police Department's computer system.

The two civilian dispatchers, Patricia Bradley and Tamara Mitchell, were charged with extortion by way of criminal information, a process that indicates they intend to plead guilty.

The two women used license tags listed in the Police Department's computer system to get names and addresses that they then sold to a man who said he intended to commit robberies at the addresses, according to the charges.

The alleged extortion occurred from August 2003 until May 2006.

The two dispatchers believed that the names and addresses they sold were those of drug dealers, according to the charges.

Unfortunately for Bradley, 35, and Mitchell, 38, the man to whom they peddled the names and addresses turned out to be a government informant, identified only as "I.B." in the court filing.

"These defendants deliberately undermined the work of the very officers they were supposed to be supporting," said U.S. Attorney Patrick Meehan.

The feds said the informant had given money to the defendants in exchange for names and addresses related to the tags.

The amount of money handed over by the informant typically ranged from $50 to $100 per name and address, said a person familiar with the investigation.

A police spokesman said yesterday that Bradley no longer works for the department and that proceedings to dismiss Mitchell should begin shortly.

The FBI and the Police Department's Internal Affairs Division investigated the case.

2 Police Radio Dispatchers Face Jail Time (PHI)

By Stephanie L. Arnold

The Philadelphia Inquirer, October 3, 2006

DOJ_NMG_0073635

Two Philadelphia police radio dispatchers face a combined 120 years in federal prison and more than $1 million in fines if convicted on charges of using police computer equipment to obtain and distribute personal information about cars and homes to a man they believed was robbing the victims.

"These defendants deliberately undermined the work of the very officers they were supposed to be supporting," U.S. Attorney Patrick Meehan said in a statement yesterday.

Charged were Patricia Bradley, 35, of the 1300 block of Lippincott Street, and Tamara Mitchell, 38, of the 600 block of Chew Street. They are accused of running license tags and giving the names and addresses associated with those tags to a man who used the information to commit crimes at those addresses.

According to court documents, Bradley and Mitchell believed that the vehicles, two registered in Pennsylvania and two in New Jersey, belonged to drug dealers.

They thought they were setting up the dealers to be robbed.

Bradley worked as a dispatcher for the Police Department from March 2003 until she was fired in February 2006. Mitchell, who still works for the department, has worked as a dispatcher since 2001. The U.S. Attorney's Office said Mitchell would be fired upon the filing of the charges.

The department hires civilian dispatchers whose responsibilities include providing information and support to police officers via police radio. A computer database is used to obtain identifying information about civilians and vehicles as requested by police officers. This database, authorities said, is prohibited from being used for personal purposes.

Newark: Bank Robber Sentenced (NYT)

By The New York Times

The New York Times, October 3, 2006

A man who once served as an F.B.I. informant was sentenced in Federal District Court yesterday to 90 years in prison for a series of bank robberies, prosecutors said. The man, Michael Giubilo, 61, of Belleville, was convicted on Feb. 10 of robbing banks in West Caldwell and Millburn in 2003 and 2004, said Christopher J. Christie, the United States attorney for New Jersey. Mr. Giubilo was arrested by federal agents as he was about to enter the Bank of New York in Millburn, Mr. Christie said. At trial, he said, Mr. Giubilo claimed that he had been set up by the F.B.I. In 1997, a federal judge ordered that Mr. Giubilo stop working as an informant because of his continued criminal activity, including weapons possession and eluding the police, Mr. Christie said.

Jemal Defense Team Questions Deal For Prosecution's Witness (WP)

By Carol D. Leonnig

The Washington Post, October 3, 2006

No witness is more crucial or more awaited in the bribery trial of downtown developer Douglas Jemal than the D.C. government refugee expected to testify today: Jemal's former drinking buddy and disgraced former city official Michael A. Lorusso.

Since the days in 2001 and 2002 when he and Jemal were standing shoulder-to-shoulder chomping on cigars at the Capitol Grille, much has changed for Lorusso. He's no longer flying high as a flashy D.C. government dealmaker; instead, he was forced out of his job and began cooperating with federal prosecutors. Lorusso, 40, pleaded guilty in 2004 to taking cash bribes and gifts from Jemal and his development company's officers in exchange for crafting sweetheart deals that would give Jemal's company millions of city taxpayer dollars it didn't earn.

But in newly filed court papers, Jemal's defense attorneys say jurors should not believe Lorusso and that the former deputy director of the D.C. Office of Property Management got a sweet deal himself by tantalizing prosecutors with tales of bribes from a big local fish. Jemal has maintained that anything he gave Lorusso was a gift to a friend, without any strings attached -- just as when the developer picks up the Friday night tab for his pals at the Capitol Grille.

Jemal's attorneys argue that prosecutors appear willing to overlook Lorusso's other shady dealings in District government and in his hometown of Boston so they can go after the more famous Jemal, his son and another company officer. That includes evidence that Lorusso helped bilk city taxpayers of millions of dollars through phony invoices for work renovating One Judiciary Square, a municipal building, soon after joining city government in November 2000 -- a project involving another company, they wrote. Also, they said, in 1998 and 1999, Lorusso persuaded people to invest hundreds of thousands of dollars in two illegal Ponzi schemes in Massachusetts that led to the indictment of one associate.

"In return for his stories about cash (bribes), Lorusso received full absolution," Jemal's defense attorneys wrote. "In return for testifying against his prominent former friends, Lorusso has capped (his future prison sentence)."

DOJ_NMG_0073636

As part of his deal, Lorusso pleaded guilty to two counts of accepting bribes. He now faces a maximum of 57 to 71 months in prison but would likely get less due to his cooperation when he is sentenced after Jemal's trial.

Yesterday, Thomas Mason, Lorusso's attorney, declined to comment on his client's deal. Also yesterday, U.S. District Judge Ricardo M. Urbina denied a defense request that the government be forced to turn over more material to them about how they reached this deal.

The fate of Jemal, his son Norman Jemal and leasing agent Blake Esherick hangs to a great degree on whether jurors believe Lorusso's explanation of why he crafted city leasing and purchase deals that were so favorable to Jemal's Douglas Development Corp. and so lousy for city taxpayers.

Lorusso is expected to testify that he took cash, trips and gifts, including a Rolex watch and pricey cowboy boots, in exchange for personally arranging exorbitantly priced leases and fraudulent invoices. Jemal denies wrongdoing.

In 2001, Lorusso proposed that the city pay Jemal $12.5 million for a Prince George's County parcel the city could use as a new vehicle-impoundment lot, records show. Lorusso presented his bosses with an appraisal saying that amount was a fair market price, but he didn't mention that he had given the appraiser inaccurate information about the site that drastically inflated the appraisal. What raised eyebrows on the D.C. City Council was that Jemal had paid $1.5 million for the land just four years earlier; the $12.5 million deal did not go through.

All told, Lorusso negotiated deals that helped Jemal and his company generate $14 million a year in income on city leases.

Yesterday, the government responded to the defense's contentions about Lorusso's credibility and favorable plea deal with the written equivalent of a smirk. Prosecutors wrote in court papers that the Jemal defense team's arguments "deserve little in the way of comment" except to note one irony.

"(T)he defendants maintain that Mr. Lorusso had corrupt relationships with nearly every person and entity with which he was involved -- with the sole exception of the defendants," prosecutors wrote.

Jemal and Lorusso may have never uttered the word "bribe," prosecutors wrote, but Lorusso will tell jurors that he "understood and believed that the defendants were in essence taking care of him in exchange for his taking care of the defendants."

D.C. Council member Jim Graham (D-Ward 1) led a council investigation into Lorusso's deals with Jemal and other city contractors, turning up revelations that helped federal investigators. Yesterday, Graham said Lorusso was surely pressured to cooperate because of the evidence against him, but that doesn't mean he's lying.

"I mean, is Lorusso a choir boy? Forget it," Graham said in an interview. "But we found a lot of shenanigans going on. And of course now he's going to do everything he can to cooperate and reduce his exposure."

Miss. Resident Sentenced For Making False Claims To FEMA (AP)

AP, October 3, 2006

JACKSON, Miss. - A Vicksburg man convicted of making false claims to the Federal Emergency Management Agency for Hurricane Katrina relief funds has been sentenced to two years in prison.

U.S. Attorney Dunn Lampton announced in a news release on Monday that Bryan Michael Beets also will be under three years' probation after he serves his sentence.

U.S. District Judge David C. Bramlette ordered Beets to pay $3,854 in restitution, which is payable to FEMA and the American Red Cross.

Beets was accused of falsely claiming to live in a Long Beach dwelling that was damaged by Katrina, when he actually was living and working in Vicksburg. Beets was convicted in federal court in June.

"The prosecution and sentence today show the continuing commitment of the Katrina Fraud Task Force to uphold the U.S. Attorney General's mandate of zero tolerance of Katrina fraud," Lampton said in the release.

BR Woman Gets Prison In Disaster Fraud (AP)

AP, October 3, 2006

A 27-year-old Baton Rouge woman was sentenced to 18 months in prison on Monday for making a false claim to get disaster aid after Hurricane Katrina, a U.S. attorney said.

Tarsha Johnson pleaded guilty May 8 to making a false claim. U.S. District Judge Frank J. Polozola sentenced her to prison with three years of supervised release, said U.S. Attorney David Dugas.

Polozola also ordered her to perform 50 hours of community service and to pay $2,000 in restitution.

FBI Joins Expressway Inquiries (SPT)

By Michael Van Sickler, Times Staff Writer

DOJ_NMG_0073637

St. Petersburg Times, October 3, 2006

The state Auditor General's Office started an audit. Now a member of the authority confirms FBI and U.S. DOT inquiries.

TAMPA — The FBI and the U.S. Department of Transportation are conducting a criminal investigation into the Tampa-Hillsborough Expressway Authority, an agency board member confirmed Monday.

Hillsborough County Commissioner Tom Scott, who sits on the seven-member board, said he spoke with investigators from the two federal agencies last week for more than 90 minutes.

"I was invited to meet with them and they are looking at the (Expressway Authority)," Scott said. "But I can't disclose the content of their questions in order not to hinder their investigation."

Neither the FBI nor the DOT's Office of Inspector General would confirm the investigation.

The inspector general's office frequently conducts criminal investigations with the FBI in cases of alleged waste, fraud or abuse in transportation agencies and projects, said spokesman David Burnes.

State lawmakers created the Expressway Authority in 1964 to build toll roads in Hillsborough.

A once obscure agency, the Expressway Authority came under greater scrutiny in 2004 when its key project, the elevated lanes of the Lee Roy Selmon Crosstown, encountered serious construction problems.

The criminal inquiry is the third investigation into the agency since late August, when details emerged about possible conflicts of interest, violations of ethics and public record laws, and questionable billings by lobbyists.

An investigation in early September by Gov. Jeb Bush's general counsel found no laws were broken, but it concluded that enough questions were raised to warrant a state audit of what the agency pays in legal and lobbying fees.

The state Auditor General's Office began an audit last week that will review Expressway Authority finances.

Rhea Law, the agency's interim legal counsel, said those investigators have requested billing records dating as far back as 2001.

Law would not say whether the FBI and the U.S. DOT are conducting a third inquiry.

Later, after Scott confirmed he had spoken with FBI and DOT officials, followup questions to Law were referred to Expressway Authority spokesman Mathias Bergendahl. He e-mailed a response from Law late Monday that did not acknowledge the investigation.

"(We) do not want to create any speculation about the Expressway Authority or the results of any review," Law wrote.

"As results are forthcoming, they will be shared with … the public."

This isn't the first time federal officials have looked into the Expressway Authority.

In June 2004, Santos Ramirez, a special agent with the DOT's Inspector General's Office, asked the Expressway Authority for information about a possible conflict of interest involving Bob Clark, a board member who owns Tampa Steel Erecting Co.

At issue was whether Clark could vote on materials to be used in projects that could benefit his company.

Steven Anderson, the Expressway Authority's legal counsel at the time, wrote an opinion urging Clark to abstain from votes that determine which materials will be used in road projects.

In an interview Monday, Anderson said Ramirez called him in 2004 and asked for the opinion about Clark. He said Ramirez asked other questions about Clark but Anderson would not disclose what they were.

The U.S. Department of Transportation wouldn't confirm that Ramirez is working this case. A call to his downtown Tampa office was not returned.

It was another opinion that Anderson wrote about a possible conflict involving Clark that ignited the current round of investigations.

The governor appointed Clark to the board in 2003. At the time, the Expressway Authority was completing a purchase of $366,000 from Clark's steel company.

Anderson flagged that purchase as questionable. More than three years later, on Aug. 28, Clark and four other board members, all appointed by Bush or one of his employees, voted to fire Anderson without a public discussion.

Board members Gwen Miller and Scott voted to retain Anderson.

When the law firm of Gray Robinson, which has strong ties to Bush, won the contract replacing Anderson, Scott claimed it was political payback.

A possible criminal inquiry could look into allegations that Expressway officials unlawfully steered the legal services contract to Gray Robinson.

It also might look into the billing practices of lobbyist John Beck, who met with Gray Robinson attorneys before the vote.

Beck's partner, Cynthia Henderson, a former top official in Bush's administration, double-billed the Expressway Authority last year for about $1,000.

On Monday, Beck's firm reimbursed the agency another $5,731 after it acknowledged it had overbilled again this year.

Other board members said they had not heard about the FBI investigation.

"I haven't heard anything. Let me know when you hear something," Clark said.

"I don't have any comment on an FBI investigation," said former state Sen. James Hargrett, D-Tampa. "I have not been contacted."

Miller, who said revelations about Beck's double billings should result in his termination from the authority, said she didn't know about the FBI inquiry, either.

"Nobody has called me or anything," she said. "I wasn't aware the FBI was involved until today when you told me."

Times staff writers Rebecca Catalanello and Janet Zink and researcher John Martin contributed to this report. Michael Van Sickler can be reached at mvansickler@sptimes.com or (813) 226-3402.

Rell, Blumenthal Announce Reviews Of Troubled Highway Project (AP)

AP, October 3, 2006

WATERBURY, Conn. -- Gov. M. Jodi Rell ordered an independent audit Monday into contracts, work performance and the Department of Transportation in connection with construction defects plaguing a $52 million improvement project of Interstate 84.

Also Monday, state Attorney General Richard Blumenthal said his office is investigating the project, which involves a 31/2-mile stretch of the highway between Waterbury and Cheshire.

The governor and attorney general's announcements came a day after The Hartford Courant reported that federal investigators are looking into why hundreds of storm drains are defective in the project.

Fixing the problems could cost the state millions of dollars and require newly paved parts of the highway to be torn up, the newspaper reported, citing state documents and people familiar with the project.

"Connecticut citizens deserve every assurance that their tax dollars are being spent and invested wisely," Rell said in a prepared statement. "They also deserve to know that multimillion dollar road projects are being performed in a complete and competent fashion."

Rell is asking an independent auditing firm to review all contracts awarded to L.G. DeFelice Inc. of North Haven, a now-defunct company that had the $52 million contract to rebuild the highway, and to New Britain-based Maguire Group Inc., which had a $6 million contract to inspect work on the project.

DeFelice, which went out of business last year and reformed as Hallberg Contracting Corp., was fired for failure to perform, the governor said. Maguire Group was fired by the DOT, at Rell's direction, last month.

The auditing firm will also review the DOT's internal oversight processes, Rell said.

Blumenthal said his investigation began several months ago "as a result of apparent failures in quality and timeliness of work done by various contractors. It is an active and intensive inquiry that will support claims for monetary recovery and other remedies as appropriate," he said in a written statement.

Authorities with the FBI and other federal agencies are investigating the problems, which could also add months to a project that was supposed to be completed a year ago.

Many of the drains lead nowhere, some are clogged with debris and others were apparently connected with substandard, cracked and leaking pipes, the newspaper reported.

In a memo written two weeks ago, a top DOT engineer blamed the defective drains on a "complete breakdown" in the inspection process.

"The numerous types of deficiencies, the particular as well as the general defects and omissions in the work, were and are stunning," Arthur W. Gruhn, chief engineer at the DOT's bureau of engineering and highway operations, wrote in the memo.

Gruhn said last week that it remains a mystery why the work is shoddy and why the inspection process failed.

"We may never know what was in somebody's mind as they were doing this," Gruhn said. "It just is so far beyond the norm that appropriate action had to be taken."

The drains, also known as catch basins, and related underground piping are designed to remove water from the roadway. Gruhn said improper drainage can create a hazard for motorists and damage roads through erosion and other forces.

The highway project includes about 300 catch basins. Inspectors have taken another look at about 280 of them, and all but 10 need additional work, Gruhn said. As many as 100 of the drains will require major reconstruction, Gruhn said, including some that are below new pavement.

Gruhn said there was no estimate yet on how much it will cost to fix the problems, but he said it could cost more than the liability insurance coverage provided by the contractors.

No one has stepped forward to accept responsibility for the problems. Nothing has been found to suggest DOT workers were partly to blame, Gruhn said.

A former vice president at DeFelice who ran the now-defunct company's cost department said he was not aware of the drainage problems.

DOJ_NMG_0073639

"As far as I know, the work was installed correctly and it was inspected," said Stephen Hallberg.

The Maguire Group is not conceding it was responsible, but a lawyer for the company said it intends to help the state correct any problems.

"Obviously we are in the process of reviewing the findings of the Department of Transportation," attorney Richard R. Brown said. "We absolutely want to cooperate in terms of correcting the situation at no expense to the state of Connecticut."

The DOT has clashed with The Maguire Group in the past. In 1992, then-DOT Commissioner Emil H. Frankel cited Maguire's "serious disregard for standards of professional ethics" in suspending the company for two years from doing work for the Transportation Department.

'Inappropriate' Expenditures Found At Getty (LAT)

By Jason Felch And Ralph Frammolino

The Los Angeles Times, October 3, 2006

A yearlong investigation by the California attorney general's office has concluded that the J. Paul Getty Trust's former chief executive Barry Munitz and the organization's board of trustees made several "inappropriate" expenditures, but will not be the subject of legal action because the money has been returned.

The misuse of the Getty's tax-exempt money included excessive travel expenses by Munitz and his wife, Munitz's extensive use of his staff for personal errands, his payment of consulting fees to a former Getty intern, and gifts of artwork to retiring trustees, according to the report released today by the attorney general's office.

For the first time in its history, Atty. Gen. Bill Lockyer has appointed an independent monitor, former state Atty. Gen. John K. Van de Kamp, to ensure the Getty carries through with its promised reforms over the next two years.

The attorney general will take no legal action against the trust, Munitz or board members, the report said.

Lockyer concluded that Munitz, whom he describes as a close friend, had compensated the trust for the inappropriate expenditure by agreeing to repay the Getty $250,000 and forgo more than $2 million in benefits when he was ousted in February.

The report also found that several other transactions were appropriate under California law, which allows the Getty to settle potential claims and spend money as long at it furthers its broad charitable purpose, the "diffusion of artistic and general knowledge."

Among them: the $3-million severance payment to former museum director Deborah Gribbon was appropriate because she had valid legal claims against the Getty; questioned grants went to nonprofit organizations and furthered the Getty's mission; and the Getty received fair market value when it sold property to Munitz's friend, philanthropist Eli Broad.

The attorney general's probe was launched in July after a Los Angeles Times investigation revealed that Munitz had used the Getty's resources for personal benefit amid controversies over his management and leadership of the trust. Further reports over the last two years showed that board members did not review Munitz's expenses and had benefited personally from the trust's vast resources.

Since those reports, much of the Getty's senior management and several members of its board of directors have left, including Chairman John Biggs, who retired early in August. The Getty is in the process of implementing a series of reforms it says are intended to correct problems highlighted in the Times reports.

The troubles of the Getty Trust, one of the country's richest private foundations, came amid a national debate about oversight of the nonprofit sector in which the art institution became a symbol of the need for reforms. Federal legislation passed this year has increased the penalties for violations of the federal tax code, which prohibits using public funds for personal benefit.

Van de Kamp will review progress reports made under oath by the Getty every six months, gather additional information if necessary and advise the attorney general's office about the organization's progress.

Aside from the appointment of the independent monitor, the report offers no specific consequences for the violations by Munitz and the board that it identifies, and gives no recommendations for reform or improved governance.

The investigation was carried out by the attorney general's charitable trust division, which regulates all nonprofits doing business in California and can impose civil penalties, remove trustees or recommend the revocation of an organization's tax-exempt status if it discovers gross mismanagement or fraud.

Lockyer approved the report before it was released. The Times reported in July that Lockyer, who is running for state treasurer in the November election, met privately with Munitz in the midst of the probe. Lockyer said Munitz disclosed he was leaving the Getty during the meeting, which the attorney general described as "therapy with a friend." In the past, Lockyer said he had sought Munitz's advise on political issues.

The report shows that the attorney general's probe focused narrowly on issues identified in the Times articles — investigators identified no new issues in their 13-page report, which provided little detail about the expenditures it criticized.

DOJ_NMG_0073640

The report stated in two places that the probe found no evidence that Munitz or trustees committed any crimes. "The payments to Dr. Munitz from the trust were authorized, and there was no indication that he obtained such authorization by making false statements, submitting false billings or through some other form of deceit."

In its June 2005 investigation of Munitz, The Times reported that on his frequent travels, he regularly flew first class, stayed in luxury hotels and ate dinner with friends at expensive restaurants, all at Getty expense. Many of the trips had a questionable tie to Getty objectives.

In one case, Munitz billed the Getty more than $35,000 for a trip with his wife and friends to Tuscany, where they rented a 15th century villa and toured the countryside visiting Getty-sponsored projects.

The Getty trustees had specifically approved Munitz's first class travel and the participation of his wife on his trips in his employment contract. The board was responsible for reviewing his expense accounts regularly, but delegated the task to one of Munitz's deputies.

The attorney general's report concluded that trustees had acted inappropriately in allowing the reimbursement of Munitz's wife's travel expenses. It concluded that Munitz's justification that his wife's participation was expected of his high office was "unpersuasive," and said the implication that an unmarried official could not perform adequately "an absurd proposition."

The report also said some of Munitz's travel expenses were "inappropriate or clearly unreasonable," though no clear rule prohibited them.

The investigation also characterized as "an improper private benefit" the more than $20,000 worth of artwork given to four retiring trustees. The Times reported that Munitz's office had ignored warnings from the trust's attorneys that such gifts violated Getty's will, which prohibits compensation for board members.

It was also critical of Munitz's frequent use of Getty staff to run personal errands for him and his wife. The Times reported he regularly sent his driver from Brentwood to Long Beach to pick up taped episodes of his favorite television programs, and on one occasion asked a secretary to track down blood orange juice for his wife, who had enjoyed it on a recent trip to Europe.

A Times article last month reported that among several "senior advisors" that Munitz hired to advise him was Iris Mickein, a young woman who had previously been an intern at the Getty. Munitz later had the Getty pay the Museum of Modern Art in New York to employ Mickein and flew her around the country to meet his friends at Getty expense.

The attorney general's report concluded that Mickein's MOMA job was appropriate because the Getty's mission includes the training of art students, but took issue with her consulting fees, for which she did "insufficient work."

The investigation concluded that there was nothing improper about Munitz steering a $200,000 Getty grant to a Russian museum at the request of a female Russian researcher with whom Munitz went to a movie, a concert and met with on several business trips.

While acknowledging that Munitz had socialized with the researcher, the attorney general found that the grant was legitimate because "it served the charitable purpose of the trust, specifically art education."

The Russian grant was one of several identified in The Times stories that the attorney general found were appropriate because they went to organizations "engaged in the diffusion of artistic and general knowledge."

jason.felch@latimes.com
ralph.frammolino@latimes.com

Monitor Named To Oversee Reforms At Getty Trust (NYT)

By Edward Wyatt And Randy Kennedy
The New York Times, October 3, 2006

LOS ANGELES, Oct. 2 — Ending a 14-month investigation, the California attorney general appointed an independent monitor on Monday to oversee reforms at the J. Paul Getty Trust, one of the world's richest cultural organizations. The inquiry determined that the trust's former president, with the approval of the Getty board, misspent trust money on his wife's travel, used employees for personal errands and made improper payments to a graduate student.

Although the attorney general, Bill Lockyer, found that the former president and the board violated their legal duties, he declined to take civil or criminal action against them. The report stated that the misuse of funds did not result from fraud and that the value of a settlement between the former president, Barry Munitz, and the trust exceeded the value of the losses from any improper payments.

The Getty, which has adopted several reforms since Mr. Munitz resigned under pressure in February, expressed satisfaction with the results of the inquiry.

Louise H. Bryson, who took over as chairwoman of the Getty board of trustees in August, said she was "pleased the attorney general acknowledged the work done by the board to change the policies and procedures" that resulted in the violations.

After reports of questionable expenses and suspect grants by Mr. Munitz and gifts to retiring board members began appearing in 2005 in The Los Angeles Times, the Getty board changed its policies to restrict travel expenses, prohibit the use of employees for personal ends and forbid gifts from the Getty to its trustees.

In February, the board reached a settlement with Mr. Munitz in which the former president resigned while repaying $250,000 in cash for improper expenditures and forfeited more than $2 million in expected benefits.

Notably, the attorney general found that a number of actions by Mr. Munitz that were approved by the board were consistent with the trust's charitable purposes. These included sending a staff member to Israel to observe an academy for chess, a game that is one of Mr. Munitz's favorite hobbies; furnishing the office of a former Getty Trust executive at another Los Angeles County arts institution; and sponsoring a luncheon at which Mr. Munitz was given an award.

The attorney general also found that the sale in 2002 of a piece of property in the Los Angeles suburb of Brentwood to Eli Broad, the billionaire philanthropist and a friend of Mr. Munitz's, for $2 million was reasonable. An assessment by an independent appraiser hired by the attorney general's office found that the property had a fair market value of $1.8 million at the time.

The report also found that there were no improprieties in a $3 million severance payment to Deborah Gribbon, the former director of the J. Paul Getty Museum, who resigned in 2004 after months of disagreements with Mr. Munitz. The attorney general's report said that the trust, in paying the money, reasonably based it on damages that Ms. Gribbon might have received in a wrongful termination lawsuit.

"Indeed, those damages might well have greatly exceeded the amount of the approved separation payment," the report found.

Through his lawyer, Mr. Munitz said yesterday: "I'm relieved that this is behind me and the Getty." Mr. Munitz stressed the findings in the report that all payments to him had been authorized by the trust, and that there was no indication that he obtained any money by making false statements or submitting false bills.

John Van de Kamp, a former state attorney general, is to serve as the independent monitor of the Getty Trust for two fiscal years, reporting to the attorney general's office on whether the trust's planned reforms are being followed.

The procedure calls for the trust to make reports to the attorney general's office every six months; those reports will be reviewed by the monitor, who can then ask for additional information from the trust. Tom Dresslar, a spokesman for the attorney general's office, said the Getty had agreed to provide further information or documentation should the monitor request it.

In a statement, Mr. Lockyer said that because charitable trusts are subsidized by taxpayers, "board members and executives have a legal duty" to make sure that spending is lawful and used to further the trust's charitable purpose. "With some expenditures and gifts, Mr. Munitz violated his duty and Getty's trustees failed to do their governance job," Mr. Lockyer said.

Mr. Lockyer and Mr. Munitz are known to be personal friends, and the attorney general has acknowledged that they met privately while the inquiry was under way.

Asked about that relationship, Mr. Dresslar said the investigation was conducted by the attorney general's charitable trusts division and that it was not influenced by the friendship.

The report's conclusions and recommendations were essentially unedited by Mr. Lockyer before he approved them, Mr. Dresslar added.

It is the first time that the California attorney general has imposed an independent overseer in an enforcement action against a charitable trust, although the procedure has been used in consumer settlements, including one this year with Ameriquest Mortgage Company after an investigation into allegations of predatory lending practices.

Jack B. Siegel, a Chicago lawyer who is an expert on nonprofit law, said he was somewhat surprised that the attorney general's findings were not more critical of the Getty. "The focus seems to be on — I don't want to say trivial things — but on very specific things like travel reimbursement," Mr. Siegel said. "They don't really seem in this to be addressing fundamental governance issues, about the overall way things are run."

DNA Test Result Casts Doubt On Two Convictions In 1987 Murder (WP)

By Ernesto Londoã±o

The Washington Post, October 3, 2006

Two of Colleen Williar's neighbors were convicted of murder after the 24-year-old woman was raped, strangled with a sock and repeatedly stabbed in her Baltimore home nearly two decades ago.

Now, a vaginal swab from the autopsy that was recently compared with DNA samples from the men might win new trials for James L. Owens, 41, and James Thompson, 47.

DOJ_NMG_0073642

The men were convicted in 1988 during separate trials in which relatively weak physical evidence was supported by a last-minute confession by Thompson. He later recanted, and both men now say they were innocent bystanders who came under suspicion after telling a series of lies that began as an attempt to cash in on police reward money.

Defense lawyers said the case could mark the first time in Maryland history that a post-conviction DNA test clears co-defendants convicted of murder.

DNA tests, which became commonplace in criminal investigations in the mid-1990s, have led to the exoneration of dozens of convicts in recent years, including a handful in Maryland.

Stephen Mercer, Owens's attorney, said the DNA test yielded a profile of a man who is neither Owens nor Thompson -- a finding at odds with the state's theory in the case.

"Someone's gotten away with murder for 20 years," said Mercer, who this year persuaded a Baltimore City Circuit Court judge to allow him to have the swab tested.

Baltimore prosecutors say they are ready to meet their burden of proof again if the case goes back to court, a prospect Williar's relatives find disturbing.

"In my heart of hearts, I believe they did it," said William C. Winkler, Williar's stepfather, who raised her. "There's not a day that goes by that I don't have to take a deep breath to get through a thought."

Mercer, a Rockville lawyer who teamed up with attorneys from the Innocence Project division of the Maryland Office of the Public Defender, said they intend to file motions seeking new trials based on the new evidence.

The Baltimore City State's Attorney's Office opposed the motion to test the swab, arguing that the convictions were supported by physical evidence and Thompson's confession.

"There was a lot of compelling evidence that was presented," said Margaret Burns, a spokeswoman for the office. Jurors "found that there was proof beyond a reasonable doubt. Not only did the jury find that, the appeals process confirmed that several times."

She said prosecutors will examine the methodology used to test the sample as well as its chain of custody over the years. Winkler said semen residue collected from the body could have been from an earlier, consensual sexual encounter, although a state witness testified that Williar had broken up with her boyfriend months before she died, and was not seeing anyone at the time.

Prosecutors argued that the semen was evidence of the rape.

Staff researcher Madonna Lebling contributed to this report.

Judge Keeps Karr Pornography Case Sealed (HC/AP)

By Marcus Wohlsen, Associated Press Writer

Houston Chronicle, October 3, 2006

SANTA ROSA, Calif. — A judge refused to unseal police documents in the child pornography case against former JonBenet Ramsey slaying suspect John Mark Karr, whose attorneys are fighting to have the misdemeanor charges tossed out.

The Press Democrat of Santa Rosa had sought to view the documents in the case against the high-profile suspect, but Sonoma County Judge Cerena Wong agreed with prosecutors who argued it could harm the investigation and prejudice potential jurors.

Authorities said they found five images of child porn on Karr's computer when he was arrested in April 2001. He fled before he went to trial. Investigators conceded they lost Karr's computer some time in the past five years, but claim to have found copies of the data recently.

Karr's trial was originally scheduled to start Monday, but was postponed for further hearings Tuesday on defense motions to dismiss the case or throw out newly revealed computer data.

Investigators said they think they have other computer equipment linked to Karr that could contain more than 1,000 other images.

Prosecutors "don't know how the images got there," defense lawyer Robert Amparan said. "They don't know whether Mr. Karr knew they were there. They don't know when if ever they were viewed."

Sonoma County Deputy County Counsel Anne Keck told the judge the FBI was comparing images of teenagers found on Karr's computer equipment with a national database of child porn victims.

She said the digital images were not related to child pornography charges against Karr.

But FBI spokesman Joe Schadler later said the bureau's role in the Karr investigation had ended, and was limited to providing expert testimony and forensic analysis of five pictures discovered on Karr's computer in 2001.

"We're not doing any further forensic work," he said.

Keck did not immediately return phone messages to The Associated Press seeking comment.

Karr, 41, who was extradited from Colorado last month to face the five-year-old charges, appeared briefly at the hearing, looking tired and worn.

Karr has rejected a plea deal that would have put him on probation. Prosecutors have conceded he probably won't serve more time if convicted because he already spent several months in jail awaiting trial five years ago. They said they want Karr to register as a sex offender.

The former teacher was arrested in Thailand last month after suggesting he killed JonBenet, a 6-year-old beauty queen, in her Boulder, Colo., home in 1996. The Ramsey case quickly collapsed after DNA failed to connect him to the crime.

Police Investigate '03 Death After Charge Against Nurse (NYT)

By Steve Friess

The New York Times, October 3, 2006

LAS VEGAS, Oct. 2 — One day before his apparently healthy wife stopped breathing and collapsed, Chaz Higgs, a critical care nurse, is said to have engaged in what seemed at the time to be idle chatter with a co-worker about the best way to kill a spouse, according to an indictment returned last week charging Mr. Higgs with his wife's murder.

The way to do it and get away with it, Mr. Higgs is said to have told another nurse, is with an injection of the paralytic drug succinylcholine because it frequently goes undetected in autopsies.

That alleged conversation — and a laboratory test that turned up suc- cinylcholine in the body of Mr. Higgs's wife, Kathy Augustine — formed the basis of the indictment. Now, the investigation into the death of Ms. Augustine has prompted the authorities to look into another death three years ago, that of her first husband, Charles Augustine, 63, who died in a Las Vegas hospital where he was being cared for by Mr. Higgs.

David Roger, the district attorney for Clark County, announced Monday that investigators would exhume Mr. Augustine's body to check for traces of the same drug that officials say killed Ms. Augustine.

Mr. Higgs, who was arrested on Friday in Hampton, Va., where he was staying with relatives, waived extradition on Monday and will be returned to Nevada. He has not made any public remarks since an impassioned denial of wrongdoing in an interview with The Las Vegas Review-Journal on July 13, in which he insisted he loved his wife and called suspicion of his involvement "just crazy."

The day after those remarks, Mr. Higgs was found with his wrists slit in the Las Vegas home he and Ms. Augustine had shared. He was treated at a local hospital and released but did not attend his wife's funeral on July 15.

The death of Ms. Augustine, 50, who was the Nevada state controller, and the case's potboiler-style twists have captivated Nevadans.

According to police reports, Mr. Higgs called the police the morning of July 8 and said he had found his wife unresponsive and not breathing at their second home in Reno. He suggested to paramedics that she might have had a complication from a heart condition.

Ms. Augustine died three days later, and an autopsy by the Reno coroner found no evidence of heart disease or heart attack.

With no visible explanation for the death, Ms. Augustine's blood samples were sent to the F.B.I. laboratory in Quantico, Va. Last week, the lab reported the presence of succinylcholine, and Ms. Augustine's death was ruled a homicide. On Friday, Mr. Higgs, 42, was arrested on one count of first-degree murder.

"It's a major punch in the gut to the family," Greg Augustine, 36, son of Charles Augustine and stepson of Kathy Augustine, said Saturday. "We were holding out hope that there wasn't any foul play. Now we know she was killed."

Now that Mr. Higgs has been accused in this death, questions have arisen about the death of Charles Augustine.

"My dad was getting better, and they were moving him to a rehab area," Greg Augustine said in July, "but very soon after that, he had massive organ failure."

No criminal investigation was conducted at the time of Mr. Augustine's death.

Mr. Higgs and Ms. Augustine were married three weeks after the death of Mr. Augustine in 2003, and the newlyweds received $1 million from his life insurance policy.

Greg Augustine said his father and stepmother were in the midst of a divorce after 17 years of marriage when the elder Mr. Augustine was hospitalized. Greg Augustine said he had had little contact with his stepmother after his father's death but does not suspect she was involved in his father's death.

The indictment against Mr. Higgs says he injected succinylcholine into Ms. Augustine's buttocks on July 8 before calling the police. Succinylcholine is a muscle relaxant used by anesthesiologists to briefly paralyze patients in order to install breathing tubes, but it has also been used as a murder weapon. Efren Saldivar, a respiratory therapist, confessed in 2001 that he injected it into some of his more than 50 victims in California. The indictment against Mr. Higgs said he had mentioned his marital discord as well as the use of succinylcholine to a fellow nurse at the Reno-area hospital on July 7. The two were discussing a high-profile arrest of a man charged with gunning down his wife, and Mr. Higgs reportedly remarked that such a means of killing someone was "stupid." The nurse, not named in the indictment, informed the police of the conversation as Ms. Augustine lay comatose before her death three days after her collapse.

DOJ_NMG_0073644

Ms. Augustine's only biological child — a daughter, Dallas Augustine, 26 — could not be reached for comment, but her spokesman said the recent developments had devastated her. "Everyone knows that your parents are probably going to precede you in death, but the idea that somebody stole half of her life is an entirely different story," said the representative, Mark Fierro. "This is 10 times, 1,000 times harder than the original situation."

Husband Faces Charges In Nevada Official's Death (WT)

By Jerry Seper, The Washington Times

The Washington Times, October 3, 2006

Critical care nurse William Charles Higgs told co-workers he knew how to commit the perfect murder just before his wife, Nevada State Controller Kathy Augustine, died of what initially was called a heart attack.

Yesterday, during a court hearing in Hampton, Va., the man who met his wife while caring for her dying husband in 2003 waived extradition to face first-degree murder charges in Nevada.

Arrested Friday by FBI agents in Hampton, where he had been staying with relatives, Mr. Higgs is suspected of killing Mrs. Augustine with an injection of a powerful muscle relaxant. Handcuffed and wearing an orange jail jumpsuit, Mr. Higgs said nothing during the brief hearing.

Police reports said Mrs. Augustine, 50, was found unconscious on July 8 and was rushed to a hospital, but died three days later. She never regained consciousness.

Mr. Higgs, 42, a nurse at Carson-Tahoe Regional Medical Center, told authorities he found his wife unconscious in bed at their home in Reno and called police, saying she had suffered a heart attack. He told police she was suffering from extreme stress from an ongoing campaign for state treasurer, where she faced fundraising problems and opposition from her own party.

But Reno Police Deputy Chief Jim Johns later confirmed that a preliminary autopsy found no evidence of heart disease that would trigger an attack and a complete autopsy was ordered. Police think Mrs. Augustine was injected with succinylcholine, a muscle relaxant often used in hospitals to temporarily paralyze a patient so a breathing tube can be inserted into the windpipe.

According to a police report, medical examiners found a needle mark on Mrs. Augustine's buttocks that could not be explained.

The report also said Mr. Higgs told co-workers he was having marital problems and was planning on ending his marriage. Investigators said Mr. Higgs also told co-workers just before his wife's death that if he intended to kill someone he would use a paralyzing drug such as succinylcholine because it could not be detected after death.

Mr. Higgs, known to his family and friends as "Chaz," attempted to kill himself at the couple's Las Vegas home by slashing his wrists three days after his wife died. He was treated and later released from a Las Vegas hospital. He did not attend his wife's funeral, held a day after his release from the hospital.

After the FBI laboratory in Quantico, Va., confirmed finding succinylcholine in Mrs. Augustine's urine, Reno police obtained an arrest warrant. FBI agents staked out the Hampton house where Mr. Higgs had been visiting relatives and arrested him Friday as he pulled into the driveway.

Mr. Higgs met Mrs. Augustine when he was caring for her first husband of 17 years, Charles Francis Augustine, 63, who died in 2003. They married six months after the funeral. Investigators yesterday said they will exhume Mr. Augustine's body to look for traces of the same drug that authorities said killed Mrs. Augustine.

Mrs. Augustine served in the Nevada Assembly and Senate until her 1998 election as the state's first female controller. In September 2004, she admitted violating state ethics laws during her 2002 re-election campaign and was fined $15,000 by the state Ethics Commission. She was impeached by the state Assembly and convicted and censured at a state Senate trial, but she was allowed to resume her office.

She announced her candidacy for state treasurer in January. Despite her death in July, her name remained on the ballot in the August primary, where she received 18 percent of the vote.

Manuscript Used To Convict Molester (WT)

By Cheryl Wetzstein

The Washington Times, October 3, 2006

A man thought to be one of the nation's most prolific child molesters has been convicted in a California court based on testimony from eight of his victims and a manuscript he was writing about his 35 years as a pedophile.

DOJ_NMG_0073645

Dean Arthur Schwartzmiller, 64, of San Jose, Calif., faces up to 153 years in prison when he is sentenced Oct. 16 on 12 charges of child molestation, taking obscene pictures of a minor and possession of child pornography.

Law-enforcement officials said the case is unique because of the memoir manuscript and seven spiral notebooks, written in code, that contained more than 36,000 entries about Schwartzmiller's sexual activities with children.

"When we found the notebooks and the manuscript, we realized we had come across a serial child molester and essentially a sociopath," said Steve Fein, deputy district attorney in Santa Clara County, who prosecuted the case.

"I haven't seen too many people keep code or that detailed a log on their sexual contacts with children," said Detective Robert Dillon, who works in the San Jose Police Department's child exploitation unit and testified at the trial in Santa Clara County Superior Court.

Mr. Dillon said that based on the notebooks' 1,500 pages, Schwartzmiller abused between 250 and 300 children -- predominantly boys in early adolescence. Boys were listed in categories such as hair color ("Blonde boys"), behavior ("Boys who say no") and explicit sex acts.

Schwartzmiller also had been writing a memoir about his life and his political views. Most chillingly, the manuscript had "paragraph summaries" of more than 100 boys, including "their names, specific characteristics about them and what he had done with them," Mr. Dillon said. "I've heard of other [pedophiles] with 10, 15, 20 victims but nobody as extensive as this."

Schwartzmiller came to the attention of California authorities after he fled the scene of a traffic accident. Police visited his home and met his roommate, Fred Everts, a convicted child molester. Police arrested Everts after discovering he had violated his parole.

Schwartzmiller learned of Everts' arrest and fled to Washington state, but called one of the boys he was later convicted of molesting and asked him to go to his home and destroy certain materials. The boy told his mother and she went to police with the pornographic materials they found including photos of her own semi-naked son, press reports said. Schwartzmiller was soon arrested.

The boy and his cousin, now 13, testified against Schwartzmiller. Schwartzmiller defended himself, and accused the cousins, who are in California illegally, of striking a deal with prosecutors to gain legal residency in exchange for lying about him. Schwartzmiller further argued that consensual sex with boys shouldn't be a crime if the boys have reached puberty.

Jurors found Schwartzmiller guilty Sept. 18 after four hours of deliberation.

Mr. Fein described Schwartzmiller as having "no remorse. He has no feelings that anything he has done is wrong. He's essentially proud of how he's led his life and what he's done."

As prolific as Schwartzmiller is thought to be, the nation's most notorious child molester may still be Rex King, described as "Mr. X" in Alfred Kinsey's research.

King, a forestry official who traveled for work, is estimated to have molested 800 children, including infants, according to his meticulous records. Kinsey included King's sex acts in his 1948 book on male sexual behavior.

Husband Faces Charges In Nevada Official's Death (WT)

By Jerry Seper

The Washington Times, October 3, 2006

Critical care nurse William Charles Higgs told co-workers he knew how to commit the perfect murder just before his wife, Nevada State Controller Kathy Augustine, died of what initially was called a heart attack.

Yesterday, during a court hearing in Hampton, Va., the man who met his wife while caring for her dying husband in 2003 waived extradition to face first-degree murder charges in Nevada.

Arrested Friday by FBI agents in Hampton, where he had been staying with relatives, Mr. Higgs is suspected of killing Mrs. Augustine with an injection of a powerful muscle relaxant. Handcuffed and wearing an orange jail jumpsuit, Mr. Higgs said nothing during the brief hearing.

Police reports said Mrs. Augustine, 50, was found unconscious on July 8 and was rushed to a hospital, but died three days later. She never regained consciousness.

Mr. Higgs, 42, a nurse at Carson-Tahoe Regional Medical Center, told authorities he found his wife unconscious in bed at their home in Reno and called police, saying she had suffered a heart attack. He told police she was suffering from extreme stress from an ongoing campaign for state treasurer, where she faced fundraising problems and opposition from her own party.

But Reno Police Deputy Chief Jim Johns later confirmed that a preliminary autopsy found no evidence of heart disease that would trigger an attack and a complete autopsy was ordered. Police think Mrs. Augustine was injected with succinylcholine, a muscle relaxant often used in hospitals to temporarily paralyze a patient so a breathing tube can be inserted into the windpipe.

According to a police report, medical examiners found a needle mark on Mrs. Augustine's buttocks that could not be explained.

DOJ_NMG_0073646

The report also said Mr. Higgs told co-workers he was having marital problems and was planning on ending his marriage. Investigators said Mr. Higgs also told co-workers just before his wife's death that if he intended to kill someone he would use a paralyzing drug such as succinylcholine because it could not be detected after death.

Mr. Higgs, known to his family and friends as "Chaz," attempted to kill himself at the couple's Las Vegas home by slashing his wrists three days after his wife died. He was treated and later released from a Las Vegas hospital. He did not attend his wife's funeral, held a day after his release from the hospital.

After the FBI laboratory in Quantico, Va., confirmed finding succinylcholine in Mrs. Augustine's urine, Reno police obtained an arrest warrant. FBI agents staked out the Hampton house where Mr. Higgs had been visiting relatives and arrested him Friday as he pulled into the driveway.

Mr. Higgs met Mrs. Augustine when he was caring for her first husband of 17 years, Charles Francis Augustine, 63, who died in 2003. They married six months after the funeral. Investigators yesterday said they will exhume Mr. Augustine's body to look for traces of the same drug that authorities said killed Mrs. Augustine.

Mrs. Augustine served in the Nevada Assembly and Senate until her 1998 election as the state's first female controller. In September 2004, she admitted violating state ethics laws during her 2002 re-election campaign and was fined $15,000 by the state Ethics Commission. She was impeached by the state Assembly and convicted and censured at a state Senate trial, but she was allowed to resume her office.

She announced her candidacy for state treasurer in January. Despite her death in July, her name remained on the ballot in the August primary, where she received 18 percent of the vote.

CIVIL RIGHTS:

FAYETTE LOCKUP IS TARGET OF RIGHTS VIOLATIONS INQUIRY (LEXHL)

By Beth Musgrave, Michelle Ku And Linda Blackford, HERALD-LEADER STAFF WRITERS

Lexington Herald-Leader (KY), October 3, 2006

Jail officer says he alerted FBI

John Vest said he has been working with the FBI for an "undisclosed" time.

An officer at the Fayette County jail who is running for jailer in Jessamine County says he alerted the FBI to allegations of excessive force at Lexington's jail.

John Vest, a corporal who has worked at the Fayette jail since 2003, said at a press conference yesterday that he has been working with the FBI in its investigation of alleged unnecessary force and civil rights violations against prisoners for "an undisclosed period of time."

Vest said he was not authorized to talk about the FBI investigation or his involvement.

David Beyer, an FBI spokesman, said he could neither confirm or deny that Vest has been working with federal officials on the case. The FBI typically does not comment on ongoing cases or who its informants are.

After Vest's announcement, jail officials questioned Vest's credibility, saying he has been involved in three use-of-force incidents during the three years he's been at the jail.

Ron Bishop, director of the Fayette County Detention Center, said he wasn't surprised that Vest had been talking to federal investigators.

"It makes a lot more sense now, when you look at the timing and his running for office," Bishop said.

On Thursday, the FBI announced that the Civil Rights Division of the Department of Justice, the U.S. attorney for the Eastern District of Kentucky and the FBI were conducting an investigation into possible civil rights violations involving excessive force at the 1,000-bed facility.

On Tuesday, FBI agents served a sealed search warrant at the jail on Old Frankfort Pike. Federal authorities have said that they cannot go into specifics about the investigation until the search warrant is unsealed.

The Fayette County jail has not been without problems over the past several years. Since August 2005, five inmates have died at the facility. It's unclear whether the current investigation has anything to do with those deaths.

Bishop said yesterday that Vest has been investigated four times in the last year. Two of those investigations involved use of force. One investigation was for improper documentation involving use of force. The second case involving alleged excessive use of force remains open, he said.

Vest has also been investigated for insubordination and for improperly filling out his time card, Bishop said.

Bishop said Vest was suspended this year for 16 hours for the insubordination incident. He received written reprimands for the other two closed cases: the time-card incident and the use of force.

DOJ_NMG_0073647

Vest has worked in the jail's intake area on the third shift, from midnight to 8 a.m., for the last year, Bishop said. Vest makes $27,110 a year, according to city records.

"I'm disappointed that Director Bishop is attempting to intimidate a federal witness," Vest said after learning that Bishop had disclosed his personnel records.

Vest said that he had no written reprimands before he was transferred in November 2005 to intake, where the FBI could be focusing its investigation. According to several people who witnessed the FBI search last week, agents spent hours going through documents in the intake area, where inmates are processed before being booked.

Vest said he has been told by his supervisors that the case that remains open has been resolved and the use of force was determined to be appropriate. But Vest said he expected to receive a written reprimand because his supervisors said he had not included everything in his report that was required.

In another incident, Vest was investigated in December 2003 after an altercation with an inmate. Vest allegedly pepper-sprayed an inmate who refused to follow an order. The inmate allegedly hit Vest with a mop handle before Vest subdued him. Both men were treated at a hospital.

Vest said the pepper spray incident was reviewed by the jail staff and was deemed an appropriate use of force. He received no reprimands.

The inmate involved was charged with assault third degree. He eventually pleaded guilty, court records show.

Jail spokesman Lt. Darin Kelly said he did not know whether Vest was disciplined in the pepper spray incident because the FBI took those records.

Vest is still employed at the Fayette jail but is requesting administrative leave with pay. He also is requesting protection under the federal Whistle-blower Protection Act, aimed at preventing workplace retribution. Bishop said he was unaware that Vest had requested leave.

Vest's spokesman, David Adams, said neither he nor Vest could discuss whether Vest's work with the FBI came before or after he decided to run for office.

"Unfortunately, the timing of Corporal Vest's involvement is part of the investigation, so I can't answer that," Adams said. "John is sincerely interested in holding people accountable in the Jessamine County jail, and that's his reason for running for office in his home county of Jessamine."

Vest, 42, the Republican candidate, was born in Winchester, in Clark County, Adams said.

Adams said Vest has already been personally attacked for his actions and he expected attacks against Vest to accelerate now that he has gone public. Adams said he could not elaborate on who has attacked Vest.

"Soon, retribution will begin for those who have perpetrated crimes in the name of government entities and those who helped the perpetrators hide their crimes," Adams said, reading from a prepared statement.

Cecil Moss, Vest's Democratic opponent in the Nov. 7 race for Jessamine jailer, had little to say about Vest's announcement.

"That's Fayette County, and I really don't know what they're doing up there," Moss said. "I don't know Mr. Vest very well."

Frank Hubbard, the current jailer, did not seek re-election.

Herald-Leader reporter Greg Kocher contributed to this story.

Fayette Jail Employee Says He Assisted FBI Investigation (AP)

AP, October 3, 2006

LEXINGTON, Ky. - A Fayette County jail employee who has asked for whistleblower protection said Monday he had been working with the FBI in its investigation of unnecessary force and civil rights violations against inmates at the facility.

John Vest has worked at the jail since 2003 and is running for jailer in Jessamine County. He is still employed at the Fayette jail but has asked for administrative leave with pay, the Lexington Herald-Leader reported on its Web site Monday.

The newspaper said Vest is requesting protection under the federal Whistleblower Protection Act, aimed at preventing workplace retribution.

The FBI announced Thursday that the Department of Justice Civil Rights Division, the U.S. attorney for the Eastern District of Kentucky and the FBI were investigating possible civil rights violations involving excessive force at the 1,000-bed facility. FBI agents served a sealed search warrant Tuesday at the jail.

Vest said at a news conference Monday he had been working with the FBI in the investigation for "an undisclosed period of time."

Vest has been involved in at least three use of force incidents in the three years he's been at the jail, the Herald-Leader reported. He received written reprimands in two cases, and one remains open, the newspaper said.

Ron Bishop, director of the Fayette County Detention Center, said he wasn't surprised that Vest had been talking to federal investigators.

Vest has worked in the jail's intake area on the third shift for the last year, Bishop said.

"It makes a lot more sense now, when you look at the timing and his running for office," Bishop said.

Vest declined to comment on the disciplinary actions against him, saying it was part of the FBI investigation.

"I really wish that I could, but it violates the integrity of the case," Vest said. "The people that have been victimized will be cheated if I violate the integrity of this case."

Vest's spokesman, David Adams, said neither he nor Vest could comment on whether Vest's work with the FBI came before or after he decided to run for office.

"Unfortunately, the timing of Corporal Vest's involvement is part of the investigation, so I can't answer that," Adams said. "John is sincerely interested in holding people accountable in the Jessamine County jail, and that's his reason for running for office in his home county of Jessamine."

Vest was born in Winchester, in Clark County, Adams said.

FBI officials could not be reached for comment.

Jail Informant Goes Public (WTVQ-TV)

By Greg Stotelmyer, Action News 36

WTVQ-TV, October 3, 2006

John Vest has been an employee at the jail in Fayette County since June of 2003. He won't say how long, but he confirms he's a federal whistleblower working with the FBI on its probe into the use of unnecessary force at the jail. Vest made that revelation Monday morning, six days after the detention center was searched by the FBI. Vest refused to answer questions about his roll as an inside informant, repeatedly telling Action News 36 "I'm not authorized to talk about it." Vest is a corporal, working third shift in the jail's intake area, which is where inmates are booked. Vest has requested administrative leave with pay claiming he would be working "in a hostile work environment."

The detention center's director, Ron Bishop says he's not surprised Vest is the whistleblower, but he did not know who the informant was before Vest went public. Bishop says the FBI search bothers him. He claims the jail has handled the use of force and allegations of excessive force properly. He says Vest never approached him about problems. "We always follow up and we always take appropriate action," Bishop said about reports of force.

Bishop also questions Vest's motives because Vest is the Republican candidate for jailer in next month's election in Jessamine County. "Let me say that I am a little suspicious of the timing and given his track record here, it is a little suspect," said Bishop. Vest says his informant roll and a run for office are "two separate things".

Vest says being "deep inside" the jail as a whistleblower made him concerned. "I was scared to death," Vest told Action News 36 in a follow up phone interview. Bishop says Vest has four disciplinary actions against him in the three plus years he's worked at the detention center. Bishop says there's an open investigation on Vest for possible use of excessive force. Vest has been reprimanded for failing to report a use of force incident and suspended for insubordination. Vest claims he has been told he's been cleared of excessive use of force.

FBI spokesman David Beyer would "neither confirm nor deny" that Vest is an informant. The search warrant allowing the FBI to raid the jail last Tuesday remains under court seal.

Bishop says the FBI carted away personnel files, incident reports and shift logs. It also took video and DVD's of events taped that involved the use of force. Bishop says he "rests easy at night" despite the federal probe.

Vest says before the FBI used him they "checked me out, my credibility, my integrity." Vest says he's done a good job as an inside informant. "I did a lot and what I did, I did good," said Vest. "John Vest knows right from wrong, John Vest has integrity."

EEOC Rules In Favor Of Chesapeake Deputies Who Were Fired (VAPILOT)

By Cindy Clayton, The Virginian-pilot

Hampton Roads Virginian-Pilot, October 3, 2006

CHESAPEAKE - The Equal Employment Opportunity Commission has ruled in favor of two sheriff's deputies who said they were fired in retaliation for a discrimination lawsuit that alleged a hostile, racist work environment.

The agency sent a letter to Tony Ellis notifying him of the ruling and suggesting an agreement that would require Sheriff John R. Newhart's office to reinstate Ellis, who was fired Dec. 30. The suggested agreement also requires Newhart to give Ellis back pay and benefits, punitive and compensatory damages, and attorneys' fees and to conduct on-site EEOC training for all supervisors and expunge all references to Ellis' dismissal in his personnel file.

DOJ_NMG_0073649

David Cahoon, who was set to testify in Ellis' case last year, also was fired and received the same ruling last week from the EEOC.

Ellis said EEOC officials told him that if the Sheriff's Department doesn't respond within 10 days, the case will be sent to the U.S. Justice Department.

Col. David Newby, undersheriff, said the department doesn't plan to respond.

"We don't mediate these things," Newby said. "We tell them that if they wish to do so, we'll try it in court and not before. That's been our practice for 15 or 20 years."

Ellis was demoted from the rank of lieutenant in May 2004 because he didn't file a report about the use of force on a jail inmate on time. He filed a discrimination complaint with the EEOC and was given a right-to-sue letter, he said.

Ellis filed suit in U.S. District Court against the sheriff and the department in November 2004 alleging he was demoted because he is black and that racial disparities in the department led to inmate mistreatment, violence among employees and other incidents.

A federal judge dismissed the suit in November 2005. A month later, on Dec. 30, Cahoon and Ellis were fired. Ellis had worked for the department for 20 years; Cahoon for 21 years.

Earlier this year, Newby said the two men were not reappointed after Newhart's re-election in November. State law allows sheriffs to reappoint employees at will.

Ellis said he was told he was being fired because he didn't speak when the sheriff greeted him inside the booking section of the jail.

Cahoon said he was told he was let go because he kept a journal of his experiences at the department. Included in Ellis' lawsuit was an affidavit written by Cahoon about incidents and experiences he had while working for Newhart. Cahoon said he had told the department's attorney during an interview that he kept a journal during his years with the department.

Cahoon and Ellis said they were taught during law enforcement training to keep a log of their actions and experiences.

Ellis' lawsuit alleged several incidents that involved white employees with rank who were charged with crimes in other cities, had threatened black employees or had failed to follow orders but were not demoted.

In one instance, a sergeant threatened a deputy and a "physical confrontation," ensued, according to the suit. The sergeant retrieved a weapon from his locker and threatened the deputy. The sergeant was not demoted, according to the suit.

Another allegation, labeled the "Thunder Dome Incident," involved inmates being put into a "dangerous cell block" where another inmate had been beaten the previous week, the suit stated. The lieutenant in charge wasn't demoted.

At a Christmas party at the sheriff's home, a white employee got into an argument with a black employee and a fight followed, the suit stated. The white employee is said to have used several racial slurs.

"There is a hostile work environment created by the lack of discipline required by Sheriff John R. Newhart," the lawsuit stated, "and due to the racial climate in the department."

Bible-Reading Student Gets Lesson In Litigation (WP)

By Eric Rich

The Washington Post, October 3, 2006

Amber Mangum was a frequent reader during lunch breaks at her Prince George's County middle school, silently soaking up the adventures of Harry Potter and other tales in the spare minutes before afternoon classes. The habit was never viewed as a problem -- not, a lawsuit alleges, until the book she was reading was the Bible.

A vice principal at Dwight D. Eisenhower Middle School in Laurel last month ordered Amber, then 12, to stop reading the Bible or face punishment, according to a lawsuit filed Friday by Amber's mother. The lawsuit, filed in U.S. District Court in Greenbelt, alleges that the vice principal's actions violated the girl's civil rights.

"Amber's a new Christian, and she's trying to learn all she can," said Maryann Mangum, the girl's mother. "She reads her Bible and she goes to Sunday school. . . . It really upset me when she was not allowed to read it on her own time."

John White, a spokesman for the school system, said administrators learned of the lawsuit Friday and were not prepared to comment on its claims. "We're just beginning to look into it," he said.

Mangum said her daughter was reading her Bible on Sept. 14 when Vice Principal Jeanetta Rainey approached. According to Mangum and the lawsuit, Rainey told Amber that reading the Bible violated school policy and that she would face discipline if she continued to do so.

Later that day, Amber recounted the episode to Mangum, who is her adoptive mother and also her biological grandmother. James Baker, a family friend, sent a note to the school asking that the principal identify any policy barring students from reading the Bible during their free time.

DOJ_NMG_0073650

The note quoted a section of the school system's administrative procedures, saying that students "may read their Bibles or other scriptures, say grace before meals, and pray before tests to the same extent they may engage in comparable, non-disruptive activities."

The principal, Charoscar Coleman, did not respond, the lawsuit says. A friend at Mangum's church suggested that Mangum contact the Rutherford Institute, a nonprofit legal organization specializing in cases that involve issues of religious and civil liberties.

The institute's president, John W. Whitehead, said yesterday that the law is clear and that Amber's rights were violated. He said the lawsuit does not specifically seek monetary damages but rather that a judge declare that students cannot be barred from reading the Bible during free time at school.

"This is a seventh-grader who's probably overwhelmed by what's going on around her," Whitehead said. "This is a chance for her to get some comfort during the day. . . . What would you rather have a kid doing, throwing spit wads or sitting there silently reading a few passages from the Bible?"

Euclid OKs Election Plan Hoping To End U.S. Lawsuit (CLPD)

By Leila Atassi, Plain Dealer Reporter

The Cleveland Plain Dealer, October 3, 2006

Redistricting aims to add black representation

Euclid -- City Council unanimously approved a redistricting plan to help settle a federal lawsuit that contends the city's election system prevents black candidates from winning council seats.

Under the new system, which will take effect in time for the 2007 election, Ward 4's black population would decrease from 54 percent to about 51 percent, and the percentage of black residents in Ward 3 would increase from about 39 percent to 45 percent.

About 13 percent of residents would be assigned a new ward, and the city's five at-large seats would remain.

City officials hope the plan will satisfy the Justice Department, which filed suit in July after a three-year investigation concluded that broadly drawn districts and a system for electing at-large council members have diluted minority voting strength.

Leading into council's vote Monday night, city officials did their best to ease the worries of residents who stepped to the lectern and said that although they believe the Justice Department's accusations are out of line, adopting the proposal seems to be an admission of guilt.

"This administration and City Council are united in our belief that this community has done nothing wrong," Mayor Bill Cervenik told residents. "Be proud of Euclid. Don't be ashamed of these accusations, because none of them are true."

In June, the Justice Department proposed that the city shore up minority voting power by breaking four wards into eight -- two of which would be predominantly black -- and eliminating all at-large seats but the council president's.

Attorney Hilary Taylor, who is representing the city in the case, said that in drafting its proposal, the Justice Department relied on inadequate census data that does not accurately reflect the demographics of the city.

The city's counterproposal was created with help from Cleveland State University researchers using new demographic data compiled by GeoLytics, a New Jersey-based company.

EUCLIDB5

ANTITRUST:

Justice Department, State Settle Suit With Dairy Industry (AP)

AP, October 3, 2006

LONDON, Ky. - A Kentucky dairy company will be sold to a competitor under a settlement between the U.S. Department of Justice, the state of Kentucky and the Dairy Farmers of America.

Prairie Farms Dairy Inc., of Carlinville, Ill., will buy Southern Belle Dairy Co., of Somerset, from the Dairy Farmers of America to settle an antitrust suit filed by the federal government.

The Allen Family Limited Partnership will also have to sell its interest in Southern Belle as part of the deal. The settlement was filed Monday in U.S. District Court in London.

Thomas O. Barnett, assistant U.S. Attorney General over the department's Antitrust Division, said the deal will mean better prices and quality of service in Kentucky and Tennessee.

The Justice Department and Kentucky filed suit in 2003 challenging the Dairy Farmers' Association's purchase of the Southern Belle dairy.

DOJ_NMG_0073651

The lawsuit said the association's acquisition of Southern Belle and the nearby Flav-O-Rich dairy in London hurt competition since both competed for school milk contracts in Kentucky and Tennessee.

Dairy Co-op In KC Settles With U.S. (KCS)

The Kansas City Star, October 3, 2006

Dairy Farmers of America, the country's biggest dairy cooperative, agreed to divest its interest in a Kentucky milk processor after a three-year battle with the federal government.

The Department of Justice said Monday that its settlement with the Kansas City-based cooperative would restore competition in the bidding for school-milk contracts in eastern Kentucky and Tennessee.

Dairy Farmers of America will sell its interest in Southern Belle Dairy Co. to Prairie Farms Dairy Inc. under the Justice Department's approval. Also selling its interest in Southern Belle to Prairie Farms is Dairy Farmers of America's partner, the Allen Family Limited Partnership.

A spokeswoman for Dairy Farmers of America indicated that the cooperative would have a statement, but had not provided it by late Monday.

The dispute began in 2003 when the federal government sued Dairy Farmers of America over its 2002 acquisition of a 50 percent interest in Southern Belle in Somerset, Ky. That purchase followed Dairy Farmers of America's earlier acquisition of a 50 percent interest in National Dairy Holdings, which owns Flav-O-Rich Dairy of London, Ky.

The government alleged that Dairy Farmers of America's acquisitions gave the cooperative ownership interest in the two dairies that competed against each other to supply milk to 45 school districts in eastern Kentucky. The purchases also reduced the number of bidders from three to two for 55 other school districts in eastern Kentucky and Tennessee, according to the federal government's suit.

FCC OKs Alltel Buy Of Midwest Wireless (AP-YBIZ)

AP, October 3, 2006

FCC OKs Alltel Buy of Midwest Wireless Holdings With Conditions

WASHINGTON (AP) -- The Federal Communications Commission on Monday approved Alltel Corp.'s $1.1 billion purchase of Midwest Wireless Holdings LLC on the condition that it sell some of its assets.

The companies must sell cell-phone businesses in Minnesota regions covering Chippewa, Lac qui Parle, Pipestone, and Le Sueur, the FCC said. The approval came more than three weeks after the Justice Department approved the transaction, with similar conditions.

The FCC voted 5-0 to approve the acquisition.

Little Rock, Ark.-based Alltel share closed Monday at $55.31 on the New York Stock Exchange, down 19 cents. Privately held Midwest Wireless is based in Mankato, Minn.

McAfee, Others Criticize Vista Security Policies (MERCN)

By Sarah Jane Tribble

The San Jose Mercury News, October 3, 2006

Computer security provider McAfee joined a chorus of complaints Monday and accused software programming giant Microsoft of abusing its monopoly by controlling what security products can run on its new operating system.

The Santa Clara company ran a full-page advertisement in the Financial Times saying that Microsoft, which started selling its own security products this summer, was trying to ``hamstring'' competitors.

``Microsoft seems to envision a world in which one giant company not only controls the systems that drive most computers around the world but also the security that protects those computers from viruses and other online threats,'' the advertisement states. ``... when it fails, it fails for 97 percent of the world's desktops.''

Microsoft's Vista, which is expected to be released to business customers next month, was designed in cooperation with the security firms and with the goal of providing customers as many security options as possible, said Stephen Toulouse, senior product manager in the security technology unit of Microsoft.

``Customers have asked us to make a more secure operating system and that's been our goal,'' Toulouse said. ``We just want to protect the customers and we know we can't do it alone.''

To be sure, the $3.6 billion security market was largely created because of Microsoft's weak operating systems, said Andrew Jaquith, senior analyst with the Yankee Group.

``Windows has for years been a monumentally insecure platform and there are a number of companies like Symantec and McAfee that have made their reputation and money on security of this platform,'' Jaquith said.

DOJ_NMG_0073652

Now that Microsoft is trying to address those security concerns, the companies that have long benefited from operating system weaknesses have much to lose, he said.

In a joint phone interview Monday afternoon, McAfee chairman and chief executive George Samenuk along with the company's chief security architect John Viega said that if Microsoft's intention was truly to protect customers, than it ``would allow legitimate security."

McAfee's sentiment echoes San Jose-based Symantec, which announced its opposition to Vista limitations two weeks ago.

At issue are two main points:

First, the security companies say they fear consumers will be confused when Microsoft's new security center pops up along with their own but relays different information. Microsoft argues its own dashboard relays very basic information that should be compatible with the information provided by security firms.

Second, the firms allege that Microsoft has blocked their ability to review the operating system's kernel, or core. Microsoft's Toulouse said Monday that the company never wanted that code to be open for the public.

Microsoft, instead, has been offering a ``relatively unprecedented level access" to the security firms, he said. McAfee and Symantec have both had office space and lab space on the Microsoft campus, he said.

Both Symantec and McAfee said they have not taken any formal action yet, but there are many options, including filing lawsuits and waging antitrust complaints.

Security firms aren't the only ones in Silicon Valley crying foul over Microsoft's new operating system.

This summer, San Jose-based Adobe Systems took the software behemoth to task for plans to let users save documents as a PDF, an Adobe file format. Microsoft dropped the plan after reports Adobe threatend legal action.

Supreme Court Denies Northwest Airlines Appeal In Key Antitrust Case (AP)

The Associated Press

AP, October 3, 2006

The Supreme Court Monday refused to consider a significant antitrust case involving Northwest Airlines and a low-cost competitor that could have set some rules for competition between large airlines and smaller, no-frills rivals.

The case, Northwest Airlines Corp. v. Spirit Airlines Inc., stems from a six-year-old Spirit Airlines suit in which Spirit charged that Northwest engaged in predatory pricing to force Spirit to drop two flights from Detroit, one to Boston, the other to Philadelphia. The case raises key antitrust issues, such as the type of evidence needed to prove that a company engaged in below-cost pricing to drive a competitor out of business.

A district court sided with Northwest, but the 6th U.S. Circuit Court of Appeals overturned the ruling and found for Spirit Airlines. But the Supreme Court Monday refused to hear the case due to procedural issues related to the timing of an appeal filed by Northwest. The airline filed a petition July 17 but the petition was removed from the court's docket because it was filed five days late.

Northwest asked the court to consider the case despite the late filing, but the court refused, issuing an order denying the "out-of-time" petition.

JUSTICES REFUSE TO HEAR GLORIA ALLRED CASE

The Supreme Court on Monday refused to step into a First Amendment issue involving Gloria Allred, a prominent California lawyer who was the subject of a judge's gag order in a high-profile murder case that is now over.

Allred, an outspoken television personality, represented a teenage girl who testified at the trial of Scott Dyleski, now 17. Dyleski was sentenced last week to life in prison without parole for the killing of Pamela Vitale, the wife of television legal analyst Daniel Horowitz.

Allred's client, Jena Reddy, is Dyleski's ex-girlfriend. She told the jury that while Dyleski never admitted or denied killing his neighbor, he told her he would take the blame to protect her and his best friend. Reddy also testified that hours after Vitale was slain, Dyleski told friends it would take at least three dozen blows to bludgeon someone and it would likely be a slow, painful death.

Late last year, amid intense media attention, a Superior Court judge in Contra Costa County, Calif., issued a gag order aimed at attorneys for witnesses in the case, as well as police, prosecutors and defense lawyers.

Allred's lawyers, including constitutional lawyer Erwin Chemerinsky, say judges increasingly are engaging in prior restraint of free speech rights in important cases.

The Supreme Court has never articulated a legal standard for when, if at all, gag orders on lawyers, parties and witnesses are permissible, said Allred's lawyers. They said that in the absence of guidance from the Supreme Court, judges have developed "quite different standards" on whether and when to gag the speech of attorneys, parties and witnesses.

DOJ_NMG_0073653

Horowitz found his wife, who had been beaten to death, in the mobile home of a hilltop estate where the couple were building a California dream home, up the road from where Dyleski lived.

Allred also represented Amber Frey, the former lover and star witness against Scott Peterson, who is on death row for murdering his pregnant wife, Laci, in 2003.

The First Amendment case is Gloria Allred and Allred, Maroko & Goldberg v. Superior Court of the State of California, 05-1505.

HIGH COURT SIDES WITH FIRED NEWSPAPER WORKERS

The Supreme Court sided Monday with Detroit newspaper unions and employees who were fired for their actions during an 18-month strike in the mid-1990s.

Justices declined to hear the newspapers' appeal of a National Labor Relations Board ruling ordering the partnership that prints, distributes and sells advertising for The Detroit News and Detroit Free Press to reinstate fired employees.

The workers lost their job after the newspapers said they blocked entrances at a distribution facility and the Detroit News Building in violation of court orders during the strike that ran from July 1995 to February 1997.

The labor relations board determined that the employees had not engaged in misconduct, but were instead exercising their right to strike. It ordered the employees reinstated with backpay.

The U.S. Court of Appeals for the D.C. Circuit upheld the board's ruling. Solicitor General Paul Clement, representing the labor relations board, urged justices not to take the appeal from the Detroit Newspaper Agency.

The Detroit News was owned by Gannett Co. during the strike, while the Detroit Free Press was owned by Knight-Ridder Newspapers Inc. The Free Press now belongs to Gannett and the News is owned by MediaNews Group Inc.

The case is Detroit Newspaper Agency v. National Labor Relations Board, 05-1427.

Supreme Court Rejects UnitedHealth Ohio Doctor Rate Appeal (MRKTWTCH)

Market Watch, October 3, 2006

WASHINGTON (MarketWatch) -- The U.S. Supreme Court Monday rejected an appeal from UnitedHealth Group Inc.'s (UNH) Ohio unit on whether doctors can go to court with antitrust challenges on reimbursement rates despite existing arbitration pacts.

UnitedHealth contends the Cincinnati area doctors are bound by arbitration clauses in the insurance agreements. Ohio state courts, however, have ruled the doctors can pursue their claims in court.

The doctors and two medical societies allege UnitedHealth and other insurance companies violated antitrust laws by conspiring to set unreasonably low insurance reimbursements to health-care providers. At issue in the case is whether the antitrust claims fall outside the contract requiring that disputes be handled through arbitration.

The case is UnitedHealth Care of Ohio v. Academy of Medicine of Cincinnati, 05-1465.

-Contact: 201-938-5400

Supreme Court Won't Hear Calif. Competition Case Against AT&T (MRKTWTCH)

By Mark H. Anderson

Market Watch, October 3, 2006

WASHINGTON (MarketWatch) -- The U.S. Supreme Court on Monday said it won't decide whether a California company can use state laws to sue AT&T Inc. (T) for alleged anticompetitive conduct in other states.

RLH Industries Inc., a surge-protection technology company in Orange, Calif., sued the telecommunications giant in a California court over restrictions in several states that prevented it from selling high voltage protection equipment to local phone companies in markets served by subsidiaries of AT&T.

The lawsuit remains pending in a California state trial court after a state appeals court allowed the case to continue. AT&T has argued constitutional limits on state interference with interstate commerce bar the lawsuit from proceeding.

"A state is and should be flatly forbidden from attempting to govern commerce occurring wholly outside that state," AT&T said in a court petition. "Under the decision below, California's antitrust and unfair competition laws would control markets throughout the country."

RLH Industries maintains that California state courts have jurisdiction to review anticompetitive practices by companies that impact it, even if those practices are taking place in other states. According to the RLH brief, lower courts are still considering some of the issues raised in the AT&T petition to the Supreme Court, making high court review premature.

The case is AT&T v. RLH Industries, 05-1493.

-Contact: 201-938-5400

DOJ_NMG_0073654

Broadcom Seeks To Bar Qualcomm Chips In Patent Fight (Update4) (BLOOM)

By Peter J. Brennan And Susan Decker

Bloomberg, October 3, 2006

Oct. 2 (Bloomberg) -- The global patent battle between Qualcomm Inc. and Broadcom Corp. for supremacy in a fast-growing segment of the wireless-telephone industry may be decided in an obscure corner of the Washington bureaucracy.

Broadcom, of Irvine, California, is asking an International Trade Commission official to decide next week to bar imports of handsets that use technology from San Diego-based Qualcomm. Broadcom says the Qualcomm technology, which provides high-speed Internet access and lets users view high-quality videos, violates patents on its chips.

The outcome of the fight may determine control of the U.S. market for so-called 3G, or third-generation, wireless phones, a market that topped $1 billion last year. The stakes are so high for both companies that some experts say they would be foolish not to reach a settlement, rather than risk an adverse decision.

``I can guarantee you that their customers are calling them every day and pushing them to settle," says Lyle Vander Schaaf, a patent lawyer with Bryan Cave in Washington who isn't involved in the dispute. Vander Schaaf is a former lawyer with the trade commission.

Charles Bullock, an administrative law judge at the commission, is due to decide on Oct. 10 whether the government should bar the Qualcomm-powered phones. Bullock's decision will be reviewed by the six-member commission, which is made up of three Republicans and three Democrats. After that, it may be challenged in a federal appeals court in Washington.

Stealth Agency

The commission, which is charged with protecting domestic markets from unfair trade practices and patent infringement, is ``sort of a stealth agency," says patent lawyer Charles F. Schill of Steptoe & Johnson in Washington, who handles cases before the agency. It ``can completely shut down your source of supply and just put you out of the market," he says.

In the past, the commission has blocked imports of knockoff Sharpie pens and some disposable cameras. In 2001, it persuaded President George W. Bush to impose tariffs of up to 40 percent to protect the U.S. steel industry.

The commission is just the latest front in the two-year-old patent fight between the two companies that began when Broadcom announced it was going to start competing with Qualcomm after the companies had worked together on a project. Broadcom and Qualcomm, the world's second-largest maker of chips for mobile phones, are battling in courtrooms and administrative agencies in Europe, South Korea and California.

A Stable of Supporters

Each combatant has enlisted a stable of big companies to support its cause.

In Qualcomm's corner are customers that use its chips in their phones, such as Seoul, South Korea-based LG Electronics Inc., and service providers such as Verizon Wireless -- a joint venture of Verizon Communications Inc. and Vodafone Plc -- and Sprint Nextel Corp. that distribute the phones to their customers. They say their products should be permitted in the U.S. even if the trade commission decides Qualcomm chips infringe Broadcom's patents.

Broadcom has the backing of Dallas-based Texas Instruments Inc., the world's biggest maker of cell-phone chips, and Espoo, Finland-based Nokia Oyj, the world's biggest maker of wireless phones.

Broadcom and its allies filed complaints with the European Commission claiming Qualcomm used its patents to create a dominant position for the advanced phones. Texas Instruments and Broadcom also have filed a complaint with the South Korean Fair Trade Commission. Broadcom also claimed that Qualcomm was using its patents to shut it out of the market. A judge threw out that antitrust suit in New Jersey, although Broadcom can seek to refile the complaint.

A Coordinated Assault?

The various cases have prompted Qualcomm to accuse its competitors of coordinating lawsuits and government investigations around the world, a charge Broadcom denies.

Qualcomm also is seeking an order today from U.S. District Judge Rudi Brewster in San Diego to prevent Broadcom from using trade secrets Qualcomm alleges were stolen. David Rosmann, a Broadcom spokesman, calls those charges ``false and incredible."

Broadcom got its start by selling chips for cable television set-top boxes and has expanded into such devices as computer switches, headsets and modems. The company's effort to expand into cellular phones has met with limited success, in devices such as Palm Inc.'s Treo 650 and with small Chinese makers such as Konka Group.

While Qualcomm's profit from royalties on all of its chips tripled -- to $1.66 billion -- between 2000 and 2005, its shares are down 13 percent this year on concern that it won't successfully renegotiate its license with Nokia, which sells one out of every three mobile phones in the world.

Options Irregularities

Broadcom shares have fallen 1.9 percent this year as it restates results to reflect $1.5 billion in costs related to options irregularities.

The stock rose 51 cents to $30.85 at 4 p.m. New York time in Nasdaq Stock Market composite trading. Qualcomm shares fell $1.69, or 4.7 percent, to $34.66 in Nasdaq composite trading and have declined 20 percent this year.

The outcome in the ITC is anybody's guess. Qualcomm investors are betting against a commission decision to bar imports of the disputed phones: ``An injunction to not allow Qualcomm's chipsets inside the U.S. is pretty drastic," says John Krause, an analyst at Minneapolis-based Thrivent Financial for Lutherans, which manages $63 billion in assets including shares of Qualcomm.

On the other hand, Broadcom says it has an edge in the fight because commission staff attorneys have backed its patent-infringement claims -- and administrative law judges often follow the position taken by the staff attorneys.

If the two sides want to reach an accommodation, they'll have plenty of opportunities -- and not a little pressure -- to do so before the Oct. 10 ruling.

`In Earnest'

U.S. Magistrate Anthony Battaglia, hearing a related matter, has ordered the billionaire chairmen of the two companies -- Qualcomm's Irwin Jacobs, 72, and Broadcom's Henry Samueli, 52 -- to ``discuss a global resolution in earnest." The two are due to appear before Battaglia in San Diego on Oct. 4 to report on their progress.

While Qualcomm Chief Executive Paul Jacobs, Irwin Jacobs's son, said in a Sept. 27 interview that his company has offered to settle on terms that are ``extremely favorable" to Broadcom, there's still no deal.

Even with the commission decision looming, Broadcom and Qualcomm still have time to reach a settlement that would resolve their differences, says Ehud Gelblum, an analyst with JPMorgan Chase & Co. in New York. In a Sept. 28 note to clients, he said the companies have ``one last chance to kiss and make up."

To contact the reporters on this story: Susan Decker in Washington at sdecker1@bloomberg.net ; Peter J. Brennan in Los Angeles at pbrennan3@bloomberg.net .

Harrah's Gets $15B Private Equity Bid (USAT)

By Roger Yu And Matt Krantz

USA Today, October 3, 2006

Harrah's Entertainment, the world's largest casino operator, was considering Monday an unsolicited $15 billion joint takeover bid from private equity firms Apollo Management and Texas Pacific Group.

The bid is the latest in a string of large deals sought by private equity firms, which combine debt, investors' money and their own funds to buy undervalued companies and resell them for profit.

If completed, it would be the third-largest private buyout this year of a U.S. company, says deal tracker Dealogic. Bigger takeovers this year: hospital operator HCA and tech company Freescale Semiconductor.

In a statement, Las Vegas-based Harrah's said it has formed a committee of board members to review the proposal to buy the company for $81 a share in cash, a 22% premium over Harrah's Friday close. “There is no assurance that Harrah's will enter into this or any other transaction,” the statement said.

Apollo couldn't be reached. Texas Pacific Group declined comment. In Monday trading, investors bid up Harrah's shares by 14%. They closed at $75.68.

In acquiring Harrah's, the private equity firms could get an undervalued company in a fast-growing industry. Harrah's operates about 40 casinos in Las Vegas, Atlantic City and other cities. Holdings include Caesars Palace in Las Vegas, Harrah's Las Vegas and Bally's, Horseshoe, Showboat and other brands.

“They traded at a relative discount compared to its peer group,” says Rod Petrick, an analyst at broker Stifel Nicolaus.

The gaming industry also has been active this year with mergers and acquisitions — 58 deals, Dealogic says.

But private equity firms have stayed away from gaming companies, says Peter Fitzpatrick of law firm Bryan Cave. Making them attractive now: They're flush with cash and can generate predictable returns.

The annual gaming revenue for U.S. commercial casinos rose to $30.3 billion last year, nearly doubling in 10 years. Harrah's has added to its appeal by buying Caesars Entertainment in 2004, which broadened its reach into more upscale customers. It also runs one of the industry's best guest-loyalty programs, Petrick says.

Its shares have fallen in recent months partly because it has been unsuccessful in penetrating Asia, the hottest emerging market for gaming, says Jake Balzer, an analyst at Guzman & Co. Harrah's has no presence in Macau, the largest Asian market, and lost a bid for a gaming license issued by Singapore earlier this year.

Balzer says, “The deal doesn't make a whole lot of sense” for the company because it would stifle Harrah's growth.

DOJ_NMG_0073656

Licenses Are The Biggest Hurdle To A Deal For Harrah's (WSJ)

By Peter Sanders

The Wall Street Journal, October 3, 2006

While Harrah's Entertainment Inc. considers a roughly $15.1 billion offer from private-equity firms Apollo Management and Texas Pacific Group, the biggest hurdle to a deal may be the long and arduous process of obtaining casino licenses in the many jurisdictions where Harrah's operates.

The companies yesterday confirmed the $81-a-share offer for Harrah's, the world's largest gambling operator by revenue. The offer represented a 22% premium over the company's closing price of $66.43 a share Friday. Also, Harrah's has about $10.8 billion in debt.

Harrah's, Las Vegas, said it had formed a special committee of nonmanagement directors to review the proposal. The company said, "The special committee has not determined that a transaction is in the best interests of Harrah's and its stockholders. ... Accordingly, there is no assurance that Harrah's will enter into this or any other transaction."

WALL STREET JOURNAL VIDEO

Reporter Peter Sanders discusses1 the complexities of the deal and why it may not be in shareholders' best interest.

It is unclear whether other suitors will emerge. But for potential buyers, the attraction of Harrah's may not lie only in its existing casinos -- which comprise Caesars Palace and other properties -- but also in its real-estate holdings in Las Vegas and elsewhere. The company owns more than 350 acres around the Las Vegas Strip alone, said Charles Atwood, Harrah's vice chairman.

Harrah's intends for some of that land to be part of a major redevelopment on the Strip that would include new hotels, retail and entertainment venues as well as casinos. Harrah's has for months been consolidating its land holdings for that project, a process that continued yesterday when it announced a land swap with Boyd Gaming Corp. that gives it the Barbary Coast casino site in exchange for 24 acres near Boyd's Stardust casino. With land on the Strip recently going for more than $23 million an acre, the real estate is attractive.

Beyond Las Vegas, Harrah's has a trove of casino properties in a dozen states. It is possible that an acquisition of Harrah's could lead to a breakup of the company that would see Harrah's casinos sold piecemeal.

But the biggest wrinkle could involve licensing for any new owners and the time it could take. Neither Apollo nor Texas Pacific executives hold gambling licenses. Individual states issue licenses to casino owners and operators, subjecting applicants to detailed investigations. Officials from Nevada, New Jersey and Missouri -- all states where Harrah's operates casinos -- estimate the licensing process could take as long as two years. Such licensing investigations usually delve deeply into financial and criminal backgrounds of the applicants.

But Apollo and Texas Pacific have already begun exploring the options with various state regulators. On Sept. 15, officials in Missouri received a detailed request from Las Vegas attorney Frank Schreck outlining a potential acquisition of an unnamed public company by three private firms.

In an interview, Mr. Schreck said he was hired by Apollo, Texas Pacific and a third firm to explore the regulatory options in various states. Mr. Schreck said he received a waiver from Harrah's, which is also a client, to work with the private-equity firms. He declined to name the third firm, although he confirmed the third entity was based in Great Britain but has dropped out.

The rules that dictate who holds casino licenses vary by state. In Nevada, for instance, officers, directors, controlling shareholders and anyone with more than a 10% stake must apply for a casino license. At closely held concerns, the state requires every shareholder to hold a casino license, said Dennis Neilander, chairman of the Nevada Gaming Control Board.

The private firms seeking to buy Harrah's could be helped by waivers often granted to institutional investors that exempt them from the licensing process, according to state regulators and Mr. Schreck.

Traditionally, private equity has shied away from major casino investments because of the heavy regulatory scrutiny. But in recent years, private equity has begun to seek out deeper investment in the sector. The first was Colony Capital of Los Angeles, which isn't involved in the current deal. It was granted a casino license in 1999 when it bought the Harveys Casino Resorts chain. In that case, Nevada awarded casino licenses to Colony's Thomas Barrack and Kelvin Davis, who were then deemed the casino's "beneficial owners," Mr. Neilander said. Nonvoting shareholders who were "basically passive investors concerned only with the assets' income" weren't required to be licensed.

Mr. Davis has since left Colony and is now a partner at Texas Pacific. He would have to reapply for a casino license if his firm acquires Harrah's.

Despite the difficulty and complexity of any take-out by private equity, investors sent the stock soaring on the news. Harrah's shares were up $9.25, or 14%, to $75.68 apiece in 4 p.m. New York Stock Exchange composite trading. Analysts said a potential deal could be a good option for the gambling company.

DOJ_NMG_0073657

"We believe that Harrah's board of directors is hard-pressed to come up with an alternative equity value creating plan to rival this proposal," Joe Greff, a casino analyst at Bear Stearns in New York, wrote in a research note. "We suspect the board of directors will just seek a higher price, citing its global development pipeline and Las Vegas land bank as a reason that the current proposal is inadequate."

--Randall Smith contributed to this article.

Write to Peter Sanders at peter.sanders@wsj.com2

Not Our Bag, Coach Says In A Lawsuit Alleging Target Sold Counterfeit Purse (WSJ)

By Vanessa O'Connell, Kris Hudson

The Wall Street Journal, October 3, 2006

Target Corp. has thrived by selling stylish apparel and accessories on the cheap. But handbag maker Coach Inc. is accusing the big-box retailer of crossing the line by marketing a fake Coach bag.

In a lawsuit filed in federal court in Manhattan Friday, Coach alleged that Target was a counterfeiter by selling a Coach-style purse, complete with a hang tag that says "Coach," according to Coach Chief Financial Officer Mike Devine. The allegedly fake bag has Coach's signature C-pattern and a touch of snakeskin-like fabric in the center of the bag, according to a photo of it included in the lawsuit. The bag, purchased from a Target store in Largo, Fla., is an "exact replica of a genuine Coach handbag" bearing at least one Coach trademark, the suit says.

Target, which isn't a licensed distributor of Coach products, said the bag in question is an authentic version and therefore the suit is without merit.

"Target has procedures in place to ensure that we do not sell counterfeit products to our guests," Target said in a statement. "We have been assured that the Coach product showcased in our store is authentic therefore we believe the lawsuit is without merit."

A subsequent message to The Wall Street Journal said "we are not providing any more information than what is in the statement."

Coach said the bag was sold at Target for about $200 -- less than the original Coach bag, but far more than Target bags usually sell for. The original bag was called the Python Signature Striped Demi. It was offered by Coach about a year ago, but is no longer in the product offering.

The Coach suit is seeking at least $1 million as well as information about where the bag was made. "This is a counterfeit," Mr. Devine says. "We have gone into stores in Florida and purchased this ourselves. It isn't ours."

The suit illustrates a new aggressiveness on the part of luxury-goods companies to hold retailers responsible for suspected instances of counterfeiting of their high-end products. Mr. Devine says this is the first time Coach has sued a major U.S. retailer over counterfeits. Last month, French luxury-goods brands Louis Vuitton and Dior Couture filed a complaint in a French court against eBay Inc., alleging the online auctioneer isn't doing enough to keep people from selling counterfeit goods through its site. That suit, which seeks an estimated $47 million in damages, alleges that nine out of every 10 Louis Vuitton brand items for sale on eBay are counterfeit. (Louis Vuitton is owned by LVMH Moet Hennessy Louis Vuitton SA. Christian Dior SA, the holding company of luxury-goods mogul Bernard Arnault, controls LVMH and owns Dior Couture.)

Designers and manufacturers are getting more assertive about protecting their brands and designs, in part because of a bill that would protect fashion trademarks from uses that blur their distinctiveness or tarnish their reputations. The bill was recently passed by the Senate and is headed to President Bush's desk.

Fashion designers also are pushing for separate federal legislation that would offer three years of copyright-like protection for designs ranging from dresses and shoes to belts and eyeglass frames. Peter Raymond, partner at the New York office of the law firm Reed Smith LLP says the legislative push has "given some confidence to a number of manufacturers" to take new measures to fight infringements of their design.

Putting a well-known trademark like Coach on a bag isn't considered copying but counterfeiting and would be illegal under current laws, Mr. Raymond says. He says the bag might have wound up at Target through the "gray goods" market, in which genuine brand-name products get beyond their usual chain of distribution and make their way to store shelves.

Though Coach has encountered other instances of stores selling Coach counterfeit goods, those stores were "usually small mom-and-pops" against which Coach sought criminal actions, working with police, Mr. Devine says. "What we don't see is reputable retailers selling counterfeits, which is what is so surprising about the Target situation," he said.

The Coach lawsuit against Target is the latest in a string of designer brands suing large retailers for alleged trademark infringement. Coach itself sued department-store chain Kohl's Corp. earlier this year, accusing Kohl's of infringing on its trademarks for its Sonoma handbags, among other goods. LVMH's Fendi brand sued Wal-Mart Stores Inc. in June for allegedly selling counterfeit Fendi handbags at its Sam's Club warehouses.

DOJ_NMG_0073658

Sometimes, the manufacturers win. In 1999, Wal-Mart agreed to pay Tommy Hilfiger Corp. $6.4 million to settle a lawsuit alleging it sold fake Hilfiger apparel.

In its suit against Target, Coach cited more than 20 trademarks that it registered from the years 1963 to 2005, including the signature Coach hang tag to distinctive patterns of open-ended ovals on its fabrics.

Sales of the allegedly fake Coach bag aren't the only issue Coach has with Target. Mr. Devine says Coach in the past had discovered Target knocking off its bags. "We had in the past been able to reach an agreement with them to stop selling the bags," he says.

As recently as Sept. 21, Mr. Devine says, Coach sent Target a letter regarding an Isaac Mizrahi tote bag that was sold under the Isaac brand but allegedly infringed on one of Coach's existing styles. Then, in the past week to 10 days, Coach learned of another item under Target's Cherokee label that was using Coach's so-called Optic C design and retails for $11.89 compared with $170 and up for Coach bags.

Coach has a signature "C" fabrication, with interlocking Cs, as well as a more abstract version called Optic C, Mr. Devine says, and it has trademark protection on both. Neither the Isaac Mizrahi nor the Cherokee purse is mentioned in the suit, however.

"Success frequently breeds imitation and counterfeiting, so naturally we're seeing more activity" in the realm of knockoffs, says Mr. Devine.

Gilead Agrees To Buy Myogen For $2.5 Billion (WSJ)

By Angela Moore, Bob Sechler

The Wall Street Journal, October 3, 2006

Biopharmaceuticals company Gilead Sciences Inc. agreed to acquire Myogen Inc. for about $2.5 billion, a move aimed at gaining ownership of the biotechnology company's lead product candidate, a potential treatment for pulmonary arterial hypertension.

The $52.50-a-share offer is a 50% premium over Myogen's share price of $35.08 on Friday. The Westminster, Colo., company's shares rose 47%, or $16.36, to $51.44, while Gilead shares were off $4.49, or 6.5%, at $64.28, both as of 4 p.m. in Nasdaq Stock Market composite trading.

With the transaction, the Foster City, Calif., company would acquire Myogen's main drug candidate, Ambrisentan, a treatment for pulmonary arterial hypertension that is in late-stage clinical trials. Pulmonary hypertension involves a narrowing of blood vessels in the lung, making it difficult for the heart to pump blood through the lungs and causing shortness of breath even when resting.

Myogen expects to file a new-drug application for Ambrisentan with the Food and Drug Administration as early as the fourth quarter, Gilead said. British drug maker GlaxoSmithKline PLC holds rights to the product outside the U.S.

Get alerts for breaking news -- such as Fed moves, major world events and big mergers -- delivered straight to your desktop. Alerts will appear in a small window on your screen, much like an instant-messaging window. See a sample and get more information.2

Executives from Gilead said that the "scarcity value" of a drug in late-stage testing that addresses an unmet medical need justified the premium price offered for Myogen.

"We felt that the premium was a fair value for what we were doing here, and that this was in fact a product that we could build a franchise around," Gilead Chief Financial Officer John Milligan said.

Datamonitor, a business-information provider based in London, estimated in March that the market for pulmonary hypertension treatments could grow to around $2 billion by 2014 from $636 million in 2004, driven by new treatments. Ambrisentan is expected to lead that market with sales topping $500 million by 2014, Datamonitor said.

The current market leader for treatment of pulmonary hypertension is Tracleer from Swiss pharmaceuticals company Actelion Ltd.

Gilead Chief Executive John Martin said Tracleer had $339 million in sales during the first half of 2006.

"We believe we have a product with a stronger profile" that can take market share as well as grow with overall demand, he said.

About 88,000 people in the U.S. have pulmonary arterial hypertension, according to Gilead, but only 30% are diagnosed and even fewer are receiving treatment. About 5,000 new patients are diagnosed each year.

Write to Angela Moore at angela.moore@dowjones.com3 and Bob Sechler at bob.sechler@dowjones.com

Gilead Plans To Acquire Myogen In $2.5B Deal (USAT/AP)

USA Today, October 3, 2006

DOJ_NMG_0073659

DENVER — Gilead Sciences, a leading producer of HIV drugs, said Monday that it plans to acquire biotech Myogen for about $2.5 billion in cash, signaling an expansion into treatments for pulmonary diseases.

Gilead agreed to pay Myogen shareholders $52.50 per share, a premium of 50% over the stock's closing price Friday of $35.08 a share. Myogen's stock hit a 52-week high, while Gilead's shares closed down 6.5% Monday.

The news caught many off guard, not only for the acquisition price but because it represented a shift for Gilead out of its area of expertise in infectious diseases.

Sanford C. Bernstein analyst Geoff Porges said the offer indicates a possible bidding war for Myogen and also reflects the scarcity of late-stage drugs in the pulmonary disease category. “It's a very generous offer,” he said.

During a conference call with analysts, Gilead President and Chief Executive Officer John Martin said the acquisition will help Gilead build on its $365 million buyout of privately held Corus Pharma in August.

“Our planned acquisition of Myogen represents both a scientific and strategic step,” Martin said.

Gilead, a Foster City, Calif.-based biopharmaceutical company with a market value of $29.2 billion, is known for its HIV drugs. It manufactures two of the three drugs in a once-a-day pill called Atripla that was approved last summer for HIV and AIDS treatment. The company also makes the Tamiflu flu treatment.

Gilead posted second-quarter net income of $265 million, or 56 cents per share, up 34% from $196 million, or 41 cents per share, in the previous second quarter. The company credited the jump to strong sales of its HIV treatments.

Myogen, a 10-year-old biopharm based in the Denver suburb of Westminster, had a market value of about $2.2 billion as of Monday. It posted a net loss of $18.5 million, or 44 cents a share, in the second quarter compared with a net loss of $21.7 million, or 61 cents a share, in the second quarter of 2005.

Myogen is developing a drug called Ambrisentan to treat pulmonary arterial hypertension. It believes information developed from two studies will support a new drug application that it expects to file with the Food and Drug Administration by year's end.

It also has a drug for treatment of primary pulmonary hypertension and a late-stage study for a drug that could treat resistant hypertension.

Argus Research analyst David Coleman, who follows Myogen, said Gilead likely will be able to capitalize on the drug better than Myogen.

“I do believe it is a very good deal for Myogen shareholders,” he said.

In a research note to clients, Piper Jaffray analyst Thomas Wei said Gilead will be able to draw on its marketing expertise to build buyers for Ambrisentan.

The deal is structured in two phases, with Myogen slated to become a wholly owned subsidiary of Gilead. Myogen's board approved the deal, which is expected to close by the end of the year, pending regulatory and other standard approvals.

Gilead said the deal will boost earnings in 2007 and 2008. It does not expect Myogen to add to 2009 profit.

Myogen stock rose $16.36, or 47%, to close at $51.44 a share in Nasdaq trading. It has traded between $17.96 a share and $42.27 a share in the past year.

Shares of Gilead fell $4.49 or 6.5%, to close at $64.28 in trading on the Nasdaq. In the past year, it has traded between $44.73 a share and $68.77 a share.

You've Got It Backward: Intel Is Bullying AMD (WSJ)

By Thomas M. McCoy

Wall Street Journal, October 3, 2006

In his Sept. 23 Rule of Law column "Tigers by the Tail," Ron Cass asserts that Advanced Micro Devices is attempting to "restrain a dominant competitor through the courts than beat it in the market." This brief for Intel is wrong. AMD is an innovation leader working as hard as it can to win in the market; the only thing missing is a competitive market free from monopoly abuse. AMD is the company leading consumer choice and value, not vice versa.

It is not competition when Intel pays a computer maker millions of dollars to cancel a new product containing AMD CPUs or when Intel threatens them with retaliation if they publicly support new AMD products. And the list of Intel tricks goes on. That's why computer makers tell us, "We think that you have great products and we wish that we could buy more of them but Intel prevents us from doing so."

The Japan Fair Trade Commission has already found that Intel violated its antitrust laws by imposing illegal, exclusive contracts on computer manufacturers. The Korean FTC is investigating and last year the European Commission gathered evidence via dawn raids about Intel's behavior. Most recently, the Financial Times Deutschland revealed the existence of an illegal and secret deal between Intel and Germany's largest retailer, Media Markt, to exclude AMD from the consumer segment.

DOJ_NMG_0073660

Despite its technology leadership, AMD has reached only 18% revenue share of the microprocessor market and, not surprisingly, most of its recent gain came after the ruling in Japan, AMD's lawsuit in the U.S. and the European Commission's dawn raids.

Thomas M. McCoy
Executive Vice President, Legal Affairs, and Chief Administrative Officer
AMD (Advanced Micro Devices)
Sunnyvale, Calif.

Competition And Antitrust Law Can Protect The Internet (HILL)

By Robert W. Hahn And Robert E. Litan
The Hill, October 3, 2006

If you doubt the effectiveness of simple slogans, the current debate over net neutrality should change your mind. As the heat of the rhetoric rises, the quality of the information has declined.

The "net neutrality" controversy centers on whether firms providing higher-speed broadband should be allowed to charge both the content providers and consumers for faster, more reliable service — pitting Silicon Valley firms like Google and eBay against the telecommunications and cable industries (which rarely find themselves on the same side, this being a notable exception).

On examination, however, one truth is clear – while both sides are prone to hyperbole and exaggeration, net neutrality enthusiasts are also just plain wrong. And the error is dangerous. If the net neutrality proponents prevail, it is less likely that phone and cable companies that operate most of the Internet pipes will have sufficient economic incentives to build needed new capacity.

Net neutrality enthusiasts believe that if Internet service providers are allowed to charge content providers like CNN.com, they will block websites for their own private gain—thus crippling the Internet. Those opposing net neutrality assert the opposite—that pricing freedom is the key to Internet innovation and the deployment of the expanded networks needed to handle rapidly growing Internet traffic.

The fact is, pricing freedom is a key to the success of the Internet. And, existing government oversight, including antitrust authority, is sufficient to rein in any potential anticompetitive behavior in those unlikely circumstances where market forces fail.

Lost in the incredibly contentious net neutrality debate in Congress and the media is the role that competition and antitrust law should play in assuring that consumers continue to have access to their preferred websites. Although net neutrality proponents have loudly complained about the danger that an Internet service provider would block access to websites they compete with or whose views they don't like, there are to date no real life examples that this has occurred (except where governments, like the one in China, block certain traffic). The reason is competition.

Network providers know that if they block access to a favored web site, their customers' swift and sure response will be to take their business elsewhere. And, in the unlikely event that a provider risks alienating its customers, the Department of Justice, the Federal Communications Commission and the Federal Trade Commission have ample legal authority under existing laws to stop the offending practice.

That is why Congress created these agencies, and already has instructed them to ensure that communications (and other) firms play fair. The FCC has already used that authority to slap down one local North Carolina Internet Service Provider, Madison River, for blocking Internet-based phone service offered by Vonage. And there remains the ability of private parties to enforce the antitrust laws – encouraged by the prospect of treble damages. Indeed, Google has recently warned that it may bring antitrust actions against Internet service providers that abuse their market power. What better evidence can there be that current law is sufficient?

Why not add even more legislative language to require regulators to issue even more rules to ensure that all Internet providers treat all websites equally? Because of another "law" – the law of unintended consequences. Net neutrality regulations could very well interfere with the carriers' abilities to enhance the capacity of their broadband networks by limiting their ability to get an adequate return on investment. This, in turn, could chill innovations ranging from telemedicine to those we could only predict with hindsight, such as eBay or Google.

Rather than heavy-handed government mandates that presume to know the best way for the Internet to evolve, we should continue to keep the "hands-off" policy that has enabled the Internet to become the powerful engine of innovation we enjoy today. The genius of competition, backed by long-standing and proven laws that block the abuse of corporate power, has worked in the past. It should be allowed to work in the future.

Hahn and Litan are directors of the AEI-Brookings Joint Center for Regulatory Studies.

DOJ_NMG_0073661

ENVIRONMENT:

Supreme Court To Take On Con Ed Case (AP)

AP, October 3, 2006

WASHINGTON — The Supreme Court indicated Monday that it is likely to consider a case involving New York City-based utility Consolidated Edison Inc. and its efforts to require UGI Utilities, a subsidiary of UGI Corp., to help pay for the environmental cleanup of several gas power plants.

The court requested an opinion on the matter from the Justice Department's Solicitor General, which usually indicates that the court will consider the matter during its current term.

The case addresses the issue of whether Con Ed can sue UGI Utilities in order to recover a share of the cleanup costs related to several gas power plants currently owned by Con Ed. The company argued that UGI formerly owned and operated the plants. UGI has countered that under the federal "Superfund" law, Con Ed cannot seek to recover costs from UGI, because Con Ed has not resolved its liability for the cleanup with the state.

The case is UGI Utilities v. Consolidated Edison Co. of New York, Inc. (05-1323).

Shares of Con Ed rose 24 cents to $46.44 in midday trading on the New York Stock Exchange. Shares of UGI jumped 12 cents to $24.57 on the NYSE.

U.S. To Delay Buying Strategic-Reserve Oil (WSJ)

The Wall Street Journal, October 3, 2006

WASHINGTON -- The Department of Energy will delay purchasing oil to fill the nation's Strategic Petroleum Reserve until after the winter-heating season, a spokesman said yesterday.

President Bush had ordered the department to halt filling the emergency crude stockpile ahead of the summer-driving season, when gasoline prices edged up to nominal highs.

Last year, the U.S. sold crude from the reserve -- a federal oil depository of 727 million barrels designed to cushion the country against supply disruptions and subsequent petroleum price rises -- to meet emergency demand in the wake of a destructive hurricane season. In June, the reserve held almost 688 million barrels of oil.

Spokesman Craig Stevens said the department had agreed to hold off collecting 1.7 million barrels owed to it from oil companies until the second quarter of 2007. Given that the department is "satisfied with the [reserve's] current level," and that it was wary of affecting the market ahead of the high-demand winter-heating season, "we have no plans currently to use the $600 million [from last year's oil sale] to fill the reserve."

He said if the department decides to start buying crude, it would be done during a period of months to minimize the impact on the market.

FBI/DEA/ATF/USMS:

Court Upholds Polygraph Tests For FBI, Secret Service Applicants (AP)

By Matt Apuzzo

AP, October 3, 2006

WASHINGTON - The FBI and Secret Service may keep using lie-detector tests to screen potential employees, a federal judge ruled Monday.

U.S. District Judge Emmet G. Sullivan's ruling ends a six-year lawsuit brought by six applicants who failed polygraph tests and were denied jobs. They said the policy violated their rights to privacy and due process.

The Secret Service has required polygraph tests for potential agents since 1985. All FBI employees have been tested since 1994.

Applicants are asked questions about their medical histories, finances, sex lives, drug use and mental health. Secret Service applicants are asked whether they have committed adultery or other sex crimes.

While those questions are personal, Sullivan said, they're not an unconstitutional invasion of privacy. Because the applicants sought positions of public trust, the agencies have the right to inquire about the backgrounds of their agents, he said.

"With regard to the Secret Service's specific questions, the agency has made a reasonable determination that there is a danger if its employees in sensitive positions could be blackmailed for some reason," Sullivan wrote. "The court will not second-guess that conclusion."

DOJ_NMG_0073662

Four of the six applicants who brought the case probably were turned down based on their answers to drug-related questions, according to court documents. All denied using drugs.

"Three people know you're lying: me, you and God," a Secret Service polygraph agent said to one applicant, according to court documents.

"No, God and I know I'm telling the truth," the applicant, Eileen Moynahan replied.

A fifth applicant was denied because she had lied about marijuana use on a Baltimore police application, prosecutors said. The sixth applicant was accused of holding his breath to try to beat the polygraph.

The lawsuit claimed the tests are unreliable, yet there is no way for applicants to clear their name. They said the stigma attached to failing the test would prevent them from getting other law enforcement jobs.

Sullivan denied that claim, noting that some of the applicants who brought the lawsuit now work in federal law enforcement jobs.

"Ultimately this will be an issue for the Supreme Court or Congress to take care of," attorney Mark Zaid said.

Ex-FBI Agent Gets 6 Years In Stock Case (WSJ)

The Wall Street Journal, October 3, 2006

NEW YORK -- Former Federal Bureau of Investigation special agent Jeffrey Royer was sentenced to a six-year imprisonment for his role in a stock-manipulation case involving a handful of penny-stock companies.

Mr. Royer also was sentenced to three years of supervised release.

He was found guilty of racketeering conspiracy and securities fraud in 2005 along with short-seller Anthony Elgindy. The government accused the two men of using confidential FBI information to depress the shares of companies that Mr. Elgindy and members of his online investment group sold short -- or bet against using borrowed shares.

"Elgindy was the master manipulator," said Judge Raymond Dearie of U.S. District Court in Brooklyn. But "without this chap and the information he sold, we would have no conspiracy."

Mr. Elgindy was sentenced to more than 11 years in prison and ordered to forfeit $1.5 million in June.

6-Year Sentence In Trading Case (NYT)

By Bloomberg News

The New York Times, October 3, 2006

By Bloomberg News

A federal judge in Brooklyn sentenced a former F.B.I. agent yesterday to six years in prison for racketeering and securities fraud related to the inside-trading prosecution of a former stock picker, Anthony Elgindy.

The former agent, Jeffrey A. Royer, 39, who was convicted after a trial with Mr. Elgindy, will be allowed to surrender to federal prison authorities by Nov. 6, said Robert Nardoza, a spokesman for the United States attorney for Brooklyn, Roslynn R. Mauskopf.

Mr. Royer was an F.B.I. agent from 1996 to December 2001, when he left to work for Mr. Elgindy, prosecutors said.

In June, Mr. Elgindy was sentenced to 11 years and 3 months in prison and ordered to forfeit $1.5 million for using inside information to make short sales and extort money from companies he criticized in an online newsletter. He was convicted last year of racketeering conspiracy, securities fraud, wire fraud and extortion. According to witnesses at the trial, Mr. Elgindy used information supplied by Mr. Royer, then an F.B.I. agent, to spread negative publicity about companies through his Web site, AnthonyPacific.com.

Prosecutors say Mr. Royer also supplied Mr. Elgindy with information about investigations of companies by the F.B.I. and the Securities and Exchange Commission.

Mr. Royer's lawyer, Lawrence D. Gerzog, did not return a call made to his office after business hours seeking comment.

Short sellers seek to profit by correctly predicting a decline in a stock's price. They sell borrowed shares, planning to buy them later at a lower price and return them to holders. Mr. Elgindy's gains from trading shares of 32 companies using illegally leaked information totaled $3.02 million, the government said.

Ex-agent Gets 6 Years In Fraud (NSDY)

By Anthony M. Destefano, Newsday Staff Writer

Long Island Newsday, October 3, 2006

Calling it a tragic case of a public official gone wrong, a federal judge in Brooklyn sentenced a former FBI agent to 6 years in prison yesterday for tipping off a Web-based stock market adviser with inside law enforcement information.

DOJ_NMG_0073663

The former agent, Jeffrey Royer, betrayed no emotion as Judge Raymond Dearie sentenced him for his January 2005 conviction.

Dearie gave Royer, who remains free on bail, until Nov. 6 to surrender to a designated federal prison.

"We must ask more of our public officials, we must," said Dearie as he sentenced Royer, 43, for conspiracy, securities fraud, racketeering, witness tampering and other crimes.

Royer was convicted with stock trader Amr Elgindy for plotting to use information about FBI investigations of companies in order to profit on the stock market.

Prosecutors charged that Elgindy, who ran a subscription-based Web site, used information leaked to him by Royer to shake down companies that were the object of negative reports by his Web service.

Elgindy, of southern California was sentenced to 13 years in prison earlier this year. Dearie said that Elgindy orchestrated the scheme, dangling the prospect of a job and other benefits to entice Royer.

Dearie noted that, without Royer's involvement, the stock schemes and extortion wouldn't have happened, although he said Royer shouldn't be held responsible for Elgindy's shakedown attempts.

Early in the case, investigators speculated that Elgindy, of Egyptian ancestry, might have had advance warning about the Sept. 11 terror attacks because of the timing of his trades, but that never was substantiated.

Just before sentencing, Royer said he leaked the information because he thought he was helping to put shady companies out of business.

The former agent apologized to his family and also to his ex-girlfriend, Lynn Wingate. Prosecutors said she was another FBI agent whom Royer persuaded to continue to leak him confidential information after he left the FBI in 2001 to work for Elgindy.

"She trusted and loved me," Royer said about Wingate, who pleaded guilty to obstruction of justice charges and received 3 years' probation in July.

City Briefs (NYDN)

New York Daily News, October 3, 2006

A man walking on the upper East Side was struck and killed yesterday by an SUV that sent him flying 30 feet, witnesses said.

"I saw something flying through the air, and I didn't know what it was. Then I thought, 'My God, that's a dude!'" said Hank Ley, 33, a doorman near the scene at 90th St. and York Ave.

The driver stayed at thescene, witnesses said. The 56-year-old victim, Yao Huang of W. 24th St., was taken to New York-Presbyterian Hospital Weill Cornell, where he was pronounced dead, officials said.

Christina Boyle and Michael White

Crane accident violations

The Tishman Construction Corp. and others involved in a near-fatal crane accident last week were socked with violations yesterday for "unsafe operation of a crane."

An 8,000-pound chunk of a tower crane that was being disassembled fell from the 21st floor of an apartment building under construction at 108 Third Ave. at 13th St. on Friday.

"Tishman Construction will do anything in its power to provide any and all information required or asked for by the Department of Buildings and the Office of Emergency Management," said Tishman spokesman Bud Perrone.

Frank Lombardi

B'klyn deliveryman shot

A man delivering merchandise to a Brooklyn 99-cent store was shot in the chest yesterday by a thug who accosted him near his truck and demanded his wallet, police said.

The unidentified 27-year-old victim was in stable condition after the 11:15 a.m. shooting in Flatbush. Police said he was trying to hand over his wallet when the gunman shot him.

Noah Fowle and Ernie Naspretto

G-man gets 6 for scam

An ex-FBI agent was sentenced yesterday to six years in prison for passing confidential information to rogue insider trader Amr (Anthony Pacific) Elgindy.

Jeffrey Royer, who quit the FBI in 2001, furnished Elgindy with criminal histories and ongoing investigations of executives that Elgindy posted on his Web site to force stock prices of companies down.

John Marzulli

DOJ_NMG_0073664

Inaccuracies Have To Do With Names In Times Report (ESPN)

ESPN.com, October 3, 2006

SAN FRANCISCO -- The federal prosecutor overseeing an investigation of steroids in baseball said Monday that a newspaper report indicating that five players, including Roger Clemens, had used illegal performance-enhancing drugs contained "significant inaccuracies."

The inaccuracies have to do with the names as they appear in the report, a spokesman for San Francisco U.S. Attorney Kevin Ryan said. The spokesman did not elaborate.

Citing sealed court filings, the Los Angeles Times reported that former pitcher Jason Grimsley had named Clemens, his Houston Astros teammate Andy Pettitte, and Baltimore Orioles Miguel Tejada, Brian Roberts and Jay Gibbons. The story first appeared on the Times' Web site on Saturday and was quickly seized on by print and broadcast media outlets.

Ryan issued a statement Monday, saying: "In view of the recent news reports purporting to identify certain athletes whose names had been redacted from the government's search warrant filings in the Grimsley matter, and in the interests of justice, please be advised that these reports contain significant inaccuracies."

A spokesman for the Times had no immediate comment. The newspaper reported that an unidentified source with access to the document allowed the newspaper to view it, and a second source provided additional details about the document.

Federal agents raided Grimsley's Arizona home in June after the pitcher admitted using human growth hormone, steroids and amphetamines. The pitcher later was released by the Arizona Diamondbacks.

In a search warrant affidavit, IRS Special Agent Jeff Novitzky said Grimsley had identified the other players as drug users. Those names were blacked out when the document was originally released.

All five players immediately denounced the story, with Clemens calling it "dangerous and malicious and reckless."

"As I have said all along, and as Andy and Roger said quite clearly yesterday, they have never used performance-enhancing drugs," Randy Hendricks, the agent for Pettitte and Clemens, said Monday.

He added that Clemens "signed up to play for his country in the World Baseball Classic this year and submitted to Olympic standard testing, including blood work, and then went out and had another good year for the Astros."

Grimsley played with Clemens and Pettitte on the New York Yankees, and is now out of baseball. The reliever has admitted using a variety of banned substances and was suspended for 50 games by Major League Baseball.

Information from The Associated Press was used in this report.

GRIMSLEY AND HGH

Former Diamondbacks pitcher Jason Grimsley told federal investigators in June he used illegal performance-enhancing drugs. A day after they searched his house, Grimsley asked for and was granted his release from the team.

Doubt Cast On Report That Named Players (NYT)

By Jack Curry

The New York Times, October 3, 2006

Two days after it was reported that Roger Clemens was among the six major league players who investigators said had been identified as having used performance-enhancing substances, a federal prosecutor said the news media coverage contained “significant inaccuracies.”

The Los Angeles Times reported late Saturday that Clemens, a seven-time Cy Young Award winner; Andy Pettitte, Clemens’s teammate and workout partner with the Houston Astros; Miguel Tejada of the Baltimore Orioles; and three other current or former Orioles were reportedly named by Jason Grimsley, a former pitcher, as players who had used the drugs. The names were blacked out in a federal affidavit that was made public in June.

But Kevin V. Ryan, the United States attorney for the Northern District of California who is investigating steroids in baseball, issued a brief statement that cast some doubt on what was in The Times’s article.

“In view of the recent news reports purporting to identify certain athletes whose names had been redacted from the government’s search warrant filings in the Grimsley matter, and in the interests of justice, please be advised that these reports contain significant inaccuracies,” Ryan said.

The prosecutor’s office declined to elaborate. A message left for a Times spokesman was not immediately returned.

Grimsley’s agent, Joe Bick, said Grimsley, who was released by the Arizona Diamondbacks after he acknowledged using steroids and other drugs and who subsequently retired, is not responsible for the naming of any players in the affidavit.

“In terms of how those names got in the document, Jason disputes the fact that he put them there,” Bick said. “Jason’s attorney made that statement a while ago, and he still feels that way.”

DOJ_NMG_0073665

Edward F. Novak, Grimsley's lawyer, did not return a telephone message yesterday. But Novak told The Arizona Republic in June that Grimsley did not volunteer any names of current or former players and merely answered questions when the investigators quizzed him about specific players.

Clemens and Pettitte, two former Yankees, both denied the accusations that were reported in The Times, as did Tejada, Brian Roberts and Jay Gibbons. David Segui, the sixth player, had previously said that he used human growth hormone.

"I'm here talking to you guys about something that is pretty much hearsay," Clemens said on Sunday. "It's ridiculous."

Pettitte said, "This has no weight behind this, as far as I'm concerned."

Randy Hendricks, who represents Clemens, noted that Clemens was on the United States team in the World Baseball Classic last March. He was subject to Olympic-style drug testing, which is stricter than baseball's testing policy. Clemens and Pettitte were teammates with Grimsley on the Yankees in 1999 and 2000.

Prosecutor: Steroids Story 'Inaccurate' (AP)

By David Kravets, The Associated Press

AP, October 3, 2006

SAN FRANCISCO -- The federal prosecutor overseeing an investigation of steroids in baseball said Monday a newspaper report that five players, including Roger Clemens, had used illegal performance-enhancing drugs contained "significant inaccuracies."

Citing sealed court filings, the Los Angeles Times reported that former pitcher Jason Grimsley had named Clemens, his Houston Astros teammate Andy Pettitte, and Baltimore Orioles Miguel Tejada, Brian Roberts and Jay Gibbons. The story first appeared on the Times' Web site on Saturday and quickly was seized on by print and broadcast media outlets.

San Francisco U.S. Attorney Kevin Ryan issued a statement Monday, saying: "In view of the recent news reports purporting to identify certain athletes whose names had been redacted from the government's search warrant filings in the Grimsley matter, and in the interests of justice, please be advised that these reports contain significant inaccuracies."

A spokesman for Ryan declined to elaborate.

A spokesman for the Los Angeles Times had no immediate comment. The newspaper reported that an unidentified source with access to the document allowed the newspaper to view it, and a second source provided additional details about the document.

All five players immediately denounced the story, with Clemens calling it "dangerous and malicious and reckless."

Federal agents raided Grimsley's Arizona home in June after the pitcher admitted using human growth hormone, steroids and amphetamines. The pitcher, who played with Clemens and Pettitte on the New York Yankees, later was released by the Arizona Diamondbacks and suspended for 50 games.

In a search warrant affidavit, IRS Special Agent Jeff Novitzky, the lead investigator in the Bay Area Laboratory Co-Operative steroids probe, said Grimsley had identified other players as drug users, the Times reported. Those names were blacked out when the document was released.

"As I have said all along, and as Andy and Roger said quite clearly yesterday, they have never used performance-enhancing drugs," Randy Hendricks, the agent for Pettitte and Clemens, said Monday.

He added that Clemens "signed up to play for his country in the World Baseball Classic this year and submitted to Olympic standard testing, including blood work, and then went out and had another good year for the Astros."

Pete Rose Admits Taking Amphetamines (AP)

AP, October 3, 2006

NEW YORK (AP) -- Pete Rose says he took "greenies" in his playing days, if only to lose a few pounds. Oh, and he doesn't bet on baseball anymore, but if he did, he'd pick the Twins and the Padres.

In an appearance on the "Late Show" taped Monday, Rose was asked by host David Letterman whether he ever used any performance-enhancing drugs as a player. Rose said he never did, but when prodded about "greenies," explained that he used them -- though they were nothing more than "diet pills."

"Well, I don't think greenies would ever help you do anything," he said. "You know, I took greenies before in spring training only because I tried to lose some weight, see."

Letterman then asked whether the pills ever helped him ward off fatigue.

"No, not like steroids," Rose replied. "If I took steroids, I'd have gotten 5,000 damn hits."

Neither Letterman nor Rose used the word "amphetamines," which were commonly nicknamed "greenies" at the height of their supposed popularity in baseball. The sport added amphetamines to its list of banned substances last year.

DOJ_NMG_0073666

Rose said he still enjoys watching baseball -- as many as three games a day -- and still holds out hope that he'll be reinstated. Letterman asked Rose who he likes in this year's playoffs.

"You sound like you're betting on baseball," Rose said, drawing laughter and applause. "You know, baseball's going to hate me -- the two teams I like are San Diego and Minnesota. And I liked the Yankees until they lost Randy Johnson, I liked the Mets, who've had a fantastic year, until they lost (Pedro) Martinez. St. Louis is going into the playoffs playing as bad as you could play. Detroit, I don't think they have the experience."

He added that he can't bet on baseball anymore "because I know too damn much about it."

"It wouldn't be fair," he said.

Rose, the career hits leader banned from baseball for betting on games as a manager, also explained the story behind the balls he signed with the words "I'm sorry I bet on baseball" that hit the market last month.

He said he signed the balls in 2005 for a friend who planned to keep them for 10 or 15 years. But the friend passed them on to a partner, and they wound up in the hands of a collector who put them up for auction -- prompting Rose to sign and market his own apology balls.

Drug Ring Suspect Pleads Guilty (ETPA)

By Tom Quigley, The Express-times

Easton Express-Times, October 3, 2006

one of 23 residents nabbed in sting. One charge dismissed in deal, but man still faces prison.

TRENTON | A Phillipsburg man has pleaded guilty in connection with Operation Stateline, a sweeping undercover drug sting that shut down a network operating in the Phillipsburg-Easton area.

Ray Edward Carter, 48, of the first block of Sitgreaves Street, faces a federal prison sentence of between 10 years to life under the terms of the agreement reached Thursday with the U.S. Attorney Christopher Christie's office.

Princeton, N.J., attorney Kim A. Otis was assigned to represent Carter, the first to plea to the federal charges.

"His nickname is Pops," the attorney said. "He's actually a very decent and straightforward honest man."

Otis said his client has a problem with drugs.

"Unfortunately he has an addiction," Otis said. "I'm hoping to do the best for him that I can."

Carter pleaded guilty Thursday before U.S. District Judge Joel A. Pisano to a single count of conspiracy to distribute and possession with intent to distribute more than 50 grams of crack. A remaining charge of conspiring to distribute the drug will be dismissed, according to the plea bargain.

Carter must also serve five years on supervised release. If he violates the conditions of the program, he faces up to five years of additional prison time, records show.

The six-month investigation conducted by the federal Drug Enforcement Agency and local authorities ended last month. The sting resulted in state narcotics charges against 23 area residents.

Phillipsburg residents Keisha Fredericks, 29, of the 300 block of Washington Street, and Edward "Sugar Ray" Rayshawn Carter, 31, of the first block of Sitgreaves Street, are considered the ringleaders of the alleged $17,000-a-week cocaine ring, a DEA spokesman said.

Investigators dubbed the investigation Operation Stateline because the dealers in the Phillipsburg-based organization often sold drugs in the Easton area, authorities allege. Federal investigators monitored cell phones, employed confidential informants, videotaped drug transactions and made undercover drug buys as they infiltrated the alleged drug network, court records show.

Investigators seized about 3 pounds of cocaine and $17,000 in cash. The cash was seized from Tim "Big Daddy" Hartwell as he tried to elude capture, authorities allege.

Hartwell, 33, of the 2200 block of Rogers Street, Bethlehem, is one of those facing federal charges along with Fredericks and Edward Rayshawn Carter.

Also facing federal drug charges are James "Unc" Armstrong, 30, of the 500 block of Green Street, Phillipsburg, Pasqual "Paco" Colon, 27, of the 600 block of Berwick Street, Easton, and Daniel "Groove" Groover, 45, of the 100 block of Washington Avenue, Phillipsburg.

All seven people facing federal charges remain in federal custody, records show. All face possible life sentences.

Court records show attorneys for Hartwell, Groover and Edward Rayshawn Carter have requested extensions from the court for further plea negotiations with the government.

Supreme Court Denies Oakmont Doc's Appeal (PTR)

Pittsburgh Tribune-Review, October 2, 2006

DOJ_NMG_0073667

The U.S. Supreme Court today declined to hear an appeal filed by a doctor convicted of trading prescription painkillers for sex at his Oakmont office.

Dr. Bernard Rottschaefer, 63, of Plum, was convicted in 2003 of 153 counts of illegally prescribing powerful painkillers, such as OxyContin, to drug-addicted female patients. He denies trading drugs for sex and has remained out of prison pending the outcome of his appeal.

Rottschaefer's lawyers filed a second appeal for a new trial last month. They claim to have found new evidence that could clear the doctor.

The five patient-witnesses who testified against Rottschaefer at trial have since sued him for malpractice. They testified during his criminal trial that they were drug addicts and that Rottschaefer prescribed the drugs to them for no medical reason, with four of the women saying they provided oral sex for prescriptions.

The women now say in sworn statements in the civil cases that the drugs were prescribed to treat chronic pain, Rottschaefer's lawyers say.

They also accuse prosecutors of allowing two witnesses to lie on the stand during trial, claiming that they were not receiving leniency from the government in other criminal cases in exchange for their testimony against Rottschaefer.

U.S. District Judge Gary Lancaster dismissed the second appeal, because the first was still pending. Rottschaefer's lawyers now can re-file the second appeal.

Doctor Again Challenges Drugs-for-sex Conviction (PPG)

By Paula Reed Ward, Pittsburgh Post-gazette

Pittsburgh Post-Gazette, October 2, 2006

An Oakmont doctor who was convicted more than two years ago of 153 counts of illegally doling out OxyContin in exchange for sexual favors will take one more shot at beating the charges.

That chance will not come from the U.S. Supreme Court, which yesterday denied a petition from Dr. Bernard Rottschaefer asking the court to hear his case on appeal.

Instead, Dr. Rottschaefer's lawyers have filed a third motion for a new trial in U.S. District Court -- the last was rejected back in January 2005 -- claiming that they again have newly discovered evidence that could have changed the outcome of his trial.

This time, the evidence is testimony in a civil malpractice case against Dr. Rottschaefer in which the women he allegedly victimized all said they had various ailments that the OxyContin helped to treat.

That contradicts the prosecution's theory in the criminal case, in which it claimed that Dr. Rottschaefer prescribed the powerful pain medication to those women with "no legitimate medical purpose," said defense attorney Eli Stutsman.

In hundreds of pages of depositions given by the five women, they admit that parts of their testimony against Dr. Rottschaefer in his criminal trial were falsified.

Mr. Stutsman called the fact that all of the women changed their stories "extraordinary."

He hopes to use the new information in the depositions, as well as letters that were written by one of the women to her boyfriend while she was incarcerated, to prove "a comprehensive scheme to tell a lie to get a better deal" in their own criminal cases.

U.S. Attorney Mary Beth Buchanan declined to comment.

Dr. Rottschaefer was convicted in March 2004 of 153 counts -- though he was acquitted of 55 more -- and was sentenced in September of that year to 61/2 years in prison. He has yet to serve any time, though, while his case continues in appeals.

Four of the five women testified at Dr. Rottschaefer's trial that they were drug addicts and had no medical need for the prescriptions they were given. But now, Mr. Stutsman said, that story has changed.

"Every complaining witness lied under oath in Dr. Rottschaefer's prosecution," he wrote. "The false testimony went to the heart of the case: whether the prescriptions were issued for medical treatment or as drug dealing."

In their depositions, the women listed ailments that were treated by the OxyContin, including migraines and a fractured tailbone.

Adolescence: When Young People Use, Parents Seldom Know (NYT)

By Nicholas Bakalar

The New York Times, October 3, 2006

Parents consistently and substantially underestimate their children's use of alcohol and other drugs, a new study has found.

DOJ_NMG_0073668

Researchers interviewed 591 adolescents ages 12 to 17 about their drug and alcohol use and then questioned at least one parent of each about what he or she thought the children were using. The analysis appears in the October issue of Alcoholism: Clinical and Experimental Research.

Parents consistently said they believed that their children were using substances less frequently than the children reported. Alcohol use was most common, with 54.4 percent of the teenagers reporting having consumed at least one drink in their lifetimes, and 23.6 percent saying they had been intoxicated. But only 30.5 percent of parents believed that their children had ever had a drink, and only 8.1 percent said their children had ever been drunk.

While 44 percent of the adolescents reported smoking cigarettes, only 27 percent of their parents knew they smoked.

Almost 23 percent of the adolescents admitted to using marijuana, while only 13.2 percent of their parents were aware of it.

With drugs other than marijuana, the results were similar: 8.5 percent of teenagers said they had used other drugs, while 3.1 percent of parents knew it.

"Parents of 12- and 13-year-olds had the lowest rates of knowledge," said Dr. Laura J. Bierut, the senior author of the study and an associate professor of psychiatry at Washington University in St. Louis. "That's worrisome, because there is good evidence that the younger you start to use substances, the more likely you are to develop addiction."

"Children are not telling you about their drug use," Dr. Bierut added. "You have to ask. Kids have access to drugs, they use them, and most parents are clueless."

New Evidence Surfaces In Bombing Case (FWST)

By Max B. Baker

The Fort Worth Star-Telegram, October 3, 2006

Six years ago, Texas Death Row inmate Michael Toney made headlines when he tried to sell seats to his execution over the Internet.

But now Toney, convicted of blowing up three people in Lake Worth on Thanksgiving Day in 1985, may create another stir as he tries to avoid the death chamber for one of North Texas' most notorious crimes.

The Texas Court of Criminal Appeals recently ruled that new evidence — including reports from the federal bureau of Alcohol, Tobacco, Firearms and Explosives discrediting the prosecution's key witnesses — is sufficient to support Toney's innocence claim and warrants another review by state District Judge Everett Young.

The Tarrant County district attorney's office says that some of the claims have been made in previous appeals. But a defense attorney representing Toney says he is convinced that Toney is innocent.

"It's one of the most egregious cases I've seen," said Jared Tyler, an attorney with the Texas Innocence Network. "For me, there is not a shred of evidence that he did it."

Toney, 40, was sentenced to death in 1999 for the briefcase bombing that killed Angela Blount, 15; her father, Joe Blount, 44; and her cousin Michael Columbus, 18.

The case had gone unsolved for a decade until Toney, who was in jail for another offense, told another inmate that he was hired to put the briefcase bomb at the mobile home. Investigators later presented evidence showing that Toney — who they said was to be paid $5,000 for the bombing — put it at the wrong trailer.

Toney always proclaimed his innocence and his efforts in 2000 to sell seats to his future execution to the highest bidder was part of a publicity stunt to attract attention to his case. The state forbade him to sell the seats.

Nicknamed "Cowboy," Toney is a prolific e-mail correspondent, writing regularly not only to reporters but also to members of the jury that convicted him. He also has a Web site on which he proclaims his innocence.

"Lies got me sentenced to death for a crime I did not commit," Toney writes on his Web site. "Since the charade of a Texas trial people have came forward and told me who killed the Blounts and why they did it."

Tarrant County Assistant District Attorney Debra Windsor, who will defend her office in court, says the way the case is being presented by the defense attorneys involves more than questions about Toney's innocence.

"It is actually an attack on this office," she said. A troubling case

Tyler and David Dow, attorneys for the Innocence Network at the University of Houston Law Center, accuse Tarrant County District Attorney Tim Curry's office of offenses including withholding reports from the Texas Department of Public Safety and the ATF that attack the credibility of the state's key witnesses, Chris Meeks and Michael Toney's ex-wife, Kimberly Toney.

Released to the defense this year for the first time, the reports suggest that Meeks and Toney may have been manipulated and intimidated into giving statements fitting investigators' preconceived notions of how and why the crime occurred.

Defense attorneys point out that by the time Michael Toney was indicted in 1997, the crime was 12 years old. The Lake Worth incident was the longest-running unsolved bombing investigation in the country, court papers state. Defense attorneys suggest that there was a renewed interest in this case by a federal agency trying to rebuild its image after the Oklahoma City bombing.

DOJ_NMG_0073669

Prosecutors were led to Toney when he allegedly confessed to committing the crime to Charles Ferris, a fellow inmate in the Parker County Jail. Already serving time in prison on a burglary charge, Toney had been transferred to the Weatherford jail on an unresolved burglary charge. Toney reportedly told Ferris that he had put the explosive briefcase on the front porch of the mobile home.

After that, investigators began looking into Toney's possible involvement in the case, which led them to Meeks and Kimberly Toney. Neither one had ever talked to authorities about Toney's role in the bombing.

Kimberly Toney testified during the trial that she, Meeks and Michael Toney went out together the day of the bombing and that they drove to a business near the mobile home park where the Blounts lived. She said Michael Toney, who was then her boyfriend, got out of their pickup, grabbed a briefcase and disappeared behind the business. He came back later without the briefcase.

Meek told basically the same story during the trial.

Defense attorneys contend that recently released reports from the DPS and the ATF show that investigators used what they call "cognitive interviewing techniques" to plant false memories into Meeks' and Kimberly Toney's minds. Those reports should have been released to Michael Toney's attorneys at the time of the trial, to show that they had not always given the same account of the crime.

Both witnesses' testimony was crucial to the state's case against Toney.

Kimberly Toney's memories in particular were "unscrupulously recovered, reshaped, and reformed, by aggressive investigators desperately trying to close" the case, court papers said.

The defense also contends that Kimberly Toney's testimony is questionable because of recently uncovered evidence that she may have suffered memory loss from chemicals she was exposed to in 1991 during the Persian Gulf War.

"At the time the investigation into the Blount bombing was reopened, it was the longest-running unsolved bombing investigation in the country. The bombing of the Alfred P. Murrah Federal Building in Oklahoma City had just occurred, and the ATF was determined to solve this crime, one way or another," court papers state. Testimony recanted

A memorandum from Tarrant County Assistant District Attorney Mike Parrish and two ATF reports that cast doubts on the testimony of Tucker Finis Blankenship were also not provided to defense attorneys at the time of the trial. Blankenship met Toney while they were in jail together, according to court documents.

Blankenship said Toney said that another man was going to pay him $5,000 for making and delivering the bomb, but that he had put it by the wrong mobile home. Since then, Blankenship has recanted those statements, and court papers indicate that Blankenship believed the cases against him would be dropped in return for his testimony.

Information was also uncovered that pointed to another man who had built a pipe bomb similar to one used in the Blount bombing and that the man's family told authorities that components used in the briefcase bomb were missing from their home. The man had also told more than one other person that he was responsible for the three deaths, court papers state.

"The fact of the matter is that the Blount bombing remains unsolved to this day, even as Mr. Toney remains on death row," court papers state.

But during the trial, Toney also admitted that he lied frequently. During the trial he acknowledged telling some people that his father is dead, others that his mother is dead, and others that he had a master's degree in chemistry.

He has also said since his conviction that he unwisely told Ferris that he could tell authorities he was involved in the Blount bombing if it would help him get out of jail by getting his charges reduced or dismissed. Ferris has since recanted that testimony, too.

Parrish has no doubts that he convicted the right person. The district attorney's office has until early next year to file its initial response to Toney's request for a review of the evidence and possibly a new trial.

"All that's been raised on state appeal," Parrish said. "There must be some new, slightly different kitchen sink they are throwing in here." <body.end> Max B. Baker, 817-390-7714

maxbaker@star-telegram.com

© 2006 Star-Telegram.com and wire service sources. All Rights Reserved.

http://www.dfw.com

Man Wanted In Shooting At Ohio Football Game Arrested In Wash. (AP)

AP, October 3, 2006

BREMERTON, Wash. - Authorities on Monday arrested a man accused of killing a man during a youth football game in Youngstown, Ohio, standing over the wounded victim on the field and shooting him several more times.

Anthony M. Caulton, 25, also known as Anthony Pfeifer, was arrested at a home in Bremerton, across Puget Sound from Seattle, after investigators developed leads that he might be hiding in Washington state, the U.S. Marshals Service said.

Caulton was wanted for investigation of a shooting at a Volney Rogers Youth Football League game on Aug. 19 at the former South High School stadium.

As many as 800 people were at the game when Caulton shot Larry D. Jones, 31, in the grandstand, police said. Jones then fled onto the field, and when he collapsed the shooter shot him several more times.

Among the witnesses were cheerleaders as young as 4.

Caulton was booked into the Kitsap County Jail pending his return to Ohio, where he has been charged with the killing in Youngstown Municipal Court.

Youngstown police said several initial requests for information about the killing got no response, and some people said they were afraid for their safety to get involved. But within days, detectives collected information that led to an arrest warrant against Caulton.

Police said the two had argued near the stadium before the shooting. The nature of the argument wasn't disclosed.

IMMIGRATION:

Supreme Court Rejects Appeal Of Nazi Concentration Camp Guard (FINDLAW/AP)

By Pete Yost, Associated Press Writer

AP, October 3, 2006

(AP) - WASHINGTON-A former Nazi concentration camp guard lost a Supreme Court appeal on Monday over the government's decision to revoke his U.S. citizenship.

Justices declined to review the case of John Hansl, a member of the SS Death's Head battalion that guarded concentration camps at Sachsenhausen near Berlin in 1943 and Natzweiler in France in 1944.

Hansl, who lives in Des Moines, Iowa, sought to distinguish his case from other former Nazi camp guards by arguing he did not hide his wartime past when he asked for a visa to enter the United States in the mid-1950s or personally assist in persecution.

An appeals court, however, agreed with a lower court ruling that Hansl's work as an armed guard with orders to shoot escaping prisoners was sufficient evidence that he "personally assisted in persecution."

In one instance, Hansl helped search for an escaped prisoner who was later shot to death, although Hansl did not pull the trigger, court records show.

The Justice Department has said that more than 70 people who assisted in Nazi persecution have been stripped of U.S. citizenship since the Office of Special Investigations began operations in 1979. The office pursues war criminals.

The Supreme Court's action means the government could begin proceedings to have Hansl deported. He was born in Croatia to parents of German descent and conscripted into the SS after Germany invaded Yugoslavia in 1941.

Hansl's attorney, James Benzoni, had told justices that U.S. immigration policy after World War II allowed visas to be issued to former concentration camp guards unless they were directly involved in committing atrocities.

On the Net:

Supreme Court: http://www.supremecourtus.gov/

Border Fence Called Impractical (WP)

The Washington Post, October 3, 2006

Building a fence in an attempt to secure the U.S. border with Mexico is impractical and would simply lead illegal immigrants to cross elsewhere, according to former U.S. Customs and Border Protection agents and other experts.

And the Mexican government agreed in a diplomatic note sent yesterday to the U.S. government, warning that the fence would damage relations between the two countries.

The Senate voted Friday to build about 700 miles of double-layered fence with access roads, lighting, cameras and sensors, to try to block five heavily used crossing points along the 2,000-mile border.

The plan, which awaits President Bush's signature, includes a sweep of fencing along most of the Arizona border, where about half of the almost 1.2 million people arrested crossing from Mexico last year were caught.

The fence would also stretch through parts of California, New Mexico and Texas.

DOJ_NMG_0073671

Former U.S. customs agents who have hunted drug traffickers in the mountains and deserts near the Arizona border said the new barrier would be defeated by the rugged terrain.

"You can't build a wall across the mountains of southern Arizona, as much of the terrain is inaccessible even on foot," veteran agent Lee Morgan said as he stood along the proposed route of the fence, east of Douglas.

The barrier would have to traverse the rugged Huachuca Mountains and other craggy ranges west of Nogales, Ariz., which are marked by bluffs and ravines that make them inaccessible to vehicle traffic, Morgan noted.

Another former customs special agent said the fencing would also struggle to bridge hundreds of creek beds spanning the Arizona-Sonora border, which are prone to flash floods from May to October.

Republican backers of the proposal contend it is necessary to prevent entry to the United States by illegal immigrants and extremists, and to prevent smuggling of weapons and drugs.

Mexican President Vicente Fox, who leaves office Dec. 1, has called the barrier "shameful" and compared it to the Berlin Wall. His spokesman yesterday urged Bush to veto the bill.

"This decision hurts bilateral relations, goes against the spirit of cooperation needed to guarantee security on the common border, creates a climate of tension in border communities," Ruben Aguilar told reporters.

Crackdown On Immigrants Empties A Town And Hardens Views (CSM)

By Patrik Jonsson

The Christian Science Monitor, October 3, 2006

STILLMORE, GA.

As Department of Homeland Security agents in black SUVs tooled up and down the dirt avenues of Stillmore, Ga., hundreds of undocumented people scattered into the woods like "flushed quail," one witness said.

Many of those who weren't arrested fled, some to Kentucky. One family hid for two nights in a tree. As night sets now, a sprinkling of solitary lights glow from once-crowded trailer parks. Since the Labor Day raid, Stillmore, where the wishful sign at the city limit reads "A town that is still growing," has shrunk by at least a third after more than 120 people were arrested and perhaps as many as 300 others disappeared.

"It's a ghost town," says resident Bennett Byrd.

As federal, state, and local officials crack down on illegal immigrants across the country, attitudes continue to harden among those who want them to stay and those who want them to go. In places like Stillmore, Ga., Arkadelphia, Ark., and Charlotte, N.C., raids and crackdowns have uncorked a phenomenon for those left behind: a sense of moral confusion about mass roundups and midnight raids.

"There's a tension between working alongside these people, understanding their impact on the economy, and then some of the issues of a community being able or not able to sustain this kind of immigration," says Allan Burns, an anthropologist at the University of Florida in Gainesville. "People are divided."

In Stillmore, the Crider plant does everything from poultry processing to packing M&Ms for the military to grilling the ribs for restaurant franchises, employees say. In a town of about 1,000 people, more than half of them were working there. The plant's success was driven by a hardworking labor supply that began arriving about four years ago.

Workers had "very good" fake documentation that fooled managers, a Crider plant spokesperson says.

In the town, few complained about the immigration status of the workers as Stillmore, once a thriving train depot, again became a destination. "People got along. The town was growing," says Don Hadden, a local carpenter.

Then, earlier this year, an investigation began by Immigration and Customs Enforcement (ICE) agents in the Department of Homeland Security (DHS). ICE agents arrested a Stillmore man in the spring, accusing him of supplying counterfeit documents to workers. The man's records were then used to identify other workers. For 10 weeks, ICE trained company managers to spot forgeries and check Social Security numbers. About 30 people who had not been weeded out by the company were arrested at the plant in an orderly fashion over Labor Day weekend, according to a plant spokesperson.

ICE agents also raided several homes in town. Witnesses say agents popped up through floor boards and broke windows.

"Everything we did [in this investigation] was in accordance with the immigration laws of this country," says Marc Raimondi, DHS spokesman.

But some, including the Southern Poverty Law Center, have voiced concerns about the searches.

"Hispanics came to Stillmore and opened up stores that had been closed for years, and now there's a sadness in how they were treated," says Father Vic Subb, who worked for a Catholic ministry in town for six years.

Proponents of immigration law enforcement say the government has a right to get tough on illegal immigrants and those who employ them. Led by Gov. Sonny Perdue, Georgia lawmakers say they will go after people who have broken immigration laws. Georgia has the fastest growing population of illegal immigrants, estimated at 470,000.

DOJ_NMG_0073672

"I firmly believe that we [as a nation] are taking in more immigrants than we have the capacity to feed, educate or employ," says D.A. King, president of Dustin Inman Society in Marietta, Ga., which opposes illegal migration of workers across the border.

This year, ICE has rounded up 2,100 people in workplace raids nationwide compared with 1,145 in 2005.

Meanwhile, more communities are signing agreements to work with ICE to undertake deportation proceedings for scofflaws and prisoners. In Charlotte, more than 600 people have been deported through hearings initiated by local officials.

It's a debate that's galvanized Congress. Sen. Mark Pryor (D) of Arkansas said immigration reform should consider the community impact of enforcement, noting a 2005 raid in Arkadelphia that detained 119 people and left 30 children behind. But last week, Rep. Russell Pearce (R) of Arizona argued for reviving Operation Wetback, the controversial 1950s-era deportation program. To deal with illegal immigration, Congress has so far approved a border fence project.

The law-and-order tack is heightening tensions, experts say.

"Because of [stepped-up raids], you're going to see more pro-immigrant activity, and anti-immigrant folks are going to want even more enforcement," says Bill Hing, an immigration law professor at the University of California, Davis.

In Stillmore, the raids forced Americans to confront their own beliefs. Residents such as Larry Hadden saw friendly and "clean" people invigorating the town's economy. To see them chased "like rabbits" through the underbrush troubled him, as did watching as women and children were left behind without resources.

Others, including resident Carolyn Byrd, see the ICE roundup as justified. Her son, Bennett, was a manager of the Crider plant for years. He said that Hispanics worked harder than anyone else. But they also took jobs, including his.

Now the plant is paying a dollar more an hour than before the raid, to draw new workers from neighboring counties. "With the illegals gone, Americans have a chance to make more money," says Mr. Byrd.

Still, there's a feeling among some that, as the undocumented go, so does the town of Stillmore. "It was very good here, but now I am too sad I can't find a good job," says Samuel Villalobos, an undocumented worker who hid out with his family in his trailer during the raid. "The trailer parks are empty, people leave very, very worried, no income, no money. It's too hard over here. Stillmore is too quiet."

Immigration Resolution Passes Early Test (CHIT)

By Josh Noel

Chicago Tribune, October 3, 2006

Despite a dissenting vote from Tony Peraica, the Republican candidate for Cook County Board president, a resolution passed a subcommittee Monday that could make the county a sanctuary for undocumented immigrants.

Modeled on legislation adopted by several large cities, including Chicago, the resolution will go before the full board after passing 3-2. It would forbid county agencies from asking about immigration status when providing services.

The co-sponsor of the resolution, Commissioner Roberto Maldonado (D-Chicago), said the measure offers symbolic support for undocumented immigrants as well as protection from real abuses.

During a brief hearing of the Law Enforcement and Corrections Committee, Maldonado cited two examples of such abuse. One was an allegation made last month that a Stroger Hospital police officer roughed up Agustin Sotomayor, 77, during an arrest and asked whether the man was in the United States legally.

The other, he said, came from the owner of Los Dos Compadres restaurant in unincorporated Franklin Park, who reported that a Cook County sheriff's police officer checked identification of would-be patrons late last month and turned away anyone without proof of being in the United States legally.

"We are sending a moral message through our government to the undocumented that we are in support of their struggle to achieve social justice," Maldonado said. "As we await comprehensive immigration reform, we stand with them."

Cook County sheriff's office spokesperson Sally Daly said the agency was unaware of the allegation against its officer until Monday. Neither Maldonado nor any citizen made a complaint, she said.

"Certainly it is concerning, but why Commissioner Maldonado would wait this long to mention it is unclear to us," Daly said. "If it's true, we take it seriously, and we will conduct an investigation."

Joining Maldonado in support of the resolution were Commissioners Joseph Mario Moreno (D-Chicago), a co-sponsor, and Mike Quigley (D-Chicago).

In a long preface to his dissent, Peraica criticized the resolution as a "feel-good piece of legislation" that violated the Constitution because county government cannot make immigration law.

"The proper channel for this is the United States Congress and the United States Senate," he said. "We would be setting a dangerous precedent if we embarked down that road."

Peraica had previously said that Sotomayor's arrest was a reflection of the poor training of county employees, but he said on Monday that the officer's behavior, if true, can't be legislated away.

DOJ_NMG_0073673

"What happened to Mr. Sotomayor is absolutely wrong and was done as the result of an ill-trained employee acting in an ignorant manner," he said. "No resolution can change that."

He called for more training for county law-enforcement officials to make clear the limits of their power regarding immigration.

Commissioner Jerry Butler (D-Chicago) joined the dissent, saying that anyone seeking services at a county health facility should be required to answer basic questions about where they live or have lived.

Maldonado said the issue will go before the full board sometime after Wednesday's scheduled meeting.

jbnoel@tribune.com

Bridging A Racial Rift That Isn't Black And White (NYT)

By Rachel L. Swarns

The New York Times, October 3, 2006

WILLACOOCHEE, Ga. — The ministers close their eyes and raise their voices to the heavens and, for a moment, they are colorless. Two men who grew up desperately poor, who picked tobacco in the fields and hauled boxes at Wal-Mart and whose life journeys ultimately led them to the Lord and to each other.

"It's like praying with a brother," said the Rev. Harvey Williams Jr., 54, who is black.

"He looks out for me and I look out for him," said the Rev. Atanacio Gaona, 45, who is a Mexican immigrant. "In the eyes of the Lord, there are no colors."

In this immigrant boomtown in Atkinson County, about 45 miles north of the Florida border, the ministers have forged a rare friendship that transcends the deep divide between blacks and Hispanics here.

For centuries, the South has been defined by the color line and the struggle for accommodation between blacks and whites. But the arrival of hundreds of thousands of Hispanic immigrants over the past decade is quietly changing the dynamics of race relations in many Southern towns.

The two pastors find that the fault lines that separate their communities sometimes test their friendship and challenge their efforts to bring blacks and Hispanics closer together.

Blacks here, who had settled into a familiar, if sometimes uneasy, relationship with whites, are now outnumbered by Hispanics. The two groups, who often live and work side by side, compete fiercely for working-class jobs and government resources. By several measures, blacks are already losing ground.

The jobless rate for black men in Georgia is nearly triple that of Hispanic men, labor statistics show. More blacks than Hispanics fail to meet minimum standards in Atkinson County public schools. And many blacks express anguish at being supplanted by immigrants who know little of their history and sometimes treat them with disdain as they fill factory jobs, buy property, open small businesses and scale the economic ladder.

"If you have 10 factory openings, I would say Hispanics would get the majority of the jobs now," said Joyce Taylor, the Atkinson County clerk, who is black. "And if you look at the little grocery stores, there are more Hispanic businesses than black businesses."

"It's kind of scary," said Ms. Taylor, 44, whose daughter was laid off from a factory here. "My children, looking forward, it may be harder for them."

Some Hispanics say African-Americans treat them with hostility and disparage them with slurs, even though blacks know the sting of racism all too well. They say many blacks are jealous of their progress and resent the fact that whites, who dominate the business sector, look increasingly to Hispanics to fill work forces. Blacks say employers favor immigrants because they work for less money.

An Area of Intense Feelings

The killing of six Mexican farm workers in a robbery last year in Tifton, about 30 miles away — and the arrest of four black men in the case — has heightened the friction. Nothing so violent has occurred here, but some Hispanics say black criminals focus on immigrants in this town, too.

Speaking of blacks, Benito González, 51, a Mexican who has worked alongside them at a poultry plant, said: "They don't like to work, and they're always in jail. If there's hard work to be done, the blacks, they leave and they don't come back. That's why the bosses prefer Mexicans and why there are so many Mexicans working in the factories here."

Such images stoke the debate over how to overcome tensions, which flared nationally this year when some African-Americans expressed anger and unease as immigrant groups hailed efforts to legalize illegal immigrants as a new civil rights movement. Although the push in Congress to create a guest-worker program has stalled, concerns about competition between black and immigrant low-wage workers remain.

DOJ_NMG_0073674

Those feelings resonate with particular intensity in the South, home to the nation's largest share of African-Americans and its fastest-growing population of immigrants, according to an analysis of census data by William H. Frey, a demographer at the Brookings Institution.

The two Pentecostal ministers who pray together are men of faith who say they believe that blacks and Hispanics should be allies in the struggle to overcome discrimination and economic adversity, even though they acknowledge that interethnic unity is often hard to come by.

Mr. Williams, a thoughtful man who studied psychology in community college, ruminates in a weekly newspaper column on topics like spirituality, ethnic relations and his recovery from cocaine addiction 20 years ago.

Mr. Gaona, whose boyish looks belie his intensity, left school after second grade to help his father work the fields in Mexico. He entered the United States illegally and started picking tobacco here when he was 24. Over the past decade, he has received his citizenship and built his church from the ground up.

The two men met working on a Wal-Mart warehouse floor in neighboring Coffee County around 1993 when Mr. Gaona was starting to deepen his faith and Mr. Williams, already a pastor, was looking for a ride to work.

Neither expected much from the acquaintanceship.

Mr. Gaona, who said his perceptions of black Americans were shaped in Mexico by news reports of crime and violence in poor urban areas, recalled, "I was thinking: 'He's black. Who knows what he wants from me?' I was just trying to keep my distance."

Mr. Williams said he never envisioned a friendship because he had never known blacks and Hispanics to be friends.

"I think I probably saw him as being a Hispanic,' he said, "and I was only going to get so close."

Over the next five years, in their hourlong weekday commuting trip in Mr. Gaona's 1988 Oldsmobile and later in Mr. Williams's 1982 Ford station wagon, they discovered common ground. Both are divorced fathers. Mr. Williams has two sons and two daughters. Mr. Gaona has five boys.

Both grew up poor, working in the fields. And both were trying to advance at Wal-Mart and searching for pathways to God. It was Mr. Williams who helped persuade Mr. Gaona to quit Wal-Mart to open the first Spanish-language church in this town.

Today, the men are remarried, full-time ministers who chat by telephone and disregard the diners at local restaurants who still gawk at the sight of a black man and a Hispanic man eating together.

But they also remain painfully aware of the fear and prejudice that remain in their communities.

Mr. Williams, who leads a working- and middle-class congregation of teachers, Civil Service workers and factory workers at the Union Holiness House of Deliverance, shakes his head as he describes the jokes about Mexicans with poor hygiene that circulate among some black people he knows.

"It was not so long ago that we were the object of jokes," Mr. Williams said. "I'm constantly having to remind people."

Mr. Gaona, whose flock at the Iglesia Alfa y Omega is dominated by factory and farm workers, says his members often describe American blacks as moyos, a derogatory Spanish term that sometimes refers to a black insect. He used the term, too, he admits, before he found God and his friend Mr. Williams.

"Every now and then, I remind them that we need to respect people, no matter how they look or their color," Mr. Gaona said. "But mostly, we don't know them, and they don't know us. There's no real communication going on."

Gaps and Similarities

The tension simmers just below the surface in the quiet communities of bungalows and trailers where the two churches are situated. Five years ago, these neighborhoods were overwhelmingly black. Today, Hispanics and blacks account for 21 percent and 19 percent of the county population of about 8,000, respectively.

Lyrical Spanish chatter competes with the sweet Georgia drawl as blacks and Hispanics share streets, assembly lines, classrooms — and hardships — that could prove to be the basis of community and political alliances. The two groups appear more likely to be poor than whites. About 36 percent of Hispanics and 31 percent of blacks live in poverty in Atkinson County, census data shows; 17 percent of whites are poor.

The two ethnic groups report experiencing some discrimination from non-Hispanic whites, who account for 60 percent of the population, and they view the blue-collar jobs in the factories that manufacture industrial fabrics and mobile homes as steppingstones to prosperity.

School administrators and sociologists suggest that the gap between blacks and Hispanics in employment and education may stem in part from immigrant parents who push their children harder to succeed in schools and the immigrant zeal to find work, regardless of how much it pays.

Many black adults, who typically have more formal education than new immigrants, seethe at the disparities. In a town where neighborliness is entrenched, blacks and Hispanics often treat one another warily.

DOJ_NMG_0073675

It is hard to envision such tension in the ministers' friendship, particularly as they laugh amid the wooden pews in Mr. Williams's church. But in many ways, they, too, keep their distance.

Despite more than 10 years' friendship, the two have never dined in each other's home. Their wives and children have never met, nor have their congregations.

Mr. Gaona does not know the black families who live near him. And he has never addressed Mr. Williams's congregation, even though his friend has invited him several times. The minister says he feels uncomfortable preaching in English.

Mr. Williams, who has spoken at his friend's church twice, says there is more to it. (Mr. Gaona's English, after all, is quite good.)

"There's still a barrier there," Mr. Williams said.

He said the worshippers in Mr. Gaona's church seemed reluctant to mingle with him after his guest sermons there several years ago.

"They are like standing on the side, you know, with their heads down as if waiting for me to leave," he recounted. "They're uncomfortable. And that's one reason for not visiting him any more than I do.

"It's one of my goals in life, to break down these nationality walls. But people are pretty divided. I just don't know if that's going to change."

Mr. Williams concedes that he, too, strives to do better. He does not know the name of the Hispanic family that lives near him. For a time, he refused to wave to Hispanic drivers on the road because they often hurt his feelings by ignoring him and the Southern tradition of greeting strangers. He has since decided to wave — no matter what.

His wife, who did not grow up around immigrants, still feels a bit uncomfortable socializing with Hispanics, despite his long friendship with the Hispanic pastor.

A Shoulder to Lean On

Mr. Gaona said he was recently taken aback when his 5-year-old came home from school and described his black classmates as moyos, the aspersion.

" 'Why you need to call them like that?' " Mr. Gaona said he asked his son. "I'm trying to share with him that's not right. But that's what he hears."

Still, on most days the two men put aside such awkwardness and focus on supporting each other.

When Mr. Gaona's computer became infected with a virus, he called Mr. Williams, who stopped by to help repair it. When state officials refused to renew his brother's driving license because his immigration papers were not in order, Mr. Gaona called Mr. Williams in frustration.

Mr. Williams relies on Mr. Gaona to interview Hispanic immigrants who ask to rent his church's social hall for parties. And it was his respect for the Hispanic pastor that helped persuade him to use his newspaper column to chastise Americans who disparaged the newcomers.

"I believe that rather than be angry or envy those who have came to America and found success, we ought to be learning from them," Mr. Williams wrote.

As the ministers meandered through their changing neighborhoods one afternoon, they considered taking their friendship to another level by preaching a joint service for their congregations. Though they knew it might never happen, they envisioned Spanish speakers and English speakers, newcomers and long timers' holding hands and praying beneath the oak trees.

On that sultry summer afternoon, it felt good to dream about the possibility. Somehow, it felt like it just might be the start of something.

"We'll get together one day soon and do one out in the open," Mr. Gaona said.

Mr. Williams replied: "That sounds good. That sounds good. We'll do that."

TAX:

Amherst Man Sentenced For Hiding Funds (BIZBUFF)

Business First of Buffalo, October 3, 2006

Amherst resident John Fortune has been sentenced to 27 months incarceration, following a guilty plea for structuring financial transactions to avoid IRS reporting requirements, according to the U.S. Attorney's office.

Assistant U.S. Attorney Gretchen Wylegala said Fortune, 62, admitted he became aware in 2001 that the banks had a duty to report to the IRS cash transactions in amounts of $10,000 or more. During a six-month-period, he acted purposefully to avoid those reports, orchestrating his cash transactions to be under that limit, typically taking amounts of $9,000 or $9,500. During that 6 month period, Fortune took nearly $150,000 in cash in 40 separate transactions, according to Wylegala.

DOJ_NMG_0073676

The conviction in June was the culmination of an investigation on the part of the FBI.

An Honest Democrat (WSJ)

The Wall Street Journal, October 3, 2006

Democrats are campaigning on "a new direction for America," but they've been deliberately abstemious with any details of what that means. New York Senator Chuck Schumer told the Journal last week that silence is their strategy because laying out an agenda "gives Republicans a target." So much for the courage of one's convictions.

Apparently, however, Mr. Schumer hasn't connected with Charlie Rangel, the 36-year House veteran from New York City who will chair the Ways and Means Committee if Democrats win a majority. Mr. Rangel has been happy to explain his own agenda on taxes and the war in Iraq.

In a recent interview with Bloomberg News, Mr. Rangel was asked specifically if any of the Bush first term tax cuts were worth preserving and he answered that he "cannot think of one." Then last week, Mr. Rangel was asked by Congress Daily whether he'd consider tax increases across the income spectrum. "No question about it," he said. "Everything has to be on the table."

"Everything" would mean repealing the 10% low-income tax bracket, the child tax credit and marriage penalty relief, all of which passed in 2001 and expire in 2010. According to the Treasury Department, repealing those provisions would raise taxes on the average middle income family by about $2,000 a year. Most Democrats say they only want to raise taxes on the rich, so give the would-be-chairman points for honesty.

Mr. Rangel has also been clear in saying he wants to "stop this war" in Iraq, and last week he was asked by The Hill newspaper how he might accomplish that. He responded: "You've got to be able to pay for the war, don't you?" That sounds like a vow to cut off funding for the war, a la 1975 in Vietnam, a point that California Democrat Lynn Woolsey reinforced by telling the same paper, "Personally, I wouldn't spend another dime [on the war]."

Republicans have jumped all over Mr. Rangel's tax comments in particular, but at least in one sense the New Yorker should be congratulated: Unlike his fellow Democrats, he isn't hiding what he believes. He's merely being candid about what he'd like to do at Ways and Means, and as a long-time Member he may feel he'll have a better chance of achieving his tax-hike goals if he talks about them more openly during the campaign. Voters won't be able to say they weren't warned.

Counting Capital Gains (WSJ)

The Wall Street Journal, October 3, 2006

Republicans haven't had any luck making the Bush tax cuts of 2003 permanent, and next year's prospects don't look promising. So now is a good time to consider some alternative tax-cutting strategies that might be more achievable.

One useful idea comes courtesy of House Republicans Mike Pence and Eric Cantor, who recently introduced a bill to index capital gains for inflation. Income tax brackets have been adjusted for the cost of living ever since the Reagan tax cuts of 1981 -- a historic pro-growth victory. But capital gains continue to suffer from an inflation tax, which yields a windfall profit for the government but reduces the value of holding long-term capital assets.

This situation stretches back to 1913, when the Treasury Department decided to define the word "cost" in the tax code as meaning historical dollars, rather than current dollars. Capital gains taxes are due whenever an asset yields a nominal gain, even if the investment is a loser in real terms. So an investor who purchased a stock for $10 in 1956, and sold it for $20 today, would still pay a 15% capital gains tax on the transaction, even though adjusted for 50 years of inflation he'd be a net loser.

From 1979 to 1994, roughly 33% of the increase in shareholder wealth, or some $1.5 trillion, was due to inflation. This means Americans are paying far higher capital gains tax rates than advertised. A 1993 study by then Federal Reserve Board Governor Wayne Angell calculated that the average real tax rate on investments from 1972 to 1992 in Nasdaq stocks was 68%. It was 101% in the S&P 500, 123% in the NYSE, and 233% in the Dow Jones Industrials. On three of the four major indexes, the average taxes were higher than the actual return.

Granted, this problem is less severe now than during the hyper-inflation of the 1970s. The capital gains bite is also less severe because Congress has cut the rate to 15% from as high as 28% as recently as 1996. This capital gains differential from the top income-tax rate of 35% is intended in part to offset the fact that capital losses are deductible against overall income only up to $3,000 a year.

But inflation remains a hidden thief that transfers gains unfairly to the government from taxpayers. The Pence-Cantor bill would protect against this by allowing any taxpayer holding an asset for more than three years to have a gain or loss determined by a cost basis adjusted for inflation. The proposal would immediately raise the after-tax return on capital investment, thus providing an incentive for more of it.

DOJ_NMG_0073677

The Bush Administration should consider getting behind the bill, but it might also be able to achieve the same result without legislation -- that is, via executive order. The tax code says only that taxes must be paid on gains as measured by the increase from the "basis" a taxpayer has in the property. The code then defines that basis as "the cost of such property," but without declaring whether that cost is real (after inflation) or nominal. If Treasury had the authority to define "cost" in one manner in 1913, it surely has the authority to redefine "cost" today.

President George H. W. Bush flinched from making this change in 1992 on the advice of government lawyers who argued that the definition of "cost" had been around so long that only Congress could now change it. But that legal interpretation is open to argument, all the more so given that inflation is once again making a comeback, albeit far more modestly than in the 1970s. Nonetheless, an inflation rate of 3% over a decade devalues the dollar value of a financial asset by about 35%. Academics have also argued that a President could redefine cost to allow, for instance, the indexing of depreciation schedules -- another bow to fairness and a boost for investment.

The Bush tax cuts expire in 2010, so taxes are sure to be a major policy battleground leading up to the 2008 Presidential race. New Treasury Secretary Hank Paulson will also be looking for ways to make his mark in the final two years of this Presidency, and removing inflated capital gains from taxation is one way to do that and help the economy.

CONGRESS-ADMINISTRATION:

Book And E-mails Hit Republican Nerves (FT)

By Caroline Daniel And Guy Dinmore In Washington

Financial Times, October 3, 2006

US Republicans are facing challenges to their credibility this week on two of their strongest themes – family values and national security – with questions on whether the leadership had covered up a scandal involving a congressman sending ex-plicit e-mails to teenage boys, and whether the White House has covered up rising problems in Iraq.

The FBI said it would look into e-mails sent to under-age congressional pages by Mark Foley, a 52-year-old Republican congressman from Florida who resigned on Friday and on Monday said he would enter rehab to deal with his alcoholism.

The real political damage could arise from concern that the Republican leadership, including Dennis Hastert, the House speaker, had been slow to investigate the allegations fully and had failed to remove Mr Foley as chairman of the House caucus on missing and exploited children.

Mr Hastert said on Monday: “Congressman Foley duped a lot of people. I’ve known him for all the years he has worked in this House and he deceived me, too.”

In an effort to contain the fallout, and with Democratic critics asking, “Why did GOP leaders sit on Foley e-mails?” Mr Hastert called for an internal review and a Justice Department inquiry into who had seen the messages that Mr Foley had sent. An initial review by the leadership – which did not include the most explicit e-mails disclosed last week – had concluded that his messages were simply “over-friendly”.

“Initially I just thought that this would cost them a seat and the public would just chalk it up to yet another sleazebag politician,” said Charlie Cook, publisher of the Cook Political Report. “As articles turned toward cover-up/ inaction, it’s just one more nail in the coffin for this majority.”

Republicans had hoped to make national security the dominant election issue and had been poised to exploit last week’s victory on Capitol Hill – approval of new rules on interrogations and military tribunals – to paint Democrats as weak on national security.

That plan for this week has been thrown off course by the publication of Bob Woodward’s book State of Denial, which revealed an administration divided and disorganised over Iraq, and a new biography of Colin Powell, which says the former secretary of state warned the president of the growing insurgency.

One of the most damaging allegations from Mr Woodward is that Condoleezza Rice, the present secretary of state, brushed off warnings of a possible al-Qaeda attack on the US delivered by George Tenet, then chief of the CIA, and Cofer Black, head of counter-terrorism, at an emergency meeting on July 10 2001.

On her way to the Middle East, Ms Rice said that she could not specifically recall a meeting, and flatly denied being warned by Mr Tenet of an attack on the US. “What I am quite certain of, however, is that I would remember if I was told – as this account apparently says – that there was about to be an attack in the United States. The idea that I would somehow have ignored that I find incomprehensible.”

Ms Rice said that Philip Zelikow, her senior policy adviser on the region and the former executive director of the 9/11 commission, had stayed in Washington “to help reconstruct from the commission side what happened”.

DOJ_NMG_0073678

Mr Zelikow was quoted by the New York Times as saying no witness before the 9/11 commission had drawn attention to such a meeting as described by Mr Woodward.

Mr Cook said the events of the last few days marked an inflection point. “The spotlight is shifting away from terrorism, 9/11, national security and falling gasoline prices back on to Iraq, how we got there and mistakes made by the Bush administration on how we have waged the war.”

Party's Handling Of Foley Riles Up Voters Frustrated By Immigration, Spending (WSJ)

By Jackie Calmes

The Wall Street Journal, October 3, 2006

WASHINGTON -- As the scandal over former Rep. Mark Foley has expanded to entwine Republican leaders who knew of his emails to underage male House pages but took little action, the party has new reason to worry about two key constituencies: Christian conservatives and suburban soccer moms.

Long before the disclosure of the unduly personal Foley emails and separate, sexually explicit instant messages last week, and the six-term Florida Republican's sudden resignation, his colleagues were fretful that many conservatives would stay home on Election Day, turned off by high federal spending, illegal immigration and inaction on a number of social issues. Moderate suburbanites, meanwhile, complain of a party agenda that is too beholden to the conservatives on issues such as federal funding for medical research using embryonic stem cells, which President Bush vetoed in July.

Speaker of the House Dennis Hastert (R., Ill.) and John Shimkus (R., Ill.) say2 no Republican leaders were aware of inappropriate emails by Mark Foley until ABC News broke the story last Friday.

Greg Valliere, chief political strategist for Stanford Washington Research, says3 that the Foley sex scandal and its cover-up puts Republican chances in upcoming mid-term elections "in real jeopardy."

REPRESENTATIVE RACES

4 · Look at local issues5 facing voters in nine congressional districts nationwide - from southern Connecticut to suburban Seattle to Mark Foley's Florida district.

Now the Foley fallout has united both Republican voter groups in anger, just five weeks before midterm elections that will determine whether the party holds its House and Senate majorities.

"It's one of the worst congressional scandals ever. A top House Republican who denounced sex predators as 'animals' stands accused of acting like one," Cliff Kincaid, editor of the conservative Accuracy in Media Report, wrote in an editorial circulated by the pro-Republican Web site GOPUSA.com. His headline reflected an ire that went beyond Mr. Foley to envelop other House Republicans who acknowledge they had heard complaints about Mr. Foley's questionable contacts with a former page. "Who Protected the Perverted Congressman?" it read.

"I think there's more pain to come" for Republicans, says party pollster Tony Fabrizio. With clients among House, Senate and gubernatorial candidates in places such as suburban Philadelphia and swing-state Minnesota, he adds, "I'm very much watching how these things play out."

Democrats need a net gain of 15 seats to win a House majority and six seats in the Senate. Many of the Republicans' most vulnerable House districts are in a swath from the moderate Northeast westward through the Ohio River valley, and in suburban districts in Arizona, Florida, Washington state and elsewhere where Republicans already were on the defensive. Democratic pollster Peter Hart, noting that Republicans already have lost the support of most independent voters, says, "Voters in general want change, and this just puts another nail in the Republicans' coffin."

"At the end of the day," the Republican Mr. Fabrizio says, "we need moderate voters to save people like Chris Shays," a Connecticut Republican who is among the most endangered incumbents.

"The Republican Party holds itself out, rightly or wrongly, as the guardian of values, and for something like this to occur does not bode well for the party," said Tony Perkins, head of the conservative Family Research Council and a frequent ally of Republican leaders. As for Christian conservative voters, "there's clearly a lack of enthusiasm as compared to" the 2004 election.

Yesterday, House Speaker Dennis Hastert and Rep. John Shimkus, chairman of the House Page Board, again sought to contain the damage with a statement to reporters reiterating their disgust with Mr. Foley and their determination to help state and federal authorities pursue the matter. The two Illinois Republicans left without answering questions.

Later Mr. Hastert spoke to a smaller group of reporters, providing his most complete account to date. The speaker said a portion of a Foley email to a former page from Louisiana asking for a photo of the teenager was "a red flag." But he said his staff didn't need to "bump it up to me at that time."

Democrats charged that the failure of Republicans to take the initial 2005 complaint, from the parents of a then-16-year-old boy, to the bipartisan six-member board that oversees the page program was evidence of Republicans' desire to shield Mr. Foley

DOJ_NMG_0073679

-- and the party's House majority. The board's top Democrat, Michigan Rep. Dale Kildee, has said that Mr. Shimkus, the board's Republican chairman, never told him of the issue.

Yet Rep. Tom Reynolds of New York, who heads the House Republicans' campaign committee, was informed of the questionable Foley emails. Mr. Reynolds says he raised the Foley matter with Mr. Hastert last spring, though the Speaker reiterated yesterday that he doesn't recall such a conversation.

The matter further imperils Mr. Reynolds. Though the House and Senate campaign chiefs of both parties typically get those jobs because they are safe at home, Mr. Reynolds already had reason to worry about his hold on his moderate-to-conservative upstate New York district. Wealthy local businessman Jack Davis, his Democratic foe, has vowed to spend $2 million. Tomorrow, first lady Laura Bush will campaign for Mr. Reynolds in his suburban Buffalo district, and then separately participate in a local radio program about youth issues.

House Majority Leader John Boehner, an Ohio Republican, conceded in a television interview late yesterday that he expected Republicans to lose Mr. Foley's seat, a seat that he had been expected to win. His comment came as Florida Republicans tapped state Rep. Joe Negron to run instead, though Mr. Foley's name must remain on the ballot. Democrats have their sights on four other Florida districts as well.

The fallout also could give impetus to Democratic candidates who previously were making an issue of online sexual predators. Among them are Ed Perlmutter, a former state senator favored to seize an open Republican-held seat in Colorado, and Phil Kellam, who is threatening freshman Republican Rep. Thelma Drake in Virginia.

Action against sexual predators on the Internet has been a popular theme for politicians of both parties. Its resonance with the public, especially parents, is reflected in the popularity since 2004 of the Dateline NBC series "To Catch a Predator," which films sting operations against suspected sexual abusers of children. Last August at the Democratic National Committee's summer meeting, Karin Johanson, the executive director of the House Democrats' campaign committee, predicted to members that Republicans would run attack ads in the fall depicting Democrats as soft on sexual predators. In anticipation, Democrats developed an Internet-safety proposal.

With Democrats now the ones on the offensive, they called on Republicans to return funds from Mr. Foley, who had been a prodigious party fund-raiser and donor. In North Carolina, the Democratic Party released a statement asking of the incumbent Republican, "Who does Robin Hayes stand up for? Mark Foley and the Republican House leadership or underage children?"

In Virginia, Dick Wadhams, the campaign manager for embattled Republican Sen. George Allen, said the campaign would donate its $5,000 from Mr. Foley to the charity Enough is Enough, a nonprofit group based in Great Falls, Va., that works against Internet-based pornography.

Leaders Face Foley Fallout (RC)

By Susan Davis

Roll Call, October 3, 2006

Facing a firestorm of criticism in the unfolding House page scandal surrounding former Rep. Mark Foley (R-Fla.), House Republican leaders held a tense Members-only conference call Monday evening to attempt to assuage lawmakers' anger about a controversy that some Republicans fear has put the majority increasingly in peril.

Sources familiar with the call described Members as "angry" and "furious," and said many lawmakers raised safety concerns about the teenagers currently enrolled in the page program.

"It's big, it's devastating, it's goes back to the idea that Washington, [D.C.,] is an immoral city," said one source familiar with the call.

Rep. Ray LaHood (R-Ill.), the sources said, went so far as to call for scrapping the House page program, which has been in place for more than 150 years. Rep. Phil Gingrey (R-Ga.) also called for the House to hold hearings on the matter, but that suggestion was not widely supported.

Unconfirmed rumors continue to swirl around Foley, who has checked into a rehabilitation facility for alcohol abuse.

House Majority Leader John Boehner (R-Ohio), mindful of press leaks, warned Members on the call not to discuss unconfirmed allegations on the conference call, but rather to contact leadership offices directly with those concerns.

The conference call came as Speaker Dennis Hastert (R-Ill.) and his aides wrestled with pressure that is perhaps unprecedented in his tenure, as divisions revealed themselves in leadership over the weekend.

National Republican Congressional Committee Chairman Tom Reynolds (N.Y.) stated publicly that he discussed the series of non-sexual e-mail exchanges in 2005 between Foley and a 16-year-old male former page from Louisiana with the Speaker earlier this year.

Hastert does not deny the conversation took place but maintains he does not recall it, and the different accounts from the two leaders was widely noted.

DOJ_NMG_0073680

"The atmosphere was foul over the weekend," said a GOP strategist close to the leadership. "People were pissed. I think the Speaker heard that and came back pretty quickly to the Capitol. The problem is that the rumor was the leadership was at each other's throats. ... The biggest problem was that they didn't all get their stories straight. Now they're all getting their stories straight, which is important."

Reynolds was not on the conference call Monday with the rest of the leadership team, though he was scheduled to have a press conference Monday night in Buffalo, N.Y., to reiterate the statement he made over the weekend about his knowledge of the Foley affair.

Leaders are furiously working to separate themselves from a series of sexually explicit online communications between Foley and an unknown number of former House pages, which were first publicly revealed last week.

Sources on Monday's conference call said Members supported the leaders' position that there was no prior knowledge of any inappropriate contact between Foley and minors.

Senior members of Hastert's staff, Rep. John Shimkus (R-Ill.), a co-chair of the House Page Board, and then-Clerk of the House Jeff Trandahl led a quiet inquiry into a 2005 e-mail exchange between Foley and the Louisiana page that was dubbed only as "over-friendly" but did result in Foley being advised to end communication with the boy at the request of his parents.

Hastert sought to separate himself from Foley, telling reporters Monday that he recalls little communication between himself and Foley, who was first elected in 1994.

"I've never had a [personal] conversation with him," Hastert said, "Other than his vote on a tariff matter at one time or another, I think."

Hastert returned to Capitol Hill on Monday to reiterate his commitment to a thorough investigation into Foley's activities and a review of the House page program.

The normally media-averse Speaker spent much of Monday interacting with the press to continue pushing his position that no member of Republican leadership was aware of sexually explicit online communications Foley had with an unknown number of former House pages.

"The instant messages, reportedly between Congressman Foley and a former page sent in 2003, are vile and repulsive to me, and to my colleagues," Hastert said, "No one in the Republican leadership, nor Congressman Shimkus, saw those messages until last Friday when ABC News released them to the public."

Hastert also has committed the House to full cooperation with any and all investigations.

The events of the past week have capped what has been a rocky 109th Congress for Hastert.

While he appears to maintain broad support in the Conference, he and his senior aides increasingly have become the target of behind-the-scenes criticism from rank-and-file Members and aides.

At the kickoff of the 109th Congress, Hastert's staff counsel Ted Van Der Meid was the chief architect of a series of partisan rules changes imposed on the House ethics committee following the admonishments of then-Majority Leader Tom DeLay (R-Texas).

The new rules deadlocked the panel for several months prompting fierce partisan gridlock on the panel until Hastert relented and the House reverted to the old rules.

Hastert was also criticized by DeLay's detractors for not having the foresight to urge DeLay to remove himself from leadership as his ethical troubles worsened and overwhelmed the House majority late last year.

When DeLay stepped down as Majority Leader on Sept. 28, 2005, Hastert was also caught off-guard when his intention to install House Rules Chairman David Dreier (R-Calif.) as temporary Majority Leader was thwarted by the Conference and resulted in a clumsy scenario under which Majority Whip Roy Blunt (R-Mo.) was given the title and Dreier was given a greater role in leadership decisions.

Hastert also was forceful in January 2006 in committing the House to passing a comprehensive lobbying and ethics reform bill in the wake of DeLay's retirement announcement and the expanding scandal surrounding disgraced former lobbyist Jack Abramoff.

The bill never became law despite repeated commitments from leaders, and the House succeeded only in passing smaller rules changes to ban former Members who are lobbyists from the House floor, and to require greater disclosure of earmarks in conference reports.

Hastert also came under fire in May when he and other Congressional leaders took on the Justice Department for what they then described as an unconstitutional raid of Rep. William Jefferson's (D-La.) Congressional office. Jefferson is the target of a federal criminal probe.

While there was bipartisan agreement that the raid raised constitutional issues regarding constitutional Speech or Debate Clause protections provided to Members of Congress, Hastert and his senior aides were criticized for their handling of the matter and for creating the appearance that they sought to protect a Member of Congress from an investigation.

DOJ_NMG_0073681

Congressional leaders filed a brief in support of Jefferson's request to have the materials returned to his office on the grounds they were obtained unconstitutionally — the appeal was struck down in court.

While Hastert has said publicly he will stand for re-election for Speaker next year, he has not similarly committed to serving for the full length of the Congress if elected.

In recent weeks, House Republicans have suggested that doubt has increased as to whether Hastert, who has diabetes and has been hospitalized several times for treatment of kidney stones and other health issues, will serve out the full Congress.

If Republicans lose the majority, Hastert is widely expected to leave the House, although he has never said so publicly.

The full repercussions of the Foley scandal have yet to play out, as well as the extent to which it could damage Hastert's standing in the House. While other Congressional leaders are elected only by their party colleagues, the Speaker must be elected by the full chamber.

If Republicans maintain the majority by similar or smaller margins, it would only take the opposition of a handful of Members against Hastert to potentially threaten his hold on the Speakership.

Leadership elections are scheduled for Nov. 15. The Speaker formally will be elected by the full House on the first day of the new session in January.

Statutory Implications Of E-Mails Are Murky (WP)

By Mary Beth Sheridan

The Washington Post, October 3, 2006

House Speaker J. Dennis Hastert has asked the Justice Department to cast a wide net in its investigation of lewd e-mails sent by a Republican legislator to young pages, even looking into whether other lawmakers learned of them and failed to notify authorities. But legal experts said yesterday that it was unlikely any such third parties would face prosecution.

"As a general proposition, mere knowledge of the fact somebody has committed a crime . . . doesn't expose you to criminal liability," said David Schertler, a former assistant U.S. attorney for the District who is now in private practice.

Hastert's office has acknowledged that his aides learned last year about inappropriate e-mails sent by then-Rep. Mark Foley (R-Fla.) to a 16-year-old page. At the time, Foley was ordered to cut off contact with the boy.

Foley resigned Friday after the revelation of much more sexually explicit messages sent to other pages in 2003.

Stephen Saltzburg, a professor at George Washington University's law school, said it was not clear whether members of Congress or their staffs actually saw any of the e-mails before the current scandal, or had only heard about them.

"That can make a big difference," he said. "But even if they had seen them, they may not have been aware of any criminality associated with that. They may have thought it was improper."

In fact, it is still not certain whether Foley broke the law by sending the messages, Saltzburg noted.

Hastert (R-Ill.) said yesterday that no Republican House leaders had seen the "vile" messages sent in 2003 until Friday. Republican officials have said the 2005 e-mails were "over-friendly" but not sexually explicit.

Legal experts said federal law and some states have an offense called "misprision of a felony," aimed at people who know of a crime and do not report it.

But Schertler said that law is generally interpreted as involving someone who participates in a coverup or has a legal responsibility to report illegal conduct.

"Ethically and morally, it raises a lot of questions" if legislators learned of a possible offense and did not report it, Schertler said. But it probably would not rise to the level of a crime, he said.

E-mails Send House GOP Scrambling (HILL)

By Patrick O'connor

The Hill, October 3, 2006

House Speaker Dennis Hastert (R-Ill.) launched a media offensive yesterday amid mounting criticism of his handling of ex-Rep. Mark Foley's (R-Fla.) e-mail to a 16-year -old page.

The Speaker, who seldom grants interviews to news outlets, held several yesterday with print and television reporters to answer questions about why Republican leaders failed to fully investigate improper e-mail sent by Foley. Hastert's staff acknowledged last weekend that they were told about e-mail between Foley and a former page from Louisiana in the fall of 2005.

Hastert has not disputed that the he was told about the e-mails by Rep. Tom Reynolds (R-N.Y.) earlier this year.

The Speaker's judgment in this case has left some within his own conference questioning his leadership capabilities. At press time, House leadership was holding a conference call with House Republican members.

DOJ_NMG_0073682

Hastert publicly maintained yesterday that his staff did everything it could have after Rep. Rodney Alexander (R-La.), whose office sponsored the page, first brought the e-mailto their attention because the page's parents did not want the incident publicized.

"In 2005, we did exactly what we thought the parents wanted us to do," Hastert told a small group of reporters about his staff's review of the e-mail from Foley to the page.

Hastert said he was not notified of that investigation until his chief of staff, Scott Palmer, and outside counsel, Randy Evans, conducted an internal investigation last weekend to solidify the timeline.

The initial investigation was conducted in coordination with Rep. John Shimkus (R-Ill.), who heads the six-member House Page Board, and former Clerk of the House Jeff Trandahl. The other members of the Page Board were not notified about the investigation.

During an earlier statement in the Capitol yesterday, Hastert tried to make a clear distinction between the language in Foley's email to the Louisiana page and the more salacious instant messages that were released later by news outlets.

"No one in Republican leadership, nor Congressman Shimkus, saw those messages until last Friday when ABC News released them to the public," Hastert said.

Despite that statement, the Speaker later said the e-mail in question did "raise red flags."

Hastert's outreach comes after a prominent member of his own leadership team disputed the his initial account about when he first heard about the e-mail in question.

Reynolds, who chairs the National Republican Congressional Committee (NRCC), released a statement on Saturday saying he first told Hastert about the initial set of e-mail last spring after the Speaker said last week that he first heard about the correspondence when news broke.

In addition to his press outreach, Hastert requested the Clerk of the House to establish a hotline for pages, former pages, their families and anyone else with pertinent information about improper contact between the pages and members or staff.

The FBI confirmed on Sunday that it is investigating Foley's activities.

The news comes just over a month before voters head to the polls to decide the fate of congressional Republicans in the next Congress. Hastert yesterday downplayed the political implications of this episode.

"This is a different issue [than] about whether we have the majority or not," Hastert said.

At press time, two conservative leaders called on Hastert and other GOP leaders to resign.

David Bossie, president of conservative advocacy group Citizens United, said, "This inaction demonstrates a lack of leadership on Speaker Hastert's part, and calls into question both his judgment and character."

Bossie told The Hill, "This is an issue of right and wrong. This is a question of honesty and integrity in government.

Michael Reagan, nationally syndicated radio show host and affiliated with Citizens United, also called for leadership resignations.

Numerous Democratic candidates have criticized Republican leaders for covering up Foley's behavior, and Minority Leader Nancy Pelosi (D-Calif.) called for leaders to be questioned by federal investigators about what they knew and when they knew it.

Many Republicans in the House are upset that they were not notified about the initial investigation and criticized their leaders' handling of the scandal.

A House conservative lawmaker said "he was very disgusted with the leadership," claiming the leaders "should have handed this over to the ethics committee immediately."

The member also questioned Hastert's memory lapse regarding his conversation with Reynolds last spring about Foley.

"I don't think I would have forgotten that conversation," the member said.

"The Speaker should have asked, 'What the hell is going on?'"

Instead of resolving this issue months ago, the matter is playing out weeks before the election, the member said.

Rep. Ray LaHood (R-Ill.), a close Hastert ally and chief of staff to former Minority Leader Bob Michel (R-Ill.), said he emailed Palmer on Sunday telling him to abolish the entire page program until these problems are sorted out.

"This whole thing is going to go a lot deeper than we all realize," LaHood said, falling short of calling for Hastert to dismiss any of his staff.

Foley's lawyer released a statement yesterday announcing that the congressman has checked himself into alcohol rehabilitation facility.

Meanwhile, the Florida Republican Party named former state Rep. Joe Negron as its candidate to replace Foley. Negron has 35 days to campaign before theelection, and his name will not appear on the ballot. He will receive all the votes cast for Foley. Democrats are now favored to capture that seat.

House Majority Leader John Boehner (R-Ohio) said yesterday on Sean Hannity's radio show that he expects Democrats to win Foley's seat in November.

Leaders over the weekend questioned the exact timeline of events about when members of the leadership knew about the questions involving Foley.

Reynolds statement on Saturday directly contradicted Hastert's initial response to Foley's resignation. NRCC spokesman Carl Forti said the campaign chief released his statement Saturday afternoon "to clarify the timeline."

Foley's office first notified NRCC staff on Wednesday night that ABC had asked them about the initial e-mail, Forti said yesterday.

An ABC News reporter then surprised some Republicans outside a rally at the Capitol Hill Club for GOP-friendly lobbyists, but the questions were about disgraced former lobbyist Jack Abramoff.

Foley's office again contacted the NRCC on Friday morning when they became aware of other instant messages that were more sexually suggestive in nature, Forti said. Upon learning of that second batch of messages, "intermediaries" approached Foley on Reynolds' behalf and told the six-term congressman that he would have to resign, the NRCC spokesman said yesterday.

Hastert yesterday dismissed the suggestion that his staff should have raised the issue with him.

"It was resolved when this thing came out, so I didn't see any reason to bump it up to me," Hastert said yesterday about his staff's review of the e-mail from Foley to a page. "There was no there there."

Boehner and Rep. Marsha Blackburn (R-Tenn.) were scheduled to make media appearances last night to make the case that there is a clear distinction between the initial e-mail and the later instant messages.

Hastert Says He Didn't Know Of Explicit Contact (USAT)

By Kathy Kiely

USA Today, October 3, 2006

WASHINGTON — House Speaker Dennis Hastert defended himself and other Republican leaders Monday against charges they did not move aggressively to investigate Rep. Mark Foley's contacts with teenage boys.

Hastert reiterated that House leaders had no knowledge of sexually explicit instant messages the Florida Republican allegedly sent to several congressional pages until ABC News reported about them Friday.

Foley resigned after ABC questioned him about them.

Speaking to reporters for the first time since the scandal broke, Hastert said House officials had no reason to press further when Foley explained a chatty e-mail to a 16-year-old boy in which the representative requested the former House page's photograph. That e-mail caused the boy's parents to complain, but it contained nothing sexually explicit.

"Would have, could have, should have," Hastert said. "We did what we thought … was prudent at the time."

Hastert's comments came as law enforcement officials in Washington and Florida outlined plans to investigate whether Foley's communications violated state or federal law prohibiting sexual solicitation of minors.

In Florida, Republicans named state Rep. Joe Negron to run in Foley's place Nov. 7. Foley's name will stay on the ballot.

"I'm going to make sure everyone knows that Mark Foley has withdrawn. He's no longer an issue," Negron said.

House Majority Leader John Boehner, R-Ohio, said it would be hard to hold onto the seat.

"In order to vote for this candidate, you have to vote for Mark Foley," Boehner said on The Sean Hannity Show on ABC Radio. "How many people are going to hold their nose to do that?"

Democrats continued to criticize Republicans for not pushing harder when Rep. Rodney Alexander, R-La., told Hastert aides last fall about the e-mail to the 16-year-old. That message was investigated by Hastert's staff and Rep. John Shimkus, R-Ill., head of the three-member House page board.

Republicans "failed to protect the children under their trust," House Minority Leader Nancy Pelosi, D-Calif., said.

Hastert refused to comment directly on the charges.

"This is not an issue of whether we have the majority or not," he said. "This is about how we protect those kids."

John Walsh, host of the television show America's Most Wanted, said he could not believe the double life that Foley led. Walsh's show profiles cases of fugitives, many of whom are accused molesters. "I feel incredibly deceived," Walsh said. "I'm absolutely appalled."

Sen. George Allen, R-Va., and Rep. Clay Shaw, R-Fla., said they will donate campaign contributions from Foley to charities. Allen is giving $5,000 to Enough is Enough, a group that advocates protection of children from Internet pornography. Shaw is giving $2,000 to the Center for Missing and Exploited Children.

On Capitol Hill, Foley's office remained locked. Hastert, who protested the FBI's unannounced raid this year on the office of Rep. William Jefferson, D-La., said he wants federal agents to have free rein. "I expect everybody to cooperate with them," he said.

DOJ_NMG_0073684

David Roth, Foley's attorney, said his client entered an alcohol rehabilitation program. Even if he is charged and convicted, Foley will receive an annual congressional pension of about $32,000 once he reaches 62, according to Pete Sepp of the National Taxpayers Union, a watchdog group.

Resign, Mr. Speaker (WT)

The Washington Times, October 3, 2006

The facts of the disgrace of Mark Foley, who was a Republican member of the House from a Florida district until he resigned last week, constitute a disgrace for every Republican member of Congress. Red flags emerged in late 2005, perhaps even earlier, in suggestive and wholly inappropriate e-mail messages to underage congressional pages. His aberrant, predatory -- and possibly criminal -- behavior was an open secret among the pages who were his prey. The evidence was strong enough long enough ago that the speaker should have relieved Mr. Foley of his committee responsibilities contingent on a full investigation to learn what had taken place, whether any laws had been violated and what action, up to and including prosecution, were warranted by the facts. This never happened.

Rep. John Shimkus of Illinois, the Republican chairman of the House Page Board, said he learned about the Foley e-mail messages "in late 2005." Rep. John Boehner of Ohio, the leader of the Republican majority, said he was informed of the e-mail messages earlier this year. On Friday, Mr. Hastert dissembled, to put it charitably, before conceding that he, too, learned about the e-mail messages sometime earlier this year. Late yesterday afternoon, Mr. Hastert insisted that he learned of the most flagrant instant-message exchange from 2003 only last Friday, when it was reported by ABC News. This is irrelevant. The original e-mail messages were warning enough that a predator -- and, incredibly, the co-chairman of the House Caucus on Missing and Exploited Children -- could be prowling the halls of Congress. The matter wasn't pursued aggressively. It was barely pursued at all. Moreover, all available evidence suggests that the Republican leadership did not share anything related to this matter with any Democrat.

Now the scandal must unfold on the front pages of the newspapers and on the television screens, as transcripts of lewd messages emerge and doubts are rightly raised about the forthrightness of the Republican stewards of the 109th Congress. Some Democrats are attempting to make this "a Republican scandal," and they shouldn't; Democrats have contributed more than their share of characters in the tawdry history of congressional sexual scandals. Sexual predators come in all shapes, sizes and partisan hues, in institutions within and without government. When predators are found they must be dealt with, forcefully and swiftly. This time the offender is a Republican, and Republicans can't simply "get ahead" of the scandal by competing to make the most noise in calls for a full investigation. The time for that is long past.

House Speaker Dennis Hastert must do the only right thing, and resign his speakership at once. Either he was grossly negligent for not taking the red flags fully into account and ordering a swift investigation, for not even remembering the order of events leading up to last week's revelations -- or he deliberately looked the other way in hopes that a brewing scandal would simply blow away. He gave phony answers Friday to the old and ever-relevant questions of what did he know and when did he know it? Mr. Hastert has forfeited the confidence of the public and his party, and he cannot preside over the necessary coming investigation, an investigation that must examine his own inept performance.

A special, one-day congressional session should elect a successor. We nominate Rep. Henry Hyde, also of Illinois, the chairman of the House International Relations Committee whose approaching retirement ensures that he has no dog in this fight. He has a long and principled career, and is respected on both sides of the aisle. Mr. Hyde would preside over the remaining three months of the 109th Congress in a manner best suited for a full and exhaustive investigation until a new speaker for the 110th Congress is elected in January, who can assume responsibility for the investigation.

After Foley, New Fears For The GOP (WP)

By Dan Balz And Jim Vandehei

The Washington Post, October 3, 2006

Republican strategists said yesterday that public revulsion over the sexually graphic online conversations between Rep. Mark Foley (R-Fla.) and former House pages could compound the party's problems enough to tip the House to the Democrats in November -- and could jeopardize the party's hold on the Senate as well.

As House GOP leaders defended their role in handling revelations that forced Foley on Friday to give up his House seat, party strategists said the scandal threatens to depress turnout among Christian conservatives and could hamper efforts to convince undecided and swing voters that Republicans deserve to remain in the majority.

There was intense anger among social conservative activists in Washington yesterday, and some called for House Speaker J. Dennis Hastert (R-Ill.) to resign.

DOJ_NMG_0073685

Republican operatives closely following the battle for the House and Senate said that they are virtually ready to concede nearly a third of the 15 seats the Democrats need to recapture control of the House, and that they will spend the next five weeks trying to shelter other vulnerable incumbents from the fallout of the Foley scandal in hopes of salvaging a slender majority.

Districts in which Republicans have effectively walked off the field include Foley's own in South Florida. House Majority Leader John A. Boehner (R-Ohio) said in a radio interview with conservative commentator Sean Hannity that the party's replacement candidate is all but doomed. Because of ballot procedures in Florida, "to vote for this candidate, you have to vote for Mark Foley," Boehner said. "How many people are going to hold their nose to do that?"

Others warned that the impact could be much greater. Tony Perkins, president of the Family Research Council and an important social conservative leader, said "there's a real chance" that the episode could dethrone the Republican majority. "I think the next 48 hours are critical in how this is handled," he said, adding that "when a party holds itself out as the guardian of values, this is not helpful."

Foley's sudden resignation came at the end of a week that had delivered a series of blows to Republican hopes in November. A National Intelligence Estimate asserted that the war in Iraq is fueling new threats from Islamic jihadists faster than the United States and allies can contain them, then a new book by Bob Woodward of The Washington Post said the administration's private assessments of Iraq are far worse than officials are telling the public. Taken together, GOP strategists said, the events of the past 10 days reversed what some Republicans had seen as a modest rebound in September after the worst days of the summer.

By yesterday, a number of GOP strategists reported widespread gloom about the party's prospects, combined with intense anger at the House leadership.

Joe Gaylord, who was the top adviser to Newt Gingrich (Ga.) when Republicans seized control of the House in 1994, was pessimistic about the party's midterm prospects. He said the fallout from Foley's resignation comes "very close" to ensuring a Democratic victory in November.

"The part that causes the greatest fallout is the obvious kind of pall that an incident like this would put on our hardest-core voters, who are evangelical Christians," he said. "The thing I have said almost since this cycle began is the real worry you have is that [Republicans] just won't turn out. This is one more nail in that coffin."

Depressed turnout would not only hurt vulnerable House incumbents but also make it more difficult for Republicans to hold the most competitive Senate seats -- many of those races are now virtually even, according to recent polling.

Hastert faces a spreading revolt among some conservatives over the way he and other GOP leaders handled the matter when first alerted to the contact between Foley and one former House page. Hastert said again yesterday that no House Republican leader knew about the most graphic communications until they surfaced on Friday, but that did little to satisfy some conservative activists.

David Bossie, who runs a group called Citizens United, called yesterday for Hastert's resignation and said other conservative leaders are likely to follow suit. Bossie said the initial e-mails alone, which included Foley's request of a minor's picture, should have prompted an immediate inquiry. "That was a cry for an investigation," Bossie said. "Why couldn't the speaker of the House muster the will to stop this?"

Leaders from about six dozen socially conservative groups held a conference call late yesterday afternoon, and participants were described as livid with House GOP leaders.

"They are outraged by how Hastert handled this," said Paul M. Weyrich, a conservative activist who participated in the call. "They feel let down, left aside. How can they allow a guy like [Foley] to remain chairman of the committee on missing and exploited children when there is any question about e-mails?"

Vin Weber, a GOP lobbyist close to the White House and to congressional leaders, said many Republicans outside of Washington are echoing Bossie.

"From what I hear, it is resonating badly and our candidates are on the defensive about this," Weber said. "The maddening thing about this is if they had done the right thing" by informing Democrats early on and investigating it fully, "there would be no political fallout," he said.

Top GOP strategists said party leaders will concentrate on trying to keep the focus of the unfolding story on Foley, rather than on how House leaders responded when informed about his contacts with former pages.

"I don't know of any race ever where the action of one member has impacted the race of another," said Carl Forti, spokesman for the National Republican Congressional Committee.

Republicans are bracing for ads that link previous scandals with the Foley case and ask, "Had enough?" Several strategists said this could be devastating in tight races. The most optimistic scenario offered by GOP strategists is that no new information surfaces and the controversy ends in the next five weeks.

DOJ_NMG_0073686

Republicans have designated state Rep. Joe Negron as the substitute candidate in Florida's 16th District, even as Boehner and others denigrate his prospects.

Republicans say they are in grave danger of losing the seat of former House majority leader Tom DeLay (Tex.), as well as those held by Rep. Robert W. Ney (Ohio) -- who agreed to plead guilty to corruption charges in the investigation into the activities of convicted former lobbyist Jack Abramoff -- and Rep. Don Sherwood (Pa.), who has been embroiled in a scandal over an affair.

In addition, Republicans have largely given up on holding the seat of retiring Rep. Jim Kolbe (Ariz.), and strategists are pessimistic about retaining open seats in Colorado and Iowa and the seat now held by Rep. John N. Hostettler (Ind.).

Some Republicans also said Rep. Thomas M. Reynolds (N.Y.), the NRCC's chairman and one of the GOP leaders who knew about a non-graphic communication between Foley and a former page, could face an even tougher challenge for his Buffalo area seat. Reynolds and Hastert sniped at each other over the weekend about who knew what and when.

Hastert Denies GOP Saw Foley's 'Vile' Messages (WT)

By Charles Hurt

The Washington Times, October 3, 2006

House Speaker J. Dennis Hastert said yesterday that Republican leaders had not previously seen the more lurid Internet "instant messages" sent by disgraced ex-Rep. Mark Foley as influential conservatives began calling for party leadership resignations over the handling of the matter.

"The instant messages reportedly between Congressman Foley and a former page, sent in 2003, were vile and repulsive," Mr. Hastert said yesterday. "No one in the Republican leadership ... saw those messages until last Friday when ABC News released them to the public."

Had Mr. Foley not resigned immediately, he added, "I would have demanded his expulsion."

Still, several well-known conservatives called for Republican resignations because, they said, Mr. Hastert and other leaders did not act aggressively enough when they first learned last year of a separate set of "overly friendly" e-mails that Mr. Foley had sent to another teenage former page.

"Speaker Hastert had knowledge of Congressman Foley's inappropriate behavior and chose to protect a potential pedophile and powerful colleague over a congressional page," David Bossie, president of the conservative group Citizens United, said yesterday.

"This inaction demonstrates a lack of leadership on Speaker Hastert's part and calls into question both his judgment and character," Mr. Bossie said. "If Speaker Hastert was willing to sacrifice a child to protect Representative Foley's seat and his own leadership position, then he surely does not share our American and conservative values."

Richard A. Viguerie, a founder of the conservative movement, called for the "immediate resignation of any House GOP leaders who had knowledge of former Congressman Mark Foley's improper contact with underage pages -- but who took no action."

Mr. Hastert told reporters yesterday that he had been unaware of sexually explicit messages sent by Mr. Foley but had been told about previous, less sordid, messages in which the congressman asked a teen boy what he wanted for his birthday and whether he could provide a photograph of himself.

"There was nothing explicit in this e-mail that I understood," Mr. Hastert told reporters yesterday. "His parents were protective of this thing and what they wanted was Mr. Foley ... to stop contacting their son."

The explanation did not convince Mr. Viguerie.

"When you have a 50-year-old man -- who is a known homosexual -- who wants a picture of a 16-year-old boy, that should send out some alarm bells," he said. "This is almost like a Clinton-type response."

Mr. Foley has refused to answer questions about his sexuality.

Nor did it convince conservative activist Bay Buchanan.

"That e-mail they call an 'overly friendly' e-mail -- that had predator stamped all over it. There's just no one in this country that can suggest otherwise," said Mrs. Buchanan, the president of American Cause.

Such rebukes by conservative supporters yesterday erased any hopes by Republican leaders that they might curtail the political fallout from the scandal, which broke last week just as lawmakers were heading home for November elections that could end their near-continuous 12-year grip on Congress.

"Most Republicans are sticking together," said Hastert spokesman Ron Bonjean. "Most Republicans understand that 30 days before Election Day, we need to stand together and find out what happened and continue fighting the war on terror and cutting taxes."

Conservative outrage echoed that of Democratic leaders.

DOJ_NMG_0073687

"Speaker Hastert again failed to answer the question that every mother and father in America is asking: How could Republican leaders choose partisan politics over protecting children?" Minority Leader Nancy Pelosi said after Mr. Hastert held a press conference yesterday with Rep. John Shimkus, Illinois Republican and leader of the Congressional Page Board.

"Republican leaders admitted to knowing about Mr. Foley's abhorrent behavior for six months to a year and failed to protect the children in their trust," she said. "Republican leaders must be investigated by the ethics committee and immediately questioned under oath."

In Florida, meanwhile, Republican leaders tapped state Rep. Joe Negron to run in Mr. Foley's place against Democrat Tim Mahoney, whose campaign had been viewed as a long shot before last week's developments. Though Mr. Foley's name remains on the November ballot, Mr. Negron will be awarded any votes cast for the six-term congressman, according to Florida election law, as well as any write-ins that are cast for him.

"Obviously I'd rather have my name on the ballot, but Mark Foley, that name is a place-holder -- that's it," Mr. Negron told reporters in Orlando yesterday. "He's withdrawn -- not in Congress, not a congressman anymore. This is going to be a race between Joe Negron and Tim Mahoney."

Former Florida Republican Party Chairman Tom Slade said chances are slim that Republicans can hold the seat.

"I think it's a death sentence ... mission impossible," he said. "The only way you win is [voters] have got to vote for Mark Foley. That doesn't appear to me to be very attractive."

On Sunday night, two days after his resignation, Mr. Foley checked himself into a clinic for treatment of alcoholism, for at least 30 days. He also has issued a statement assuming responsibility for his actions.

Last night, his attorney David Roth told CNN that Mr. Foley is "absolutely, positively not a pedophile" and "has never ever had an inappropriate sexual contact with a minor in his life."

Republicans on Capitol Hill say they feel betrayed by their longtime colleague and offered no words of comfort for him.

"Congressman Foley duped a lot of people," Mr. Hastert said. "He lied to Mr. Shimkus, and he deceived his in-state paper when they each questioned him. He deceived the good men and women in organizations around the country with whom he worked to strengthen our child-predator law. I have known him for all the years he served in this House, and he deceived me, too."

Whatever the cause, Mr. Viguerie said, it's more evidence that Republicans have lost their way.

"This isn't an isolated situation," he said. "It is only the most recent example of Republican House leaders doing whatever it takes to hold onto power. If it means spending billions of taxpayers' dollars on questionable projects, they'll do it. If it means covering up the most despicable actions of a colleague, they'll do it. They've lost their moral rudder."

·This article is based in part on wire service reports.

Analysis: Foley Shadows GOP Election (SFC/AP)

San Francisco Chronicle, October 2, 2006

(10-02) 16:44 PDT WASHINGTON, (AP) --

In a twist on the old Watergate question, the Republican Party is struggling to answer: What did GOP leaders know of a congressman's salacious exchanges with underage male pages and when did they know it?

The truth could determine not only their own political futures but also whether the party can recover from the scandal surrounding former Republican Rep. Mark Foley — and manage to remain in power after Nov. 7.

"I don't think this is so much about Foley as it is about the handling of this," Rick Davis, a Republican strategist, said Monday as the drama rocked the House GOP five weeks before midterm elections, much to Democrats' delight.

"The question becomes who's getting thrown overboard besides Foley to get this to go away," said Tony Fabrizio, another GOP consultant.

The six-term Florida congressman resigned abruptly on Friday after the disclosure that he sent suggestive electronic messages to teenage boys working as House pages. The tawdry turn of events set off finger-pointing among House Republicans and overshadowed what the GOP had hoped would be a triumphant final work week highlighting the party's national security credentials before the campaign's homestretch.

Now, the Republican Party — already facing an unfriendly political environment and the fallout from a new book critical of President Bush's handling of the Iraq war — finds itself knocked even further off message and working to contain the political damage.

Punting on Monday, White House spokesman Tony Snow told reporters: "The House has to clean up the mess, to the extent there is a mess."

On Capitol Hill, House Speaker Dennis Hastert, R-Ill., denounced sexually explicit instant messages Foley sent in 2003 to pages as "vile and repulsive" and denied that House leaders had access to them.

DOJ_NMG_0073688

However, Hastert's staff and Republicans in leadership, including Majority Leader John Boehner, R-Ohio, and Rep. Tom Reynolds, R-N.Y., the chairman of the House campaign effort, for months had been aware of a questionable 2005 e-mail exchange between Foley and a Louisiana teen. Reynolds said he also told Hastert, but the speaker said he doesn't recall the conversation.

GOP leaders are facing questions of a cover-up while Democrats across the country seize on the scandal, demanding an independent investigation and calling for some Republicans to resign their leadership posts.

Republican candidates, meanwhile, are distancing themselves from Foley and seeking inquiries. Some Republicans also are calling for accountability from GOP leaders who knew about some of Foley's behavior and failed to take action.

"If they knew or should have known the extent of this problem, they should not serve in leadership," said Rep. Christopher Shays, a Republican in a competitive re-election fight in Connecticut.

Like other Democrats, his opponent Diane Farrell called the scandal indicative of House Republicans run amok, saying: "This leadership, which has been so terribly wrong on so many policies, now seems willing to cover up events to protect its members."

Privately, some Republicans concede that the party now is in even more danger of losing control of the House and a few fear the scandal could spill over to the Senate as well. Democrats need to win 15 GOP-held House seats and six in the Senate for control after a dozen years of Republican rule.

The fear is that voters already angry with Congress and inclined to favor Democrats will view the scandal as an indictment against the GOP in general and buy into the Democratic argument that change is needed.

In light of the scandal, at least one Republican-held House seat considered safe for Republicans now may be in jeopardy — Foley's seat in Florida. His name must remain on the ballot even though Republicans chose a replacement candidate, state Rep. Joe Negron.

Seeing an opportunity, Democrats rushed to the aid of challenger Tim Mahoney, and the candidate himself wasted no time, launching a fresh round of television ads featuring former Democratic Sen. Bob Graham calling Mahoney someone who "believes in faith, family and personal responsibility."

Carl Forti, a spokesman for the House Republican campaign effort, said that's the only seat that could be affected. "I don't know of any member of Congress who's ever lost because of something a member did or didn't do," he said.

"If Democrats want to play politics with this, they're going to be bitten too," Forti said.

Still, the fallout from Foley's behavior also could complicate Reynolds' re-election bid.

The New York Republican's race against Jack Davis, a millionaire maverick Democrat, has been close for months, and Reynolds' disclosure that he had been told months ago of Foley's inappropriate e-mails plays into one of Davis' central arguments — that Reynolds, as a GOP leadership member, cares more about political dealmaking than his district.

Other Republicans in close re-election fights also are feeling heat.

In Ohio, Rep. Deborah Pryce, a House leadership member, is facing questions about what she knew, and she joined other Republicans — including Reps. Nancy Johnson of Connecticut, Clay Shaw of Florida and Heather Wilson of New Mexico — in saying they plan to donate to charities or return the contributions they received from Foley. Sen. George Allen of Virginia says he'll do the same.

For Hastert, Boehner and others in leadership but not in close races, the ramifications could spread beyond November and into House leadership elections should Republicans hold the House — now a big "if" some Republicans say.

Three decades ago, Republican Richard M. Nixon was dogged by the question of what did the president know about the break-in of Democratic headquarters at the Watergate and when did he know it.

In November 1974, Democrats capitalized on the scandal, seizing scores of congressional seats as the Watergate class swept to office.

Ripple Effect May Shake Reynolds (HILL)

By Jonathan Allen And Aaron Blake

The Hill, October 3, 2006

The political fallout from former Rep. Mark Foley's (R-Fla.) inappropriate electronic communications with underage congressional pages could spread to Rep. Thomas Reynolds' (R-N.Y.) district, according to some political experts.

As Republican leaders scramble to limit the damage to their party, Democrats are drawing a bead on the National Republican Congressional Committee (NRCC) chairman, who has admitted to knowing for months about e-mail contact Foley had with a page.

Sean Kelly, a political science professor at Niagara University in Lewiston, N.Y., said there is reason for Republicans to be worried about Reynolds' seat.

DOJ_NMG_0073689

"The story seems to have some legs, and the current explanation doesn't seem to be cutting it to a lot of people — that he knew and that he passed on the information and the parents didn't want to pursue it," Kelly said. "My perception is that a lot of people are looking at that and saying, 'So what if the parents didn't want to pursue it? It should be pursued.'"

Last week a Survey USA poll found that Reynolds is only leading his opponent by two points. Reynolds and other Republican leaders insist they knew nothing about the most salacious Internet chats, the contents of which have been posted on ABC's website.

"His insistence that he told the Speaker about this some time ago highlights … his own political vulnerability," said Thomas E. Mann, a senior fellow at the Brookings Institution.

Reynolds won a fourth term in 2004 by his slimmest margin to date, 56 percent to 44 percent. Democrat Jack Davis is making a second bid for the seat and said he will pump $2 million of his own money into the campaign.

But Republicans say the Foley story has not made them more concerned about Reynolds's prospects for reelection.

"Not at all," NRCC spokesman Carl Forti said.

Two past NRCC chairmen, Rep. John Linder (R-Ga.) and former Rep. Bill Paxon (R-N.Y.), said Reynolds will be unaffected.

"I don't think last week will have any impact at all," Linder said.

Republican leaders have been working to distinguish between less-suggestive e-mails that they say they were aware of and extremely explicit Instant Messenger conversations that they say they knew nothing about until they were reported by ABC last week.

Paxon suggested that the distinction is important in explaining why Reynolds did not pressure Foley to resign months ago.

"If you're Tom Reynolds and if you thought for a nanosecond that there was a potential scandal there, you would have taken immediate action to get Foley out of the race," Paxon said.

But Democrats say Reynolds kept the e-mail quiet for political purposes.

"When Washington and Republicans in Congress needed a moral compass, Tom Reynolds, as a member of the leadership, swept the facts under the rug and put politics ahead of protecting children," said Jen Psaki, spokeswoman for the Democratic Congressional Campaign Committee (DCCC).

Jim Campbell, a political science professor at the University at Buffalo, said the Foley scandal does not help Reynolds but it probably will not cost him his seat.

"My sense is that this is probably going to be a two-day story. As long as Congressman Reynolds indicates he followed the reasonable procedure in sending along the information about this up through the channels, I wouldn't think it would hurt him much," Campbell said.

Campbell and Kelly said Davis has focused almost entirely on economic issues and they do not anticipate a message shift in the five weeks before the election.

"I'd be surprised if Davis changes tact," Campbell said.

Local Democrats are upset that Davis has been reluctant to attack Reynolds on issues other than the economy, Kelly said.

"I think there are a lot of people in Erie County who are probably pulling their hair out," he said.

But the Davis camp launched a salvo at Reynolds late Monday afternoon.

